A decree also came forth into the neighbour Cities of the Greeks, upon the suggestion of Ptolemei (son of Donymenes 2 Maccab. 4.45.) that they should proceed in like manner against the Jews, and compell them to partake of the sacrificer, but as for such as would not come over to the Greek customs, they should put them to death, [2 Maccab. 17. 8, 9.]

17, 8, 9.] And truly other nations embraced the word of the King, and of the Israelites also many conformed to his religion, and sacrificed unto Idols, and prophaned the Sabbath, [1 Maccab. 1. 44. 2 Maccab. 2. 8.] for many of the people that forsook the law were gathered together unto them, and they made the Israelites hide themselves in dens, and in caves, for their refuge, [1 Maccab. 1. 55, 56.] others were brought by bitter constraint on the Kings birth-day every month to eat of the sacrifices; and when the feast of Bacchus was kept, they were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus, carrying ivy, [2 Maccab. 6, 7.]

But the Temple was filled with riot and revelling by the Gentiles, who loolly spent their lives with harlots, and in the holy circuit of the Temple, defiled themselves with women, and moreover brought in things that were not lawful, the altar also was filled with prophane things, which the law forbiddeth. [2 Maccab. 6. 4, 5.]

And on the 15 day of the moneth Casfeu (which answereth partly our moneth November, and partly December) in the 145 year of the kingdom of the Greeks, they erected the abomination of delolation (the detestible idol of Jupiter Olympius) upon the Altar, and built idol-altars throughout the Cities of Judah, on every side, and burnt incense at the doors of their houses, and in the streets. [1 Maccab. 1, 54, 55.]

When

On the 15 day of the month Caelor, sacrifices were offered upon the idololatrial altar, which was erected upon the Altar of God, [1. Ad Luc. ii. 49] the 145 year of the Seleucida's reign; Olympiads the 113. [1. Joseph. lib. ii. cap. 7. & 11.]

At the same time, two women which had circumcised their children, were accused to whose breasts the children being hung, after that they had bin publicly led through the City, they threw them down headlong from a wall, and destroyed their families, and those that had circumcised the infants. [1. Maccab. 4. 61, 2 Maccab. 4. 10.]

The Galatians, Advertis being their leader, inflicted the kingdom of Eumenes with a very great commotion; but, a truce being made for the space of winter, both the Galls went home again, and the King withdrew himself to Pergamus into his winter quarters, where he fell sick of a sharp disease. [Lib. lib. 45, cnm Polyb. Legat

93. Antiochus, when he saw that his edicts were despised by the people, forced every one with torments by talking of impure meats to abjure judaism. [Joseph. Bell. et. Maccab. 1. 10.] However, many of the israelites were resolved and confirmed in themselves; not to eat any unclean thing, and they chose to dye, that they might not be defiled with those meats, and that they might not profane the Holy Covenant. [1 Maccab. 1. 62-63.]

Therefore the Tyrant Antiochus, sitting in an eminent place, as President with his affairs, his army with their weapons environing them, commanded every one of the Hebrews to be snatched away, and to be eaten Swines flesh, and such things as had been offered unto idols: and if any should refuse the prophane meats, that being racked on wheels, they should be put to death. [Ioseph. ut sup.]

And many being led away, a principal person, Eleazar by name, of the priestly family, one, as being an eminent Scribe, most expert in the knowledge of the Law,¹ of 90 years of age; and therewith well known unto many of the followers of Antiochus was brought before them: who, neither yielding to eat swine's flesh, nor to pretence and diffidence to have eaten it, chose rather to undergoe the most cruel torments, than to violate the Law. [Id. ibid. 4. Maccab. 4. 18.—51.]

to violate the Law, [1*id.*, 2 Maccab. 4: 18—31].

After him, few young men that were brethren, together with their most courageous mothers, were brought before Antiochus; who refusing to raft Swines flesh, after that they had been exquisitely with new invented torments cruelly handled, ended their conquerable souls unto God. The most noble Martyrdom of these persons is found described in the fourth chapter of the second book of the Maccabees, and in the final Treatise of Josephus, touching the Maccabees, intitled ἡ τῶν μακαβίων ἱστορία. Of the emperor Respon. in the Latin Paraphrase wherof, set forth by Ruinus, these persons are reported to be brought from their Cattle named Salandrum, unto Antioch unto the King, and their names were exprest Maccabaeus, Abie, Machir, Judas, Aehas, Arathis Jacob, and the mothers name is said to be Solomon: which notwithstanding, the later Hebrew Historians call Haman.

Historians call Hamah. In Judah, about this time, Rhazis a Senator of Jerufalem gave a notable example unto others, exposing his body and soul for the defence of the Jewish religion; for his friendly affection unto his Country he was termed, The father of the Jews. [2 Maccab 14:37, 38.]

14. 37, 38.] The Kings Officers, who in Judea forced men to Apostacy, came unto the Town called Modin that they might there compell the Israelites to sacrifice, [1 Maccab. 2. 15.] Modin was a Village near Dioispolis, as Eusebius relateth in his book de vita et moribus imperatorum. Marathias son of Jonathan, which was the son of Simon, dwelt there at that time, a Priest of Jerusalem, of the family of Joarab: who was the first among the 24 courses. [1 Chron. 24. 7.] together with his five sons: (John called Caddes, or Avagades, Simon called Thasi, Judas called Maccabeus, Eliazar called Abaron, or Avagades, and Jonathan called Apphus. [1 Maccab. 2. 1, 5.] And as those seven Marryrs, who at Antioch discharged their combat received from the elder brother Maccabeus.

the common name of the Maccabean brethren, so custom prevailed that from Judas Maccabeus, if not the first of Mattathias his five sons in age (as Josephus thinks in his first book of the war, first Chapter, yet surely in the account of Prowesse, and glory thereby procured, [1 Maccab. 2, 56, 3, 4, 9, 4, 26.] they should obtain the common name of Maccabees. Howbeit, their father Mattathias or Matthias is called by Josephus, lib. 1, Belli cap. 1, (as also in the Chronicle of Eusebius, and the lesser Seder Olam of the Hebrews) the son of Alfameoneus; but in the 1300k of Antiquities, cap. 8, more expressly: ὁ ἑταῖρος τοῦ Ζαχαρίου, ὁ Ἀλφameoneus, the son of John, the son of Symeon, the son of Alfameoneus, the common sort of Hebrews will have Mattathias himself to have been called Alfameoneus, and that from him that Sir-name descended unto the posterity; of which R. David Kimchi is to be persuaded upon the 68 Psalm, v. 32, where he denoteth the word מַכְבִּי Prince.

Antiochus his officers did earnestly exhort Mattathias, being brought unto them, That, sofar as much as he was a Prince and an illustrious person, and a great man in the City Modin, and fortified with sons and brethren, he should lead others by his example to yield obedience to the Kings command: which he did not openly constantly deny, but also put to death a certain Jew whom he beheld sacrificing upon the heathen altar, at the very altar, and at the same time slew also the Kings Commissioner, (called by Joseph. lib. 12, cap. 8, Apelles) who forced men to sacrifice, and threw down the altar: after that, exhorting all who were guided with a zeal of the Law to follow him, together with his sons, he fled into the mountains, leaving all their goods in the City, [1 Maccab. 2, 16, 21.]

Then many, that fought after justice and judgement, went down into secret places, and together with their children and wives, and cattle, lived in Caves: which when it was discovered unto Philip (that Phrygian whom Antiochus had left Governour at Jerusalem, 2 Maccab. 5, 22,) the Kings Commanders, taking with them the Garrison of the Castle of Jerusalem, pursued them: and when they could not persuade them to be obedient to the Kings commandment, throwing fire into the Cave on the Sabbath day, they consumed them with their wives, children, and cattle, to the number of a thousand persons: those that were included for the honour that they bore unto the Sabbath making no resistance; no, not so much as stopping the entrances of the Caves, [1 Maccab. 2, 29, 38, 2 Maccab. 6, 21, Joseph. lib. 12, cap. 8.]

When Mattathias and his friends were informed hereof, they much lamented their case: and decreed, That if from thence forward they should be assailed by their enemies, they would repel them with arms. [1 Maccab. 2, 39, 40, 41, Joseph. ut supra.]

Unto these the company of Asideans joyned themselves: religious men who voluntarily offered themselves for the defence of the Law by arms, and all which were compelled to flee from the wicked: and having settled an army, they partly slew the impious men, and partly forced them to betake themselves by flight unto the Nations. Howbeit, Mattathias and his friends, marching up and down, threw down altars, circumcised all children whom they found uncircumcised in the coasts of Israel, and pursued the fons of pride, and the work prosperously succeeded in their hands, [1 Maccab. 2, 42, 48.]

When the Cibyrites neither durst, for fear of the Romans, detain Polyaratus the Rhodian amongst them, nor yet were able to convey him to Rome, by reason of their unskillfulness in Sea-affairs (for they were altogether mid-land-men) they were compelled to dispatch an Embassy to Rhodes, and also unto Macedonia unto L. Emilius Paulus the Proconsul, entreating them to receive the man. And the Proconsul wrote to the Cibyrites, That they should keep Polyaratus in straight custody, and bring him to Rhodes; but to the Rhodians, That they should take care that he should safely be brought unto Rome by Sea, and so the business being discharged by both of them according to command, Polyaratus was at last brought to Rome, [Polyb. in Excerptis Valerij, pag. 141.]

King Eumenes sent his brother Attalus to Rome, for the suppressing of the commotion of the Galatians; as also to congratulate unto the Senate, the conquest procured over Perseus. Which Embassy Attalus undertook so much the more cheerfully, that, because he had assisted the Romans in that war, and exposed himself unto all dangers as a willing and ready confederate, he might, by some testimony of favour and benevolence, try how acceptable that service was unto the fathers: by which hope, least he should be tempted also to procure the kingdom, Eumenes sent after his brother unto Rome: Stratus the Physician, a person of great trust and authority with him, as a faithful Elysee of the things that were done by his brother, and a trusty Monitor, if he should see him depart from his fidelity, [Polyb. Legat. 93, Liv. lib. 45.]

cause they believed him to be their friend; and when they came to meet him with a greater train than he hoped for: he began to be twine up with vain hope, being ignorant of the true cause for which he was so kindly entertained: for seeing the minds of most of the Romans were alienated from Eumenes, and believed that he had carried himself deceitfully in this war, entertaining conferences with Perseus, and watching advantages upon the straits of the Romans; some persons of especial rank were eager to draw Attalus into private debates and encourage him to lay aside that Embassy: which he had undertaken for his brother, and treat for himself: for the Senate, they said, was dissatisfied unto his brother, and desirous to censure upon him that Dominion and Power which pertained unto him. Whence it came to pass, that Attalus his mind was lifted up, inasmuch that he engaged himself unto some of the Governours to come into the Senate, and to debate with the fathers of that business. Howbeit Stratus the Physician, a person of singular prudence, and powerful eloquence, took him off from that intention; for he set before his eyes, That even for the present, he did reign no less than his brother, and for the future, he would be left the undoubted Successor of the kingdom: and that that hope could not be far distant; sofar as much as Eumenes by reason of the infirmity of his body, did daily and hourly expect the end of his life. Moreover, he said, That a new combustion came now upon the kingdom from the insurrection and tumult of the Galls, whereunto resistance could scarce be made by the consent and concord of the Kings: How much less should they be able to deal with them, if a home-bred sedition should be added unto a foreign war? Wherefore Attalus being brought into the Senate, in the first place proffered his joy for the overthrow of Perseus: and afterwards discoursed of his fidelity and readinesse of mind which he brought unto that war: then he largely entertained of sending Embassadors to the Galatians, who by their authority might draw them from arms; and reduce them to their former estate: he proceeded also to speak of the Enions, and Maronies, which he requested might be bestowed upon him: but as for the accusation of his brother, and the division of the kingdom, he wholly omitted to propound any thing, [Id. lib. 45.]

The Senate supposing that Attalus would come unto them again, and discourse of those affairs apart, promised him to send Embassadors; and expressed notable magnificence in lending those gifts, which customarily in such cases used to be given: moreover they promised to bestow upon him those Cities. But when after all these offices of humanity and courtesie had been performed unto him, Attalus departed the City, neither did any of those things which the Senate hoped for; the fathers being frustrated of their expectation, whilst he was yet in Italy, declared Ennum and Marconia to be free, revoking the promise which they had made unto Attalus. Yet the Embassy, whereof Publius Licinius was the principal Person, they dispatched unto the Galatians, [Polyb. Legat. 93.]

Amongst many Embassies of Asia, and Greece, next to this of Attalus, the Embassadors of the Rhodians drew the eyes and minds of all men upon them: they had at this time a twofold Embassy, the first whereof Philostratus discharged, the later Philostratus and Altimedes, [Id. lib. Liv. lib. 45.] for the Rhodians upon the return of that answer, which was given unto Agapellus, presently after the battle fought with Perseus, knowing the anger of the fathers against them, and hearing their threats, immediately dispatched those Embassies, [Polyb. lib. 45.]

When the Legates had first made their appearance in white raiment (as it became such as rejoiced; for if they had been clad in fordid apparel, they might have looked like mourners for the misfortune of Perseus) after that the fathers had been consulted with by Marcus Julius the Consul (whilst the Embassadors stood in the place of the public assembly) whether they would give unto them places, rewards, and a Senate, they judged fit that no Rite of hospitality should be observed towards them: the Consul being gone forth out of the assembly, after that the Rhodians, affirming that they came to congratulate their victory, and purge the accusations of their City, had requested that a Senate might be granted unto them, declared, That the Romans were wont to give unto confederates and friends both other things benignly, and liberally for their entertainment, and also a Senate; but as for the Rhodians, they had not deserved in that war to be reckoned in the number of confederate friends. Upon the hearing of which words, they all prostrated themselves upon the ground, beseeching the Consul, and all that were present, that they would not more look upon new and false criminalities to their hurt, than on their ancient deserts, whereof they were witnesses themselves, and immediately taking unto them fordid raiment, they went up and down with prayers and tears to the houses of chief persons, entreating them that they would first understand their cause, before they were condemned, [Liv. lib. 45.]

Marcus Juventius Tullius the Prætor, whose employment it was to intermeddle in the affairs between the Citizens and strangers, stirred up the people against the Rhodians, and by a new and bad example, not advising first with the Senate, nor acquainting the Consuls, made a proposition upon his own head. Whether they did approve, and would command war to be denounced against the Rhodians, and one to be chosen out of the Magistrates of that year, who should be sent with a fleet to manage the war, hoping that himself should have been the person, M. Antonius, and Marcus Pomponius Tribunes of the people opposed this enterprise: and from thence there arose a contention between the Prætor and the Tribunes of carrying on all things disorderly. The Tribunes by their intercession before the time, persuaded that the haft of the Prætor should be put off until the coming of Æmilius the General, [Id. ibid.] The Prætor was violently, by Antonius pulled from the Desk: and the Embassadors of the Rhodians, being by him brought unto the Senate, made their speeches: first Philophon, and afterwards also Asymedes, [Polyb. Legat. 93. cum Diodor. Sicul. Legat. 19. & in Photii Bibliotheca, cod. 244.] by the later of whom that Oration seems to have been made, which is found in Livie without a beginning: for Polybius witnesseth, That Asymedes having inserted his speech amongst his letters, exposed it unto publick view: which notwithstanding, the same author observeth upon that account to have been misliked by the more prudent Persons, because (peradventure in the former part of it which is wanting in Livie) he undertook the defence of his own Country in such a manner, that it was interwoven with an altogether unnecessary aculation of the rest of the Greeks.

The speech being ended, they all fell down upon their faces, and in humble manner casting down branches of Olive: at length being raised up again, they went out of the assembly: then the votes began to be demanded: such as bearing the office of Consuls, or Pretors, or Embassadors in Macedonia had been engaged in the war, were most enraged against the Rhodians. However, Marcus Portius Cato much advantaged their cause, who being of rigid disposition, at that time shewed himself a gentle and meek Senator: the speech which he spake for them in the Senate, was by himself inserted into his fifth Book of his Origines, or Derivations, [Liv.] The fathers at length, sharply and severely upbraiding the Rhodians with many things particularly, said, That the Senate well understood, had it not been for some few that were friends to the Roman people, and especially for the Embassadors themselves, in what sort the Rhodians ought to be handled, and answer was given unto them in such manner, that they were neither declared enemies, nor continued friends, [Polyb. Diodor. Sicul. and Livie in supra.]

The answer being given, Philocrates immediately went to Rhodes: Asymedes remained Lier at Rome, that he might know what things were transacted and give notice of them to his Country-men: the Rhodians, forasmuch as they seemed quit from an exceeding great fear of a war to be brought upon them from the Romans; bore the other passages, though very doleful, with a contented mind. [Polyb. and Livie.]

P. Licinius, and the rest of the Embassadors who were sent with Attalus to end the war between the Galls and King Eumenes came unto Synnas: at what time Eumenes (who after the recovery of his health, the Spring first invited abroad out of his house) had gathered his army from several places unto Sardes. At Synnas, the Roman Legats conferred with Solovetius, Captain of the Galls, and Attalus went along with them, but he would not enter into the Camp of the Galls, least their mind should be incensed by the debate. P. Licinius, discoursing with the Duke of the Galls, found him more fierce upon their intercession: inasmuch that it might seem strange, that the words of the Roman Legats should prevail so much amongst those rich Kings, Antiochus and Ptolemy, that they should presently make peace, and be of no reckoning with the Galls, [Liv. lib. 45.]

Upon the approach of the Summer, the Rhodians sent Theætetus (the Copies of of Livie have Theodotus) the Admiral of the Fleet, with a Crown to the value of 10, or, as we read it in Livie, 20 thousand pieces of gold, at the rate of 16 pound the piece, that they might by all means endeavour to contract friendship with the Romans: but they desired that amity might be requested from the Romans, that no vote of the Rhodian people should be made concerning it, or that it should be committed unto writing: lest, if they should not obtain it, besides the frustration of their Embassy, they should be more disgraced upon a repulse, & repent them of the Decree. When therefore, according to their Laws, the Admiral of the Fleet alone had power of concluding friendship, without any expresse ordinance procured; they decreed by him to send their intentions, and the truth is, That although before this, they had assisted the most noble and comely victories of the Romans, yet for the space of 40 years, they continued in their friendship, that they never bound themselves unto them by a league of amity: left left being engaged in the religion of an oath, they should cut off all hopes from other Kings and Potentates, waging wars with the Romans of obtaining assistance if need required from: but now with most earnest desire they endeavoured to procure this honour, not that they were in love with new confederates, or stood in fear of any but the Romans themselves; but that they might render themselves less suspected unto the Romans. [Polyb. Legat. 93. Liv. lib. 45. Dio. Legat. 21. vel. 22.]

Theætetus had scarce arrived at Rome, when the Caudians revolted from them: and the Mylasenses possessed the Towns of the Eueromes, the Rhodians therefore dispatching Lycus suddenly with an army, forced the Caudians, though they had procured the assistance of the Cibyrites, to submit to their government, and in a fight near Orthesia, overthrew the Mylasenses, and the Alabandens, who having taken away the Province of the Eueromes, came with united forces against them. [Polyb. & Liv. ibid.]

About the same time there was a decree published by the Senate, whereby liberty was granted unto the Carians and Lycians in general, whom after the dispatch of the war with Antiochus, the Romans had allotted unto the Rhodians: upon the receiving of which news, the minds of the Rhodians were shooke with fear, whilst they much doubted, least they had given the Crown to no purpose, and in vain expected an amity: and thus at last the Rhodians lost Lycia and Caria, after that they had been forced to endure their wars to procure them. [Polib. Legat. 93. & 140. Liv. lib. 45. Appian. Syriac. pag. 116.]

When a Senate was granted unto Theætetus, he entreated concerning the entrance into a league with the Rhodians; but whilst the fathers made delays, he departed this life, being above 80 years of age. Afterwards the Caudians and Stratonicians, that were in exile, came unto Rome, who after that they had been heard in the Senate, there was a Decree made, whereby the Rhodians were commanded to withdraw their Garrisons from Caudus and Stratonicea. That answer being received, Philophon and Asymedes with all speed halted into their Country, lest if the Rhodians should neglect to call forth their Garrisons, the beginning of other calamities should again arise unto their City. [Polyb. Legat. 99.]

About the same time, the Cnossians and Gortynians waged war with the Raucians, having made a league amongst themselves, which they confirmed by an oath; That they would not make an end of the war before that they had taken Raucus by force. [Id. Legat. 100.]

The Rhodians upon notice of the Embassy of the Caudians, when they perceived that the wrath of the Romans was nothing asswaged, were in all things obedient unto their pleasures. [Id. ib.] And thus they lost Caudus, which they had redeemed from the Commanders of Ptolemy with 200 talents: and Stratonicea, which they had received, as a great benefit from Antiochus, and Seleucus: either of which Cities paid 120 talents yearly unto their City. [Id. Legat. 104.]

The Rhodians sent an Embassy to Rome, the principal Person whereof was Aristocle. These had in their commission instructions to propound the friendship again; and to be earnest in that behalf: But when about mid-lummer the Embassadors made their appearance, and upon the grant of a Senate unto them, after the declaration of the Rhodians their obedience in all things that were enjoined unto them, had exhorted the fathers with many and sundry reasons unto an amity: the Senate returned such an answer, wherein no mention of society being made, the fathers desired it to be proper for them to vouchsafe amity unto the Rhodians. [Id. Legat. 100.]

At the beginning of Autumn, L. Æmilius Paulus, C. Sulpitius Gallus, being appointed overler of the army, went with no great Retinue to view Greece; Scipio his son, and Athenus brother of Eumenes the King, waiting upon him; he bestowed liberty upon Macedonia, and enacted laws meet for confederates. After the dispatch of his serious affairs, he instituted at Amphipolis a sport, which he had long before prepared, having sent messengers, both into the Cities of Asia, and to the Kings to give notice of it: howbeit as he compassed the Cities of Greece, he gave intimations thereof unto the Governours himself, and in that great convention of Europe, and Asia, a multitude being from every quarter, partly for congratulation, partly for to see the fight, gathered together, such vast armies of both land and sea Forces, there was observed, such abundance of provisions, and such cheapness of victuals, that there were gifts given of that kind for the most part, by the General, as well unto private persons, as to Cities and Countries; not only for present occasion, but to carry unto their houses. [Livie lib. 45.]

Labeo was sent by the Romans to destroy Antissa, in the Island Lesbos, and for the transplanting of the Laryssians unto Methymna, because at what time Antenor, (Perseus his Admiral) coasted about Lesbos, they receiving him, furnished him with victuals. [Id. ibid.]

Prusias (Vexator) King of Bithynia, with his son Nicomedes, came unto Rome: the Senate sent L. Cornelius Scipio the Treasurer, to meet him at Capua: and decreed that a most excellent house should be hired for him at Rome, and provisions made upon the publick account, not only for himself, but also his Retinue: and in the entertainment of him, the whole City had the village and countenance of one courteous friend, [Liv. lib. 45. Valer. Maxim. lib. 5. cap. 1.]

Having entered into the City with a great traine, he went from the Gate, and the judgement-seat of Q. Cuffius the Maior, and unto the market-place: a concourse of people being made on every side, he said, That he came to salute the gods which dwell at Rome, as also the Senate and Roman people, and to congratulate unto them, their conquest over Perseus, and Gentius the King; and that having reduced the Macedonians, and Scavonians to their jurisdiction, they had encreased their Empire. When the Maior had told him, That if he pleased, he would grant a Senate unto him that day; he requested two dayes space, wherein he might visit the Temples of the gods and the City, as likewise both strangers and friends. L. Cornelius Scipio the Treasurer was appointed unto him for a guide to conduct him up and down. The third day, he came into the Senate, congratulated the victory unto them, mentioned his own merits in that war; requested that he might have liberty to perform his vow, by offering to greater sacrifices in the Capitole at Rome, and one at Preneste unto Fortune; that these were his vows for the conquest of the people of Rome, and that amity might be renewed with him afresh: and that the land taken from King Antiochus, which the Galls, albeit the people of Rome had conferred it on no man, did possess, might be given unto him. Last of all, he recommended his son Nicomedes unto the Senate: he was assisted with the favour of all those that had been Commanders in Macedonia. Wherefore the rest of his demands were granted; as for the land, it was answered, That they would send Embassadors to enquire, whether it belonged unto the Roman people, and were given unto no body. That they accepted willingly the recommendation of Nicomedes. That Ptolemei King of Egypt (unto whom of late the Roman people had preserved his kingdom from Antiochus invading it) did sufficiently declare with what care the Roman people did defend the children of their confederate Kings: Moreover it was commanded, that beasts and other things that appertained unto sacrificing, whether he would offer them at Rome, or at Preneste, should be given unto the King, as to the Roman Magistrates at the publick charges; and that twenty long ships should be assigned unto him out of the Fleet which lay at Brundisium, which he might employ, until the King came unto the Fleet assigned unto him; that L. Cornelius Scipio should not depart from him, and should defray the expences both of himself, and company, till they should take ship. It is reported, That the King was wonderfully affected with joy, by that kindness of the Roman people: That he refused the rewards that were given unto him, but commanded his son to accept of the gift of the Roman people. These things the Roman Writers relate of Prusias, [Liv. ibid.]

Polybius and other Greek Authors write, That when he came into the Senate, he did low obeysance, and killed the threshold of the Senate, and called the Senators, his Tutelary gods, and used other speech not to honourable to the hearers, as misbecoming unto himself: and that for this extraordinary debasement of himself, he received a more courteous answer from the Senate, [Id. ibid. Polyb. Legat. 97. Diodorus Sicul. Legat. 22. vel 23.] Howbeit having stayed about the City not above 30 dayes, he departed into his kingdom, [Liv. fin. lib. 45.]

About the transaction of these things newscame, That Eumenes was upon his journey to Rome: who, because he had carried himself a neutral in the Macedonian war; least that he should seem to be judged an enemy, if he were excluded, or discharged from all crime, if he were admitted; there was a general law made, That no King should be permitted to come to Rome, [Polyb. Legat. 97. Liv. 46.] Afterwards being certified that Eumenes had arrived at Brundisium in Italy; they sent unto him the Treasurer, to bring this Decree unto him, and to command him to speak, whether he had occasion to make use of the Senate in any thing: if he had no request to make unto the fathers, That he should give intimations unto him, with all speed to depart out of Italy. The King, upon conference with the Treasurers, understanding the pleasure of the Senate, exchanged not a word of business with him; assuring him that he stood in want of nothing. By this means, the Romans did not only effect a hindrance of Eumenes his coming to Rome, but procured somewhat else also which was of great concernment unto them: for the kingdom of Pergamus being in great danger by reason of the Galatians; there was no doubt, but by reason of this disgraceful rejection of Eumenes, the courage of all his friends would be abated; and the Galatians betwix more courageous in the prosecution of the war. Now these things came to passe upon the beginning of Winter, [Polyb. ibid.]

Marrathias

Marrathias, having exhorted his sons unto the study of piety, and unto fortitude in the constant defence of the Law of God, commended Simon unto them, as a Counsellor and Father, but Judas Maccabeus, as the Commander of their war; as one that was excellent in valour from his youth: afterwards, blessing them, he dyed in the 14th year of the kingdom of the Greeks, when he had governed the miserable and banished company one year, and his sons buried him in the pulperies of their fathers at Modin, and all the Israelites bewailed him with great lamentation, [1 Maccab. 2. 49.—70. Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 8. 9.]

Judas Maccabeus his brethren, and all who adhered unto his father, assisted him, succeeding into his fathers place, [1 Maccab. 3. 1, 2.] who privately going into the Villages, exhorted their kinsmen, taking with them (such as continued in the Jewish Religion), they gathered together six thousand men, and called upon the Lord, That he would pity his Temple profaned by ungodly men, as likewise the City ruined, and hear the blood that cried unto him; and that remembering the unjust destruction of innocent infants, and the blasphemies that were committed against his name, he would declare his hatred against the wicked, [2 Maccab. 8. 1, 4.]

In the mean time Antiochus Epimanes, when he heard of the sports set forth by E. Paulus in Macedonia, and had a mind to exceed Paulus in the magnificence of his expence; he dispatched Legates, and Observers into the Cities, who might declare, That at Daphne near Antioch, sports should be exhibited by him: to the intent, That out of all Greece (as Polybius) or out of all parts of the World (as Diodorus delecteth) famous men might eagerly make recourse unto that show. Howbeit, Polybius in the 3rd Book of his Historie, thus describeth the order of the Pomp.

There went in the first place, five thousand men in the flower of their age, in garb like Roman souldiers, with mayled brigantines: there followed immediately as many Myrians. Next to these, three thousand Cilicians, lightly armed, and ready harnessed with Golden Crowns. After this as many Thracians, five thousand of the Galatians; and moreover some with silver Shields. After this company, 240 couple of Gladiators: Upon the back of these came a thousand riding on Pisean, or rather Nilean Horses, (as them self learned Calaubon hath corrected the place) and 3000 riding on such as were of vulgar use; and of these most had Trappings, and golden Crowns, some silver. Unto these succeeded of their confederates and friends about a thousand Horsemen, all furnished with golden Trappings. With these was joynd a wing of their associat friends, agreeable unto them in number, and accoutrement. Besides these marched 1000 choice men; whom the most excellent order of Horse-men, to the number of about 1000, did follow, called by the Greeks Agema or the Company: 1500 Horsemen in compleat armour from head to foot, called by the Greeks Cataphrasti, because both men and horses were covered with arms, did close the company: all the forementioned persons had purple coats, some of them inter-woven with gold, and portrayed with the images of live beasts: after these marched an hundred Chariots, with six horses abreast, and 42 Wagons with four. Moreover there was a Chariot drawn with coupled Elephants, and another with two Horses: and after these followed 36 single Elephants, without any order.

Next went about 800 Youths with golden Coronets, six Oxen near 5000, Tables for Holy uses about 300, Elephants teeth 800: then were carried whaever by man was believed or said to be gods or Genii; as also the images of their Heroes: some of them gilded over, others arrayed in golden robes, each one gallantly adorned with his Elogy and Motto, suitable to the Legend written of him. To these were added the Images of the night, of the day, the Earth, of the Heavens, of the morning and of the noon: 1000 Pages belonging to Dionysius the Kings Secretary, went in this pompous train, bearing silver vessels, none whereof weighed less than a thousand Drachmes. These were seconded by 600 others of the Kings Pages, carrying vessels of gold: and next to those followed about two hundred women, whose office was out of golden Chalcies to sprinkle the spectators with their sweet oynments. In the close, 80 women gloriously decked and adorned with costly rayment, were carried in litters, having legs of gold, and 500 more in others, whose legs were of silver: These things were most remarkable in the Pageantry.

After this, a great solemnity of sports, fencings, huntings, was kept for 30 dayes together: all which time variety of oynments was provided by the King: for all which played any prize. For the same purpose 15 golden jattes were brought full of oynments of saffron, and as many of cinnamon and spiknard: those sorts of oynments were bestowed the five first dayes, and with no less freedom the dayes following, oynments of oyl-olive, marjaron, and lillies. As to the treatments of the guests, sometimes 1000, otherwhiles 1500 tables were most richly spread: all which things to exact and magnificent were performed, partly out of what in Egypt he had cheated King Philometor of, being but then in his minority, herein perfidiously transgressing the tenour of his his league, partly out of friends contributions, and partly out of the spoiles of those many Temples, which he had rifled, [Polyb. in Atheniens, lib. 5. cap. 4. & lib. 10. cap. 12.]

But the glory of this preparation was eclipsed and defaced by those unworthy offices the King supplied in his own person; for he, riding up and down on a little palfrey, commanded these to passe on, these to stand, others he ordered as best pleased his own fancy; in such manner, that if his Diadem had been of none, none would have deemed him to be King, who scarce represented a servitor of reasonable quality and repute. All the times of the feast, standing at the doors of the rooms where the feast was kept; some he conducted in, others he placed at the Tables he ushered in the servants that brought in the dishes, sometimes walked to and fro, sometimes fat down, other whiles lay along the floor, oft times hopping and skipping about to remove a dish or a cup from the Table: in his viewing round the guests, he now and then pledged those that drank to him; sporting and jesting with such of the company as were merrily disposed: moreover, after many had taken their leave, in regard the feast continued a long time: he was in a disguise brought in by the Atticks and layed along upon the ground, as if he had been one of their company; at last roused by a noise of musick, he started up, and fell to dancing, acting his part with ridiculous jestures: so that all, ashamed of the Kings demeanour, forsook the feast, [Polyb. lib. 5. & cum sententiis Diodorus Siculus, in Excerpt. Valef. pag. 321.]

The Shew thus at length concluded: Tiberius Gracchus, Embassador, immediately came to Antiochus, sent by the Senate to make discovery of the counsels of the King, and to spy how affairs went there: who was by the King entertained with such cheerfulness and alacrity, that he did not only not suspect a plot, or discover the least token of alienation in him for what had happened at Alexandria, but also opposed himself against all those, that went about to impeach him: And which is more, Antiochus resigned his Palace Royal to the Embassadors of Rome, and as good as his very Diadem: when as notwithstanding all this ceremony, his will and affection was most irreconcilably estranged from the Romans, [Polyb. Legat. 101. & 109. Diod. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valef. pag. 322.]

Whilst Antiochus was at leisure to sport it at Daphne, Judas Maccabeus seriously plyed his business in Judea: For being stoutly assisted by his brothers, he drove out the enemy, slew his revolted Country-men, and purged the Land from its former prophecies, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 9.]. Fired Cities and Villages, being upon them unawares, got into his hand the most convenient places; put to flight no small number of his enemies, most commonly taking advantage of the night for such private attempts: in-fomuch, that the bruit of his valour spread it self forth into all quarters, [1 Maccab. 3. 8. 9. 2 Maccab. 8. 6. 7.]

To the Embassadors which were sent from the Galatians in Asia unto Rome, the Senate indulged the enjoyment of their own constitutions, but with this proviso, That they keep home, and passe not beyond their own borders in armes, [Polyb. Legat. 102.]

Pytho, dispatched upon an Embassie from Prusias King of Bithynia to Rome, complained to the Senate of King Eumenes, how he had pillaged his territories, and seized certain places to his own use; charging upon him also, that he would not forbear his encroachment upon Galatia, nor submit to the Decrees of the Senate; but that he did cherish, and by all means possible advance those of his own faction: on the contrary he did discountenance and keep under whosoever seemed inclinable to the Romans, and desired that the Common-wealth should be governed by the precepts of the Senate. Others likewise came from the Asiatick Cities with fresh accusations, intimating a combination betwixt him and Antiochus against the Romans. The Senate after audience, neither slighted the accusations, nor yet revealed their own sense, but kept all close within their own breasts: having an eye upon Eumenes and Antiochus, as jealous of them. In the mean time, they always gratified the Galatians in some thing or other, and were assistants in vindicating their liberties, [Id. Legat. 104. Livie lib. 46.]

Attymedes the Rhodian Legat, pleading his Countries cause at Rome before the Senate, was now more moderate, and not so hot in his speech, as in his former Embassage. Omitting all recriminations, he made it his only business at present to shew, That his Country-men had smarted sufficiently, and far beyond the demerit of the offence: when he came to inform particularly the damages which the Rhodians sustained, he said, Their chief grievance was, That they had now lost the revenue of their Haven: in regard that the Romans had both discharged Delos from paying custom, and had also taken from the people, the liberty which they formerly enjoyed, of determining the impost, and other matters of publick concernment: So that the custom which in former times was farmed for ten hundred thousand drachmas, scarce now surmounts surmounts to a hundred and fifty thousand: And seeing, that they themselves knew full well, that only a few had been engaged in the crime charged upon them, and those also had been all sufficiently punished by the people, he requested that they would not prove inexorable in their displeasure against those which were no whit involved in the guilt, but vouchsafe to receive them into their grace and favour, as formerly: for this it was, that his Country at this instant stood more in need of, than an allocation for war. And indeed this his speech seemed suitable to the present condition of the Rhodians so much, that after Tiberius Gracchus (who was newly returned from Asia, whither he had been Legate) had first declared, That the Rhodians had submitted themselves to the Decrees of the Senate; then, That all those were put to death which had any hand in bringing the people into disrelish of the Romans; he stopped the mouth of the adversaries, and prevailed with the Romans, That they would take the Rhodians into their alliance, [Polyb. Legat. 104.]

Neither could Tiberius signify any thing more to the Senate concerning the designs of Eumenes and Antiochus, than that they knew before his setting forth from Rome: so mightily had these Kings obliged him unto them by their civility, [Id. Legat. 105.]

Apollonius, Governour of Samaria, having raised a great army amongst the Gentils and Samaritans, fell upon the Jews; but Judas Maccab, smote him and slew him, and many fell down slain, and the rest fled: and Judas took the spoile, and amongst them Apollonius his own sword, which ever after he used in the wars, [1 Maccab. 3. 10. 11. 12. Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 10.]

When Seron who had the command of Crete heard, how that Judas was well provided of an army, multitudes from all parts resorting unto him: had mustered up all the Forces under his command, taking also the runagado Jews unto him, and encamped near the going up to Bethoron; where he with his whole army was routed by Judas Maccab, and 800 of them being slain on the place, the residue fled into the land of the Philistines, near the sea coast, [1 Maccab. 3. 13. 24. Joseph. in sup.]

As soon as the news of this overthrow came to Antiochus his care, it put him into such a heat, that forthwith he levied all the strength of his kingdom, and giving them a years pay, commanded them to be ready upon all service. This Salary being paid, he saw his Treasuries quite exhausted; for by reason of the Jews their revolt from him, who paid him yearly above 300 talents of silver, and the vehement persecution raging in the Grecian Cities, and many Regions, (for he spared not the very Gentiles, whilst he endeavoured to make them abjure their ancient superstitions, and to bring them to a conformity of worship) his revenues were very much impaired: In-fomuch, that fearing he should not find enough whereby to defray his charges and gratuities (where-in he was exceeding generous and surpassing the Kings that went before him) he determined to go into Persia, to glean some tributes in those parts, and levy a considerable stock from thence, [1 Maccab. 3. 27. 31. Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 12. Sever. Sulpic. Sacr. Histor. lib. 2.]

Upon his going thither, he left Lysias of the Blood-Royal in Syria, Governour over all the Regions, from the River Euphrates, to the borders of Egypt, and entrusted him with the care of his son Antiochus (Eupator) committing unto him also, the half of all his Forces, and his Elephants, with expresse charge, utterly to root out the name of the Jews, and to give their Country to be inhabited by strangers: with the rest of his sons, himself leaving Antioch (near Daphne) in the 147 year of the kingdom of Greeks, having passed over Euphrates, marched into the high Countries, [1 Maccab. 3. 32. 37.]

Philip (whom Antiochus had appointed over Jerusalem, 2 Maccab. 5. 22.) observing how that Judas Maccabeus grew stronger and stronger every day, wrote unto Ptolemy (son of Dorymenes) Governour of Nicanor, to lend him helping hand to the Kings affairs: who forthwith choosing Nicanor son of Patroclus, a most intimate friend, sent him with no less than 40000 souldiers of all Nations under his command, purposing to root out the whole stock of the Jews: And to him also he joynted Gorgias, a Captain notably experienced in Military affairs, [1 Maccab. 8. 8. 9.]

Lysias also dispatched away Ptolemy himself as a relieve to them: so that under these three Commanders, Ptolemy, Nicanor, Gorgias, were mustered 40000 Foot, and 7000 Horse: who, marching with their entire army, pitched by Emmaus in the plain Country, [1 Maccab. 3. 38. 39. 40.]

And seeing that Antiochus was in arreare to the Romans in a tribute of 2000 talents, Nicanor resolved to wipe off that score, out of the sale of the captive Jews; and to that end, invited out of the Cities near the sea coast 1000 Merchants, promising That he would allow 90 slaves for one talent, [2 Maccab. 8. 10. 11. 14. 34. 36.] which was no sooner divulged, but the Merchants of the Country, with their attendants repair to the Camp to purchase the Jews for slaves; great companies also flocked out of Syria, and and of the land of strangers or Philistines, to barter for the same commodities, [1 Maccab. 3, 41.]

Hierusalem being now quitted of inhabitants, and the Temple prophaned: Judas Maccabees in this great extremity, removed with his army to Malpaa, or Mizpa, for there before the building of the Temple, was the Israelites place of worship, [1 Jud. 11, 2, 20. 1, 5, 8, 1 Sam. 7, 5, 6, 10, 17.] where he proclaimed a fast, and with most fervent prayers importuned the Lords protection of hisimal army (for he had with him but fix, or (as the Latin edition rendereth it, but seven thousand against the vast power of the enemy. After this, such as had betrothed wives, or were planting vineyards, or were timorous, he dismissed home according to the Law, [1 Dem. 20, 6, 7, 8.] and then divided his army into four squadrons, and appointing his brothers Commanders, committed to each 1500 soldiers; to the army removed, and pitched on the southside of Emmaus, opposite to the enemy. Where Judas earnestly exhorting them to behave themselves valiantly, even to the death, for their Country, and the Laws of their God, he gave orders to be in readiness for the battle on the morrow. [1 Maccab. 3, 42.—60, 2 Maccab. 8, 12.—27.]

That night Gorgias had a design to surprize them unawares, and to that end took along with him 500 Foot, and 1000 choice Horse, and came toward the Jews Camp, having the Garrison soldiers of Syon Fort for his convoy. When Judas had got intelligence thereof, wisely making use of this present opportunity of setting upon the enemy, whilst thus divided, he marched straitways to Emmaus against Nicanor, whilst Gorgias their express Commander was from them. Who when by night he had arrived at the Jews Camp, and found no body there, supposing they were fled, hunted them about in the mountains: but by break of day Judas discovered himself in the plains of Emmaus with 3000 men, who notwithstanding, were neither provided of armour or twos to their mind. [1 Maccab. 4, 1.—6.]

Judas, after he had encouraged his soldiers to the battle, and given the word, in the help of God, himself being in the front, encountered with Nicanor, and, Almighty God assisting, slew of the enemy above 9000, wounded and maimed the greater part of Nicanor's army, and put them all to flight: the chase was so large, that the Jews pursued some of them from Emmaus as far as Gazara (as the Greek Copy of the Maccabees, in the end of Arundels Library reads it) or Gadara (as Josephus) others unto the plains of Idumea, others as far as Palestine, Azotus, and Jamnia, all the hindmost of them were slain, near 3000 in number. [1 Ibid. 8, 15, 2 Maccab. 8, 23, 24.]

Among those that were thus put to flight, were the Merchants, who (nothing doubting of the victory, followed the Kings army, in hopes of getting a good bargain of the Captives) became a prey also themselves: for the Jews seized on their money which came to buy them: and when they had had a long pursuit of them, being prevented by time, they founded a retreat. For the evening, on which the sabbath began, drawing on, after that they had gathered up the arms of the vanquished Host, and taken the spoiles from them, they composed themselves for the observation of the Sabbath, magnifying the mercy of God for this so marvelous a deliverance. [2 Maccab. 8, 25, 26, 27.]

Judas takes off the Jews, eager upon the spoiles, for fear of an encounter with Gorgias, who was now returned from his fruitless expedition: whose forces discovering themselves from the mountain, as soon as they perceived by the smoke of the Tents, set on fire, that other division of their army to be routed, and saw Judas on the plain, standing in batallia ready to receive them, they all shifted for themselves into the land of strangers. The coats thus cleared, Judas returned to the spoils, where he found plenty of gold, blew silk, purple of the sea (which the Phenician Merchants had left behind them) and much wealth. [1 Maccab. 4, 16.—29.] All which the soldiers shared amongst themselves, having first deduced a portion for the maim'd, widows, and orphans: then with joyous supplication they beseeched the Lord that he would vouchsafe to continue to be gracious and favourable to his servants. [2 Maccab. 8, 28, 29.]

The Jews after this coped with Timotheus and Bacchides, and slew in that fight above 20000 of the enemy, made themselves Masters of the Forts, and divided amongst themselves much spoyle: always admitting the maim'd, orphans, widows, and aged persons into equal portions with themselves: and when they had gathered up the arms, and disposed of them into the most convenient places, the remainder of the spoyle they carried to Jerusalem: they slew also Philarches, one of Timotheus side, a most wretched fellow, and a notorious afflictor of the Jews: and in the midst of their solemn festival, which they had instituted for their late obtained victory, they burnt Callisthenes alive (having taken sanctuary in a little house) because he it was that had fired the holy gates. As for that pestilent Nicanor, he, having striped himself of all all his glorious attire (that thereby less notice might be taken of him) came like a solitary fugitive thorough the mid-land Country, unto Antioch: where he professed, the Jews to be utterly unvanquishable, in regard they had God for their Protector, [2 Maccab. 8, 30, 36.]

Lyfias receiving, by those that escaped, intelligence of the overthrow of his party, was confounded thereat: both because, neither those things which he would, happened to Israel; nor what the King commanded were accomplished, [1 Maccab. 4, 26, 27.]

Therefore the year following (being the 148. of the the kingdom of the Greeks, he halt's into Judea thorough Idumea, with 60000 choice Foot, and 5000 Horse: Judas Maccab. marched up toward him as he lay encamped at Bethlura, on the borders of Judea. And having first implored publicly the assistance of God, gives the enemy battle. Lyfias observing how the Jews like to many mad men, contemning death, brake thorough their enemies body, and that his men turned their backs, 5000 being killed on the place: returned to Antioch, purposing a new expedition after he had with a greater army well re-inforced himself, [1 Maccab. 4, 28, 35.]

Antiochus Epiphane's, having undertaken an Expedition against Artaxias King of the Armenians, who marched from the Eastern parts, flew most of his army, and took Artaxias himself, [1 Appian. Syrian. pag. 117. & 131. Porphyr. apud Hieronym. in Daniel. cap. 11.]

When Prusias, King of Bithynia, had not only himself most vehemently accused Eumenes King of Pergamus, already suspected of the Romans by letters intercepted intimating a combination with Perseus against the Romans: but also, had prevailed with the Galatians, Selgenes, and many other people of Asia, to do the same. Artalus and Athenaeus were dispatched away to Rome by their brother Eumenes: who not only in the audience of the Senate, cleared all crimes, which were laid to their charge, but also returned back into their Country, with high honours conferred upon them: Yet for all this, the Senate abated nothing of their jealousies conceived against Eumenes and Antiochus; but sent C. Sulpicius Gallus, and Marius Sergius, Ambassadors, with instruction, to make a most strict enquiry into Antiochus and Eumenes their counsels, whether or no, they had made any provision for war, or were confederate with any against the Romans, [1 Polyb. Legat. 106. Diad. Sicul. Legat. 21.]

C. Sulpicius Gallus, as soon as entered Asia, unadvisedly makes proclamation thorough the chief Cities there; commanding whoever had, whereof to accuse King Eumenes, he should at the appointed time, repair to Sardes: where, when he himself was arrived, he sat upon the Bench, (erec'd for that very purpose in the place of exercise) ten dayes together, to receive accusations: gladly admitting all manner of reproaches, and obloquies against the King, and catching at the least hint of an impeachment: for he was a person naturally vain, and such an one, who hoped some honour might redound to himself from the difference with Eumenes; [1 Polyb. lib. 31. in Excerpt. Valerij. pag. 145.]

Judas Maccab. and his brethren (as soon as they perceived that they had got respite from their enemies) with all their Forces came up to Jerusalem: and they recovered the Temple and the City, except Sion Fort. But the Altars and Chappels which the Gentiles had built in the open street, they demolished: And Judas commanded certain men to assault those which were in the Portresse of Sion, whilst in the mean time he was busied in cleansing the Temple: the sad desolations whereof being beheld, stirred up most vehement lamentation to all that were present, [1 Maccab. 4, 36, 41, 2 Maccab. 10, 1, 2.]

The Priests well experienced in the Law, assigned by Judas himself to that business, cleaned the Sanctuary, removed the defiled stones into an unclean place: pulled down the Altar for burnt-offerings, which was prophaned by the Gentiles, (laying up the stones thereof in the Mount of the Temple, until such time, a Prophet came which might inform them what ought to be done with them) built another of whole stones, upon which no iron tool had been lifted according to the tenour of the Law, [1 Deut. 27, 5, 6.] Repaired the Holy, and the Holy of Holies: hallowed the Courts, made new holy Vessels, brought into the Temple the Candlestick, the Altar of incense, and the Table: So they burnt incense upon the Altar, lighted the Lamps which were on the Candlestick; placed the Shew-bread upon the Table, spread the vails, and finished whatsoever they had taken in hand, [1 Maccab. 4, 42, 51. 2 Maccab. 10, 3.]

Then on the 25 day of the ninth month, (called Cisleu, or Chastleu) in the 148 year of the kingdom of the Greeks; they role up betimes in the morning, and, having furnished themselves with fire by striking stones one against the other, they offered sacrifice according to the Law, upon their new Altar of burnt-offering, [1 Maccab. 4, 52, 53. & 2 Maccab. 10, 3.] Two years after Judas succeeded his father Mattathias manner: and also because he had been called Traitor, for delivering up Cyprus (which was committed to his trust by Philometor) unto Antiochus Epiphanes, [2 Maccab. 10, 11, 12, 13.] Polybius gives him this commendation, [in Excerpti. Valerii, pag. 126.] Πρωταρχὸς ἡγεμονίας Κυπρίου ἰδιώτης Αἰγυπτιακῶν γένους, ἀλλὰ νομίζεις ἐν ἀνθρώποις. Ptolemaeus the Governor of Cyprus behaved himself like an Egyptian in nothing, but was prudent and valiant among the first.

But Gorgias, who had the command of all parts about Judea, hired souldiers, and continually fomented the war against the Jews: the Idumeans also who were joyed in affociation with him, having gotten into their hands the most commodious forts, and entreinating the Jerusalem-tunnagadoes, infested the Jews, and did what they could to keep the war on foot, [2 Maccab. 10, 14, 15.]

Hereupon Judas Maccabæus at Acrabattæ, a Region of Idumea, falls upon the sons of Eliau, who had begirt the Jews round: and forming their Garrison, because maffer thereof, slew no lesse than 20000, and seized upon all their spoiles, [1 Macc. 5, 3. 2 Macc. 10, 16, 17.]

And now he calls to mind the shrewd turne of the children of Bzian, who had spread themselves in privy ambushes along the way sides, by which the Jewish army was to passe. These Bzianites upon the last rout had elcaped with 9000 unto two very strong Castles, provided with all things necessary to endure a siege. Therefore Judas Maccab. left his brother Simon, with Joleph, and Zachæus, to besiege them, whilst he himself marched away to relieve some other places which stood in more need of his present assistance. But those that were with Simon, out of a greedinesse of money, upon contract with the besieged for 70000 drachmes, suffered some to escape: as soon as Maccab. had notice hereof, he summoned together the Governours of the people, and in their presence, executed as many of them as upon conviction were found to have any hand in the treachery: and having with little adoe reduced both the Garrisons, he burnt them to the ground, and utterly destroyed above 20000 of them, [1 Macc. 5, 4, 5. 2 Macc. 10, 16, 23.]

From thence he passed over to the Ammonites, where he found a very great power got together, and much people, under Timotheus his command: but he often fought them, and discomfited them, and having taken Jazer, and the Towns belonging therunto, returned into Judea, [1 Macc. 5, 6, 7, 8.]

Timotheus having, since his last overthrow, well recruited himself with multitudes of foreign Forces, and horses collected out of Asia, not a few, returned confident of the conquest of Judea. But Maccab. and those that were with him, after a serious humiliation and supplication unto God, marched out of Jerusalem, and joynd in battle with the enemy, a great distance from the City: and being encouraged by apparitions of certain horsemen in the heavens, fighting for them, slew of the enemy 20500 Foot, and 600 Horse: As for Timotheus himself, he elcaped to a very strong Garrison, Gazara by name, whereof his brother Chereas was Governour: but at last, the Garrison was taken, and he and his brother, with Apollonius, being found hid together in a pit, were all three put to the sword, [2 Macc. 10, 24, 28.]

The Trocmians, a people of Galatia, having made some vain attempts upon Cappadocia, and seeing they could get no footing there, posted to the Romans, endeavouring to render King Ariarathes odious unto them. The Romans presently dispatched an Embassie, of which M. Junius had the chief managing, [Polyb. Legat. 108.]

From Autuma began the year, of the account of the contracts or Dhilkarnai, observed by the Collector of the second book of the Maccabees, CXLIX: but of the Chalde account used in the Kings Edicts, [ibid. cap. 11.] and in Ptolemeis great Syn-taxia, [ibid. 9, cap. 7. & lib. 11, cap. 8.] CXLVIII, which also was the Sababatical year.

The Heathen about the Region of Galaad assembled themselves together against the Jews, which were near their borders, with an intent utterly to destroy them: who slew of the Jews inhabiting the land of Tob, [Judæ. 11, 3.] about 10000 men: led away their wives and children captives, and took their very goods and household-stuff: and for those Jews of Galaad, which betook themselves to the Garrison in Dathema, for their security: Timotheus (not he which even now was said to be slain with his brother Chereas, but another of the same name) hasted with an army to lay siege unto them: and at the same instant, others from Ptolemais, Tyre, and Sidon, and all Galilee of the Gentiles, held a Rendezvous upon a design of cutting of the Galileans, [1 Macc. 5, 9, 15.]

The Galaadites and Galileans, dispatched letters to Judas and his brethren, earnestly solliciting them to hasten their assistance in this their extremities: Hereupon Judas (after a consultation first had with those at Jerusalem) divides his whole army into 5 Brigades: 3000 he designs to his brother Simon, for the relief of the Galileans: himself and his brother Jonathan, take along with them 8000 for the delivery of the Galaadites, Galaadites, and the residue of the army he leaves with Joseph, son of Zacharias, and with Azaria, for the security of Judea, strictly charging them, That they should not upon any terms engage with the heathens in battle, till such time as they were returned back again, [ibid. 16, 20.]

No looner was Simon entred Galilee, but he fell upon the heathens, and chased them to the very gates of Ptolemais, and there fell of them 3000 men, whole spoile they took. Having thus rescued the Galileans, and those of Arbattis, ערבטין, the plain and Champaign Countries) with their wives, children, and whatsoever they had, they brought them into Judea with great joy, [ibid. 21, 22, 23.]

But before Judas could get to the Galaadites, many of them were shut in Bosfora, Bozor, Alems, Caspher, Maced, Carnai, and other Cities in Galaad, [ibid. 16, 27.]

By that time Judas and his brother, having passed over Jordan, had got three dayes march through Arabia Deserta: though Nabathites, met him very friendly, and acquainted him with all that happened to the Galaadites: Moreover, how that on the morrow following the enemy, had designed to fall upon the Garrisons, and as fast as they took them to put all to the sword in one day. Upon this intimation, Judas with his army, turned aside by the way of the wilderness unto Bozor: and having won the City, put all the males to death, pillaged the City, and after burnt it to the ground. Departing thence by night, he marched toward the Fortresses, where he found the enemy about break of day, placing their Engines for battery, and the cry of them within the City, went up to Heaven: Those that were with Judas, marching in three divisions on the rear of the enemy, founded with their Trumpets, and lifted up their voyce in prayer. Timotheus his Camp, knowing that it was Maccabæus, who was so near them, fled from him, and got themselves out of his sight: but in the pursuit, he had so great execution of them, that there fell in that day near 8000 of them. This done, he stept aside to Malpha, took it by storm, slew all the males, and after the plunder, set it on fire. From thence he went and took Chaphor, Maced, Bozor, and the other Cities of the Country of Galaad, [ibid. 24, 26.]

Whilst Judas and Jonathan were in Galaad, and Simon in Galilee, over against Ptolemais. Joseph, son of Zacharias, and Azarias, who were left behind, to secure Judea, hearing of their gallant achievements, and ambitious to get themselves a name as great as the other, contrary to command, drave down their army as far as Jamnia, with intentions to fight the heathens. But Gorgias drew out all his forces out of the City against them, and beat them back to the very borders of Judea, and there fell that day of the Jews, near upon 2000 men, [ibid. 55, 62.]

Lyfias, the young King Eupator's Protectour and Kinsman, and the sole manager of the affaires of the kingdom, being much displeased at what had happened, mustered together almost 80 thousand men; all his own Horse, and 80 Elephants, and marched against the Jews: resolving within himself to render Jerusalem an habitation for the Grecians, The Temple tributary, and to set the High Priesthood to sale every year. Hereupon, being entred Judea, he clapt close siege to Bethsela, a strong place, distant from Jerusalem about five furlongs. But Maccabæus his army, having an Angel for their convoy, flew 10000 of the enemies Foot, and 1600 Horse. All the rest, with Lyfias himself, were put to flight, whereof many were fore wounded, others threw away their arms, and thrust for themselves, [2 Maccab. 11, 2—12.]

Lyfias, casting up with himself what losse he had sustained, and considering that God fought the battles of the Jews, sent Ambassadors to them, to intreat concerning a piece, avowing, That he would subscribe to all reasonable propositions; and moreover, be a means of ingatiating them into the Kings favour. Judas Maccabæus, supposing this might be conducive to the publick behoof, embraced the motion, and signified in writings, (which was sent by the hands of John and Abshalom, what he should mediate for unto the King, on the behalf of the Jews: The King granted every Article, [ibid. 13, 14, 15.] concerning this particular, there are extant letters, both from King Antiochus to Lyfias, [ibid. 22, 26.] as also from Lyfias to the Jews, dated in the year (of the Chalde account) 148, the 24 day of the month Diocorbinus: as it is in the Greek Copies; but in the Latin Discurus, [ibid. 16—21.] This month in the Caldee year, seems to be intercalated betwixt Dyfter and Xanthicus (in which are written, the following letters of the Kings, and the Roman to the Jews, concerning the foresaid peace) which is therefore called in the Greek edition of the book of Esther, (now to be seen in the noble Earle of Arundels Library) the month Adar-nisam, and Dyfter-xanthicus, and by the modern Jews Pedar, or the other Adar: although our Syriac Interpreter of the second book of the Maccabees, hath substituted in its name the Syriacus latter Tifri.

In the same 148 year, (of the Chaldean reckoning) the 15 day of the month Xanthicus, according also to the Chaldean reckoning) there are letters directed to the Jews, both both from King Antiochus, [2 Maccab. 11. 27.—31.] and also from Quintus Memmius, and Titus Manlius (otherwise called Manius or Manlius) Ambassadors from Rome, who at that time came to the King residing at Antioch: [Ibid. 34.—38.] thither also followed Lysias after the covenant was drawn up. [1 Maccabees 12. 1.]

About the beginning of the Spring, began the CL year of the kingdom of the Grecians, which the writer of the first book of the Maccabees makes use of.

Demetrius, son of Seleucus Philopator, having been detained many years hostage at home, and now entered the 23 year of his age, requested the Senate, That by the assistance of the people of Rome, he might be restored into his own kingdom, now unjustly usurped by the son of Antiochus Epiphanes his Uncle, protesting that he should allways look upon Rome as his native Country and nursery, repute the Senators sons, as so many brothers, and the Senators themselves as fathers. Notwithstanding all this complement, the Senate esteeming more expedient, as to their affairs, if Syria were Governed by a child rather than a man, with joint consent voted, that Demetrius should be kept at Rome, and the kingdom be confirmed to the child which Antiochus left behind him. But withal, they presently dispatched away Cn. Octavius Sulpicius, and Lucius Aurelius, as Legats to wield that kingdom at the pleasure of the Senate, supposing that none would be against it: the King being but yet a child, and the Princes of the Court accounting they were extremely favoured, in that the Romans would not deliver up the kingdom to Demetrius, which was a thing they much feared would ensue. And when they were informed, how Antiochus had provided himself of Elephants in Syria, and ships above the number which they allowed him; they gave in charge to the Legats, that they should fire the ships, hough the Elephants, in a word, That they should do what they could to bankrupt the Kings Exchequer. [Polyb. Legat. 107, Appian. Syriac. pag. 117. Zonar. ex Dieme. Justin. lib. 34. cap. 3.]

The Legats also received instructions to visit the Macedonians, who, in regard that a popular state seem'd strange to them, had made no use of a Common Council, and were up in factions and seditions amongst themselves. They were ordered also to make diligent enquiry into the affairs of the Galatians, and the kingdom of Aria; rather; [Polyb. Ibid.] Notwithstanding, Ariarathes by his great civility in a conference with Julius, and the former Legats, dismissed them, highly commending him. [Id. Legat. 108.]

The peace betwixt Eupator and the Jews, was no sooner made, than broken off again: for those that had command in the places adjacent; Timotheus Apollonius, son of Genneus, Hieronymus, Demophon, and Nicanor, Governour of Cyprus, would not suffer the Jews to be quiet. And the Citizens of Joppe likewise, having by fair speeches enticed 200 Jews, which dwelt amongst them, into their ships, put from shore, and threw them all over-board. [2 Maccab. 12. 23, 24.]

When Judas Maccabees heard of this piece of villany, he came by night to Joppe, fired their port, and navy, and slew all those that had fled thither; and understanding that the Jammites had some such designe against those Jews that lived with them, he did the same by night to their port and fleet, so that the flame of the fire appeared as far as Jerusalem, which lay 240 furlongs distant. [Ibid. 5, 9.]

By that time, Judas his army had gone nine furlongs thence, upon their march against Timotheus, the Nomades of Arabia (set upon them, not fewer in number than 5000 Foot, and 500 Horse, where after a hot dispute the Arabians were worsted, and upon an engagement, to supply them with Catel, and to pleasure them some other ways, obtained a peace from Judas. [Ibid. 10, 11, 12.]

Judas his souldiers stormed the City Capispa and took it: the City was fortified with a bridge, and fenced with walls, and inhabited by people of several nations: the slaughter of the Citizens was so great, that an adjacent lake of two furlongs broad was coloured with blood. [Ibid. 13, 16.]

They removed from thence 750 furlongs, and came to Characa unto the Jews which were called Tabieni (because they inhabited the land of Tob.) Timotheus was drawn off from that place, although he had not done the business he went about, leaving behind him a very strong Garrison: which Dositheus and Sosipator, two of Judas his Captains ventured upon, and killed about 10000 of the men which Timotheus had left to keep it. [Ibid. 17, 18, 19.]

Upon this miscarriage, Timotheus leaves a new army of 120000 Foot, and 2500 Horse, of all nations round about him, and mercenary Arabians; sent away the women and children, and other baggage to Carnion, or Carnaima, a place hardly to be besieged, and difficult to come unto, by reason of the streightness of the passage, he encamped against Raphon, on the other side the brook. Judas with all his forces, (putting himself in the van) crossed the brook toward the enemy, and gave that Gentile army such such a total rout, that some flew this way, others that way, in such great disorder, that they were often hurt by their own men, and wounded by the points of their own swords: So that Judas pursued them with such eagerness, that he flew near thirty thousand men. [1 Mac. 5. 37, 43; 2 Macc. 12. 20, 23.]

But Timotheus himself falling into the hand of Dositheus and Sosipator, very subtilly befooght them, that he might escape with his life, because he had in his power many of the Jews parents and brothers, who, if they put him to death, he would be served in the same kind; upon his engagement to see them safe returned, they dismissed him for their brethren sakes. [2 Mac. 12. 24, 25.]

Judas marched forward to the City Carnaim, and to the Temple of Atargata which was therein, whither many of the enemy had fled: the Temple he fired and all the men in it, demolished the City, and put to the sword 25 thousand men. [1 Mac. 5. 43, 44 2 Mac. 12. 26, 27.]

Then Judas brought back all the Israelites which were in Galad, with their wives and children, and all their baggage, with intent to bring them into Judea: And they were come as far as Ephron, which was a very great City, and well fortified, and stood in the way thorough which they were to passe; it was peopled by nations of all sorts, the walls well manned, and had in it good store of engines and ammunition. But so it was, when Judas and his army were necessarily to passe thorough it, that the Citizens clapped their gates against them, and baracado'd them up with the stones; yet they forced their way thorough, after a day and a nights battery, and demolished the City to the ground; took all the spoile, killed all the males, near 25000 in number, and marched over the dead bodies thorough it. [1 Mac. 5. 45, 51. 2 Macc. 12. 27, 28.]

After this, they passed over Jordan, into a great plaine before Bethsam, [1 Mac. 5. 52.] which the Greeks called Scythopolis, [Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 12.] distant 600 furlongs from Hierusalem. As soon as they were entered into the town, the Jews (which lived amongst them, met them) and acquainted them, how friendly the Scythopolitans had always dealt with them, and how kindly they had treated them in their adversities: whereupon they returned them thanks, and requested the continuance of their affections to their Nation for the future. [2 Mac. 12. 29, 30, 31.]

Judas bringing up the rear of his army, encouraged them all the way, until he came to Judea, [1 Mac. 5. 53.] They arrived at Jerusalem, about the Feast of Pentecost, [2 Mac. 12. 32.] and went up unto Mount Zion with joy and gladness, and offered burnt-offerings, because they had not lost a man, but were all returned home in peace, [1 Mac. 5. 54.]

After Pentecost, Judas and his brethren with 3000 Foot, and 400 Horse, marched against Gorgias, who had the command of Idumea, with intent to give him battle, [2 Mac. 12. 32, 33; cum 1 Mac. 5. 65.]

In that fight few of the Jews were slain: yet when Dositheus, one of the Bacenors troupe, a stout man, had taken Gorgias prisoner, and apprehending him by his coat of mail, led him away, a Thracian trouper made up toward him, and cut off his shoulder, and rescued Gorgias, that accursed miscreant, who made his escape into into Marissa: but when they that followed Eldris (one of Judas his Captains) were wearied with long fighting; Judas, after he had called upon the Lord, and sang Psalms and Hymns in his mother-tongue, set upon Gorgias his forces unawares, and made them flee, [2 Mac. 12. 33, 37.]

Then having after the victory called together his army, he withdrew to the City Odullam: and when the seventh day was come, they purified themselves, and kept the Sabbath. The day following, when Judas his souldiers had gathered up the bodies of those that fell in the battle, with an intent to bury them, they found under every ones coat, things consecrated to the Idols of the Jammites; which was prohibited the Jews by their Law. [Deut. 7. 25, 26.] So that it was clear and evident to all, that this was the cause of their miscarriage. Hereupon they betook themselves unto prayer, ἱκετεύοντες τὸ θεοῦ ἐλεησέτω τοὺς λαοὺς ἱσραὴλ, beseeching God, That sin might be utterly rooted out; or, (as the Arundel book, and the Aldin edition reads it) ἵνα ἡ πόλις καὶ ἡ γῆ οὐκ ἀκαθάρτα παραμένῃ. They beseeched God, that they might not be utterly razed out for that sin: moreover, they made a contribution of two, or three, (as the Greek Arundel, and my own Syriac book, or twelve, as the Latine copies have it) thousand drachms of silver and sent to Jerusalem, to provide a sin-offering. [Ibid. 38, 43.]

Then Judas with his brethren went against the sons of Elau, and discomfited them in the South (of Judea), and smote Hebron, with the villages thereof, dismanned the fortification, and fired the towers round about. From thence he removed, pursuing to go into the land of the Philistines, and passed throw Samaria. At that time certain Priests desirous to shew their valour, and not going very wisely to work, were slain in a skirmish.

skirmish. Then Judas declined toward Azotus, into the land of strangers or Philistines, and when he had overturned their altars; burnt their graven images, and taken away the spoils of the Cities, he returned into Judea. [1 Mac. 5. 65, 68.]

When Antiochus his soldiers which were garriſoned in the Tower at Jerusalem, had blocked up the Jews round the Sanctuary, always studying which way they could annoy them, and strengthen the heathen: Judas and all the people besieged them in the 150 year of the Greeks, having planted their battery — and engines; howbeit some of the besieged got forth (to whom also certain wicked Israelites joined themselves) and prevailed with Antiochus Eupator the King, speedily to oppose himself against that swelling power of the Jews. [1 Mac. 6. 18, 27.]

Hereupon the King summoned together all his friends, and the Commanders of his army, and Masters of his house: and to these repaired forces from other kingdoms, and from the Islands or sea coasts: So that his whole power consisted of 10000 Foot, and 20 thousand Horse, and 32 Elephants, trained up for war. [Ibid. 28, 29, 30.] But in the second book of the Maccab. we read, how that in the 149 year (of the account, viz. of the Contrabits) that tidings was brought to Judas Maccabeus, that Antiochus Eupator was gone against Judea provided with Greek forces, to the number of 10000 Foot, and 5300 Horse, 22 Elephants, and 300 Chariots with hooks. [2 Maccab. 13. 1, 2.]

Menelaus the Usurping High Priest sided with this power, feeding himself with fond hopes of obtaining from Eupator that honour which hitherto he had but the empty title of. [2 Mac. 13. 3.]

King Eupator came with a mind highly enraged, resolving to bring far greater mischief upon the Jews, than ever his father had done: which when Judas heard of, he commanded the people, That they should call upon God night and day; that he would vouchsafe them his wonted assistance: and then having called a Council of war, he resolved to march against the King, and encamp about Modin. [2 Mac. 13. 9, 14.]

The Kings army having marched thorough Idumea, assaulted Bethſura, with their engines: but the Bethſurans sallied forth, and fired them, and fought with them valiantly. As for Judas, he pitched in Bethzachariah, over against the Kings Camp. [1 Mac. 6. 31, 32.] and when he had given the watch-word to his men, Victories are from God, taking along with him some of his choicest men, he attempted by night the enemies Camp, and pierced as far as the Kings own pavilion: he slew at this bout, near 4000 men, and their prime Elephant, with all that were upon him: upon the dawn of the morning, he drew off, and departed with good success, having thereby transfused a dread and a horror clean thorough the enemies Camp. [2 Maccab. 13. 15, 16, 17.]

Then the King early in the morning, marched apace with his army, and pitched near Bethzachariah: where he drew up his men into battalia, and ordered that the juice of grapes and mulberries should be set before the Elephants, supposing thereby to render them more fierce upon the fight. These beasts were disposed through the army, and to each beast, was assigned 1000 Foot well appointed, and 500 Horse: in their wooden castles which every one of them carried on his back, were 32 soldiers, besides the Indian which guided him: Their armour made such a glorious show, that the neighbouring hills glittered by reason of the reflexion of the Sun-beams upon their shields of gold and brass. [1 Mac. 6. 33, 41.]

Judas and his army engaged the enemy, and killed of the Kings Party 600 men. At which time, Eleazar, surnamed Savaan, (or Avaran rather, Judas his brother [1 Mac. 2. 5.]) observing an Elephant in royal harness, and taller than any of his fellows, and supposing the King was upon his back, made up toward him, slaughtering his enemies on both hands, and crept under his belly, and flew him; but he himself was pressed to death with the fall of the beast upon him: But the Jews perceiving the vast power of the King, and the strength of his Forces, turned away from them. [1 Maccab. 6. 42, 47.]

The King upon his return to the siege of Bethſura, was sometimes put to flight (by Judas) other whiles in skirmishes, he retreated with loss. But Judas neglected not to relieve the besieged, and to lend them such things as they stood in need of. Rhodius, one of the Jewish army, sent intimation hereof to the enemy: hereupon inquiry being made, he was seized on, put upon the rack, and kept in prison. Then the King parleyed the second time with the Bethſurans, and inclined them to resign unto him. [2 Mac. 13. 19, 22.] After the peace thus concluded, betwixt them, they all marched out of the City, being forced to surrender for want of provision to sustain the siege: for that year was the Sabbatical year, in which it was not lawful to sow their land. But the King after he had taken Bethſura, placed a Garrison therein to keep it. [1 Maccab. 6. 49, 50.]

Thence

Thence the Kings army went up to Jerusalem, and encamped against Mount Sion, and the Sanctuary many dayes together, and planted his Artillery with Engines, and instruments to cast fire and stone, and pieces to hurl darts, and slings: whereupon the besieged counter-made these Engines, with others of their own, and held them play a long while; but victuals began to grow scant with them both, in regard that this was the seventh year, and also because they in Judea which were delivered from the Gentiles, had eaten up the residue of their store: very few were left in the Sanctuary, because the famine prevailed so mightily amongst them, that they were forced to disperse themselves into several places. [1 Maccab. 6. 51, 54. Josephus, lib. 11. cap. 14.]

In the mean time, Philip, whom Antiochus Epiphanes had by his last Testament nominated Tutor to his son Eupator, and under him appointed over the affairs of that whole kingdom, (being returned out of Egypt) came out of Media and Persia, with the forces which Epiphanes had left there. [1 Maccab. 3. 37.] purposely to recover by force his right which Lyſias had usurped. [1 Maccab. 4. 55, 56. 2 Maccab. 13. 23.]

When Lyſias heard hereof, he perswaded the King and the Commanders of the army, to make peace with the whole nation of the Jews, and to permit them to enjoy their own constitutions, as in former times: in regard, that their army lessened every day, the provision for the Camp failed, the place which they besieged was well fortified, and the affairs of their own kingdom were urgent and important. [1 Maccab. 6. 57, 58, 59.]

The Kings and his great ones, assenting to what Lyſias had moved, sent in to the besieged, about articles of peace: the conditions were accepted of, and the Covenants confirmed with an oath. Whereupon the besieged marched out of the Garrison, and the King entered Mount Sion, offered sacrifice, honoured the Temple, and dealt kindly with the place: But in a while after, when he had well considered the strength of the place, he brake his oath, and gave order to pull down the wall round about. [Ibid. 60, 61, 62. cum 2 Maccab. 13. 23.]

The King appointed Maccabeus, or (as the Greek context bears it, and my Syriack Interpreter hath it) Higemonides rather, General of his army from Ptolomais to the Gerthenians. [2 Maccab. 13. 24.] or as far as Egypt; whose boundary is the mountain Gerur, by Ptolomies assigment.

While the King was come to Ptolomais, the Ptolomians (who allwayes bare a deadly hatred to the Jews, as appears by the History. [1 Maccab. 12. 48.]) were heartily vexed at the peace made with Judas, and in a rage, would needs have nullified the Covenant. But Lyſias went up to the judgement-seat, where he to well defended the matter, that he appeased the tumult, and pacified the Citizens. [2 Maccab. 13. 25, 26.] Josephus, at the close of the 14 book of his Antiquities, says, That the Sovereignty of the Haimoneans lasted 25 years, to the taking of Jerusalem by Herod, and the slaying of Antigonus, (or (as Hero 1) hath it in the same Author, lib. 17, and the same work, cap. 8.) one year less. But that fell out in the 126 year from this time, so that the investiture of the commanding power in the Haimoneans took its rise from the time of the peace, agreed on betwixt Antiochus and Maccabeus.

From the Autumn began the year of accounts of the contracts, CL, which the Collector of the second book of the Maccabees, makes use of.

Antiochus Eupator, with Lyſias his Guardian, hastening to Antioch, [1 Maccab. 6. 63. 2 Maccab. 13. 26.] brought along with him as prisoner, Menelaus the High Priest. [Josephus, lib. 12. cap. 15.] whom Lyſias had accused as the sole incendiary of the whole Jewish war, and the first promoter of all their evils. Whereupon, by express from the King, he was sent to Berthea in Syria, where he was let down into a Tower filled with ashes, and so dyed a death worthy of his life. [2 Maccab. 13. 48.]

This wretched Menelaus thus taken out of the way (the tenth year after his first usurping the Priesthood) at Berthea (as it is truly written in Josephus, pa. 421, and not as in pag. 700, erroneously at Berytzen.) the King substituted another in his room, every whit as bad as the former; Alcimus or Jacinus by name: Priest indeed he was of Aarons progeny, but not of the High Priests blood. Lyſias, having perswaded the King to transfer that dignity into another family. [Joseph. Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 15. & lib. 20. cap. 8.]

Onias, son of Onias the third, High Priest, seeing the High Priesthood was conferred upon Alcimus, went into Egypt, and after he had well insinuated himself into the affections of Ptolomei Philometor, and Cleopatra his wife, obtained of them leave to build a Temple to God, in the jurisdiction of Heliopolis, answering that of Hierusalem, and that they would also constitute him High Priest there. Thus Josephus delivers the business, in the forced places of this work of the Jewish Antiquities, recanting what he had formerly writ in his work of the Jewish wars, [lib. 1. cap. 1. & lib. 7. c. 37. al. 30.] viz. Onias his flight, and his building the Temple in Egypt, to have fallen out whilst Antiochus Epiphanes was living.

About this time, Ptolemei Philometor, and his younger brother Ptolemei Euergetes II. fell at high variance: the Senate of Rome wrote letters to their Ambassadors. Cn. Octavius, Sp. Lucretius, and L. Aurelius, to do what in their way, to compole the differences: [Polib. Legat. 107.] For after they had jointly six years together reigned peaceably, the younger brother cast off Philometor, and ruled alone. [Porphyr. in Græc. Enselp. Scaliger. pag. 54. & 235.]

He, being deprived of his kingdom, repaired to Rome for his relief, with a very slender retinue, and in a neglected garb. [Palæ. Maxim. lib. 5. cap. 1.] As he was on his way to the City on foot, he was taken notice of by Demetrius, Seleucus his son who, much troubled at the sight, presently provided a Royal Robe, a Diadem, and a Horse, adorned with golden furniture, and thus attended with his own servants, made toward Ptolemei, meeting him 26 miles from the City: After a civil salute, he advised him to put on these princely ornaments, and to enter Rome somewhat like himself, least happily he might appear contemptible. Ptolemei indeed thanked him extremely for his good will toward him, but was so far from taking any of those things which he had brought him, as that he desired him rather to give him leave to retire a while with Archias in some one of those towns which lay in the way. [Diod. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valæ pag. 322.]

At length he came to Rome, having taken up his lodging at an Alexandrian Painters house: as soon as the Senate heard of it, they sent for him, and made a most exact apology, for that they neither had, according to the usual custom, sent the Quæstor to wait upon him, nor had entertained him upon the public account: avowing, That those omissions were not to be imputed to any disrespect of theirs towards him, but merely to his own coming so suddenly upon them, and so privately. Hereupon, they conducted him out of the Court, unto the house of publick entertainments, and pastwaded him to put off those his sordid weeds, and pitch upon a day for audience: they also took care that Presents might be sent unto him daily by the treasurers, so that by their several civilities, they did, as it were by so many distant steps, advance Ptolemei from that low condition he was in, to his former kingly eminency, and occasioned unto him far greater ground of triumphing in the hopes he had of Romes assistance, than of fear considering the meanness of his fortune. [Palæ. Max. ut sup.]

As soon as Cn. Octavius and Spurius Lucretius, the Roman Legates came to Ariarathes, King of the Cappadocians, they enquired into the constellation which was betwixt him and the Galatians. He, in few words, opened the whole case to them, adding this, That he was willing to acquiesce in their umpirage. But the greatest part of his speech was concerning the affairs of Syria, knowing that Octavius was bound thither. He shewed them also in what a tottering condition that state was in, and how great correspondence there was betwixt himself and the great ones there. He proffered also to attend upon them with his forces, and to be ready and forward upon all occasions, untill they were returned safe out of Syria. The Kings good will and forwardness to accommodate them, was much relented by the Legates: yet they told him, That at present they had no need of his company, but in case of some future emergency, if there might be occasion for it, they would not scruple to send unto him, whom they would for ever hereafter put into the list of such which are reputed most sincere friends to the Romans. [Polib. Legat. 108.]

As for the commotions in Syria, King Eupator, by the help of his Guardian Lyfias, had quickly pacified them. For he upon his return to Antioch, finding Philip in command there, fought him, and took the City, [Macab. 6. 93.] where also, after he had gotten Philip into his clutches, he put him to death. [Josephus lib. 12. cap. 5.]

Octavius Lucretius, and Aurelius, the three Roman Legates (according to their instructions received from the Senate upon their coming into Syria) took care that the Elephants should be slain, and the Navy fired, and managed all things else to the Roman interest. This lay heavy upon the stomach of one Leptines, and therefore with his own hand, he stabbed Cn. Octavius, the prime Legate at Laodicea, as he was anointing himself in the place of exercise: he vouched the fact, as lawfully done, and not, but by the instigation of the gods. This Octavius was the first that ennobled that family with the consullship, from whence Cæsar Augustus afterward descended. Lyfias, Eupators Guardian (who was reputed the chief incendiary of the people against the Romans) took care for the intertainment of Octavius: and forthwith dispatched Legates, in the Kings, to Rome, which might excuse the fact and evidence the Kings innocency: as not being any whit accessory therunto. [Polib. Legat. 114. & 122. Cicero, Philippi. 9. Appian, Syriac. pag. 117. Zonar. ex Dion.] Julius Obsequens, in his book De Prodigis, confirms this killing of Octavius, as happening in the time of Marcus and Scipio, being Consuls.

There was at that time in Syria, one Illocratis a Grammarian, of the company of those that were wont to make publick recitations, a prating Braggadocio, and one that was hateful to the Grecians themselves; whom Alceus in his publick consultations did use wittily to provoke and jeer. He, as soon as he came unto Syria, began to vilify the Syrians, as people of none of the soundest head-pieces, and not containing himself within the bounds of his profession, began to treat of state-matters, and to give his judgement therein: for he did not only defend the justice of Cn. death, but moved also that the massacre might be extended to the other Legates of the people of Rome, that not so much as one might survive to carry tidings thereof to Rome: that they might by this be brought to abate of their arrogance, in controlling others, and surcease this their over-bold usurpations of sovereignty every where. [Polib. Legat. 122.]

The Romans (by their Ambassadors, Canuleius and Quintus) restored Ptolemei Philometor to his kingdom: and reconciled him to his younger brother Euergetes: having decreed that the kingdom should be divided betwixt them: Philometor was to take Egypt and Cyprus for his share, Euergetes Cyrene: this agreement was confirmed by all religious ceremonies, and by the mutual plighting of their faith each to other: Notwithstanding, all this Euergetes hastened away to Rome, in despite of nulling the Covenant: whereupon Philometor also sent Menechillus of Alabanda, as his Legate thither, as his advocate and proxy in this his contest with Euergetes. [Polib. Legat. 113. & 114. Liv. lib. 46. Zonar. ex Dion.]

Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia, deceased, his son Ariarathes (so named Philip) succeeded, by right of inheritance, to the Crown: who as soon as he had solemnized his fathers funeral with the highest magnificence that could be, he sent his Legates to Rome, about renewing the league and alliance with that people of Rome. He was first called Mithridates, but after he came to age, by his fathers name Ariarathes. At his coming to the Crown, he treated his Friends, Nobles and Subjects, with what respect was fitting, so that he soon won the affections of all persons, of what quality soever. And in regard that he was experienced in the Greek, and studied philosophy, Cappadocia (never before known to the Grecians) soon became a receptacle for learned men. [Livie lib. 46. Diodor. Sicul. in Bibliotheca, Phocy. cod. 244. & Excerpt. Valæ. pag. 325.]

From Spring-tide began the CLI year of the kingdom of the Grecians, which is used in the first book of the Maccabees.

When the Ambassadors of Ariarathes, the new King of Cappadocia, were arrived at Rome, they moved the Senate, that they would embrace their King with all love and affection, who alwayes, both abroad and at home, withheld well to all the Romans: the Senate did not only renew the league and amity, as was requested; but highly commended the Kings inclination, and entertained the Ambassadors very civilly: after that Tiberius Gracchus (of whom mention was made in the 383 year of the World) returned from his Embassy in Asia, had related many notable expressions of the affections of this King, and of his father, and indeed of the whole kingdom, toward the people of Rome. [Polib. Legat. 109.]

The Rhodians (by Cleagoras and Lygdamis their Ambassadors at Rome) requested that they might be permitted to hold Lycia and Caria, upon the same terms as formerly. [Id. Legat. 110.]

For at what time the Calyndians in Caria revolted from the Canii (whereupon the Canii attempted to besiege them) at the first indeed they required assistance from the Cnidians, and by that association made shift for a while, to hold the enemy play: but being doubtful of the issue of the war, they dispatched an Embassy to the Rhodians, wherein they yielded themselves and their City into their hands. The Rhodians accepted of the profer, and accordingly sent supplies both by sea and land, raised the siege, and took the City into their own jurisdiction. And the Senate soon after confirmed unto them the right and possession. [Id. Legat. 111.]

Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, understanding by his Legates, who were now returned from Rome, that he was affronted of the good will of the Romans, thought himself now fast-fast in his kingdom, offered to the gods Eucharistical sacrifices, and feasted his Nobles. Moreover, he sent Ambassadors to Lyfias at Antioch, to fetch the bones of his sister and mother (Antiochus the daughter of Antiochus the Great) concerning which business he gave instructions to the Ambassadors upon their departure, joyntly with intreaties and prayers, supposing it not reasonable to expostulate the the business of Octavius his death (although he was much displeased at it) least if he should chance thereby to provoke Lysias, he might not have his request granted. Lysias gave way that he should have those reliques, which, as soon as they were brought unto him, he carry'd them forth in high solemnity, and was very careful to lay them next his fathers tomb. [Id. Legat. 112.]

After the two Ptolemies (brothers) had parted the kingdom betwixt them: Ptolemei the younger comes to Rome, to invalidate the partition agreed upon with his brother, urging, That he did not voluntarily do as he was commanded, but, had yielded upon necessity, being forced thereto by the difficulty of the times: therefore he requested the Senate, That they would adjudge Cyprus to him: for, put the case it were so, yet would his portion be far worse than his brothers: on the other side, Menithyllus, Philometors Agent, declared, (which also the Roman Ambassadors themselves confirmed by their Testimony) How that the younger Ptolemei did not onely hold Cyrene, but also his very life, by means of his brother, in regard that there was such a general alienation of mens minds from him, that he might take it for a high favour, that the kingdom of Greece was quitted to him, which was more than he could hope for, or any man else dream of. But upon Ptolemies contradicting what was urged, the Senate, partly considering, that the sharing of the kingdom was not as yet quite compleated, partly out of their own desire to have that kingdom divided, (that as occasion should serve, they might with lesse pains reduce it under their own power, when divided, than when united) granted the younger brothers demands, and forthwith sent their Legats (Tius Torquatus and Cn. Merula) with instructions to reconcile the two brothers, and to give Cyprus to the younger. [Id. Legat. 111.]

When news was brought to Rome of the killing of Cn. Octavius and the Legats of Antiochus Eupator, which Lysias sent, were arrived at Rome, and discoursed at large, shewings, That their King was in no wise conscious to the murder: the Senate sent the Legats back again, determining nothing upon the matter, because they would by no means reveal their minds. [Id. Legat. 114.] yet they ordered a Statue to be erected in the place of common pleas, to the memory of Octavius. [Philippic. 9.]

Demetrius, much affected with the news of that accident, sent for Polybius (the Historian) and advised with him, Whether or not, were expedient to move the Senate afresh about his affairs; who admonished him to take heed of damning himself twice against the same stone: telling him, That he had better adventure upon some noble exploit, worthy of a kingdom; hinting hereby, That he would have him steal away from Rome: as soon as he could. But he, following the counsel of one Apollonius, his intimate acquaintance, (a good man indeed, but a very youth) came into the Senate, and requested, That he might at least have his liberty, and might not any longer be detained as hostage at Rome; seeing they had confirmed the kingdom unto Antiochus Eupator. The Senate for all this, remained peremptory in their decree: whereupon, Demetrius consulted first with Diodorus, (a subtil fellow, who came fresh out of Syria, and had had formerly the education of him) and then with Polybius, how he might make his escape. Menethyllus, Ptolemei Philometors Agent, (who by Polybius his means (with whom he was intimately acquainted) had been admitted into the Counsel, under pretence of providing for his return home-ward) openly hired a sacred ship of the Carthaginians, which was about to saile to Tyrus, to bring the first fruits of the Carthaginians, (as the manner was) to their ancestor-gods. When all things were in readinesse, Demetrius sent his Tutor Diodorus into Syria beforehand, to hear what the world talked, and to feel how the pulse of the people did beat. Himself taking onely a few with him, which might be as companions to him in his journey, supped at a friends house with them, the rest he sent away to Anagnia, whither he said he would come a hunting the day following. [Polyb. Legat. 114.]

At this instant, Polybius lay sick a bed, who fearing lest Demetrius, sitting over long at his cups should let slip the opportunity of escaping: night now drawing on, sent unto him a sheet now sealed up, with these intimations written in it,

Ὁ δέμτριε, τὸ αὐτὸ μὲν ποιεῖς. ὁ δὲ στρατὸς
ἔστιν ἐν τῇ πόλει. τὸ δὲ πλοῖον δὲ πλοῖον.

Τὴν αὐτὴν νύκτα, ὁ δὲμτριε, πλοῖον
ἔστιν ἐν τῇ πόλει. τὸ δὲ πλοῖον δὲ πλοῖον.

He what delays, incurs the fates
Of night, but late he successe creates.

Adventure, come what can, let all,
Rather than thou, thy self shouldst fall.

To

To which he added, that saying of Epicharmus (commended by Polybius, lib. 3. pag. 768, and by Cicero, ad Attic. lib. 1. Epist. 16.) Νῆσος, ὁ ἄριστος ἀνὴρ ἐστὶν: ἀρετὴν, πρᾶξιν, φρόνησιν, be sober, and remember to trust no body; these are the very fiewes of prudence. As soon as he read the notes, he understood presently what those instructions meant, and from whom they came; and thereupon making shew as if he had been about to vomit, and had need to dilgorge, he and his friends left the company: and communicating his design to Nicanor, and the rest of his friends, he came by night to Othia, at the mouth of Tiber. Menethyllus went before to the Mariners, and told them, That he received new instructions from the King, so that he must of necessity abide a while longer in the City: yet he would dispatch him unto certain young men of most approved fidelity, which should give him a full account of all the transactions of his brother. About the end of the third watch of the night, Demetrius comes with 8 companions, 5 servants and three lackeys: whom Menithyllus commended to the Master of the Ship, who knew nothing of the plot; they set sail about break of day. [Id. ibid.]

There was no thought at Rome of his departure until the fourth day following; and then they made strict inquiry after him, but could not find him: upon the fifth day, the Senate met upon the business; but Demetrius being now six dayes sail from the City, was gone as far as the straits of Sicily. The Senate thought it would be no purpose to follow after him, he having gotten to great a start of them: Bar within few dayes after, they let forth Tib. Gracianus, Lucius Lentulus, and Servilius Glaucias, Ambassadors: whose employment was to see how things went in Greece; and passing from thence, to observe what Demetrius had in designe, as also to learn how other Kings stood affected, and to debate their differences with the Galatians [Id. ibid.]

In the meantime, Demetrius was got into Lycia: from whence he wrote to the Senate, That he marched not against Antiochus his Uncles son; but against Lysias, with a resolution to avenge Octavius his death. And having soon drawn Tripolis of Syria to be on his side, as if he had been sent by the Senate to take possession of the kingdom, (for no one dreamed of his escape) and being seized also of Apamea, he mustered all his Forces together, and made toward Antioch: where he killed the young youth (King Antiochus Eupator) and Lysias, as they were friendly coming out to meet him (for they did forbear to take up armes for fear of displeasing the Romans) [Zonar. ex Dione.] and being entertained with the applause of all in Syria, he obtained the kingdom. [Justin. lib. 34. cap. 3. Appian. in Syria. pag. 117, 118.]

We read in the [1 Mac. 7. 1, 4.] how that in the 15th year of the kingdom of the Grecians, Demetrius, son of Seleucus, escaping from Rome, came with a few men to a City on the sea coast (viz. Tripoli of Phœnicia) and began to reign there: and that, as he entered into the Palace of his Ancestors, (at Antioch near Daphne, the Metropolis of Syria) his souldiers seized upon Antiochus and Lysias, who were by his command put to death. And in the [2 Mac. 14. 1, 2.] how that, after three years, or in the third year (from the beginning of Antiochus Eupator, or the purging of the Temple by Judas Macc, of both which mention is made in the beginning of the 10th cap. Judas was informed that Demetrius was arrived at the Haven of Tripolis, and with a great power, and navy, had taken the Country, and killed Antiochus, and his Tutor Lysias. But Josephus assigneth to Antiochus Eupator two years reign. [lib. 12. cap. 16.] so doth Eusebius also in his Chronicle) although Porphyry [in Grec. Esch. Scaliger. pag. 228.] and Sulpicius Severus, [Histor. Sac. lib. 2.] ascribe to him, one year onely, and 6 moneths.

Demetrius, having removed Heraclides (from the charge of the Treasury in Babylon, over which he was appointed by Antiochus Epiphanes) and put to death his brother Timarchus (who likewise was by the same Antiochus made Governour of Babylon) as a Rebel against him (who besides that, was very faulty in the discharge of his place there) was by the Babylonians first surnamed Soter, [Appian. Syria. pag. 118.]

Alcimus (who had obtained from Antiochus Eupator, the grant of the High-Priesthood, but was not received by the people, in regard, that in the times of confusion under Antiochus Epiphanes, he wilfully disfiled himself, [2 Mac. 14. 3.] endeavouring to get the Priesthood confirmed upon him by Demetrius Soter, made his address unto the King, accompanied with other wicked and apostate Israelites, who maligned their country-men, and especially the Hasmoneas, as guilty of cutting off the Kings friends, and banishing them out of the Country. Demetrius renewed their complaints; and thereupon sent Bacchides the Governour of Melopotamia, his intimate and trusty friend, and with him, Alcimus (on whom he had settled the Priesthood) with a great force into Judea: when they had entered the Land, they thought to have over-reached Judas Maccabeus and his brethren by their fair speeches: but they gave no credit unto them. [1 Mac. 7. 5, 11.]

Then

Then there assembled unto Alcimus and Bacchides, a company of Scribes, amongst whom the Hapideans were chief, that desired of them: for said they, One that is Priest of the seed of Aaron hath the conduct of this army, who will not do us any wrong. But after that they had put themselves into his hand; that wicked Priest, contrary to the agreement, and his oath, put threefold of them to death, all in one day: to this massacre, the Historian applies that of the Psalmist [Ps. 79. (at 78.) 2, 3.] The High Priest Simeon, says they (TTP) cast out, given to the beasts of the earth, and their blood have they shed round about Hierusalem, and there was none to bury them: by which perfidiouse many being terrified, fled from the City, [Ibid. 12, 19.]

Bacchides removed from Jerusalem, and encamped in Bethzeth, or Bethzetha; from whence he sent and took many of those which had forsaken him, and certain of the people also (of the Jews) whom he slew, and cast into a deep pit. After, then he committed the Country to Alcimus his care, leaving him a sufficient force to assist him, and he himself returned back to the Kings. To Alcimus (who neglected no thing that might help to assure the Priesthood unto him) assembled all such as were disturbers of the people; who after they had brought the land of Juda under their power, made great havoc in Israel: Herupon Judas Maccab. went out into all the coasts of Judea round about, taking vengeance of all those that had revolted from him; and he got such a hand over them, that for ever after they kept close within their Garrisons, and durst not make any more incursions into the Country, [Ibid. 19, 24.]

Ptolemei the younger, coming out of Italy into Greece, hired from thence an army of very stout men, amongst whom he took with him one Damaspippus, a Macedonian, who (after he had slain the Governors that late in Council at Phaco, a Town of Macedonia) escaped thence as fast as he could, with his wife and children. Ptolemei, removing from those parts, came to Perea, a Continent situate over against Rhodes for who, after he had been courteously treated by the people, he determined to flee for Cyprus. But Torquatus and the rest of the Roman Legates, when they observed what a great strength of mercenary souldiers he had levied, they began to consider the tenour of their instructions they had received from the Senate, whereby they were expressly charged to reduce him without blows. And at last prevailed with him, to disband his mercenaries, as soon as he had brought them to Sida, and to break off his intended voyage to Cyprus: and that he should do his best that they might meet with him about the borders of Cyprus. They themselves in the mean while were upon going to Alexandria, that they would work the King to a confederation to his request, and that they would meet him at the place appointed, and bring the King himself along with them. These propositions had such influence upon Ptolemei the younger, that, despairing of reducing Cyrene, he dismissed the mercenary soldiery: And himself went directly to Crete, taking along with him Damaspippus and Cn. Merula, one of the Embassadors: (where as soon as he had hired a thousand souldiers,) he departed to Libyna, and kept them at the Port of Apis, [Polyb. Legat. 115.]

In the interim, Torquatus, and Titus, being come to Alexandria, did what they could to persuade the Senior Ptolemei, to come to an agreement with his brother, and to yield Cyprus unto him. But upon Ptolemei's grant of some particulars, and lending a slight care to others, merely to gain him time, his younger brother who lay encamped (as was agreed upon) before Apis in Libyna, much displeased that as yet nothing was concluded concerning the resignation of Cyprus, sent Cn. Merula to Alexandria, hoping by his, and Torquatus his means, to accomplish his designs, [Id. Ibid.]

Hipparchus Bithynus (never sufficiently extolled by Pliny who attempted to transmit unto posterity the exact number of the stars, and reduce the constellations into order, by particular instruments of his own invention, thorough which he shewes, both their positions, and their magnitudes) [Plin. lib. 2, cap. 26.] wrote in his book de stellis fixis that the conjunction of the planets, that in the 27 year of the third Calippic Periode, the 30 day of the Egyptian month Mefor, (Septemb. Julian 27.) about sun-set, the autumnal equinoctial was observed by him, [Prod. 3, lib. 2, cap. 2.]

From this Autumn, began the year C.L. of the account of the contracts: made use of the 2 book of the Maccab. In which year (for to the Greek Copies compute, and my Syriac Interpreter, where the Latin edition reads C.L.) Alcimus is said to come to King Demetrius, presenting him with a golden Crown, a Palme, and Boughes also which were thought to be of the Temple, [2 Macc. 14, 3, 4.] For he, observing how greatly Judas Maccab. and the Affideans which were with him increased in power, and also because they would not suffer him to come near the holy Altar; having gotten opportunity, eagerly accused them to the king, as authors of all the commotions, and disturbers of the common peace in Judea, complaining most bitterly: That he was despoiled of the High-Priesthood, which was the glory of his ancestors; and as long as Judas was living, he was confident Demetrius should never enjoy the kingdom quietly. This (being avouched by other of his friends, and most implacable enemies of Judas) troubled Demetrius, that he dispatched away Nicanor, General unto Judea: with order to destroy Judas, disperse his associates the Affideans, and to settle Alcimus in the High-Priesthood: as for the Gentiles which fled out of Judea for fear of Judas, they came flocking to Nicanor, accounting the calamities which were like to fall upon the Jews, to be their only happiness, [2 Maccab. 14, 3, 14. cum 1 Maccab. 7, 25, 26.]

The Jews, upon report of Nicanor's approach, and of the allocation of the Gentiles with him, cast dust upon their heads, and made their supplication to God. But after a short skirmish betwixt Simon (Judas his brother) and Nicanor near the village Desfaro: Nicanor, hearing the brutes of the prowess and valour of Judas and his company in defending their Country, was somewhat timorous of running the hazard of a war. Therefore he sent Pofidonus, Theodorus, and Matthias, to parlee with them upon mutual engagements of fidelity, each to the other. When they had well debated the matter amongst themselves, Judas propounded it to the people, who with unanimous consent approved the Articles. The day was fixed, whereon Judas and Nicanor were to meet, the one with the other: yet Judas was somewhat jealous of the enemy, and thereupon disposed of some armed men into several convenient places, which might be as a security, in case any violence should be attempted contrary to engagement. But the conference proved very peaceable, and closed in a league without the king's privy. Nicanor, after this, abode a while in Jerusalem, and dismissed the companies which he had before collected: he lived so friendly and familiarly with Judas, that he persuaded him to marry a wife, [2 Mac. 14, 15, 25.]

As soon as that wretched Cause Alcimus observed this their mutual correspondence, and meetings together, he addressed himself the third time to Demetrius, and complained of Nicanor, as having in agitation some treacherous design against the king: who was so enraged by these calumnies, that he wrote immediately to Nicanor, to let him know, that he took very ill, those his intercourses with Judas Maccab. commanding him withal, forthwith to send away Judas bound to Antioch: which although he was very loath to do, in regard it was a violation of their Articles of peace, seeing Judas had not in the least manner transgressed; yet, because he knew not to gainstay the king, he watched for a convenient time to execute the king's command by a stratagem, [Ibid. 26, 29.]

Whilst Ptolemei Philometor with his high complements detains the Roman Legates at Alexandria fourty dayes, rather against, than with, their wills, nothing of business being dispatched: the Cyrenians revolted from Euergetes the younger brother, and with them some other Cities also conspired. The Egyptian Ptolemei (whom Euergetes had appointed over the whole Realme, when he sailed away unto Rome) being no stranger to the business; when tidings hereof was brought to Euergetes; and more also, that the Cyrenians were already with an army in the field, tearing least, whilst he endeavours to adde Cyprus to his Dominions, he should loose Cyrene: he layes aside the thoughts of all other matters, and leaving Apis, where his Navy lay in harbour, he sailed to the great Catabathmus, as they call it: intending from thence to reach Cyrene. But finding the strait in Catabathmus kept by the Libynians and the Cyrenians; he shipped half his men, and gave them orders to fall about those narrow places, and to fall upon the enemy unawares: he himself with the other Brigade of his army, charging them in the Van, endeavoured to gain the hill. But as soon as the Libynians perceived they were surrounded on all sides, they quitted their stations: so that the king did not only get a free pass to the top of the hill, but also reduced a strong hold, having 4 towers which lay in the bottom, wherein was great plenty of waters, [Polyb. Legat. 115.]

From thence he marched clean thorough the Wildernesse in seven dayes: the souldiers which were under Mochyrinus following him by Sea; the Cyrenians upon his approach, drew out their army against him, consisting of 8000 Foot, and 500 Horse. For they, guessing what Philometors mind was, by what he had done at Alexandria: and seeing nothing of a king in Euergetes, but that all his administrations were tyrannical, could by no means be persuaded, freely to yield themselves unto him: whereupon they gave him battle, and overcame him, [Ibid.]

Judas Maccab. observing how Nicanor was grown more reserved than formerly, and his dealings more rough than usually they had been: he behought with himself, that this enemy of his could not portend any good, and therefore having gathered together many of his associate, he withdrew himself from his fight, [2 Mac. 14, 30.]

Nicanor, coming to Jerusalem with great Forces, and by his fair speeches drew Judas to a treaty. Howbeit, whilst they were saluting one the other civilly, the enemy had designed to seize upon Judas, and carry him away: which thing, when it was known to Judas, he was fore afraid of him, and would see his face no more. When Nicanor law his purpose was discovered, he marched against Judas, to fight him beside Capharsalama: where there fell of Nicanors party near five thousand men; and the rest fled to the City of David. [1 Mac. 7. 27, 32.]

After this went Nicanor to Mount Zion, where there met him out of the Sanctuary, certain of the Priests, and Elders of the people, to salute him peaceably; and to shew him the burnt sacrifice that was offered for the King; but he slighted and scoffed at them; & commanded them to deliver up Judas unto him. And when they professed with an oath, that they knew not what was become of him; he stretched forth his right hand toward the Temple, and swore, unless Judas and his forces were delivered up into his hands, when he returned in peace, he would let the house of God on fire, digge down the Altar, and erect in the same place another glorious Temple to Bacchus. Whereupon the Priests entered, and stood before the Altar, and the Temple; and with great lamentation beseeched God to frustrate Nicanors threats, and avenge his blasphemies. [1 Mac. 7. 31, 38. 2 Mac. 14. 31, 36.]

There was arrived unto Nicanor one Rhazis, one of the Elders of Jerusalem, who for his love and affection to the Citizens, was called, The Father of the Jews. Therefore Nicanor, (thinking that if he were dispatched out of the way, he could bring what calamities he pleased upon the Jews, sent about five hundred soldiers to take him: who when they had forced the outward gates of the Tower wherein he was, and had commanded to fire the other doors, he stabbed himself with his own sword: but when he perceived, that by his making so much haste, his wound was not mortal, he threw himself headlong from the wall; afterwards, running to a steep Rock, when he was almost dead, he plucked out his bowels, and with both his hands, cast them amongst the throng, and to gave up the ghost. [2 Maccab. 14. 37, 46.] Touching which action, St. Augustine is to be consulted with, in his 61 Epistle to Dulichius, and lib. 2. against Gaudenzio, cap. 23.

When Nicanor saw that Judas was not in Jerusalem, but in the parts of Samaria, he marched from Jerusalem, and encamped in Bethoron, where a supply of forces met him out of Syria. But Judas pitched in Hadafa (30 furlongs off the enemy) with 3000 men. Nicanor did what he could to engage in battle on the Sabbath day, and when he was presently admonished by some Jews (who were compelled to march with him) to give the reverence due to that day, and to God, the first instructor thereof, he with most horrid blasphemy, put by those that thus perwaded him. As for Maccab. he encouraged his party out of the Law and the Prophets; and moreover, recalling to their minds their former encounters, and declaring unto them a dream of his, wherein there was represented unto him Onias, (who was High Priest, the third of that name) praying for the people, and the Prophet Jeremy reaching unto him a golden sword, he cheered up their spirits. Whereupon, being well armed with prayers and sure confidence in God, on the 13 day of the 12 month Adar, the fell upon the enemy. Nicanor himself was the first that fell in the fight: whereupon, the rest threw away their arms, and betook themselves to their heels. The Jews had the pursuit of them one dayes journey, even from Hadafa to Gazera, founding an alarme after them with their Trumpets. Whereat all the Jews, out of the severall Towns round about, hastened to the slaughter of their flying enemies: so that no lesse than 35 thousand of them were slain by the sword, not so much as one single person remaining alive of the whole army. Then they tell upon the Spoil, and took the prey, and cut off Nicanors head and arms with the shoulder, and brought them to Jerusalem, where they hung his head upon a high Tower, with his right hand; which he had so proudly stretch forth against the house of God: Judas also commanded the tongue of this wicked fellow to be cut out, chopped in piece, & to be given to the birds of the air. In commemoration of this victory, it was enacted by a general Decree, That a great solemnity should be kept yearly upon the 13 day of the 12 month, called in the Syriac, Adar: the day before the feast of Mordecai. [1 Mac. 7. 39, 49. 2 Mac. 15. 8, 37. Joseph. lib. 12. cap. 17.]

Here ends the History continued in the second book of the Maccabees: wherein is comprehended a breviary of the five books of Jason a Jew of Cyrene. After Nicanors death Judea for a while had rest from wars, [1 Mac. 7. 50.] during which time, Judas Maccabeus, hearing of the great power of the Romans, and their humanity towards any that were in distress; having learned also, in how great fear Demetrius stood of them, sent Eupolemus the son of John, and Jason son of Eleazar, as Agents to the Senate at Rome, in the name of him, his brother, and the Common-wealth of the Jews, to negotiate an association and alliance with the people of Rome, hoping thereby to free their necks from that heavy yoke of King Demetrius, and the Empire of the Greeks. [1 Maccab. 8. 5. 17, 18, 31, 32.]

Cneus Metula, being at length returned from Alexandria to Euergetes, told him, that his brother Philometor would not condescend to any of his demands, urging, That they

they must hold to the Covenants, which were ratified at first. Euergetes, hearing this, commanded away Comanus, and his brother Ptolemis, as his Legates to Rome, with Metula: who were to treat with the Senate concerning the injury done him by his brother, and to acquaint them with his contentment of the people of Rome. As they were upon their way thither, they met with Titus Torquatus (Cn. Metula his Colleague in the Embassy) who likewise was dismissed from Alexandria, without completing the business he went about. At the same time also Menithylus of Alabanda was sent Agent to the Senate from Philometor, (Polyb. Legat. 116, & 117.)

After Demetrius heard that Nicanor and his whole army were cut off in the Fight; he dispatched Bacchides and Alcimus, the second time into Judea, and with them the right wing, or the better part of his army, who marching on the way that leads to Galgala; encamped in Masaloth (al. Maslath) which is in Arbel, and having taken 15, put multitudes to the sword, [1 Mac. 9. 1, 2.] On the first month of the 153 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, they removed toward Jerusalem (to seek out Judas Maccabeus) and from thence they marched to Berea (or Bezrath, as it is in the Arundel Copy) with 20 thousand Foot, and 2 thousand Horse. But Judas pitched in Eleafa, having 3000 choice men with him: who seeing the number of the enemy so great, were fore afraid: whereupon many of them conveyed themselves away from him, insomuch, that 800 only remained in the Camp. With these few he charged Bacchides vast army, and fought from morning till night: and at last routed his right wing, in which Bacchides himself was, and pursued them unto Mount Azotus. But those on the left wing following upon Judas, and those which were with him; slew Judas, fighting valiantly, and as soon as he fell, the rest fled away. Then Jonathan and Simon took up the corps of their brother Judas, and buried it in the Sepulchre of their fathers at Modin: and Israel made lamentation for him many dayes, [1 Mac. 9. 3, 21.] Judas was slain the sixth year, after the death of his father Mattathias.

After the death of Judas, wicked men discovered themselves in all the coasts of Israel, who before played least in fight, for fear of Judas: and by reason of the great famine which happened in those dayes, the whole Country, joyned with them, and submitted themselves to Bacchides, that they might the more commodiously be supplied with provisions. Bacchides advanced those wicked men to be Lords of the Country, who when they light upon any of Judas his friends, brought them to him to be tormented and reviled: So that, there was great affliction in Israel, the like was not, since the time the Prophets ceased from amongst them, [1 Mac. 9. 23, 27.]

In the mean time the Legates which were sent to Rome from Judas Maccab. concluded a peace and association with the people of Rome, and the Articles were writ in tables of brass, to this effect, That the Jews should assist the Romans, and the Romans the Jews against the common enemy. The Senate also wrote letters to King Demetrius, that he should forbear to oppress the Jews any farther: otherwise they would wage war with him, both by sea and land, in vindication of that People who was now their friend and confederate, [1 Mac. 8. 19, 32.] And to this, relates that passage of Justin concerning the Jews, [lib. 36. cap. 3.] When they had revolted from Demetrius, (having procured alliance with the Romans) they of all the Eastern people first obtained their liberty: the Romans at that time being very free in giving away that which was none of their own.

Josephus, [lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 17.] observes that this was the first league that was ever known to be betwixt the Romans and the Jews: which is there expressed in other words, by this forged subscription, also being added thereto. This Decree of the Senate was writ by Eupolemus, son of John, and Jason, son of Eleazar (the Jews Agents) when Judas was High Priest, and his brother Simon General. As if any body else had been General, whilst Judas was living besides Judas himself: or admit there had been, Had it not been more probable that Jonathan would have been the person, rather than Simon, who had it not till after Jonathan's decease? For what was a little before written by Josephus, how that upon Alcimus his death, the people by common suffrage gave the High Priesthood to Judas, appears out of [1 Mac. 9. 54, 55, 56.] to be a clear mistake; for there it is evidently shewed, that Alcimus died after Judas: and Josephus himself (recanting afterwards his error) relates, That Iacimus or Alcimus had no successfull at all; but that Hierusalem was destitute of a High Priest eleven whole years together, [Antiq. lib. 20. cap. 8. pag. 701.]

After a long debate in the Senate, betwixt the Legats of both the Ptolemies when Titus and Cneus (who were by the Romans sent Embassadors unto them) had by their evidence, and with all favour and industry promoted Euergetes his cause; the Senate ordered, That within five dayes Menithylus Philometors Legate, should depart from Rome: and the League which was betwixt them and Philometor, should be void. They sent also Publius Apulcius, and Caius Lentulus, Embassadors to Euergetes: who forthwith went to Cyrene, and with great care informed him what was done. This puff'd him up with fresh hopes, so that presently he levied an army, and set all his wits a working, how to get Cyprus into his hands, [Polyb. Legat. 117.]

All Judas Maccabæ, his friends meeting together, chose in his room, his brother Jonathan (surnamed Apphus) for their General. Bacchides, as soon as he heard of it, contrived how to destroy him; but Jonathan and his brother Simon, and those that were with him having notice thereof, to prevent him, fled into the Desert of Tekoa, and encamped by the pool of Asphar: then Jonathan sent his brother John, (surnamed Gaddis) with a band of soldiers, to desire the Nabathites (Arabians) that they might leave their carriages with them, for they were very many: But the children of Jambri out of Medaba met with them upon the way, and falling upon them, slew John and his company, and having seized on the spoils, went their way. But these pillagers joy lasted not very long: for when Jonathan and his brother Simon heard that those sons of Jambri kept a great wedding, and were bringing the Bride from Nadabath in great pomp and a long train of Nobles (for she was daughter to a Prince in Canaan) they rose out of the place where they lay in ambush, and falling fiercely upon them, slew 400, made the rest flee to the mountains, and seized on all their spoils. After they had in this manner fully avenged the blood of their brother, they marched back again to the marshes of Jordan, [1 Maccab. 9. 28, 42. Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 1.]

Bacchides followed Jonathan at the heels, and came upon the Sabbath day to the Banks of Jordan, with a great army. Both the armies engaged, and in the fight Jonathan reached forth his arm to strike Bacchides, but he warily waved the blow: yet there fell of his men in that day, about a 1000, (or 2000 as Josephus gives up the account) Jonathan, perceiving he was not able to deal with that vast power of the enemy, he and his men leaped into Jordan, and got over to the other side; neither did the enemy attempt to follow him. As for Bacchides he returned to Jerusalem, and built fenced Cities in Judea, and a Fort in Jericho, Emmaus, Bethoron, Bethel, Thamnath, Pharithon, Tephon, and strengthened them with high walls, gates, and bars: he garrisoned them all, that by their fallies and incursions they might prejudice the Israelites. He fortified also Bethfura, and Gazara, and the Tower at Jerusalem; supplying them with men and provision. And having seized upon the chief mens sons in the Country for hostages, he put them in ward in the Tower at Jerusalem, [1 Macc. 9. 43. Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 1.]

When Mithrobuzanes, one of the sons of Zadiades, King of the lesser Armenia had eloped to Ariarathes King of Cappadocia; Artaxias King of the greater Armenia (whom Antiochus Epiphanes had conquered) hankering after his kingdom, by an Embassy to Ariarathes, solicited him to side with him; and by murdering the one of the two brothers, whom he had under his power at that time, that he would divide Sophene between them. But Ariarathes abhorring such a piece of treachery, sharply rebuked the Legates, and by letters to Artaxias, admonished him to forbear such a villainous design: and moreover, he restored Mithrobuzanes to his fathers kingdom, [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. H. Valesii, pag. 325.]

Ariarathes received Tiberius Gracchus, Lucius Lentulus, and Servilius Glaucius, the Roman Legates in Cappadocia, very royally, [Polyb. Legat. 119.] Thither Demetrius Soter sent Menocharis, to the end, that he should seriously debate with the Roman Legates about the settling of his kingdom, [Id. Legat. 120.] He proffered also to King Ariarathes marriage with his sister, (Dowager of Persus King of the Macedonians) but he refused the motion, foreseeing he might thereby give offence to the Romans, [Diodor. Sicul. Legat. 24. Justin. lib. 35. cap. 1.]

After Menocharis was returned to Demetrius at Antioch, and had given account of his conferences with the Roman Legates; the King deeming it very necessary (as his condition was at present) by all means possible to engage and endear unto him the Roman Legates, laying aside all other matters: first sent to them into Pamphylia, then again to Rhodes; protesting, that he would do whatever lay in his power for the Roman interest, if he could but procure from them, the Title of King. Tiberius, who wished well to him from his heart, helped him much in the grant of his suite, and obtaining the right of Sovereignty, [Polyb. Legat. 120.]

Leptines (who had stabbed Cn. Octavius the Roman Legat at Laodicea) went to King Demetrius, and intreated him, not to be troubled at the death of Cnatus, nor to proceed to any extremity against the Laodiceans, upon that account; for he himself had resolved to go to Rome, and avouch before the Senate, that he had done the act, and that with the good liking of the gods. And because he went cheerfully, and of his own accord: he was brought from thence to Rome, without either bond or guard. As for Illocrates the Grammarian, who by his malapert tongue had drawn upon himself that misfortune, as soon as ever information was given against him, he grew distracted, and and became stark mad: but when he saw the gyves put about his neck, and the shackles applied, then began he to abridge himself of his daily repasts, and wholly to neglect his attire and garb, [Polyb. Legat. 121.]

In the 153 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, the second month, Alcimus commanded to pull down the wall of the inward court, which ever the court of the people, from that other of the Gentiles: It was built by Zerobabel and the Prophets: But God stopped the mouth of that prophane High-Priest, by striking him with a sudden Palfie, that he could not speak a word more, nor give orders concerning his own house; but died in great torment, [1 Maccab. 9. 34; 55; 56.] the third year after he had usurped the High-Priesthood, [Josephus in lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 17.] assigns unto him four years; but in the last chapter save one of the twentieth Book of the same Work, three years only: where also he adds, how that after his death, Jerusalem was seven entire years without any High-Priest. But wix the second month of the 153 year in which Alcimus died, and the seventh month of the 160 year in which Jonathan put on the High-Priests Robe, [1 Maccab. 10. 21.] were seven years, and five months over.

Upon Alcimus his death, Bacchides returned to King Demetrius; so that, Judea had rest two years, [1 Macc. 9. 57.]

About the CLV Olympiade, Embassadors came to Rome from Ariarathes King of Cappadocia with a Crown of the value of 10000 pieces of gold: who signified likewise to the Senate in what manner their Master had received Tiberius Gracchus, and how for their lates they refused the proffers of friendship with Demetrius, and the tender of marriage with his sister: adding withal, that he was very ready to serve the Romans, in whatever they would be pleased to command him: When Tiberius Gracchus, and the rest of the Embassadors had by their testimony confirmed this his propensity and affection towards the people of Rome: the Senate accepted of the Crown, and took it for a great favour; which they requited with a Staff, and a Seat of Ivory; which sort of Presents, are of high estimation amongst the Romans. These Embassadors were dispatched home by the Senate without delay, before the beginning of Winter, [Polyb. Legat. 119. Or. 121. Diodor. Sicul. Legat. 24.]

Upon the coming in of the new Consuls (Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, and Marcus Fulvius Nobilior) the joynt Embassy of Prusias King of Bithynia, and the Gallogrecians, complaining against Eumenes King of Pergamus, was heard in the Senate. Atalus also had his audience, who was sent thither by his brother Eumenes, to plead his cause: who was not only quitted from the accusations that were against him; but had honour conferred upon him, and was received and dismissed with great courtship. For observe, how far the hearts of the Senators were alienated and averse from King Eumenes, whom they perfectly hated, so near did their affections close with Atalus, being always enflamed with ancient desires of his promotion and advancement, [Polyb. Legat. 119, 121.]

Menocharis, and other Embassadors, came to Rome from Demetrius Soter King of Syria, bringing with them for a Present, a Crown worth 10000 pieces of gold, (which the king sent as a token of his gratitude for his civil usage when he was hostage amongst them) delivering up also Leptines who had killed Cn. Octavius the Embassador with his own hand, and Illocrates the Grammarian, who defended openly the murder. Illocrates was a strange spectacle to all beholders, his countenance was terrible and fierce, as a mans must be, who in a whole years space had neither washed his face, nor pierced his nailes, nor cut his hair: the figure and motion of his eyes shewed the distemper of his mind to be at that height, that whosoever should chance to have met him, would not to much have dreaded the sudden occurrence of any wild beast: On the contrary, Leptines was always the same man, ready at any time to come into the Senate: and whensoever any discoursed with him about the murder, he confessed the fact, and added withal, that he was confident the Romans would do him no hurt: neither did his hopes fail him; for when the Fathers had a long while debated in the Senate, what was best to be done in the business: at last, the Senate gave audience to the Embassadors, and received the Crown at their hands, but made no account of those two men; as if that was a fault chargeable upon all the Syrians. It was the policy of the Senate to keep this liberty entire to themselves, that as often as they pleased, they might revenge this crime. And upon the very same ground, they gave this answer to Demetrius: That the Senate was ready to do him all friendly offices, provided, that he became their feadary, as formerly he had been, [Polyb. Legat. 122. Diodor. Sicul. Legat. 25. Appian. Syriac. pag. 118.]

Orophernes, (as some call him) Holophernes, made his address to Demetrius Soter, King of Syria, complaining of Ariarathes his younger brother's injury, in driving him out of his kingdom of Cappadocia: although, to speak truth, he was not the lawful

Issue, but either shuffled in by Queen Antiochis, or adopted by her, as Zonaras relates out of Dion, and we before (in the year of the World, 3852), out of Diodorus. Demetrius, who still bare a grudge against Ariarathes, for slighting the tender of his sister to him in marriage, entertained the suppliant; and, covenanting with him for a thousand talents for his pains, by his advice, and assistance dethroned Ariarathes: Notwithstanding, the assistance he had from Eumenes King of Pergamus. [Polyb. lib. 3, pag. 161. Liv. lib. 47. Justin. lib. 35, cap. 1. Appian. Syriac. pag. 118. Zonar. ex Dione.]

Eumenes, King of Pergamus, upon his death-bed, bequeathed his wife Stratonica, (sister to Ariarathes, who lately lost his kingdom) and also his kingdom to his brother Attalus, [Plutarch in Apophthegm. & lib. vii. c. 4. c. 1.] after his 38 years reign. For, subtracting the years (computed by Strabo) of his brothers and his sons reign, who succeeded him, from the intervall (inserted in the Roman History) between his first coming to the Crown, and the ceasing of Pergamus to be a kingdom, there remains over and above, 38 year: so that Eumenes dyed in the very beginning of the 39 year; although Strabo (but erroneously) assigned him 40 years reign. He left Attalus Philometor, (whom his wife Stratonica bare unto him) to inherit the kingdom after him: but in regard that his son was too very young, he appointed his brother Attalus Philadelphus Protector of him and the kingdom, who managed the affairs thereof one and twenty years. [Strabo. lib. 13, pag. 624.]

3846. A second observation of the Autumnal Equinoctial was made by Hipparchus in the 20 year of the Calippick Period, on the first day of the Additionals to the Egyptian year (the 27 of the Julian September) in the morning, about the sun-rising. [Ptol. lib. 3, cap. 2.]

Orophernes, whom upon the expulsion of his brother Ariarathes, it behooved much to manage things with great prudence, and ingratiate himself into the peoples hearts by clemency and acts of grace, intended no such matter, but was wholly fixed upon scraping up money together: having most wickedly put many to death, unto Timotheus (whom afterwards he sent Embassador to Rome) he gave 50 talents to King Demetrius 70, promising to pay the other 400 talents shortly after, and to add six hundred over-plus: whereas he saw that he had rendered himself odious to the Cappadocians by this action, he began to pill and plunder all the people, and to hook into his own Exchequer the wealth of the nobility. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 334.]

This same Orophernes, having had his education in Ionia (as hath been intimated in the 3832 year of the World, out of Diodorus) little regarding the constitutions of his Country, (let up his lawless & tyrannical desires, The Ionick, and an artificial kind of intemperance, [Polyb. lib. 22. apud Athenaeum, lib. 10, cap. 12.]) And having heaped together a vast sum of money, he deposited 400 talents in the hands of the Prieniens, in case the times should turn: which afterwards were faithfully by them restored unto him again. [Polyb. & Diodorus, Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 170, 173. & 334.]

After that Jonathan and his company had lived in peace and quietness at their own home two years together, some prevaricating Jews suggested to Bacchides, That there was a fair probability of surprising them all in one night. Whereupon Bacchides made towards them with a great force, and sent letters privily to all his friends in Judea, to assist him in his enterprize of seizing on Jonathan, and those that were with him. But their plot was discovered to Jonathan and his company, who having taken 50 men of the country, who were found to be contrivers of the villany, put them to death. [1 Mac. 9, 57, 61.]

Then Jonathan and Simon, and those that were with him, removed to Bethbasi, (or Bethlagan, as Josephus hath it) which is in the wilderness, repaired the walls thereof, which were decayed, and fortified it. As soon as Bacchides had notice of it, he mustered up all his forces, and summoned his adherents in Judea, to repair unto him. Then went he and laid siege to Bethbasi, and fought against it many dayes, and made his Engines. But Jonathan, leaving his brother Simon within the City, travelled the Country with a small brigade; where he smote Odoarthes (or Odomern) and his brethren, and the sons of Phasiron, in their Tents: And when he began to smite all that he met with, and break into the enemies body, Simon with his company sallied out of the City, and fired the Engines. In this fight, Bacchides was worsted: who engaged to see himself thus disappointed in his hopes, converted his anger against those wicked wretches, that were the promoters of this expedition, inasmuch that he slew many of them, and purposed to return into his own land. Jonathan having intimation thereof, sent Commissioners unto him to treat with him concerning a peace, and the delivering back the prisoners he had taken out of Judea. Bacchides very readily embraced the motion, protesting he would not prejudice Jonathan all the dayes of his life: so he returned back into his own land, and never after entered Judea with an army. The

The wars thus composed in Israel, Jonathan dwelt at Michmash, (in the Tribe of Benjamin) and began to judge the people, and to take away the Wicked out of Israel, [ibid. c. 2. 73.]

A third observation of the autumnal Equinoctial, was made by Hipparchus in the 21 year of the third Calippick period, on the first day of the additionals to the Egyptian year (the 27 of the Julian September) at noon-tide, [Ptolem. lib. 3, cap.]

Ariarathes, deprived of the kingdom, came an humble suppliant to Rome, and applied himself to Sextus Julius the Consul. His garb discovered the great calamity he was in: there came also an Embassie from Demetrius; Miltiades had the prime managing of it, who came provided both to excuse whatsoever Ariarathes should lay to his charge, as also with counter-criminations to render him odious. Orophernes likewise sent his Legates, Timotheus, and Diogenes, to present a Crown at Rome, and to renew their alliance and association; but chiefly to be defendants in the judicial proceed for what was acted by his party, and to accuse Ariarathes. And, to speak truth, Diogenes and Miltiades both, at private conferences made the greater flourish, (as being two to one, and they in their height of prosperity, Ariarathes in an afflictive and miserable condition) and also when they came to treat the matter openly, had far the odds of him: for in that they dared to say any thing in defiance of the truth, and answer to all queries, no body being present which could confute their utterings, they seemed to do what they listed, [Polyb. Legat. 126.] but in the conclusion, it was decreed by the Senate, That Ariarathes (in regard he was a friend and an associate of the people of Rome) and Orophernes should reign together as brothers, and partners in the kingdom, [Appian. Syriac. pag. 118. Zonar. ex Dione.]

Ptolemei Evergetes endeavouring to reduce Cyprus, in a fight there with his brother Philometor, was worsted: and when Philometor had reduced him, being besieged in the City Lapithus, unto extreme necessity, at last he took, but spared, him; being naturally of a mild disposition, and because of that bond of consanguinity betwixt them, as also out of fear to give distaste to the people of Rome. Neither did he only forgive him, but entered into covenant with him, whereby he obliged himself to resign back unto him, the kingdom of the Cyrenians, and in lieu of Cyprus, to demean unto him certain Cities with a yearly allowance of corn: promising also to espouse his daughter unto him. Thus was that war betwixt the two brothers, after that it had risen to the greatest alienation of affections, and extreme danger, of a sudden composed upon most gentle conditions, [Polyb. & Diod. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 197, 334, 337. Liv. lib. 47. Zonar. ex Dione.]

Orophernes, considering with himself that the Romans had cut him short of what he enjoyed formerly, resolved as soon as possibly he could, to pay his mercenary soldiers: least that for want of their pay, they should chance to mutiny. But being at present somewhat bare of monies, he pillaged Jupiters Temple, situated at the foot of the Mount of Ariadne, which until that time was untouched: and out of that plunder, discharged all the arrears which were due to the soldiery, [Diodor. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 337.]

Demetrius Soter proffered to Archias 500 talents, upon condition he would betray Cyprus unto him: promising him other gratuities and honours, if he would assist him herein. As Archias was going about the work, he was apprehended by Ptolemei (Philometor) and being questioned for the design, he hanged himself with the rope of the curtain which was drawn before the Hall, [Polyb. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 170. & apud, Suidam, in voc. ἀρκεῖον & ἀρκεῖον.]

Ariarathes, after he was restored unto the kingdom of Cappadocia, demanded of the Prieniens the 400 talents, which Orophernes had deposited with them: but they honestly replied, As long as Orophernes was alive, they would not deliver the money to anybody but him, who had entrusted them with it: whereupon Ariarathes sent Troopers to pillage the Country: Attalus assisted him, and indeed incited him to the work, there being a private grudge betwixt him and the Prieniens: And notwithstanding the great slaughter that was made both of man and beast, and some were killed at the very gates of the City, yet could not the Prieniens relieve them; wherefore they sent their Embassadors to the Rhodians, but were glad at last to see the Romans for Protection: But Ariarathes lightly esteemed all reports, and although the Prieniens had faithfully restored to Orophernes the money deposited amongst them, yet did Ariarathes for that very thing, let a great fine upon them, and afflicted them with most bad calamities, and that without just cause, [Polyb. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 173.]

Upon some differences arising betwixt Attalus and Prusias Venator, King of Bithynia, Atralus sent Andronicus, Prusias Nicomedes and Antiphilus, Ambassadors to Rome: whereupon, the Senate sent Publius Lentulus to take cognizance of their cause. When Andronicus began to charge upon Prusias, the first invasion, the Romans were not much affected with what he said in that particular; but began to suspect that Atralus had a mind to fall upon Prusias, to seek occasion of quarrel, and to get before hand with him in accusation: Prusias his Ambassadors protested that there was no such matter; which made the Senate give little credit to what was alleged against Prusias. But after a more strict search into the business the Senate not very well knowing how far they might trust those Agents, sent two Ambassadors of their own, L. Apuleius, and C. Petronius, to see how the squares went betwixt those two Kings. [Polyb. Legat. 128.]

Pri-fias, having gotten a conquest over Attalus, entered Pergamus, and after he had at a great charge provided sacrifices, he went into Esculapius his Temple, and as soon as he had made an end of offering, he returned again to the Camp. The day following, failing in his designe and hopes of taking Atralus, he brought his forces to Nicephorium, lying under the walls of Pergamus, began to pillage all the Temples, and rifled and rancked the Images and Statue, of the gods: and at last, the Image of Esculapius himself, to whom the day before he had offered to many vows and sacrifices, elcaped not his hand; which, because it was an excellent piece (made by Philomachus or Phryomachus) he carried away with him, bearing it upon his own shoulders. From thence he marched with his army to Elea: and having attempted to besiege the City, when he saw he was not likely to do any good upon it, (because Solander, foster brother to Atralus, lay in the City with a strong Garrison, and bear him off) he went away by ship to Thyatira: In the way he rancked the Temple of Diana in Hiera Cume, As for Apollo Cynius his Temple, about Temnus, he did not only rifle it, but burnt it to the ground: and having so done, returned home. Having lost most of his foot souldiers by famine and the bloody flux: neither had he better luck with his fleet at sea; for by reason of a violent storm in Propontis, most of his ships were sunk in the midst of the sea, souldiers and mariners all: and others wracked and cast on shore. [Polyb. & Diodorus Sicul. in Excerptis Valerij pag. 169, 170, & 337. cum Suidas, in Voc. neptunia.]

Attalus, after he had been beaten by Prusias, sent his brother Athenzus along with Publius Lentulus, to acquaint the Senatewith what had befallen him. [Polyb. Legat. 128.]

After these two had made their full declaration in the Senate of Prusias his exploits, the fathers of the Senate forthwith ordered that C. Claudius Cento, L. Hortensius, and C. Aurrunculus should go Ambassadors with the aforesaid Lentulus, with instruction; to charge Prusias to forbear any farther to molest Attalus. [Id. Legat. 129.]

P. Scipio and Marcus Marcellus being Consuls, the Athenians sent three of the most famous Philosophers of that age Ambassadors to the Senate and people of Rome, Carneades an Academicus, a Cyrenian by birth, Diogenes the Stoick, a Babylonian born, and Critolaus the Peripatetic, to get a release of the fine of 500 talents (accorded by the judgement of the Sicyonians, but by commission from the Senate of Rome) for their devastation of Oropus. When they were brought into the Senate, they made use of Cecilius, (or C. Asiaticus rather) a Senator for their Interpreter: although a little before, each of them severally, to shew their abilities, had discoursed in a great assembly of people. At that time, lay Rutilius and Polybius, it was admirable to hear the eloquence of those three Philosophers in their several strains, Carneades was hot and fiery: Critolaus witty and smooth: Diogenes grave and sober in his style. Clitomachus in his History written in Greek, relates, how that Carneades (to whom Clitomachus was an Auditor) and Diogenes the Stoick stood before the Senate in the Capitol: A. Albinus, who was then Prator, laid in meritment to Carneades: I seem not (O Carneades) in your eyes as if I were a Prator, because I am not a Philosopher, nor Rome a City, nor the people therein Citizens: to whom he replied, This Stoick perhaps takes you for no such Person. As soon as Carneades had done speaking, Cato the Censor thought it fitting to dispatch away those Ambassadors incontinently, because, whilst he argued, the truth, could not easily be discerned. And because the bruit of those Philosophers spread all over the City, and the Roman youth laying aside all other pleasures and delights, ran as if they were mad after Philosophy: Cato, tearing least the youth should bend all their study that way, and make far greater account of the glory of eloquence, than of action and martial discipline, moved, That all Philosophers should be sent out of the City in a civil equipage: and when he came into the Senate, he checked the fathers, for that they suffered those Ambassadors (who were also to persuade what they pleased) to abide so long amongst them without an answer: wherefore he advised also, That they would without farther delay, conclude and decree something concerning the the Embassy, that to they might get them home, and argue amongst their young Grecians: and not to tamper with the youth of Rome, who were to be kept close to the obedience of the laws and magistrats as formerly. [Cicero in Lucullo, & Tullian. quest. lib. 4. & lib. 2. de oratore, Plin. lib. 7. cap. 30. Plutar. in Catoe. Major. A. Gellius lib. 7. cap. 14. Maccab. lib. 1. Salmast. cap. 5.]

At the same time that the Senate sent Qu. Opimius Consul, to wage war with the Oxybians of Ligurea (of which Polybius makes mention in the 134 Embassy) Ptolemy the younger (Euergetes) came to Rome: who as soon as ever he was entered the Senate, fell foul upon his brother Philometor, charging him as the contriver of those ambushes, by which he had been way-laid: endeavouring withal, by displaying the scars of the wounds he had received to the eyes of the Spectators, and aggravating the business with all the Rhetorick he had, to work upon the affections of the people, and to bring them to a commiseration of his condition: there were present at the same time also Ambassadors from Ptolemy the Saviour, Neolaidas and Andromachus, who stood ready to satisfy all impeachments charged upon him by his brother, but the Senate would not suffer them to speak a word, to strangely had his brother prepossessed their minds by telling his tale first, these being suddenly commanded out of Rome, five Ambassadors were designed, amongst whom were Cn. Metella, and L. Thermus, and to each of them were assigned Gallies of five orders of oars: their commission was to go along with the younger Ptolemy, and place him in the possession of Cyprus. They wrote also to their Allies in Greece and Asia, giving way for their assisting of Ptolemy in his recovering of Cyprus. [Polyb. Legat. 132.]

When the Ambassadors from Rome were come to Prusias, they forbid him in the Senates name to proceed any farther in his hostility against Atralus, an Ally and confederate of the Romans. But upon this they charged him strictly, either to submit to the Senates decree, or to come with a thousand horse to the borders, there to argue the case with Atralus, who with the same number expected his coming thither. He, fighting Atralus his tender retire, and hoping to surprize him, sent his Agents a little before, as if intending no less, than to follow after with his thousand men. But he drew up his whole army, as if he had come to fight, (not to parley.) Atralus and the Roman Legates, upon notice given them, hasted away: but Prusias seized upon the Roman carriages, took Nicephorum, and demolished it, fired the Temples that were in it, and having forced Atralus with the Roman Legates to fly into Pergamus for refuge, besieged it. [Appian in Mithridaticis, pag. 172.]

When Hortensius and Aurrunculus were returned from Pergamus to Rome, and had declared with how great contempt Prusias had received the injunctions of the Senate; who had, contrary to the league betwixt them, assayed all violence and injury against them and Atralus, after he had blocked them up in Pergamus. The fathers were to highly displeased, and moved by this affront, that they decreed ten Ambassadors should forthwith be dispatched away, amongst them were L. Anicius, C. Fannius, and Q. Fabius Maximus, with order to make an end of the war, and to compel Prusias to make satisfaction to Atralus for the damages he had sustained by this war. [Polybius, Legat. 123.]

Whilst it was yet winter, Atralus had got together a considerable army: for, both Ariarathes and Mithridates his confederates had sent under-hand both horse and foot, under the command of Demetrius, Ariarathes son. Whilst Atralus was busied in these his preparations, the Roman Ambassadors met him at Quada, and after they had conferred of all things with him, they went directly to Prusias: as soon as they came thither, they seriously signified unto him the pleasure of the Senate: Prusias promised he would do some things the Senate required of him, but denied the most: whereupon, the Roman Ambassadors to whom he had given great offence by his obstinacy, renounced that amity and alliance which had been formerly between them, and so all of them took their leaves of him, and set forward to go to Atralus. But Prusias, repenting of what he had done, made after the Ambassadors, begging and beseeching them a long time: and when he saw no good could be done by his importunity, he gave them over, and returned home, not well knowing what course to take. In the mean time, the Romans advised Atralus to lie upon the confines of the kingdom with his army, but should not commit any act of hostility against any body, only secure his own Cities and Villages from invasion. As for them, they divided themselves several ways; some went to Rome to acquaint the Senate of King Prusias his peritancy: others went into the Country of Ionia, and others of them to the Hellespont, and the Ports adjacent, to Byzantium; all of them went upon one and the same designe of working men off alliance and compendence with Prusias, and bringing them to side with Atralus, and to assist him in what they could. [Id. Legat. 135.]

Athenus, Atralus his brother, soon after came with a great Fleet, consisting of 80 ships with decks, whereof five were of the Rhodians, and had been employed in the war war in Crete, twenty of Cyziceneans, twenty seven of Attalus, the other were of the Confederates setting out. He drove in a direct course to the Hellespont; and wherefoever he failed by any of the Cities under Prusias command, he put to shoar, and waited their Countries, [Id. Legat. 136.]

As soon as the Senate had taken an account of their Embassadors which were now returned from Prusias: they sent three others, Appius Claudius, Lucius Oppius, and Aulus Posthumus: upon their arriving in Asia they concluded the war, and prevailed with both the Kings to agree upon these conditions: That Prusias should forthwith deliver up to Attalus 20 ships with Decks: That he should pay 500 talents within the space of 20 years: That either of them should keep what they had, before the breaking out of the war betwixt them. Moreover, Prusias was to satisfy for the damages which he did to the Countries of the Mithymneans, Egeans, Cumans, and Heraclians, and to pay unto them 100 talents. After the Covenants were signed by both parties, Attalus returned home with all the forces he had brought either by sea or land, [Id. ib. 175.] But Prusias, observing how difficult he had rendered himself to his Subjects by his enormous Tyranny, and considering withal, how mightily his son Nicomedes was beloved of them, he grew jealous of his son, and sent him away to Rome; that he might live there, [Appian, in Mithridatic. pag. 173.]

Upon the revolting of the Antiochians from Demetrius Soter, Orophernes entered into combination with them, and contrived how to dethrone him, who had been not long since the principall in restoring himself to his kingdom. Demetrius, having received intimation of this his designe, spared indeed his life, least Ariarathes should be freed from the fear of war from his brother, but seized his person, and commanded him to be kept close prisoner at Seleucia, yet the Antiochians, notwithstanding the discovery of the plot, were not so dismayed as to give over their enterprize: But, having drawn into their alliance Ptolemy King of Egypt, Attalus King of Asia, and Ariarathes of Cappadocia, being provoked by war from Demetrius, they furnished a certain obscure youth, an Aliant, who was to lay claim to the kingdom of Syria, as being his fathers, and to assuage the recovery thereof by force of arms; and that the contrivance might be complicit, they called him Alexander, and gave out, that he was son to King Antiochus, such an universal Odium, had Demetrius contracted upon himself, that his rival had conferred upon him by consent of all, not only strength and power befitting a King, but also royalty of extraction, [Justin lib. 35. c. p. 1.]

This Alexander, in the Epitome of the 52 book of Livie, is said to have been an obscure person, and whose descent was not very well known, Athenaeus styles him, Supposititious son of Antiochus Epiphanes. [lib. 5. cap. 10.] Appian, one who thrust himself into the family of those that were descended from Seleucus, [in Syriac. pag. 31.] Sulpitius Severus, A youth bred up at Rhodes, who falsely bragged of himself, that he was son to Antiochus. [Histor. Sacra. lib. 2.] Strabo, [lib. 16. pag. 751.] Juvenal, Balas, and Jolephus, [lib. 13. cap. 8.] Balles.

Heraclides, (whom Antiochus Epiphanes formerly had appointed over the treasury at Babylon) brought this Alexander with him to Rome, together with Laodice (Antiochus Epiphanes his daughter) in the midst of summer. Whilst he stayed at Rome, he bore the guard of some great person, and did all things very subtilly, purposely drilling out the time, hoping to encline the Senate to favour his designe. [Polyb. Legat. 138.]

Attalus son of King Eumenes (in whose name his Uncle Attalus governed the kingdom of Pergamus) being yet a very child, came to Rome, that he might ingratiate himself with the Senate, and renew that friendship and right of hospitality, which formerly had been betwixt his father and the people of Rome: who after he had been treated with most extraordinary civility by the Senate; and his fathers friends, had received an answer to his own hearts wish, and had been ennobled with such honours as were suitable to a child of his age, within few daies he returned to Rome: all the Cities of Greece, through which he passed, receiving him with great devotion and magnificence. [Id. Legat. 140.]

Demetrius (afterward called Nicator, son of the then reigning Demetrius Soter in Syria) was at the same time at Rome. His reception was but ordinary, being but a child, and his stay not long. [Id. ib.]

Heraclides, having tarried some what long at Rome, came into the Senate with Laodice and Alexander (Balas) where first the younger made a short speech, wherein he desired, That the Romans would be pleased to remember that friendship and alliance which had been formerly betwixt them and his father Antiochus, and that they would further him in the recovery of his kingdom; or, if they had no great mind to that, that at least they would permit him to return into Syria, and that they would not stave off any of those, who were ready to assist him in the regaining of his fathers kingdom kingdom. Next spoke Heraclides, who after he had at large recited the worth and merits of Antiochus, and thereto adjoynd an impeachment of Demetrius (Soter) at last concluded, That it was right and just to grant unto the youth (Alexander) and to Laodice (who were the lawful issue of King Antiochus) leave to return into their Country. But little or nothing of all he said was liked by sober-minded men, who accounted all he had spoken a fiction, and a tale of his own devising, and did utterly detest Heraclides. But the meaner sort of the Senators, whom Heraclides by his flatteries had made his friends, all accented, that a Decree of the Senate should be drawn to this purport. That the Senate had given way to Alexander and Laodice (children of a King who was a friend and an associate of the people of Rome) pleading in the Senate, to return to their fathers kingdom by right of former inheritance, and withal decreed to assist them, according to their desires. Heraclides presently hired him loudiers, and drew very considerable persons to be on his side: Then came to Epistius, where he began with all earnestness to set on foot the war he had had long in his head, [Id. ibid.]

In the 160 year of the kingdom of the Greeks, Alexander (Bala) crying himself up for the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, seized upon Ptolemais (a City of Phenicia) which was betrayed unto him by the loudiers therein garrisoned, [1 Mac. 10. 1. Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 3.] who could not endure Demetrius his behaviour, being of an harsh disposition and very insolent: for his humour was to immure himself upon one of the Castles royal, fortified with four turrets, not far from Antioch, and to admit no body to come unto him: where, laying aside all care of the publick, he trifled away his time in idleness.

Demetrius Soter, hearing that Alexander was received into Ptolemais, and began to reign there, he mulctured together a very great force, with a resolution to march against him, and fight him. [1 Mac. 10. 1, 2.] But Demetrius considering the hazard of the war, and the uncertainty of the events, sent two of his sons (Demetrius Nicator, and Antiochus Sideres; both of whom afterwards were Kings of Syria) with a great weight of gold to his host at Cnidus: that there they might be secured out of the dangers of the war, and, if it fell out, reserved alive to avenge their fathers quarrel hereafter, [Liv. lib. 52. Justin. lib. 35. cap. 2.]

Demetrius wrote letters also to Jonathan, whereby he renewed peace with him, and gave him authority to levy Forces, and to provide armes, that he might be his assistant in the war against Alexander: he commanded likewise, that the hostages which were kept in the Fort, should be released. Upon Jonathans reading of the letters openly at Hierusalem: those which were in the Fort, for very fears, resigned up the hostages to him, and he them to their parents, [1 Mac. 10. 3, 9.]

Jonathan, very wisely making good use of this opportunity, dwelt at Jerusalem, and began to re-edifie and repair it. He took care also to build up the walls, and the Mount Sion round about with square stones, for the fortifying of it. So that the alians which were in the Forts which Bacchides held, quitted their hold, and every one hastened away to his own land: Only, there remained at Bethsura, some of the Apostates and Defectors of the Law; holding this as their place of refuge, [Ibid. 10. 14.]

Alexander had heard in the mean time, of the fair promises which Demetrius had made to Jonathan in his letters he sent: whereupon he also by letters courts his friendship and affection: ordained him High-Priest of that Nation, honoured him with the Title of being called the Kings friend, and withal sent him a Purple Robe, and a Crown of gold, [Ibid. 15. 20.]

Jonathan put on the holy vestment on the seventh month of the 160 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, at the Feast of Tabernacles, [1 Mac. 10. 21.] being the ninth, not the fourth year (as it is in Josephus lib. 13. cap. 5.) after the deceale of his brother Judas: For by that account, Judas dyed not before the 164 year of the Grecians; expressly against the truth of the History of the Maccabees, [1 Mac. 9. 3, 18, 14.] which error sprang from that other, concerning Judas his succeeding of Alcimus in the High-Priesthood: which (as we have shewn) was soon after acknowledged by Josephus himself, clearly professing, that no one succeeded after the deceale of Alcimus or Alcimus; but that the City was destitute of a High-Priest, for the space of seven entire years. [lib. 20. cap. 8.] which seven years expired, and five months over, Jonathan now discharged the Office of the High-Priesthood. He was first of the Hasmonaeans, descended from Jehoiair, the Priests family indeed, but not from Jaddus the High-Priest, whose heir, Onias at this instant lived in Egypt with Ptolemy Philometor.

Demetrius Soter, grieving that the Jews were inclined to take Alexanders part, hoped to bring them off again by the relaxation of their arrears, and all the tributes (whereby the Macedonians had hitherto miserably oppressed that Nation) and large promises of other honourable concessions, Jonathan and the people of the Jews were not much affected with those profuse engagements, and profers; considering, that they came from a man, who had sufficiently evidenced by his former pranks, how perfectly he hated them, and that he would not perform a trifle, if once he got loose from those bribes in which he was at present entangled. Whereupon disclaiming Demetrius, they stuck close to Alexander, who had first articulated with them concerning a peace, and from that time forward, they continued his confederates in the War, [1 Maccab. 10, 22, 47.]

One Andronicus an Adramytean, a contemptible person, gave out that he was the son of Perseus, the last King of the Macedonians, and changing his name, called himself Phil: He endeavoured to breed some disturbance in Macedonia; but when he saw that no body regarded him, he went into Syria, and made his address to Demetrius Soter (whose Sister was Perseus his Wife) plianly to himself a possibility of craving some assistance thence. (For the better accomplishing of his design) he deputed his tale. That he was descended from King Perseus by a Curetzin, and placed out with one Cyrtella to receive his education: That so, at least a seed of the Royal Stock might be preserved, in case the war, which at that time he had with the Romans, might not prove successful. After Perseus's decease, he was kept in ignorance of his descent, and believed until he came to twelve years of age, that the man with whom he was brought up at Adramyrum, was his father: afterwards the man falling sick, and drawing now his last breath; His descent was discovered, and that a little book was given to his reputed mother signed with King Perseus's Signet, which was to give to him when he came to age, with the highest precautions, to keep all close and private till then: when he came to age, the book was delivered up to him, in which two treasures were mentioned let him by his father: Then the woman who knew he was not her own, but a tuborned son, informed him, being ignorant of it, whence was his true descent; begging him carefully to withdraw from those parts before the business came to Eumenes his care, who was Perseus his sworn enemy; least happily they should be put to death. For this lye he was attacked by King Demetrius and sent to Rome; where, when it appeared that he was neither the son of Perseus, nor had besides any thing remarkable in him, he was slighted and contemned, [Liv. lib. 48. & 49. Zonar. ex Dione.]

Alexander Balas, what with the soldiery which revolted from King Demetrius in Syria, and the auxiliaries of Attalus, Ariarathes, Jonathan, and especially of Ptolemy Philometor, having gotten together a considerable army, encountered with Demetrius: And to speak truth, the left wing of Demetrius army routed the adverse Party, and made them flee, and pursued them to hard, that they had all the plunder of their Camp: But the right wing, in which Demetrius himself fought, was forced to give ground: But Demetrius (the rest with all haste betaking themselves to their heels) behaved himself very valiantly, killing some of his enemies outright, and chasing others of them, who were not able to withstand the violence of his charge: until such time, he happened upon a flugh, deep and unpassable: where, past all hopes of escaping, by reason that his horse fell all along, the enemy environed him round, and stroke him thorough with their darts; but he fought very gallantly afoot, until he fell down dead, having received many wounds, [1 Maccab. 10, 48, 49, 50. Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 5. Justin. lib. 35. cap. 1. Appian. Syrian. pag. 131.] Thus Demetrius, after he had reigned in Syria twelve years, the rest of the Kings conspiring against him, lost both his life and his kingdom together: as Polybius hath it, [lib. 3. pag. 165.] whom Porphyrius (who well knew Demetrius) [in Græc. Enchir. Scaliger. pag. 228.] Eusebius, and Severus Sulpicius, follow in assigning him 12 years reign: although Josephus allows him but eleven.

Upon Demetrius his death, (who left behind him two sons, Demetrius and Antiochus;) a little before the Achæick war; there appeared a Comet, not less than the Sun. At first the Orb was fiery and ruddie, and casting a clear light, whereby the night was enlightened. Afterwards it began to lessen in bignesse, and its brightness vanished, and at last quite disappeared, [Senec. Natural. quæst. lib. 7. cap. 15.]

After Alexander, by the more especial assistance of Ptolemy Philometor (as Appian testifies) had deprived Demetrius both of his life and kingdom: he sent Embassadors to Ptolemy, to negotiate a match betwixt him and his daughter. Ptolemy desired assented, and forthwith came out of Egypt to Ptolemais with his daughter Cleopatra (a woman born to ruin the kingdom of Syria) in the 162 year of the kingdom of the Grecians; (in the close of the year;) where the Nuptials betwixt Alexander and Cleopatra were celebrated with such magnificent solemnity, as is commonly observed at the Marriage of Princes, [1 Macc. 10, 51, 58.]

Jonathan was by Alexander invited to this wedding, who presented thole, two Kings, and their friends likewise with gold and silver, and many other gifts; so that hereby he insinuated himself much into their favour. At the same time, a pack of malevolent

levolent fellows, came out of the land of Israel, to accuse Jonathan: But Alexander was so far from giving any heed to those detractions, that he commanded that Jonathan should be clothed in purple, and that he should sit next to him: and ordered also the Piers of his realm to attend him into the midst of Ptolemais, and by proclamation inhibit any one to speak against him, or to molest him in any matters; whereupon, his accusers vanished out of his sight. The King also shewed him a great deal of honour, by lifting him amongst those that were reputed his most intimate friends, and constituting him Generalissimo (of his forces in Judea) and shared the dominion with him (in his own Court:) So Jonathan returned back to Jerusalem in peace and great joy. [Ibid. 59, -62.]

Onias, son of the High Priest, Onias the third of that name, who lived a runagado with Ptolemy Philometor at Alexandria, now beyond all hope of recovering the High Priesthood of Jerusalem (it being transferred upon the family of the Hermoneans) aspiring to get himself a name to all posterity, intimated to King Ptolemy, and Queen Cleopatra (who was both wife and sister to him) by way of petition, that whilst he was employed in the war in divers Countries, he observed how that in Cælosyria, Phœnicæ, and Leontopolis in the Heliopolitan jurisdiction of Egypt, and in divers other places the Jews had their Temples, which was the cause of all those bickerings and contentions which were to rise amongst them. He requested therefore, That he might have leave to purifie an old ruinous Temple, (not as yet consecrated to any god,) which he had found standing near the Castle of Bubastis in the plain, and to erect another in the same place to the Almighty God, after the model of that at Jerusalem, both for figure and bulk, that so the Jews living in Egypt, might keep their assemblies there, which would be a great means, both of preserving unity amongst themselves, as also of putting them in a readinesse to serve their Majesties upon all occasions. For indeed, the Prophet Isaiah foretold, That there should be in after ages, an Altar erected unto the Lord God in Egypt: and prophesied many other things besides concerning that place. [Isaiah, lib. 13. cap. 6.]

Where by the way it is to be observed, first, That Onias did not set upon the building of the new Temple, when he came first to Philometor and Cleopatra into Egypt: but after he had done them good service, both in the Egyptian and Syrian wars: for Josephus in his second book against Appian [p. 1064.] voucheth, That Philometor and Cleopatra, committing their whole kingdom to the Jews to ravage, appointed Onias and Dositheus (both Jews) over the whole Militia. And again, that Prophesie of Isaiah, which Onias wrested to support his sacrilegious ambition, had respect to the spiritual kingdom of our Lord Christ: the place is to be found in the 19 Chapter of Isaiah, 18, 19. verses, In that day shall there be five Cities in the land of Egypt, speaking the language of Canaan, and sworne to the Lord of Hosts, one shall be called a City of destruction. In that day shall there be an Altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a Pillar to the Lord at the border thereof: where for the City of Jerusalem, by reason of the great resemblance of the letters to each other, it was formerly read ירושלים יעיר that is to say, the City of the Sun, as Simmachus hath interpreted it: so also Jerom hath rendered it, One of them shall be called the City of the Sun. The Chaldee Paraphrast pursues them together, The City of the Sun which shall be destroyed: Upon which occasion perhaps Scaliger gulleth, that Onias chose the Heliopolitan tract, wherein he might build the Temple.

Onias, having got a grant of the place in the field under that Heliopolitan feignory 180 furlongs distant from Memphis, erected a Temple there, neither so big nor so costly, as that at Jerusalem: The Tower indeed of this was like to that of the other, of great stones, and 60 cubits high, The fabric of the Altar he made, was in imitation of that in his own Country, and furnished it with the same utensils, excepting the Candlestick: For he made no Candlestick, but in leiv of that the gold en Lamp, which sparkling as it were with a beam of light he hung upon a chain of gold, he surrounded also the Temple with a wall of brick, in which were made gates of stone. The King also passed a grant of a great proportion of land, and revenue in money, that the Priests might be supplied with necessaries for the worship of God. Onias also found out some Jews, who were like himself (אֵלֹהִים לְיִשְׂרָאֵל חָזְקוּ מַעֲשֵׂיהֶם) That inhabited the region of Onias) [Josephus, lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 14. & lib. 1. Belli. cap. 7.] and Priests and Levites, who there frequented divine service; [Josephus lib. 7. of the Jewish war, cap. 37. compared with lib. 13. Antiquit. cap. 6. yet in the Mishna, tract. Minhoth cap. 13. Sect. 10.] the Priests which ministered in Onias Temple were accounted (and that not undeservedly) little better than the Priests of the high places, who were not permitted, (as appears out of 2 Kings, 23, 9.) to offer burnt offerings upon the Altar of the Lord at Jerusalem, Jerusalem, but only to eat unleavened bread (like to the unclean Priests) among their brethren.

At Alexandria there arose a sedition betwixt the Jews and the Samaritans, concerning their holy Solemnities, the one contending the Temple of Jerusalem, the other that of Gerizim, to be the lawful Temple, and according to Moles his prescription: both parties appealed to Ptolemei Philometor, and a Session of his friends, for the hearing and decision of the cause: in such wise, That the advocates of that party which happened to be overthrown in the process, should be sentenced to death. Sabbas and Theodosius pleaded on the Samaritans behalf; Andronicus the son of Mellanus was on the Jews side: they took their oaths by God and the King, That they would use no arguments but such as they drew out of the law: and they moved the Kings, That he would put to death, whoever of them were taken falsifying their oath: the King with many of his friends, at the Council tables heard the whole debate: and at length persuaded by Andronicus his allegations, determined that the Temple in Jerusalem was that which was built by Moles's directions: as for Sabbas and Theodosius, they were both of them by him (as was covenanted betwixt them) sentenced to death. [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 6.]

At the same time Antiochus a Jew, being a Peripatetic Philosopher, grew famous at Philometors Court in Egypt, who wrote a Comment upon Moles, and dedicated it to the same King. Out of the Preface of which book to the King, a famous passage is quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus lib. 1. Stromas; and by Eusebius in Preparat. Evangelic. lib. 13. cap. 7. who both there, and in the eighth book of the same work, cap. 3. takes somewhat large fragments out of these same Comments.

In this year began the third Carthaginian war, to which Mithridates Euergetes, who was the first of the Kings of Pontus, that would confederate with the people of Rome, brought a supply of ships against the Carthaginians. [Appian, in Mithridatic. p. 176.] Both the Consuls were sent to manage this war: Manilius had the conduct of the land forces, Marcus Censorinus was Admiral of the fleet, who received private instructions, by no means to give over the war, till such time as they had demolished Carthage. [Liv. lib. 49. Appian, in Libya. pag. 42.]

Andronicus or the false Philip, having stole privately out of Rome, levied an army, and seized upon all Macedonia, and the Royal Ensigns; either with the consent of the inhabitants, or by force of arms, in the third year of the 157 Olympiade. He thought also to invade Thessaly, and to bring it under his commands, but through the insigation of the Roman Legates, it was defended by the help of the Achaeans, [Liv. lib. 49. & 50. Vellei Patercul. lib. 1. Porphy. in Graec. Enclit. Scalig. pag. 329.]

Prusias Venator, King of Bithynia, understanding that his son Nicomedes was in some favour at Rome, ordered him to go to the Senate, and obtain of them, That the arrears of the money, which was due to Attalus, might be taken off: He sent also an Ambassador, Menas, to be his assistant: to whom under cover, he gave command to respice Nicomedes, if he succeeded in his suit, if otherwise, to kill him at Rome out of hand. [Appian, in Mithridatic. pag. 173.] providing thereby for his younger sons which he had by a second venter. [Justin, lib. 34. cap. 4.] whereof one of the same name which his father, had no teeth in his upper mandible, but instead thereof, one continued bone, so evenly growing out, that it neither disfigured him, nor yet was any inconvenience to him in his chewing. [Liv. lib. 50. Valer. Maxim. lib. 1. cap. ult. Plin. lib. 7. cap. 16.]

Prusias let out his Ambassador Menas with some large ships, and two thousand soldiers: To oppose him, Nicomedes was sent Ambassador from Attalus; who made it clearly appear, That the fine which was layd upon Prusias, was far less than the booty he had got by pillaging the Country. Menas, perceiving that he was in small hopes of getting Prusias his fine taken off, and observing also in how high esteem Nicomedes was in Rome, he was at a stand, not knowing what course to take; neither daring to kill Nicomedes, nor yet, failing in that, to turne back to Bithynia. In this suspense, he abode still at Rome, where the young man (Nicomedes) gave him a meeting, which went not much against his stomach: they conspired against Prusias, and drew Andronicus into their confederacy, who was to persuade his master Attalus to help to settle Nicomedes in Bithynia; they all met together at Bernice, a little Town in Epirus, and at night time went aboard a ship, to consult amongst themselves what was fittest to be done in this business: when the debate was ended, they departed severall wayes the same night. But in the mornings, Nicomedes comes aboard in his purple, and with his Crown on his head, like a King: Andronicus met him soon after, and having saluted him King, attended him with two soldiers he had about him. As for Menas, he made as if he wot not that Nicomedes was in company till then: but then he ran to and fro about the two thousand soldiers he had brought with him, and ex-

thorted them to stick close to that Party, which should seem most deserving: intimating withal, That Prusias was now an aged man, Nicomedes in his young blood: That the Bithynians were weary of him, but desirous of this, That the best sort of the Romans effected this youth extremely, and that Andronicus, now Captain of his Guard, had promised assistance from Attalus, a neighbouring King, and one that had wide Dominions, and besides, was a most inveterate enemy to Prusias. He minded them also of Prusias his cruelty, discovering many of his pranks, whereby he had incurred a general hatred: as soon as Menas espied in these soldiers also a disrelish of his villanies; he carried them all away with him to Nicomedes: He was the second after Andronicus that saluted him King, encompassing him about with a guard of 2000 soldiers. [Appian, ut sup. pag. 173, 174.]

Attalus was very forward in receiving the youth, and sent to Prusias, commands to assign over unto his son, some Cities to dwell in, and fields for provision: Prusias answered, That he would ere long give him Attalus his whole kingdom: for whose sake he had formerly invaded Asia. Having thus said, he dispatched some away to Rome, to accuse Nicomedes and Attalus, and cite them both to a trial. [Id. ibid. pag. 174.]

Nicomedes, encouraged by Phaeleon, (or rather Phaenii:) Epirus's Oracle, which he interpreted by his own emoluments and advantages, upon the insigation of Attalus, waged war with his father Prusias, [Zosim. H. stor. lib. 2.] As soon as he and Attalus with their Forces came into Bithynia, the Bithynians began to revolt: Whereupon Prusias durst not trust himself with any body (of his own subjects) His hope was, That the Romans would relieve him; in expectation whereof, he shut himself up in a castle of Nicæa: having procured of Dirigylas a Thracian (his father in law) 500 Thracians, which he appointed to be his life guard. [Appian, Mithridatic. pag. 174.]

The Roman Cities Prætor did not conduct to the Senate the Embassadors from Prusias, as soon as they arrived at Rome, intending thereby to do Attalus a courtesy: and after he had ushered them into the Senate, and was commanded to make choice of some Embassadors, which might compromise the war, he chose three: one of which, having been formerly wounded on the head with a great stone, was much disfigured with scars: a second was lame on his feet, and the third, a very fool and for Cato Censorius (who soon after died in the 85 year of his age) in a jeere to them, said, That the Romans sent an Embassy which had neither head, feet, nor heart, [Id. ibid. lib. 50. Plutarch, in Catoe majori.]

The Embassadors, as soon as they came into Bithynia, commanded both parties to lay down their arms: Nicomedes and Attalus made as if they were ready to submit to the authority of the Senate, but the Bithynians (who were put upon the business, and pre-instructed by Nicomedes and Attalus what they should do) said peremptorily, That they were not able any longer to endure Prusias his tyranny, especially now they had evidenced unto him, (by this present engagement) how much they disliked his government. The Embassadors (in regard that the Bithynians had not as yet made known these their grievances to the Senate) returned home again, having done nothing in the business they came about. Prusias, now despairing of any relief from the Romans, in confidence of whom he had hitherto forborn to sollicite helpe elsewhere, passed over to Nicomedia, intending to fortifie that place, and from thence to prohibite the enemies entrance: but the Townsmen deserted their King, and opened the gates to the enemy. Whereupon Prusias becook himself to Jupiters Temple, trusting the religion and respect due to that place would have been his protection: but Nicomedes sent some of his Party, who killed him in the place, [Appian, Mithridatic. pag. 174, 175.] Diodorus Siculus relates, That Prusias, fleeing for his own security to the Altar of Jupiter, was slain by his son Nicomedes, his own hand, [in Photii, Bibliotheca. cod. 244.] Strabo tells us, he was slain by Attalus, [lib. 13. pag. 624.] Livy, by his son, but with Attalus his assistance, [lib. 50.] By his own subjects, saith Zonaras, out of Dion. For Polybius reports how he had contracted from his Bithynians such a general dislike, [in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 174. & Suidas in Theop.] that they all appeared against him in such multitudes, and with such violence, as if their design had been, not only to revolt from him, but principally to avenge themselves of him for the notable miscarriages in his government.

Andronicus, or the false Philip, in Macedonia, encountered with Juventius the Roman Prætor, who was sent with a legion against him, wan the field, slew Juventius himself, and killed upon the place, the greatest part of the Roman army. From thence he made an impression into Thessaly, wasted most part of the Country, and took the Thracians into association, [Liv. lib. 50. Flor. H. stor. lib. 2. cap. 14. Eutrop. lib. 4. Zonar. ex. Dion. Oros. lib. 4. cap. 23.] Upon these his successes, he betook himself he to acts of cruelty and tyrannical iniquities. There was not a wealthy person which he put not to death upon false accusations. He spared not his most intimate friends, but dispatched many many of them out of the way: For he was naturally of a fierce and bloody disposition, in his familiar encounters, proud and haughty, and at last, deeply engaged in covetousness, and all manner of vice. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 342.]

Alexander Bala in Syria, having quite given himself over to riot and luxury, his friend Ammonius managed the affairs of the kingdom; who put to death all the Kings friends, Ladioc the Queen (the daughter of Antiochus Epiphanes) and Antigonus Demetrius his sonne, [Livie lib. 50. Josephus lib. 13. cap. 8. Atheniens, lib. 5. cap. 10.]

In the 155 year of the Grecians, Demetrius the eldest son of Demetrius Soter, now in the flower of his age, hearing of Alexanders degenerating into all luxury, (whom those vast incomes which he scarce dreamed he should ever have arrived unto, and the ornaments of an usurped Sovereignty, kept as it were close prisoner within his own Palace, amongst a company of Courtizans) procured of Lathenes the Cretian, a considerable force of mercenary soldiers, and with them, he looked from Crete, and sailed over into Cilicia. The news thereof troubled Alexander, that he posted away in all haste from Phenice to Antioch, to settle things before Demetrius his arrival. The government of Antioch he committed to Hieraces and Diodorus, who is the same with Tryphon, [1 Mac. 11. 39. 1 Mac. 10. 67, 68. Josephus lib. 13. cap. 8. Justin, lib. 35. cap. 2. Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 346.]

Apollonius (named Daus by Josephus) Governour of Celsosyria, joyned with Demetrius: whom he made General of his Forces, which he sent against those Jews which remained loyal and constant in their engagement to Alexander. Apollonius, having gotten together a great army, the terror whereof made many fall off from Alexander to Demetrius, encamped at Jamnia, and sent to Jonathan (the Jews General, and High Priest) a ranting challenge to meet him, if he dared, and fight in the plain field. This enflamed Jonathan so highly, that he forthwith marched out of Hierusalem with 10000 men: where his brother Simon met him to assist him. They pitched their tents before Joppa; but Apollonius his soldiers which were garrisoned there, shut them out; whereupon they layed siege and began their batteries, which so dismayed the Citizens, that they opened their gates immediately, and resigned up the City, [1 Mac. 10. 69, 76.]

As soon as Apollonius heard of the losing of Joppa, he marched away to Azotus with three thousand Horse, and his infantry: (which Josephus says consisted of 8000) having placed in ambush 1000 of his Horse, who were to fall upon Jonathans reare, as soon as he was past the place where the ambush lay: and Apollonius himself facing about, would charge the enemies Van; so that the Jews were to be assaulted one both hands. As soon as Jonathan was passed the place, and clyped these of the ambush to discover themselves, and to encompass his Camp: He commanded his men to stand still, and receive the enemies darts with their shields: When the Horse had quite tired out themselves, and exhausted their quivers, having played their darts from morning till night. Then Simon lead up his Forces against the enemies Foot; discomfited them, and made them quit the field. The Horse upon their routing, made what haste they could to get to Azotus, and they entered into Bethdagon their idol Temple for their safety. But Jonathan set fire on Azotus, and the Cities round about it; took great spoils, burnt Dagon's Temple to the ground, and also they that had fled thither perished in the flames: So that near 8000 men were destroyed by the sword and by the fire. Jonathan removed thence and pitched before Alalon, where the men of the City treated him very nobly. After this victory Jonathan returned Conqueror to Hierusalem with his army loaded with great booty and spoils. When King Alexander heard the news of Jonathans successes, he continued to shew his respects to him, and sent him a golden buckler, which was usually given to those of the blood Royal; he gave also Alalon with its territories (a City of the Philistines) to him and his heirs for ever, [Ibid. 77. 89.]

The Carthaginians, after they had got the better in their encounter with Pilo the Consul, at Hippe, sent their Embassadors into Macedonia, to Andronicus (generally reputed the son of Perseus) moving him to persist courageously in his war against the Romans; promising, that he should never want money nor shipping from Carthage, [Appian, in Libye, pag. 67.]

Q. Caelius Metellus, the Roman Pretor (not Consul, as Florus hath it, and the Latin Interpreter of Paulanias his Achaicks) being sent against Andronicus with a great army, came into Macedonia; There he periwaded the Commissioners (which the Senate had sent to receive information of the affairs in Asia,) that before they passed over thither, they would go to the Commanders of the Achaians, and charge them for a while to surcease the war they had undertaken against the Lacedemonians. They delivered to Damocritus and the Achaians the injunctions (they received from Mebeilas) when they had now led up their army, against the Lacedemonians; so that when they perceived that no discourse of theirs wrought any thing upon the resolutions of the Achaians, they went onward into Asia, [Paulan. in Achaicks, pag. 218.]

Metellus being entered Macedonia, Attalus brought his fleet to his assistance, by the help whereof he put a stop to Andronicus, who was somewhat fearful of the sea coast, who having brought up his army a little beyond Pydna, though his Cavalry had got the better of the enemy, yet here treated back for fear of the Roman foot, and divided his army into two brigades, one of them he sent into Thracia to wait that Country, the other he kept to himself. Metellus, not much valuing that considerable party, marched towards them, and having beaten their forces, discomfited the main body: Andronicus fled into Thracia, where after he had leaved a new army engaged with Metellus, but upon the overthrow of his party, he fled to Byzus, a petty King of Thrace, who betrayed him into the hands of Metellus. One Alexander also, who gave out, that he was the son of Perseus, having gathered an army, seized upon part of the Country which lay next to the river Nestus; but Metellus pursued him as far as Dardania, [Scribo lib. 1. 13. pag. 624. Vellei, Paternuli lib. 1. Flor. lib. 2. cap. 14. Zonar. ex Dione.] The false Philips power by the loss of 25000 of his soldiers thus utterly defeated, and himself also taken prisoner, Macedonia was recovered by the Romans, [Entrop. lib. 43.] Spurius Postumius and Lucius Pilo being Consuls, [Jul. Obsequens, de prodigiis.] in the fourth year of the 157 Olympiad, (in the close of the year) [Porphyr. in Graec. Ensebi Scallig, pag. 229.]

P. Cornelius Scipio, the Consul, with his own fleet, and five ships of the Sidenes, which Mithridates King of Pontus sent unto him, fought at sea with the Carthaginians before the walls of Carthage, [Appian, in Libye, pag. 75, 76.]

The Aradians contriving the ruine of the Maratheans (in Phancia) sent privately to Ammonius (who at that time was Viceroy in Syria under Alexander Bala) offering him 300 talents, prevailed with him to deliver them Marathum: Whereupon Ammonius sent Agodore to the Maratheans, who, by his speech, was to pretend some other matters, but really went to exculpate the commands he received to seize upon Marathum, and to deliver it up to the Aradians. The Maratheans observing how that the Aradians were higher than themselves in the Kings favour; denying the Kings soldiers entrance into their City, out of the most aged Citizens, made choice of ten of the most famous amongst them, and sent them as suppliants to the Island Aradus, with some of the oldest images of their gods which they had in their City: hoping therewith to appease the fury of the Aradians. But the Aradians blood being up, and highly provoked, slighted the common law of such humble addresses, cast off all reverence to the gods, brake the images, and trampled them most shamefully under their feet. And when the Ambassadors were flouted by the people, some Senators which interposed themselves, had much ado to convey them safe to prison. Who, when they made their complaint, and pleaded the privilege of suppliants, and the sacred, and not to be violated rites of Ambassadors, they were miscreed by a company of impudent young fellows. The authors of this villany came immediately after into the assembly, and having taken of the Kings of those Maratheans which they had killed, they counterfeited letters to the Maratheans in the Ambassadors names; in which they intimated that the Aradians would suddenly send them some supplies: upon this policy, that the Maratheans, ignorant of the plot, having admitted the Aradian forces into their City, in confidence they came for no other end but to assist them, might be surprized unawares. Whereupon they seized upon all the ships belonging to private men, least happily some one might discover their plot to the Maratheans: for all this, a certain Marriner, a friend to the Maratheans, pitying their sad condition, (who usually layed in the neighbouring sea) took his ship, and by night boldly passed that strait, which consisted of about eight furlongs, and discovered to the Maratheans, how that the Aradians had a designe of circumventing them. When the Aradians perceived their plot was revealed, they desired to deal any longer by letters, [Diodor. Sicul. Lib. 29. & in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 349, 350.] But they setting upon Marathum by open force; they took the City, demolished it, and shared the territory amongst themselves. [Scribo, lib. 16. pag. 733.]

A fourth observation of the Autumnall Equinox, was made by Hipparchus at midnight, in the 32 year of the third Calippic Period. On the third day of the Egyptian Additionalls (at the beginning of the 27 day of the Julian Septem.) the 178 year from the death of Alexander, or rather 177 ending, the 178, being to begin after two days next ensuing, [Procl. lib. 3. cap. 2.] in the morning, Hipparchus writeth, that the Vernal Equinox was most exactly observed by him. [Id. Ibid.]

Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and Lucius Mummius being Consuls, Carthage was demolished. [Vellei. Patenc. lib. 1.] On which occasion, Scipio, considering the revolutions of humane affairs, and fearing least some such fate should happen some time or other to Rome it self, pronounced these verses,

Εστὸν ἔμελλε ἡ νῆρ τοῖς Ἰωάνησι τοῖς ἱερῇ, καὶ Πάριον, ὃ καὶ ἰσχυρὰ Πάριον.

The day shall come when sacred Troy shall fall,
And Priam with his stock sink thereunto.

As he himself confessed to his Master Polybius, who was then present, and hath inserted this passage in his History. [Appian, in Libic. pag. 82.]

L. Mummius the Consul, who was sent from the Senate to make an end of the Achaic war, came to the Camp with a small company, and after he had given orders to Merellus (who managed the Achaic war, as soon as he had accomplished the Macedonian) to march away with his forces into Macedonia, he stayed a while at the Isthmus, until such time as he had drawn up his whole body, which consisted of 3500 Horse, and 23000 Foot. There were in this army some Archers out of Crete, and Philopomen brought him a brigade from Aratus out of Pergamus, which lies above Caicus. The Consul, having defeated Darius at the Isthmus (the last Achaian Prætor, and the first ring-leader in these Achaian commotions) on the third day after the fight, entered Corinth, with trumpets sounding, and after he had taken the spoils of the City, levelled it to the ground. [Liv. lib. 52. Vellei. Patenc. lib. 1. Justin. lib. 34. cap. 2. Florus, lib. 2. cap. 16. Pausan. in Achaic. pag. 221. Oras. lib. 5. cap. 3.] In the third year of the 158, (for to it is in Pliny, and not the 156) Olympiads, and according to Varro's computation, at the DCVIII year since Rome was built. [Plinie lib. 34. cap. 2.]

Polybius, boasting out of Africa, to the relief of his Country, elpyed some Pictures of the most exquisite artists lying upon the ground at Corinth, and the soldiers playing at dice upon them: two of them he makes mention of in his History, upon one was portrayed Hercules: tortured in the shirt which Dejanira lent him, the other was Bacchus his Picture drawn by Aristides the Theban, of whom some think that proverb was derived, Οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ Διὶ σῶν, This is nothing to Bacchus, (that is, Aristides his Picture of Bacchus. [Strabo. lib. 8. pag. 381.]) When L. Mummius understood that King Aratus had bought this Picture of Bacchus (from amongst the spoils that were let to sale) for six thousand sesterces (or 100 talents, as Pliny hath it, lib. 7. cap. 38. and lib. 35. cap. 10.) He marvelled much at the high price of the picture, and suspecting much that there might be some rare virtue in it which he was not of, revoked the sale much against Aratus his mind, and placed the picture in Ceres her Chappel at Rome. [Plin. lib. 35. cap. 4.] For he knew too little what belonged to such things, that when he had culled out (some exquisite pieces, and statues of the best Artists to be carried into Italy, he told those that had the charge of them, if they lost any of them by the way, they should restore new ones for them. [Vellei. Patenc. lib. 1.] What hangings, and other ornaments seemed admirable, were sent away to Rome: of less value were given to Philopomen, and conveyed to Pergamus. [Pausanias in Achaic. pag. 221.]

Ptolemei Philometor, having gotten together great forces both by land and sea, came out of Egypt into Syria, under pretence to help Alexander Bala his son in law, but indeed, to annex the Kingdom of Syria (of which Alexander was deprived) to his own dominions: And when, in obedience to the commands of Alexander, all the Cities had received him peaceably, he placed a Garrison of soldiers in every one of them, pretending Alexander's interest. [1 Mac. 1. 1, 2, 3.]

As soon as Ptolemei was come near Azotus, they threw him the Temple of Dagon, which was lately burnt, and the ruins of Azotus and the Suburbs thereof, and the heaps of the dead bodies of those that were slain in the war, and were burnt by Jonathan's command, for they had laid them on heaps in the way that he was to pass: and although they had made an envious relation of whatever Jonathan had done, on purpose to Malign him, yet the King replied not a word. But Jonathan met the King at Joppa in great state, and was very courteously received by him. From thence they went together as far as the River Elkerubus, where Jonathan took his leave of the King, and returned to Jerusalem. [Ibid. 4. 7.]

Ptolemei, having gotten into his hand all the Cities along the sea coasts as far as Seleucia upon the coast, (situate at the mouth of the River Orontes) imagined wicked counsels against Alexander, complaining, how, That, by his means at Ptolemais, Ammonius had had laid an ambush to circumvent him: and whereas he had demanded that just might be done him upon Ammonius for the fact, Alexander would not deliver up his person. Hereupon he took away his daughter Cleopatra from Alexander, and gave her in marriage to Demetrius Soter, promising withal, to restore him to his fathers kingdom. [Ibid. 8. 12. compared with Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 8. & Liv. lib. 52.]

The Antiocheans deserted Alexander because of Ammonius, from whom they had received very hard usage: Ammonius, thinking to make an escape in women's apparel, was light upon and slain. Ptolemei went into Antioch, and being by the people thereof saluted King: Crowned himself with two Diadems, the one of Asia, (or Syria) the other of Egypt. But telling them that he was for his part, contented with his own Dominion of Egypt, persuaded the Antiocheans to receive Demetrius, professing that he had a far greater resentment of their present civilities, than of the late exaltations and contempts which had happened betwixt them and his father Seleucus. [Josephus, ut sup. compared with 1 Mac. 11. 13.] And for the Antiochia is (purposing to make amends by their loyal departments to the son, for the injuries they had formerly done to the father) resign themselves up unto him: The old soldiery also of the father, ravished with love of this young man, and perceiving the bond of their former oath before the pride of their new King, went away with their colours to Demetrius. [Justin. lib. 35. cap. 2.]

Alexander was at that time in Cilicia, [1 Mac. 11. 14.] where, upon his consulting the Oracle of Apollo, he is said to have received this answer: viz. That he should beware of that place, which had brought forth a rare fight to be seen, A thing having two shapes: which was generally thought to refer to Asas, a City in Arabia: (where Alexander was slain not long after) In this City, there was a certain woman called Heras (having Diophantus a Macedonian for her father, and an Arabian woman her mother, and married to one Samiades) who changed her Sex, and of a woman became a man, taking upon her, her fathers name Diophantus. [Diodorus Siculus, lib. 32. in Photi: Bibliotheca, col. 244.]

A fifth observation of the Autumnal Equinox, was made by Hipparchus, in the 33 year of the third Calippic Period, on the fourth day of the Egyptian Additional (21 day of the Julian Septemb.) in the morning. [Ptolemei, lib. 3. cap. 2.]

Alexander, having gathered together a powerful army, invaded Syria, and wasted all the Territories of Antioch, pillaging and firing wheresoever he came. But Ptolemei with his son in law Demetrius, marched towards him, and defeated his whole power in a fight near the River Onopora. Alexander himself slipped out of the fight with 500 of his soldiers, and made as fast as he could towards Arabia, a City of Arabia, to a great Person of Arabia, whom the Writer of the History of the Maccabees calls Zabdiel, Josephus Zabai, Diodorus Siculus Diocles, But the Commanders of Alexander's Party, which were with Heliodorus treacherously slew Alexander, having covenanted before with Demetrius to that purpose, to whom they had sent an Embassy to treat for their own peculiar advantage, and private interest. In the last fight it happened that Ptolemei's horse, scared with the braying of an Elephant, threw him on the ground, and when he was down, the enemy fell upon him, and wounded him desperately on the head, and had killed him out right, had not his Life-guard interposed, and rescued him: for all that, he lay four whole days so senseless, that he could neither speak himself, nor understand what others spake to him. But Zabdiel the Arabian cut off Alexander's head, and presented it to Ptolemei: who about the fifth day finding some respite from the anguish of his wounds, and pretty well come to himself again, fed both his fancy and his eyes, the one with the pleasing discourse of the death, the other with the beholding of Alexander's head. But the third day after, Ptolemei himself died, whilst his wounds were dressing, and the Physicians endeavoured to piece his bones. [1 Mac. 11. 14. 18. Polyb. in Excerpt. Vellei, pag. 194. Diodor. Sicul. ut supra. Liv. lib. 52. Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 751. Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 8.]

Josephus alcribeth five years to Alexander's reign, after the death of Demetrius Soter, [lib. 13. cap. 8.] from which we suppose about 5 months are to be deducted: So that, from the authority of the Maccabaic Writer, the death of this man appears to be coincident with Philometors. After Alexander's death, Demetrius, son of Demetrius Soter, had the sole government of Syria, in the 167 year of the Kingdom of the Grecians, [1 Mac. 11. 19.] who because he had overcome one that was not descended of their family, received the same surname with the first Seleucus author of the Kingly Race, Nicanor, or Nicator. [Appian, Syrian, cap. 132.]

As soon as Ptolemei Philometor was dead, the soldiers which he had placed in the Forts and Cities for the security of Syria, were all slain by the other soldiers in the same Garrison, upon the justification of Demetrius, [1 Mac. 11. 18.] Demetrius also treated the rest of Ptolemei's soldiers very unkindly, forgetting both the assistance which he had afforded, as also the affinity which was betwixt them, by reason of his marriage with Cleopatra. But those soldiers, abominating the man's ingratitude, retreated all of them to Alexandria, leaving only the Elephants under his power. [Josephus lib. 13. cap. 8.]

In Egypt, Cleopatra, the wife and sister of Philometor, lately deceased, countenanced by some Peers of the realm, laboured much to get the kingdom settled upon her son. [Josephus lib. 2. Contra Appian, pag. 1064, Justin lib. 38. cap. 8.] But Ptolemy the younger brother of Philometor, surnamed Euergetes II. and Philon, who reigned at Cyrene, was sent for from thence to oppose her in her enterprise. Against him Oshas (who lately builded the Temple in the Helopolitan jurisdiction) undertaking the war upon Cleopatra's interests, marched with a small army of Jews to the City Alexandria, at what time Thermus was Legat Ambassador there for the Romans, as Appian the Grammarian relates in his book against the Jews. [Josephus lib. 13. cap. 8.]

But Philon, that he might end the quarrel, forced Cleopatra, who was his elder sister, and had been wife to their own brother, to marry him. [Valer. Maxim. lib. 9. cap. 1.] And as soon as he entered Alexandria, he commanded all those that favoured the young child to be put to death. He slew also the young child himself, as he was in his mothers arm, upon the wedding day in the midst of their feastings and religious solemnities; and so went up into his sister her bed beset with the gore of her own son. Neither was his carriage any whit milder to those his Countrymen, which invited him to the Kingdom, and were his advances into the throne. For, having given licence to the foreign soldiers to kill and slay at pleasure, there were great inundations of blood in all quarters. [Justin lib. 38. cap. 8.] Many he executed with most cruel tortures, falsely objecting matters of treason unto them: Others he proceeded against by confiscation of their estates, and banishment, for no other impeachments than what he himself had forged and drawn up. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerptis Valefii, pag. 350.]

Jonathan, having drawn together those that were in Judea, and prepared many Engines, laid siege to the Tower that was in Jerusalem: In information hereof was carried to Demetrius Nicator, by certain ungodly persons, and haters of their own nation. The King hereupon, being incensed, wrote to Jonathan, to leave off the siege, and to meet him in all haste at Ptolemais, that they might have some conference together about the matter. Jonathan would not draw off his siege, yet ventured to go to the King. He, the Elders and the Priests, taking along with them some presence, whereby they soon pacified the Kings wrath: and Jonathan made to him an Apologie for himself, that the King dismissed the informers, confirmed the High Priesthood upon him, and counted him as one of his chief friends: Moreover, Jonathan promising to give unto the King 300 talents, procured of him a release for all Judea, and the three signories therunto annexed (of which mention is made in 1 Mac. 10. 30.) Viz. Apherima, Lydda, and Ramath, from all rites and tribute, whatsoever, which were formerly paid to the Kings. Letters hereof from the King to Lathines, (who with the Creteans Auxiliaries brought Demetrius to the kingdom) whom he styled Cousin and Father, are to be seen. [1 Maccab. 11. 20, 37.]

Demetrius, seeing there was now peace throughout the kingdom, and no opposition made against him, disbanded his old hom-bred soldiers, and confined in arms only those bands of foreigners which he had levied in Crete and other Islands. This turned the hearts of his fathers soldiers against him. [1 Maccab. 11. 38.] who constantly received their salaries from other Kings, his Predecessors in times of peace, so that thereby they might be more ready and more cheartull to serve them upon all dangers, and emergencies. [Josephus lib. 13. cap. 8.]

Diodorus, one of Alexander Balas his Commanders, (who after was made King, and took upon him the name of Tryphon) took notice of this alienation of the soldiery from Demetrius. He was born at the Castle of Secon, in the Apamians Country, and brought up at Apamia. [1 Maccab. 11. 39. Sirabo lib. 16. pag. 752. Livie lib. 52. & 55. Josephus lib. 13. cap. 9. Appian, Syriae, pag. 132.] This Tryphon went to Elmalchel the Arabian (who was entrusted with the education of Antiochus, Alexander Balas's young child) and told him what Demetrius Nicator had done, and the differences betwixt him and the soldiery; urging and pressing him very hard to deliver up unto him the young child, and he would undertake to settle him in his fathers Kingdom. But finding the Arabians averse from his motion, he carried there many days. [1 Maccab. 11. 39, 40.]

In the mean time: Demetrius Nicator supposing himself secure and out of Gunshot, proceeded against all those that had appeared against him by unusual kinds of death: Lathines, that wicked and rash fellow (who was appointed over the whole kingdom) corrupting the youth, and by his flatterings and fair speeches, putting him forward upon most villainous attempts. [Diod. Sicul. in Excerptis Valefii, pag. 346.]

Jonathan sent Ambassadors to Demetrius, desiring him to remove his Garrison soldiers out of the Tower of Hierusalem, and all other Forts, because they continued to infect the Israelites with war. Demetrius replied, That he would not only grant Jonathan his request, but would also make him and his nation glorious, when he saw convenient time: for the present, he desired him to send him some soldiers to his assistance, in regard his own soldiers were most of them revolted from him. Jonathan gratified him in his request very readily, and sent him to Antioch 3000 four men, which the King entertained very joyfully. [1 Maccab. 11. 41, 44.]

Demetrius, well provided with foreign forces (in whom he reposed greater confidence than in his own) commanded to disarm the Antiocheans: But the Antiocheans did not only refuse to deliver up their arms, but assembled themselves into the midst of the City, to the number of 10000, and attempted to take away the Kings life; they forced him to retreat to his Palace, whereupon they secured all the passages of the City, and began to assault him in the Palace. But the Jews halted to his relief, who, dispersing themselves about the City, slew on that day near up 10000 men, fired the City, and took much booty: whereupon the Citizens laid down their arms, and made peace with the King. The Jews having got a great deal of honour in this service both from the King, and the whole kingdom returned richly laden with spoils to Jerusalem. [1 Maccab. 11. 45, 52. compared with Diodorus, Sicul. in Excerptis Valefii, pag. 346.]

Upon the consuming of the greatest part of Antioch by fire, and the executing of many about the sedition, and confiscation of estates into the Kings Exchequer, many of the Citizens were forced to escape, what out of fear, what out of hatred to Demetrius, wandering about Syria, catching at all opportunities to avenge themselves of Demetrius. In the mean time, Demetrius, (whose actions had rendered him odious to all men) persisted in his massacres, banishments, confiscations, far surpassing his father in cruelty. [Diodorus Siculus, Ibid, pag. 349.] Moreover, he did but dissemble with Jonathan: Notwithstanding, his fair speeches, and estranged himself from him, and afflicted him very sorely, [1 Maccab. 11. 53.] he threatened also to wage war with him, unless he would discharge all those tributes, which the nation of the Jews were wont to pay to his Predecessors. [Josephus lib. 13. cap. 9.]

Diodorus (who is Tryphon) returned at length into Syria out of Arabia, with young Antiochus (son of Alexander Balas and Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy Philometor) set the Crown upon his head, and vouched him the right heir of the Crown, and furnishing him Theos or Divine. And being provided of a pretty considerable party, in regard all the force which Demetrius had chastised, came flocking in unto him, he set upon Demetrius in plain field, overcame him in battle, and made him fly into Seleucia. But Diodorus seized on his Elephants, and won Antioch. [1 Maccab. 11. 54, 55, 56. compared with Livy, lib. 52. Josephus lib. 13. cap. 9. & 12. about the beginning, and Appian, in Syriae, pag. 132.]

Then Antiochus (or rather Diodorus in his name) sent letters and Ambassadors to Jonathan, confirmed the High Priesthood to him, granted him the four Seignories (Ptolemais perhaps was added to the three which were named in the end of the year before, out of 1 Maccab. 10. 30, 39.) and did him the honour to be one of the Kings friends. He sent unto him also Chargers of gold to be served in, and gave him leave to drink in vessels of gold, and to be clothed in purple, and to wear the golden buckle. Moreover, he appointed his brother Simon General of all the Kings forces, from the tract of Tyre, to the borders of Egypt. [1 Maccab. 11. 57, 58, 59.] Jonathan, being very glad of the favours and honours Antiochus had to bounty-lull conferred upon him, sent his Ambassadors also to Antiochus, and his Guardian Tryphon, professing that he would be their friend and associate, and join in arms against the common enemy Demetrius, of whose ingratitude he complained, in that he had required his civilities and courtesies with many shrewd turns, and injuries. [Josephus lib. 13. cap. 9.]

Diodorus (all Syria being now in disrelish of Kings) made use of Coracesium a Castle of Cilicia, for his head quarters, and moved the Cilicians to join with him in Pyrracy Asia. [Sirabo, lib. 14. pag. 688.]

Demetrius residing at Laodicea, spent his time idly, in revelling and luxury: yet abated nothing of his injurious persecutions, being no whit reformed by the late calamities which beel him. [Id. ad. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valgii, pag. 353.]

At which time Ptolemy Evergetes the second, or Phylion was installed in the Palace at Memphis, according to the solemn Rite of the Egyptians. Queen Cleopatra (who was both sister and wife to him and his brother Philometor) bore him a son: he was so exceeding joyful thereat, that he named him Memphites, because he was born whilst his father was employed in the holy solemnities at Memphis: yet during the celebration of his sons nativity, he obtained not from his cruel practices, but issued out commands to execute some of the Cyrenians (who were the first bringers of him into Egypt) for that they had been somewhat too free and sharpe in reproving him for his Cruelty Irene, [Id. ib. pag. 354.]

When Jonathan had gotten leave of Antiochus to wage war against Demetrius his Captain, having drawn together soldiers out of Syria and Phenicia, as well as out of other places, he speedily traversed all the Cities situate beyond the River Jordan: and with all his Syrian auxiliaries marched to Afulon, where the Citizens went out to meet him very honourably. But removing from thence to Gaza, he was denied entrance, and the Citizens shut their gates against him; whereupon Jonathan laid close siege to the City, and plundered and fired the Suburbs. This strict proceeding inclined them to petition for peace, which was granted them upon their tender of hostages. Jonathan, after he had sent away the hostages to Hierusalem, marched clean thorough the Country as far as Damascus, [1 Mac. 11. 60, 61, 62. Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 9.]

The Princes of Demetrius were come to Cades a City of Galilee, upon design of drawing back Jonathan from meddling in Syria, and engaging him in the relief of his own subjects the Galileans. Jonathan marched against them, leaving his brother Simon behind him in Judea: who vigorously assailed Bethsura many days; and after along siege, forced them to resign: he threw out Demetrius his soldiers, and put in a Garrison of his own in their room, [1 Mac. 11. 63, 66, & 14. 7, 33. Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 9.]

As for Jonathan and his army, they encamped by the Lake of Gemefaret, and betimes in the morning, came to the plain of Afulon where Demetrius his Forces met him, having placed beforehand an ambush amongst the mountains: which as soon as they discovered themselves, the Jews fearing they might be intercepted and put to the sword, betook themselves to their heels: so that all of them deserted Jonathan in this great danger, except Mattathias the son of Abalom, and Judas the son of Calphi, the two chief Commanders of the army, who stuck to him with a Band of fifty well resolved men: Jonathan, having first humbly implored the Divine assistance, faced about with those few that were with him, charged the enemy, and worsted them: when those that had deserted Jonathan saw that the enemy was put to flight, they returned again into the field, and pursued the enemy to their own Camp, as far as Cades. There fell that day of the Heathens about three thousand men: so Jonathan returned to Hierusalem, [1 Mac. 11. 67, 74. Josephus, ut supra.]

Jonathan, observing that his affairs were now in a fair way, sent Numerius son of Antiochus, and Antipater son of Jafon, Embassadors to Rome, about confirming and renewing the alliance and association which was formerly begun with Judas Maccabæus, [1 Mac. 12. 1, 16.] To whom also they gave instructions, in their return homeward from Rome to visit the Lacedemonians, and to mind them of the alliance, and ancient League made with the High-Priest Onias, the third of that name; sending a letter to the same purpose, wherein the people of Judea amongst other things, signified, how that as a testimony of their continued affection towards them, they constantly remembered them as their own brethren in their solemn sacrifices and devotion, [Ibid. 2, 3, 18. Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 9.]

Jonathan, having received intelligence how that Demetrius his Commanders were returned with a far greater army, than they had before, to fight against him: drew out of Hierusalem, and marched against them in the Country of Amathis situate in the utmost borders of Canaan: And, encamping within 50 furlongs of the enemy, sent out his Scouts to view the enemies posture and fortifications. Jonathan, having learned by some prisoners which the Scouts had brought in, how that the enemy had designed to fall upon them on the sudden, and unawares; commanded his soldiers to stand with their arms all night in a posture ready to receive the enemies charge: placing his guards throughout the Camp. When the enemy heard that Jonathan was drawn up in batallia, and was provided for their onset, they began to be afraid; whereupon they stole away privately by night, having kindled fires throughout the Camp, to deceive the Jews. In the morning Jonathan pursued them, but to no purpose; for they had already gotten to the other side of the River Eleutherus. Jonathan therefore bent his course course into Arabia against the Zabadeans (or Nabatians, as Josephus hath it) and smote them, and took their spoiles: from thence he removed with his whole body to Damascus, and passed through the whole Country, hunting and chasing the Demetrians from place to place. His brother Simon lay not idle all this while, but was engaged in an expedition as far as Afulon, and the Garrison adjacent, from whence he turned aside to Joppa, and seized on it, and put therein a Garrison of his own soldiers to secure it, for there was a report, that the Citizens had an intention to deliver up that Garrison to Demetrius his party. [1 Mac. 12. 24, 34. Josephus lib. 13. cap. 9.]

The Ambassadors of the Jews were brought into the Senate, where they renewed their amity and league with the Romans; who also gave them letters to the Governors of the severall associations; that they should conduct them safe into Judea, [1 Mac. 12. 3, 4.] In their return homeward, the Lacedemonians likewise treated them very civilly, and delivered into their hands the publick Decree, concerning the renewing of their amity, and preserving correspondence betwixt them: A copy whereof is recited upon another occasion, [in the 1 Mac. 14. 22, 23.] Numerius son of Antiochus, and Antipater son of Jafon, the Jews Ambassadors came unto us, to renew the friendship that was betwixt us, and it pleased the people to receive the men honourably, and to enter a copy of their Embassie amongst the publick records, to the end, the people of the Lacedemonians might have a memorial thereof.

As soon as Jonathan was come back to Hierusalem, he assembled the Elders of the people, and consulted with them about erecting of scopes and forts in some convenient places of Judea, and about building of the wall about Hierusalem, and a high and strong wall also betwixt the fort (Sion) and the City, to hinder any one from carrying provision from the City to the Fort, for they began their reparations, and when they brought their new work to joy with the remains of the old wall towards the East, (where was the brook Cedron) they made up that place which was called Chapiana-tha. Simon also went into other quarters of Judea, and builded Adida in Sephela, or the plain, and made it strong with gates and bars. [1 Mac. 12. 35, 38.]

In the 169 year of the account of the Contracts, in the reign of Demetrius the Jews in Hierusalem and Palestine, wrote to the Jews in Egypt, concerning the keeping of the feast of tabernacles in the month Chislew, [2 Mac. 1. 7, 8, 9.] The feast of the Maccabees Dedication, which was observed according to the prescript of the Molatic feast of Tabernacles, in the month Tisir, [Vid. supra. Anno Mundi 3840. 4.]

When Tryphon had a designe of putting his young pupil Antiochus beside the kingdom, and feared that Jonathan would appear in armes for the right and defence of the young King, he marched with his forces to Bethlæhem, which by the Gentiles is called Scythopolis, thinking to surprize him: Jonathan, hearing of his coming, made toward him with forty thousand choice men, which to dishearten Tryphon, that he was so far from daring to lay hands on him, that he treated him very nobly, recommended him to all his friends, rendered him many presents, and gave command to his soldiers to be as observant of him, as of himself. In the close he persuaded Jonathan to dismiss his army, and go along with him to Ptolemais, with a few selected men, promising to resigne it up unto him, and what other Garrisons and Forces he had in those parts. Jonathan, giving credit unto him, sent away two thousand of his soldiers into Galilee, and the residue into Judea, reserving only a thousand to himself. But as soon as he was entered Ptolemais, Tryphon commanded the gates to be shut; Jonathan was taken, and all that entered with him were put to the sword: neither was Tryphon satisfied with the massacre of those thousand men, but sent his army and some horse into Galilee, to fall upon those two thousand Jonathan had sent thither: who as soon as they heard of the bloody proceedings against their fellows at Ptolemais, they put themselves in a posture of fight. But Tryphons soldiers, considering with themselves that they had to do with desperate men, retreated back again: And so Jonathans soldiers came late into Judea, and all Israel lamented that losse of their Country-men with great lamentation. [1 Mac. 12. 39, 53.]

After this, Tryphon levied a great army to come against Judea, and to wast it. Whereupon, Simon, observing the people much disheartened, went up to Hierusalem, and having assembled the people together, protested his endeavour to protect them; so they chose him General in the place of Judas and Jonathan his brethren: who gathered all the men of war, made what speed they could to perfect the walls of Hierusalem, and fortified it on every side: He expended vast sums of money out of his own purse, armed all the men of war of his own nation, and received them into pay. [1 Mac. 12. 53, 54. 13. 1, 10, 14, 21, 32.]

Moreover, Simon sent Jonathan the son of Abshalom, with a sufficient army into Joppa: who drove out the inhabitants and resided in it himself; and having well fortified it, designing that part for his passage to the Isles of the sea, [1 Mac. 13, 2, and 14, 5, 34.] From whence Strabo also hath noted, that the Jews used this harbour, [lib. 16, pag. 759.]

Tryphon removed from Ptolemais with his army against Judea, carrying Jonathan along with him his prisoner: as for Simon, he encamped in Adida over against the plain. Tryphon observing that the Jews had put themselves in a posture of fighting, pretended that he kept Jonathan prisoners, for a debt of a 100 talents of silver: upon discharge of this arrear, he promised to release Jonathan: and provided, that he sent two of his sons hostages as a security from Jonathan's attempting to revenge his imprisonment after he got his liberty. But as soon as Simon felt both the money and his brothers sons to him: he falsified his engagement, [Ibid. 12, 49.]

Tryphon upon his march against Judea, bent his course by the way which leads to Adoram (or Doran, a City of Idumea, as Josephus hath it) but Simon's army attended his motion which way soever he went. Those that were in the Fort (Sion) at Hierusalem, sent to Tryphon some Agents, soliciting him very earnestly to make what speed he could to come to them, thorough the Desert, and to supply them with victual. Tryphon was ready with his Horse for the expedition; but there happened such a great fall of snow that night, that he could not possibly get to them. Whereupon he altered his journey, and marched into the Country of Galad: as soon as he came near Balsama (or Balcha) he put Jonathan to death: who was there buried: which done, Tryphon retreated back into Syria, [Ibid. 20, 24, Joseph. lib. 13, cap. 11.] Jonathan lived after the decease of his brother Judas Maccabaeus 17 years, and about 7 months, and enjoyed the High-Priesthood 9 years and a month or two.

Simon sent to fetch away the bones of his brother Jonathan, and buried them at Modin, a City of their ancestors: and all Israel lamented him many days. Simon built a Monument over the Sepulchre of his father and his brothers, all exceeding high, of white stone, polished all over: He erected also 7 Pyramids all of a row, in memory of his father, mother, and his 4 brothers: To these he added a Porch of great Pillars, which were of whole stone, on which he caused the Portraiture of Arms and Shields to be engraven, so lively, that they were conspicuous to all that passed by that way, [1 Mac. 13, 25, 30, Joseph. lib. 13, cap. 11.] Josephus says, this rare Sepulchre at Modin lasted to his time: to doth Eusebius Caesariensis, in his little book on the Preparation evangelic. lib. 1.

The Romans and the Lacedemonians very deeply resented the death of Jonathan: but as soon as they understood by Simon's Embassadors, that he was advanced to the High-Priests Office in his brothers room: They wrote to him in Tables of Brasse concerning the renewing of the amity and league, which they had formerly made with Judas and Jonathan his brothers, [1 Mac. 14, 16, 17.] As for the Romans, they styled the Jews, their Allies, Friends, Brethren, and went forth to meet Simon's Embassadors in an honourable equipage, [Ibid. 40.] And the Inscription of the Letters which the Lacedemonians returned by the Embassadors, (to which also they annexed a Copy of their reply sent before to Jonathan) was this. The Magistrates and Cities of the Lacedemonians to Simon the High-Priest, and the Elders, and to the rest of the people of the Jews: our Brethren, Greetings, [Ibid. 20, 24.] The Letters both from the Romans and from the Lacedemonians, were read before the Congregation at Hierusalem, [Ibid. 19.]

Antiochus, Theos (or the Divine) son of Alexander Bala, was fraudulently slain by his Guardian Diodorus or Tryphon: who corrupted the Chyrurgions to dispatch him, and to give out that he died of a fit of the stone, whilst they were cutting him. Tryphon began with his own Country, and seized first upon Apamia, Larissa, the Carians, Megara, Apollonia, and the other Cities adjacent: from thence he went onwards to invade the other part of Syria: he put the Crown Royal on his own head, and made a great desolation in the Country, [1 Mac. 13, 31, 32, Livy, lib. 55, Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 752, and Justin, lib. 36, cap. 1.]

Tryphon, having now ascended from a private condition to a Kingly estate, made what haste he could to get his Sovereignty confirmed upon him by the Decree of what haste he could to get his Sovereignty confirmed upon him by the Decree of the Roman Senate. To compass this he sent by his Embassadors to the Romans, a golden Meddal of Victory, weighing 10000 crowns: not doubting, but he should obtain from them, the compellation of King, considering the Prefect which he sent, was not in his self only very rich, and of a good value: but such, whose name carried along with it, the happy prognostication of Victory. But his hopes were deluded by the subtlety of the Senate: who received indeed the Prefect: but withal ordered, that instead of Tryphons name, the Title of the Princely youth (slain by Tryphon's treachery) should be engraven upon it, [Diodor. Sicul. Legat. 31.] But he, not one jot dismayed dismayed thereat, caused money, whereof some pieces are still extant, to be coined with the Inscription of BACIAENC TPYNNOC & TPYNNOC ATTO. K PATOPOS BACIAENC: King Tryphon: and of Tryphon the puissant King. For, having had the confidence to usurp the kingdom it self, he began to take upon him the Title of King also; and to change his old name Diodorus, for that new one of Tryphon, [Appian. Syriac. pag. 132.]

Sarpedon, General of Demetrius his Forces, having received an overthrow by Tryphons army, to whom the inhabitants of Ptolemais associated themselves, retired with his soldiers into the Mediterranean Country: But it happened as the Tryphonian Conquerors marched along the sea coast betwixt Ptolemais and Tyre, that on the sudden a wave of the sea rising to an incredible height, and rushing with a great violence upon the land, suffocated many of them, hurrying some into the sea, and leaving others of them dead in hollow places: and upon its recede back into its channel, multitudes of fishes were discovered mingled with the dead carcases. Sarpedons soldiers hearing of this disaster, returned thither with all speed: well enough pleased indeed with the destruction of the enemy; but withal gathered up very many of the fishes, and sacrificed them before the gates of Ptolemais (where the battle was fought) καταδύσαντες αὐτάς unto Neptune the deliverer, [Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 758, & Athenais, lib. 8, cap. 2, out of the History of Possidonius, the Stoick.]

Simon, the Jews General and High-Priest, repaired the Garrisons in Judea: fortifying them round with high Towers, great Walls, Gates, and Bars: and supplied them all with victual. His greatest care was to see that Bithura should be well fortified, which was situate in the confines of Judea, and formerly had been the enemies Magazine: He put in it a Garrison of Jews to secure it, [1 Mac. 13, 33, 14, 7, 33.]

Moreover, Simon, observing how that Tryphons additions were all of them meer rapines, sent by the hands of choice men a Crown of Gold to King Demetrius Nicator: requesting him, that he would release Judea from paying of Tributes, [1 Mac. 13, 34, 37, 14, 10, 33.]

Demetrius, hearing that Simons Embassadors were entertained very nobly by the Romans, and that the Jews and the Priests had passed a grant of the government and High-Priesthood to Simon and his heirs, he also confirmed the High-Priesthood unto him, and made him one of his friends, [1 Mac. 14, 38, 41.] He wrote also a letter unto him, thus inscribed, King Demetrius to Simon the High Priest, and friend of Kings, and to the Elders and Nation of the Jews, Greeting: Wherein, he intimated his concluding of a peace with them, a promise of an Amnistie of all past miscarriages, a ratification of all former covenants (made to Jonathan, 1 Mac. 11, 32, 37.) a grant of all the Forts unto them, which they had built, and a release of Tribute to all in general, and of custom arising from commodities put to sale, to those of Hierusalem. Thus was the yoke of the Heathen taken off from Israel, the 170 year of the kingdom of the Grecians: and the people began to date their instruments, and contracts: In the first year, Simon being the Great High Priest General, and Leader of the Jews, [1 Mac. 13, 35, 42, Joseph. lib. 13, cap. 11.]

In those dayes Simon beligned the Gazans, who upon Jonathans death rebelled, and compelled them to a surrender, after he had with his battering Engins forced the Tower. He did not put them to the sword, being wrought upon by the importunities of the Citizens, humbly imploring his pity: but drove them all out of the City. After he had cleared the houses of all their idols, and other uncleannesses, he entered the City, praying God with Hymnes: and after he had placed in the City such as were true worshippers of God: he fortified it, and built a house in it for himself, whereto he might upon all occasions retire, [1 Mac. 13, 43, 48.]

A sixth observation of the Autumnal Equinox was made by Hipparchus in the 36 year of the Calippick Period, on the 4 day of the Egyptian Addionis (Septemb. Julian 25) at evening about four-lets, [Ptolem. lib. 3, cap. 2.]

Alexandra, afterwards Queen of the Jews, was born at this time, if so be she lived 73 years, as appears out of Josephus, in the last Chapter of the 13 book of Antiquity, and out of the 33 cap. of the Jewish History which is printed at the end of the Paris Bibles of many Tongues, under the title of the second book of the Maccabees. In Arabic we find she was called Salina, out of Eusebius in his Chronicle: Epiphanius in the 9 heretic of the Nazarenes, Hierom in Dan. cap. 9, and 11. and Severus Sulpicius in Sacra. Histor. lib. 2. Eusebius seems to have taken it (as he is wont to do) out of Julius Africanus; and he out of Justus Tiberienis, or some other ancient Writer of the affairs of the Jews.

When the Garrison soldiers of the Fort at Jerusalem were destroyed, being prohibited from all provision for two years space, they were forced to yield themselves. Simon turned them all out, cleared the Fort of all the pollutions of the Idols, and went into into it himself on the 23 day of the second month (Jais) in the 171 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, with branches of Palms, Harp, Cymbals, Vials, Hymnes, and Songs. He ordained also an anniverſarie ſolemnitie for this day: in regard thereon they were freed from a peſtilent enemy, who annoyed them very much in their going up to the Temple. Moreover, he made the Fort ſtronger than it was, and the Temple-mount, over which it looked, for the greater ſecurity, both of the Country, and of the City; and there he dwelt himſelf with his company, [1 Mac. 13. 49, 53. & 14. 7. 36. 37.]

Simon ſeizing his ſon John (Synnamed afterwards Hircanus) to be a very valiant man, appointed him Captain of all his forces, and dwelt himſelf in Gazata, [1 Mac. 16. 13.] in the confines of Azotus, where the enemies formerly inhabited, but Simon diſlodged them, and planted the Jews in their room, [XIV. 7. 34.] namely, that Gadara, which Strabo ſaith the Jews afterward made their own, [lib. 16. pag. 759.]

Cleopatra, Ptolemy Ptolemy's daughter, brought unto Demetrius Nicator a young ſon Antiochus, ſurnamed afterwards Grypus, from his hook noſe, if ſo be he lived 45 years, as Joſephus computes. [lib. 13. cap. 21.]

In the 37 year of the third Calippick Period, of Nabonnasſar 607, on the 20 day of the Egyptian Tyb (January Julian 27 ending) two hours before midnight, an Eclipse of the Moon in Rhodes was obſerved by Hipparchus. [Ptolem. lib. 6. cap. 5.]

Demetrius, conſidering with himſelf how that now moſt of his Cities were revolted from him, and had ſhaken off his command, that he might wipe off the ſcandal of ſloth and ſluggiſhneſſe, determined to engage in a war againſt the Parthians. Over the Parthians at that time reigned Mithridates, ſon of King Pampatus, called Artaces, or Artacides, (the common name of all the Parthian Kings) nothing inferior to Artaces himſelf, his great Grandfather, the founder of the Parthian Monarchy, from whom that ſurname was derived to all the ſucceſſours. For he by his proweſſe extended the Parthian Empire, from the eaſt ſide, as far as the river Indus, and from the weſt, as far as Euphrates. [Juſtin. lib. 36. cap. 1. and 41. cap. 5. 6. Oros. lib. 5. cap. 4.] Before we treat of Demetrius his Parthian Expedition, it will not be amiffe to ſhew how Mithridates arrived to that vaſt dominion.

At that very juncture of time alſo, when as Mithridates began to reign over the Parthians, Eucratides took upon him the command of the Baſtrians, gallant men both, but a more benigne fortune attended the Parthians, which, under the conduct of Mithridates, led them as it were by the hand, to the higheſt pinnacle of ſovereignty; whilſt the poor Baſtrians diſturbed and toſt with ſeveral wars, loſt in the cloſe, not onely their dominions, but their liberty. For after the Sogdians, the Arachats, the Drangianites and the Indians, had well bated them by their continual wars with them: the feeble Parthians ſet upon them, at laſt, when they were quite tyred, and as it were bloodleſſe. [Juſtin. lib. 41. cap. 6.] Artaces or Mithridates, having purſued this his victory as far as India, and found no difficulty in ſubduing the Country, where Porus of old reigned, and the other nations lying between the river Hydaspes and Indus, [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Val. pag. 358. Oros. lib. 5. cap. 4.] Theſe Baſtrians were the reliques of the Grecians, who having taken Baſtriana from the Kings of Syria, the ſucceſſors of Seleucus Nicator, ſeized alſo upon Ariana, and India, and got not onely Patralena into their hands, but all the ſea coaſts; as well that which is called the kingdom of Tellaſioſus, as that of Sigartis; and which is more. Apollodorus (againſt the common opinion indeed) affirms in his book of the Parthian affairs, that they were maſters of a greater part of India than ever Alexander himſelf and his Macedonians were: Adding moreover, That Eucratides had in India under his own juſdiction 1000 Cities, [Strabo, lib. 11. p. 16. & 11. p. 686.] As for Eucratides, he in all the wars (for he was engaged in many) behaved himſelf with much proweſſe: when he was worn out with the continuance of them, and was cloſely beſieged by Demetrius King of the Indians, altho' he had not above 3000 ſouldiers with him by his daily ſallies forth, waſted the enemies army conſiſting of 60 thouſand: and being at liberty in the fifth month, reduced all India under his command. In his retreat homeward, he was ſlain by his own ſon, whom he had made joynt partner with him in the kingdom: He did not go about to diſſemble of ſmother his parricide, but drove his Chariot through the blood, and commanded the dead corps to be caſt aſide into ſome bye-place or other, unburied, as if he had ſlain an enemy, and not murdered a Father. Whilſt theſe things were acting amongſt the Baſtrians, a war was commenced betwixt the Parthians and the Medes. The encounters of theſe two nations had their interchangeabſe ſucceſſes for a while: at laſt, the Parthians got the better. Mithridates, being ſtrengthened by the acceſſion of theſe forces, appointed Bacasid over Media, whilſt he himſelf marched into Hircania: as ſoon as he returned from thence, he engaged in a war with the King of the Elymies, beat him, and annexed that nation to his other dominions: ſo that by his his ſeveral conqueſts, he enlarged his Dominion of the Parthians, from the mountain Caucasus, as far as the River Euphrates, [Juſtin. lib. 41. cap. 6.] For having conquered Demetrius Nicator's Leivenant, he invaded the City Babylon, and all the borders thereof, [Oros. lib. 5. cap. 4.]

The Grecian and Macedonian ſides of the upper Provinces, not bro'king the inſolencies of theſe ſtrangers the Parthians, ſent ſeveral Embaſſages to Demetrius Nicator, engaging themſelves, that if he would but come unto them, they would yield themſelves up unto him, and joynt with him in oppoſing Artaces the King of Perſia and Media. Inflamed with this hope, he made what ſped he could towards them: and in the 172 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, having drawn up all his Forces together, marched into Melopotamia, truſting ere long to get both in and Babylon, and Media, all at once into his hands: not doubting, but by the allocation of the upper Provinces with him, he ſhould eaſily chaſe Tryphon out of the kingdom of Syria. Upon his arrival into thoſe parts, he was received with great acclivity, and being aſſiſted by the auxiliaries of the Perſians, Elymies, and Baſtrians, gave many an overthrow to the Parthians. But at laſt, he was over-reached by one of Artaces his Nobles, who upon pretence of concluding a peace, was ſent to ſeize upon his perſon. He was ſurprized by an Ambuſcado, and having loſt his whole army, fell alive into the hand of the enemy: who led him thorough the ſtreets of the City, ſhewed him to the people which revolved, in mockery of their favour towards him, and at laſt committed him cloſe priſoner, [1 Macc. 14. 1, 2, 3. Joſeph. lib. 13. cap. 9. ſin. Juſtin. lib. 36. cap. 1 & lib. 38. cap. 9.] Gorgius Syacellus adds, how he was kept in irons, and upon that occaſion was ſurnamed Siderites.

Although Artaces was advanced to ſuch a vaſt command, yet did he not proceed to luxury and pride, (which is the uſual practice of moſt Princes) but expreſſed a great deal of Clemency towards his ſubjects, and valour againſt his enemies. And when he had brought ſeveral Nations under his command, he ſelected out of every one of them, the choicest inſtitutions and laws, and communicated them to his Parthians, [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Val. pag. 361.] As for Demetrius who was ſent away into Hircania, he did not onely freely give up to him the reſpect due unto a King, but alſo gave him his daughter to wife, promiſing moreover, to reſtore unto him the kingdom of Syria, which Tryphon had ſeized: ſince he, [Juſtin. lib. 36. cap. 1. & lib. 38. cap. 9.] Although Appian writes that Demetrius lived at Paranares Court (the Brother and ſucceſſour of Mithridates) and married his ſiſter Rhodoguna, [in Syr. accu. pag. 132.]

In the 172 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, on the 18 day of the (6) month Elur, about the ending of the third year of Simous High Prieſthood (commencing from the death of his brother Jonathan, after whom he ſucceeded in the High Prieſthood) in a great aſſembly of the Prieſts, and the people, the Rulers of the Nation and the Elders of the Country, an Inſtrument was publiſhed, ſpecifying how well Simon had deſerved of the Jewiſh Nation, and the right of ſovereignty granted to him and his poſterity, that he ſhould be their Governour, and that he ſhould have the oversight of thoſe that were over the works and reparations of the Temple; over the Governours in the Country, over the Commanders in the army, and the Captains of the Garrisons: That he alſo ſhould have the charge of the holy things, and ſhould be obeyed of all men; That all writings in the Country ſhould be ſigned with his name; That he ſhould be clothed in Purple, and wear Gold; That it ſhould not be lawful for any of the Prieſts or the people, to repeal any of theſe Decrees, or contradict anything he ſpoke, or gather any aſſembly in the Country, without his permiſſion; or to wear Purple, or uſe the golden Buckle. Simon accepted hereof, and was well contented to execute the High Prieſts Office: to be General and Commander of the Jews and the Prieſts, and to be over them all. Then commanded they this writing to be put in Tables of braſſe, and to be hung on the pillars in the porches of the Temple, in an open place; and that a copy alſo of the ſame ſhould be kept in the Treſury of the Temple, that Simon and his ſons might take them out upon occaſion, [1 Macc. 14. 26, 49.]

The ſouldiery growing weary of Tryphons deportment, revolted from him to Cleopatra the wife of Demetrius Nicator, who at that time had ſent her ſelf up with her children in Selucia. But ſent to Antiochus brother to Demetrius, her husband (who was cloſe priſoner) offering him marriage and the kingdom. This ſhe did, partly by the advice of her friends, partly becauſe the feared, leaſt ſome of the Selucians would deliver up the City to Tryphon, [Joſeph. lib. 13. cap. 11.]

This Antiochus, ſon of Demetrius Soter; in Joſephus, [lib. 7. Antiquit. cap. 12. & lib. 13. cap. 16.] is called (becauſe of his religion) the Pious; and [in lib. 13. cap. 12.] by his fathers ſurname Soter; in Trogetus Pompeius, [in prol. lib. 39.] and in Eusebius [in his Chronicles.] Sideres, vel Sedetes: either from his haunting (which in Syrick is סירק) and to which sport he was much addicted, as Plutarch's Problems intimate: or from the City Sidon, from whence (as Georgius Syncellus writeth) he came to besiege Tryphon. Justin relates, how that at first he was brought up in Asia, and by his father: Demetrius Soter, entruſted, with his elder brother Demetrius Nicator, to an hoſt at Cnidos, [Justin, lib. 35. cap. 2. & 36. cap. 1.] Appian writes, how that he received at Rhodes, and from the Islands of the ſea, the news of his brothers confinement, and what enſued after, [in Syriac, pag. 132.] We read alſo in [1 Mac. 15. 1, 2.] that he (after he had aſſumed upon him the title of King) wrote letters to Simon the High Prieſt, and Ruler, and to the whole Nation of the Jews.

In theſe his letters he complained much of the hard uſage of his enemies, and ſhewed, that he was now ready to avenge himſelf, leaſt he might ſeem to take upon himſelf the name of a King to no purpoſe. In the next place, in deſign of making Simon his friend, he confirms unto him all the immunities and privileges, which other Kings had granted; to which he added a right of coining monies with his own ſtamp. He decreed moreover, That Hieruſalem ſhould be exempted from being under the Kings jurisdiction; promiſing alſo, that he would confer more and greater favours, as ſoon as he was in poſſeſſion of hiſ kingdom, [Ibid. 3. 9.]

Numenius, Antiochus his ſon, and ſome other Embaſſadors came to Rome from Simon the High Prieſt and the people of the Jews, about renewing their League and amity with the Romans: They brought with them a great ſhield of God of a thouſand pound weight. The Preſent was well taken; and Lucius the Conſul gave them letters to the Kings, and to the Provinces, prohibiting them from attempting any thing which might prejudice the Jews, nor abetting and aſſiſting any that ſhould fight againſt them; and if at any time any Runnagado Jews ſhould flee out of Judea, and come into their parts, they ſhould deliver them up to Simon the High Prieſt, to be proceeded againſt according to the laws of their Country, [1 Mac. 14. & 15. 1, 2.] 4572. 139.

Lucius was that ſame L. Calpurnius Piſo, the Colleague of L. Popilius Lenas, who was ſent into Spain againſt the Numantines, of whoſe Conſulſhip mention is made in Valerius Maximus [lib. 1. cap. 5.] after this manner. P. Cornelius Hiſpalus the Preſtor, for Traſgers (Popilius Lenas, and L. Calpurnius, being Conſuls) commanded by his Edict, all Children to depart the City, and ſtudy within ten days: whoſe profeſſion it is, by their fall ſignification of the influence of the Stars, to caſt, ſhew, and ſift upon vain and fooliſh minds. Although Stephanus Biſhop (our of Caſſiodorus his Faſti Conſulares) inſtead of the prænomèn Lucius, hath put Cneus againſt the authority of the received Copies.

The Kings to whom theſe Letters were written, were five in number. Ptolemy Euergetes I. or Phyſcon of Egypt: Demetrius Nicator of Syria (notwithſtanding he was at this time, priſoner to the Parthians.) Attalus Philadelphus of Pergamene Aſia, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, and Arſaces or Mithridates of Parthia. The Cities, Countries, and Iſlands were 19. Samplaſa, (or as in the Latin, Lampſacus) Sparta, Delos, Myndus, Sicyon, Caria, Samos, Pamphylia, Lycia, Halicarnafus, Rhodus, Phafelis, Coſos, Sida, Aradus, Gortyna, Cnidos, Cyprus, and Cyrene, [1 Mac. 15. 16. 22, 23.]

In the 174 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, Antiochus Sidetes returned into the land of his fathers, [Ibid. 10.] where he married Cleopatra, his brothers wife, [Justin, lib. 36. cap. 1.] who was ſomewhat vexed for Demetrius his marrying Rhodoguna, daughter to the Parthian King, [Appian, Syriac, pag. 132.] From this time, Antiochus reigned 9 years, [Porphyry, & Euseb.]

Tryphon had but a very ſmall Retinue, almoſt all his Forces came away to Antiochus. Upon this deſertion of the ſouldiers, he made what haſte he could to get into Dora (a maritime City of Phœnicia.) Thither Antiochus purſued him, and laid ſiege cloſe to the City (both with land Forces, conſiſting of 120 thouſand Foot, and 8 thouſand Horſe) and alſo with his Fleet, that he ſuffered none to paſſe out or in, [1 Mac. 15. 10, 14.]

In the mean while, Numenius and his company came from Rome, bringing with them letters to the Kings and Provinces, and a copy of the ſame to Simon the High Prieſt, [Ibid. 15. 24.]

Simon ſent 2000 choice men with ſilver and gold, and many Engines of war to Antiochus at the ſiege at Dora: But he reſuſed them all; brake whatever covenants he had formerly made with him, and wholly eſtranged himſelf from him. He ſent likewiſe Athenobius to demand of him, the reſignation of Gazara, Joppe, and the Port in Jeruſalem; and to require the Tributes of thoſe places beyond the bounds of Judea which were poſſeſſed by him, or in lieu thereof, to demand 500 talents of ſilver, and in conſideration of the hurt he had done, and the Tributes of the Cities, 500 talents more: menacing war uſeleſſe all things were done according to his commands, [Ibid. 2. 5, 31.]

Athenobius, a friend of the Kings, coming to Hieruſalem, as ſoon as he ſaw Simons glory, glory, his cupboard ſet with gold and ſilver plate, and other furniture of the houſe, he was aſtoniſhed, and told him the Kings meſſage. But Simon denied, that they had ſized upon any Towns that belonged to others, but one; had recovered from the enemy by law of arms ſome Towns of their own which were kept back from them. As for Joppe, and Gazara, albeit the people had been much prejudiced by the enemy, yet he offered 100 talents. Athenobius returned back in a rage to Antiochus, and told him both what he had heard, and ſeen: neither was the King himſelf leſſe paſſionate, when he ſaw that his commands were not ſubmitted unto, nor his great menaces of war regarded, [Ibid. 32. 36.]

In the mean while Tryphon took ſhipping and eſcaped away to Orthoſias, another maritime City of Phœnicia, [Ibid. 37.]

Then did Antiochus make Cendebeus Governour of the ſea-coaſt: and ſupplying him with Horſe and Foot, commanded him to build Cedron (or as the Latin edition hath it, Gedor: concerning which Joſh. 15. 58.) and to engage the Jews in a war: as for the King himſelf, he attended Tryphons motion, [Ibid. 38, 39.]

Cendebeus being come as far as Jamnia, began to invade Judea, and to take the people priſoners, and to kill and ſlay: and when he had built Cedron (or Gedor) he placed there ſome Horſe, and ſome companies of Foot, who were to make our-roads into the high-ways of Judea, as the king had given him order to do, [Ibid. 40, 41.]

John (Hircanus) came up from Gazara, and ſignified to his father Simon, what pranks Cendebeus had played: who now, worn out by old age, committed the whole care and managing of the war to his two elder ſonnes, Judas and John. Whereupon they choole out of the Country, twenty thouſand men of war, and with ſome Horſe, marched againſt Cendebeus, and took up quarters that night at Modin, the place of their nativity. From thence the next morning they took the field, where the enemy met them with a powerful army: howbeit there was a Brook betwixt them. John attempted firſt to wade over, and then the people followed their Leader apace. He divided his body in ſuch wife, that the Horſe being placed in the miſt of the Foot, they did mutually protect each other, againſt the enemies numerous Chevalry. Then ſounded they with their holy Trumpets, whereupon Cendebeus was routed, and many of his army ſlain; as for the remainder, ſome of them fled to his Fort (Cedron) which he lately built, and others of them eſcaped to other places. John (his brother Judas being wounded) purſued them as far as the Towers which were in the fields of Azorus, and in the purſuit, killed about 2000 men: and when he had burnt the Towers to the ground, he lead back his army ſafe and entire into Judea, [1 Mac. 16. 1, 10.]

4576. 138.

Tryphon at laſt, retired to his own Country-men at Apamea: at which time that happened which Frontinus relates of him, [lib. 2. Stratagem, cap. 13.] How that all the way he went, he ſcattered money, on purpoſe to reward Antiochus his ſouldiers in their purſuit of him, and ſo eſcaped out of their hands. But Joſephus intimates, That Apamea was taken by aſſault, and Tryphon killed, in the third year after Demetrius was taken priſoner by the Parthians, [lib. 13. cap. 12.] Appian writes, That he was at length taken by Antiochus, and ſlain, though with much ado, [in Syriac, pag. 132.] Strabo. That he was ſhut up in a certain Caſtle, and driven to that extreme, that he killed himſelf, [lib. 14. pag. 668.] and Georgius Syncellus reports, That being driven out of Orthoſias, he leaped into the fire and therein perished.

Hierax, General for the war in Egypt, in regard he was a very expert ſouldier, and very popular in publick aſſemblies, and moreover of a high ſpirit, took upon himſelf the kingdom of Ptolemy Phyſcon: For, obſerving Ptolemy in diſtreſſe for money, and the ſouldiers for want of their pay ready to revolt to Gaſetes, he comprized the munity, by paying the ſouldiers arrears out of his own purſe. As for the King himſelf, the Egyptians plainly vilified and contemned him, when they ſaw how childiſh he was in his diſcourſes, how impetuous and prone to the vileſt luſts, and how eſteemed in his body by his intemperance, [Diodor, Sicul. in Excerptis, H. Valeſii, pag. 361, & 362.]

In that part of Aſia where Pergamus is, Attalus Philadelphus, brother to Eumenes, grew ſo diſſolute thorough long idleneſs and peace, that Philopemen, one of his friends (wayed him which way he pleaſed: in ſuch wife, that the Romans in a jeere to him, would often aſke of thoſe that ſailed out of Aſia; whether the King had any intereſt in Philopemen.) [Plutarch in lib. whether the managing of a Common-wealth ought to be entruſted to an old man] yet would not Attalus leave his kingdom to any of his own ſons; but in his life time, ſet the Crown upon the head of his brother Eumenes his ſon (whoſe Guardian he was) now come to age, and transferred upon him the Title of King, [Id. in Apophthegm. & in lib. apud eundem.]

After the death of Attalus the Uacile, Attalus ſurnamed Philometor, ſon to Eumenes by Stratonica, daughter of Ariarathes King of the Cappadocians, held the kingdom of Pergamus five years, [Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 624.]

He no sooner was possessed of the kingdom, but he stained and dishonoured it by the massacres of his friends, and proceedings against his kindred; pretending, how that at one time, his mother, an old woman at another time, Beronice his spouse, dyed by their enchantments. [Justin. l. 36. c. 4.] And because he was somewhat jealous of the chiefest and most eminent of his fathers friends, lest they should engage in some treasonable act against him, he resolved to dispatch them all out of the way: to that end, out of his barbarous mercenariness, he made choice of the most bloody and covetous of them, and placed them in several private rooms in the palace; and then having called together to Court those of his friends which he had in greatest suspicion, he committed them to the mercy of the barbarians, who slew them, and immediately after issued out his commands to proceed against their wives and children after the same manner: as for his other friends, who had either command in the army, or were appointed over Cities, some of them he removed by circumventions and treachery: others, as fast as he light upon them, he beheaded with their whole families; so that by reason of his cruelty, he became detestable, not only to his own Subjects, but also to his neighbours round about: whereupon all under his dominion harkened extremely after a change in the state. [Diod. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valer. p. 370.]

After this mad furious fit was over, he put on a nasty garment, let his hair and his beard grow as criminous persons use to do; he appeared not in publick, would not shew himself unto the people, gave no entertainments at home, or had the least sympathy of a man in his wits: insomuch, that he seemed to be haunted by the ghosts of those he had so lately murdered. [Justin. lib. 36. cap. 4.]

Attalus, having resigned the government of the kingdom to his nephew, betook himself to digging of Gardens, sowing of herbs, mingling the unwholom ones with the wholom; to all of them he gave a tincture of some poisonous juice, and sent them as rare presents to his friends. [Id. Ibid.] Neither did he only sow and plant herb, but also heliobore in the Kings Gardens, but also heliobore, woolf-bait, and the herb dorycnium, wherewith arrows are wont to be poisoned: He studied also to know the nature of their juices, seeds, and fruits, and to gather them all in their proper season. [Plutarch in Demetrio.] We learn moreover by Vatro, [de re rustica, lib. 1. cap. 2.] Colobella, [lib. 1. cap. 1.] and Pliny [lib. 18. cap. 3.] that he writ some books concerning husbandry.

Antiochus Sideres persecuted extremely those Cities which had revolted in the beginning of his brothers reign, and having massacred them, joyined them to his own kingdom. [Justin. lib. 36. cap. 1.]

Ptolemei Euergetes the second, (or Philcon) slew many of those Alexandrians which had called him first into the kingdom, and banished no small number of those, who in their minority were brought up with his brother Philometor (with whom he had had some differences) and were now come to age. And having given licence to his foreign soldiers to kill and slay, as they themselves pleased, all places daily streamed with blood. [Justin. lib. 38. cap. 8. Athenus, lib. 4. cap. 24. fin.] Moreover, he divorced Cleopatra herself, who was both his sister and wife, and having first ravished her daughter, a virgin, took her to wife. These strange occurrences so appalled the people, that for fear of death they quitted their Country, and went into banishment, some to one place, some to another, in such wise, that Ptolemei and his company were left alone in so spacious a City: and when he saw that he was a King of empty houses rather than of men, he turned strangers by his edicts. [Justin. lib. 38. cap. 8.] And upon that account, replenished the Cities and Islands with Grammarians, Philosophers, Geometricians, Musicians, School-masters, Limners, Physicians, and many other Artizans, who teaching their arts to get their livings, made many excellent men, whereby it came to pass, that the liberal Arts and Sciences were again restored in those parts; the knowledge whereof was interrupted and grown out of date, by reason of the continual wars and combulations that happened in the times of Alexanders successors. [Athenus supra.]

P. Scipio Emilianus (whom upon the subversion of Carthage, was surnamed Africanus) Spurius Murrinus, and L. Merellus (assigned Ambassadors from the Roman Senate, to see in what condition Kingdoms and Cities of their Allies were in, and to compare their differences) took a strict survey of Egypt, Syria, Asia, and Greece. [Cicero. in Somnio Scipionis, Strabo lib. 14. pag. 669. Justin lib. 38. cap. 8. Plutarch in Apophem. Athenus, lib. 6. cap. 38. c. 12. cap. 27.] Cicero in Lucullus writes, that Scipio was employed in this famous Embassy, before he was made Censor: a little before the second Consulship: Valerius Maximus vouches this Embassy to be performed by him, after his two Consulships, and his two chief triumphs, the Carthaginian and Numantine. [Id. 4. cap. 3.] Polybius, who in a particular treatise hath made a description of the Numantine war, (as appears out of the 3 lib. of Cicero, ad familiar. epist. 12.) mentioneth this Embassy, (as we gather from Athenus, lib. 6. cap. 8. and out of Suidas in the word βασις, compared with Diodorus Siculus, Legat. 32.] not having any fitter introduction to his intended works, than that, Scipio, after he had dispatched that Embassy, was sent out to conclude the Numantine war. And upon that ground, of those three different opinions, we thought it meet to chuse the middle one.

In this Embassy, Scipio, out of all his friends, took one companion only along with him, who was not C. as Lelius (as it is read in the corrupt Copies of Aurelius victor, de viris illustribus cap. 58.) but Panetius the Philosopher. [Cicero in Lucullo, Plutarch in Apophem. and in Lib. de Philosophando cum Principibus, out of Ptolemaeus his History.] To whom Athenus [lib. 12. cap. 27.] falsely joynes Ptolemaeus the Stoick, who was long after him, as shall be made appear in his proper place. Scipio had in his retinue five servants only, by the testimony of Ptolemaeus and Polybius (so that out of them both Valerius Maximus, who assigned seven to him, and Aurelius Victor, who allows two, are to be corrected) and of those one dyed in the journey, yet would not Scipio buy another servant, but wrote home for another to be sent from Rome to supply his place of the deceased, [Athenus lib. 6. c. 8. Plutarch in Apophem.] so that as he passed through the Countries of Allies and Strangers, they did not so much count his slaves as his severall victories: neither was notice taken how great a weight of gold and silver he brought along with him, but of the extent of his greatness. [Valer. Maximus, lib. 4. cap. 3.]

Foreigners repairing to Alexandria upon Proicmei Euergetes his proclamation, the Ambassadors of the Romans arrived there. [Justin lib. 38. cap. 8.] When Scipio came out of the ship to land, he walked with his head covered with his cloak, but the Alexandrians flocking about him, desired him to unavayle his face, and discover himself to the people, for they had a great mind to behold him: which as soon as he condescended unto, they shouted, and made great acclamations. [Plutarch in Apophem.]

As for the King himself, who came to meet the Ambassadors, he seemed somewhat ridiculous to the Romans, for he was of an horrid look, short stature, a swag belly, more like a beast than a man: which uncomeliness he made seem greater, by the thinness of a transparent garment, as if he had contrived on purpose to discover those things, which every modest man would by all means possible endeavour to have concealed; for thus Justin out of Trogus Pompeius [lib. 38. cap. 8.] hath described the man, whom Athenus out of the seventh book of Ptolemaeus the Stoick, hath represented unto us in this guile, [lib. 12. cap. 27.] as Natalis Comes hath interpreted him. His body by reason of his luxury was grown grosse and fowle, and his belly so big, that a man could hardly compass him with his arms, which forced him to wear a long garment, with sleeves down to his ancles, nor did he ever walk a foot, unless at this time, in respect to Scipio: who, observing that the King, by reason of this sluggishness and tenderness of body, could scarce with great straining himself, keep pace with him, whispered Panethius in the ear: Now the Alexandrians have repaid some fruits from our travel hither, who, in civility to us, have sent their King walking. [Plutarch in Apophem.] from whence we may perceive, how well Dalcampius, who translated Athenus, hath rendered those words upon antiochus βασις, in δὴ βασιλεύς, He never walked on foot, but leaning on his staff.

The King entertained the Legates very nobly, and shewed them his Palace and his Treasury. But they being persons eminent in virtue, contented themselves with reasonable dyes, and such as was holstone, scorned that rich provision as prejudicial, both to the mind and body: as for those things which the King offered as rarities and admirable, they only glanced their eyes upon them, and looked on them as things of no value: but what was worth their view, those things they viewed most exactly, viz. the situation of the City, and capacities thereof: and particularly Pharos, and what belonged thereto: thence they sailed to Memphis, and took notice of the goodness of the Country, the conveniences of Nilus, the number of the Cities, the infinite thousands of inhabitants, the fortification of Egypt, and the excellency of the Country, how well it was provided, both to the security and extent of an Empire. In brief, having sufficiently admired both the populousness of Egypt, and the conveniences of the places therein, they were of opinion, that the kingdom of Egypt would easily fall into a vast Empire, if it were to fortunate as to meet with matters answerable. After they had well viewed Egypt, they went to Cyprus and from thence into Syria. [Diod. Sicul. Legat. 32.]

To Mithridates Euergetes King of Pontus was born that famous Mithridates, surnamed Dionysius or Bacchus, and Eupator, whereupon he called the City which he built Eupatoria. [Appian, in Mithridates. p. 276. c. 251.] But he was both born and bred in the City Syene, and therefore held it always in high esteem, and made it the Metropolis of the whole kingdom. [Strabo lib. 12. pag. 545.]

In

In the same year that Mithridates was born, there appeared a great Comet, [Josephus lib. 37. cap. 2.] The very same which Seneca speaks of in lib. 7. cap. 15. of his natural Questions. In the time of Attalus his reign, there appeared a Comet, at the first but small, but afterwards it elevated and spread it self, and came as far as the Equinoctial circle, so that its extent equalized that region of the heaven, which we call the milke way. For we allow (with Eutropius lib. 6.) and Orosius [lib. 6. cap. 5.] who usually follow Livy) to Mithridates 72 years of life: but if we had said with Appian, [pag. 249.] that he lived only 68 years, or 69 years, then this Comet had appeared after Attalus was dead, and not in his reign.

Simon the High Priest, and ruler of the Jews, traversing the Cities of Judea, and providing for their orderly government, came down with his sons, Mattathias and Judas to Jericho, in the 177 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, the eleventh month, which is called Sabal. There Ptolemei the son of Abubus (Simon the High Priests son in law) entertained them in Doc Castle which he had fortified. This Ptolemei being by his father in law appointed over the province of Jericho, and a very wealthy person, had a great mind to get the government of the Country to himself: whereupon, whilst he was treating Simon and his sons with a banquet, where they had drank somewhat freely, he with his army of Ruffians, whom he had placed in some private place, entered into the house, and treacherously slew Simon and his sons, and some of his servants. [1 Maccab. 16. 11, 17.] Josephus relates how that Simon was slain at a banquet by the treachery of his own son in law, after he was set over the Jews just eight years, [Lib. 13. cap. 14.] But we gather out of the story of the Maccabees, that he, after the decease of his brother Jonathan discharged the High Priests office for the space of eight years and about three months.

Ptolemei immediately after acquainted Antiochus Sidetes the King with this Villainy, desiring him that he would send an army to his assistance: and he would soon deliver the Country and Cities of the Jews into his hands. [1 Maccab. 16. 18.] This to sudden intimation of that fact to the King, and the promise of resigning up the Country unto him, gives occasion to suspect, that this business was not undertaken, but with the Kings privacy; and that that piece of honour which the traitour so much aspired after, was before engaged unto him by the King, as a reward of the enterprise, as Jacobus Saliarius observes in the epitome of his Annals: to which is to be referred that passage in the Pologue of the 36 book of Trogus Pompeius. Antiochus, after Hircanus was slain, subdued the Jews. Hircanus the son, falsely put for Simon the father; as on the contrary, Eusebius in Chronicle, touching upon the history of the conquest of Judea by Antiochus, writes, That he forced Simon the High Priest to conditions, putting Simon the father, instead of Hircanus the son.

This Perfidious Ptolemei sent other villains to Gazara, to surprize John (Hircanus) and to kill him: He trucked also with the Colonels of the Jewish Militia, and wrote letters unto them, whereby he made large promises to them, if so be they would revolt to his side. He dispatched others also, to seize upon Jerusalem, and the mountain of the Temple: but one ran before to Gazara, and told John, that his father and his brethren were slain, and that others were sent to do as much to him. John, although much astonish'd at the sad news, persecuted the murderers, by falling upon them first; and so was made High Priest in the room of his father. [1 Maccab. 16. 19, 24.]

Here ends the first book of the Maccabees, containing the History of XL years, which Josephus continuing onwards, begins with an improbable relation: for saies he, John Hircanus escaped in the very nick to the City, and was received in by the people, who shut out Ptolemei, attempting to enter in at another gate: that John after he had discharged the holy services, led his army out of the City against Ptolemei, and flux him up in the Fort Dagon, situate above Jericho, that whilst John was endeavouring to reduce the fort, Ptolemei commanded to bring both Johns mother, and his two brothers, who were with him in the Fort, and to scourge them soundly with whips, threatening moreover to throw them down over the wall, except he desisted. That John touched with commiseration of their hard usage, grew somewhat cool and faint in his opposition: and although, the mother very resolutely exhorted the son not to relent out of affection to her, but to do what in him lay to take vengeance of the traitour, yet the hard usage of his mother made such a deep impression in his affections, that he surceased his batteries as often as he beheld his mother whips. But the Sabbatical year coming on, in which the Jews rested from their works, as on the seventh day John called his siege, and Ptolemei was set at liberty: who, after he had killed Hircanus his mother, and brothers, flew to Zeno, surnamed Coryllas, who was governor of Philadelphia. [Josephus lib. 2. of the war, cap. 2. & lib. 13. Antiquities. cap. 14, 15.]

All which Saliarius in the sixth Tome of his Annals, convinces of a great deal of vanity, considering the persons, time and place, [ad Ann. Mandi. 3919. Scit. 5. 6, 7. & 3920. Scit. 5. 6.] Where he well advieth to take notice, That in the Sabbatical year, the waging of war, or besieging of Cities, or raising of fortifications, was no where prohibited to the Jews, by the Law of God. To which we add moreover, That this year indeed was the Sabbatical year, but it began not after, but four months before, Simons death, viz. in the beginning of the CLXXVII year of the account of the contracts, as appears by the list of the Sabbatical year, kept by the Jews themselves to their very times.

In the 43 year of the third Calippick Period, on the 29 day of the Egyptian month, Meechis (on the beginning of the 24 day of the Julian March) after midnight, the Vernal Equinox was observed by Hipparchus, [Ptolemei lib. 3. cap. 2.] and at the end of the same year of the same Period, the summer Solstice was also observed by him, [Id. ibid.]

Antiochus Sidetes, in the end of the fourth year of his reign, and in the beginning of the first of Hircanus, entered with an army into Judea, and having wasted the Country, forced Hircanus to retire to the City Jerusalem, and then laid siege to it, at eleven places, having divided his whole army into seven brigades, that so he might obstruct all the passages to and fro of the besieged. [Josephus lib. 13. cap. 16.]

Scipio Africanus, and the other Roman Ambassadors, having travelled through very many parts of the world, were received generally with a great deal of affection and love: wherefore they came, they did their utmost to compromise differences, by reconciling some, and persuading othersto yield to what was just and equal: those that were impudently refractory, they forced to a confession, and when they met with any caules, which were somewhat difficult to be decided, those they referred to the Senate. And having had this commerce with divers Kings and people, and renewed their ancient friendship and alliance with all of them, they returned home: Those whom they had visited, dispatching Ambassadors to Rome, who applauded the Senate for sending such men unto them. [Diodorus Siculus, Legat. 32.]

The siege of Jerusalem was prolonged, through the strength of the walls, and courage of the defendants: At last, on the other side of the wall, where the passage was more levels, Antiochus erected an 100 Towers, three stories high, and having placed in them bands of soldiers, daily attempted the walls. He made also a double trench, both long and broad, so that the Jews were so straightly besieged, that they could not get out any way. On the contrary, they within made often sallies forth, and if at any time they found the enemies Camp any whit neglected in their guards, they fell upon them, but if ready for resistance, they retreated back to their holds. [Josephus lib. 13. cap. 16.]

Hircanus, after he had considered how prejudicial the multitudes of them in the City would be unto him, by reason of the unprofitable consuming of the victuals, cast the inferior route out of the walls, reserving onely such as were able to bear arms: But Antiochus would not suffer them to passe, so that being forced to wander about the walls, many of them miserably perished by famine. [Id. ibid.]

When the feast of tabernacles was come, they took pity upon the excluded, and received them again into the City. They requested also Antiochus, that he would for their sake grant a cessation of hostility for seven days, which he did not onely indulge unto them, but also brought, in great pomp, to the very gates of the City, Bulls with gilded horns, and gold and silver Cups filled with all manner of spices: and having delivered sacrifices to the Priests of the Jews, and made a feast to the army, he returned to the Camp. [Id. ibid. cum Plutarch in Appo. thegem.]

When upon the setting of the Pleiades, plentiful showers had supplied the besieged with water, (for want whereof they were much distressed before,) and the Sabbatical year being now ended, if the Jews were hindered from sowing their grounds, a famine must undoubtedly have followed: Hircanus, considering Antiochus his justice and piety, sent Ambassadors unto him, requesting him, that he would give them leave to live according to the laws of their forefathers. Many of the Kings friends pressed him to demolish the City, and to put the whole nation of the Jews to the sword, as being a people unfociable, and severed from all other nations by their peculiar constitutions: or if not so, yet they urged him at least to abrogate their laws, and force them to change their manner of life. But the King, who was of a high spirit, and gentle in his behaviour, rejected their counsel, and approving the Jews piety, commanded, that the besieged should deliver up their arms to him, dismantle the City walls, pay all customs due from Joppe, and the other Cities without Judea, and moreover, receive a Garrison

Garrison into them: upon their conditions he would conclude a peace with them. They conferred to all the Kings propositions; excepting that one receiving in a Garrison amongst them; in regard that they would avoid all commerce with strangers. In lieu of that, they chose rather to give hostages, amongst whom Hircanus his own brother should be one, and 500 talents besides; whereof, 300 were paid down presently after; so they threw down the battery from the wall, and raised the sieges, and discharged the Jews of all impeachments. [Joseph, ibid., cum Diodor. Sicil. lib. 34, in Bibliotheca, Phar. cod. 244.]

Hircanus having opened the Sepulchre of David, which was the richest of all the King's, took thence 3000 talents: in confidence of this treasure, he began to entertain foreign auxiliaries, which never any of the Jews did before: so Josephus, Lib. Bell. 1, cap. 2, lib. 3, Antiquit. cap. 12, & lib. 13, cap. 16, & lib. 16, cap. 11, of this, [see Sallustius his centuries, Tom. 6, of his Annals in the year of the World, 3921, Sect. 8, 9.]

In the first year of Hircanus Matthias, surnamed Ablias the son of Simon Pictus, Priest of the temple of Joarib, had by the daughter of Jonathan the High Priest, Matthias surnamed Curtus, the great grandfather of Josephus the Historian, as he himself shews in the beginning of the book of his life.

P. Africanus, and Caius Fulvius, being Consuls, there arose a servile war, from the servants in Sicily, [Liv. lib. 56, Julius Obsequens, de prodigiis.] It was commenced by one Eunus a servant, a Syrian, born in the City Apamea, a man much addicted to magical incantations, and juggling. He taught himself to have received the knowledge of future events, by the inspiration of the gods, first appearing to him in his sleep, but afterwards, when he was awake. And although he failed in many of his prognostications and predictions, yet because in some he hit right by chance, no body objected his errors, but for his true predictions, they were diligently noted and applauded, so that his name began to be cried up more and more amongst men. At last, feigning himself mad, whilst he pretended the ceremonies of the goddess of Syria, and gave out, That he had appeared unto him in his sleep, and promised to promote him to kingly honour, he stirred up the servants to appear for their liberty, and to take up arms; by the command of the gods; and to prove that this was no delusion of his own head, but proceeded first from the indignation of the gods: he concealed in his mouth a nutshell, crammed with sulphur and fire, so that his breath caused him to send out a flash of fire as often as he spake. This very miracle raised him two thousand men at first, of the ordinary sort, which he improved in an instant to an army of 40 thousand, having broken open the prisons by law of arms. Hircupon, Eunus was by the slaves created King, who after the Crown was set upon his head, and his wife (who was also a Syrian, and his fellow Citizen) proclaimed Queen, chose out of the whole company, some that seemed wiser than the rest, to be of his council, filling himself Antiochus, and his associates, the revolting Syrians. These fellows succeeded so fortunately, that Cleon, another slave, was encouraged by these successes, to raise an army also; he was born in Cilicia, not far from Mount Taurus, an high-way robber from his youth. But he submitted himself upon Eunus his bare command, who as King made him his General, in regard he had an army of 5000 of his own soldiers (or as it is in Livy his Epitome, 70000.) This was done about 30 days after the first breaking out of the rebellion: which because the Pretors were not able to quell it, was turned over to C. Fulvius the Consul, [Diodor. Sicil. lib. 34, in Phasii Bibliotheca, cod. 244, & Excerpta, II. Valesii, pag. 359, 370, Liv. lib. 56, Florus, lib. 3, cap. 19.] This precedent caused the like detestation of slaves in some other places, particularly at Delos, [Diodor. Sicil. sup.] in which Island there was such a shop of slaves, that it could take in and put off again myriades of them in a day: inasmuch, that it grew into a proverb, Merchant, put in hither, set forth your slaves, you shall sell them all off immediately, [Strabo, lib. 14, 668.]

Scipio Africanus, the other Consul, was marched into Spain, to put an end to the Numantine war, whither King Attalus sent unto him out of Asia very costly presents, as well in it in Cicero's Oration, in the behalf of Djonatus, which Scipio took in the sight of his army. The like was done by Antiochus Sidetes, as appears in the Epitome of Livy's 57 book: Though it was the wish of other Generals, to conclude King's granties, yet Scipio said, he would receive the rich gifts which Antiochus Sidetes sent him in open Court; and commanded moreover the treasurer to register them all in the publick Tables; that so he might have wherewithall to reward the gallantry of his Soldiers.

Attalus, the last King of Pergamus in Asia, called Philometor, having given himself over to the working in art of brass, and being much delighted in making of instruments, and melting and stamping of brass; at last, set upon making a Sepulchre for his mother: but being too intent of the work, he caught a surfeit by reason of the violent heat of the furnace, and died the seventh day after, [Justin, lib. 36, cap. 4.]

Eudemus of Pergamus brought Attalus his Will to Rome, and delivered to Tiberius Gracchus the tribute of the people, the King of Pergamus his Crown, and Purple Robes, [Plutarch in Tiber. Gracch.] In the Will was written; Let the people of Rome be the heir of my goods. So that the people of Rome, reckoning the kingdom as part of the King's goods, held that Province, not by force of arms, but by virtue of the Will, [Florus, lib. 2, cap. 20.] Whereas Asia by the Will of Attalus the King, was bequeathed to the people of Rome (if so be it was bequeathed) that it ought to be free, [Liv. lib. 59.] Indeed the Romans are charged with the counterfeiting of this Will in Mithridates his letter to Arlesius, in the fourth of Salusty's History. And that they were not lawful heirs to Attalus, Horace himself gives a private hint: as Acron hath observed in his notes upon the 18 Ode of the second book of Veres:

— Neque Attali
Ignotus heres regium occupat:
Neither have I as an obscure heir invaded Attalus his Court.

Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, desirous to purchase unto himself the peoples favour, ordained by the agrarian law (which from him was called the Sempronian law) that land in Asia should be farmed out by the Roman Censors: and to that end published a law to the people: That as soon as the money bequeathed by King Attalus was come, it should be divided amongst the Citizens, who were by the Sempronian law to rent the lands, towards the managing of their farms, and providing instruments of husbandry. As for the Cities of the kingdom of Attalus, he denied that the Senate had anything to do with them, and that he intended to refer them to an assembly of the people, [Cicero, Verrin. 2, Liv. lib. 58, Plutarch, in Tib. Gracch. Orof. lib. 5, cap. 8.] But because in an assembly of the tribes held that Summer, it was moved, that he might be continued Tribune of the people for the year following, he was stabbed in the Capitol, by the designation of P. Cornelius Nafica, the Pontifex Maximus, [Appian, Bell. Civil. lib. 1, pag. 358.] Scævola and Platon being Consuls, [Afon, Pedian, in Verrin. 2.] the same Summer in which Attalus died.

Ariftonicus falsely pretending his descent from the Blood Royal, as says Velius Paterculus; indeed the son of King Eumenes, and the brother of Attalus deceased, though not by lawful wedlock, but by an Ephesian Courtisan, the daughter of a Multian, invaded Asia in right of his father. Most of the Cities (living formerly under kingly government) he easily persuaded to be of his side; and chose less which for fear of the Romans stood out against him, he reduced by force, [Liv. lib. 59, Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2, cap. 4, Strabo, lib. 14, pag. 646, Flor. lib. 3, cap. 20, Justin. lib. 36, cap. 4, Plutarch, sub fin. Vita. T. Q. Flamini. Appian. Bell. Civil. lib. 1, pag. 360, & Mithridatic. pag. 22, Europ. lib. 4.]

The first place which he wrought to a revolt, was a little Town called Leucas: but he was soon thrust out thence upon a defeat given him by the Ephesians in a sea-fight near Cuma, [Strabo, sup.]

From thence Ariftonicus marched into the midland, where he drew together a numerous company of beggarly persons, and slaves, whom he incited to stand up for their liberty, and whom he called Heliopolitans, [id. ibid.] Whatsoever slaves had the hap to've under hard masters, quitted their services, and ran away to him: and gave great overthrows to many Cities, [Diod. Sicil. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 362.] Ariftonicus first set upon Thiatira, next seized upon Apollonia, and afterwards the other Garrisons, [Strabo, sup.] Myndus, Samos, Colophon, he took by storm, [Florus lib. 2, cap. 20.]

To stop his career, all the Cities round about sent their Forces: Nicomedes king of Bithynia, Ariarathes of Cappadocia, Phylzmenes of Paphlagonia, and Mithridates of Pontus, brought their supplies to the Romans against him. Moreover, five Legates came from Rome, [Strabo, sup. cum Justin. lib. 37, cap. 1 & Europ. lib. 4.]

In the 38 year under king Eucerges, (the second, or Phylcon, the Epoch of his reign, being taken from the time he began to reign with his brother Philometor, concerning which see above ad ann. Mundi, 3835.) Jesus the son of Sirach born at Hierusalem, coming into Egypt, and residing there, translated the book of his Grandfather Jesus (called by the Greeks Panaristos, and Ecclesiasticus) out of Hebrew into Greek, as he himself shews in the Preface to his translation: which very book, Heironimo in his 115. Epist. says, he hath seen in the Hebrew, with this inscription. The parables of Jesus son of Sirach.

P. Rupilius, being raised from the condition of a Sicilian Publican, to the honour of Consulship, Confulship, quelled the infurrection of the slaves in Sicily, [Liv. lib. 59. Afcion. Pedian. Verrin. 4. Valer. Maxim. lib. 2. cap. 7. & lib. 6. cap. 9.] At his beſiege of Taurominum, he took priſoner Comanus, Cleons brother, as he was ſtealing out of the City : and a while after, upon Sarapion the Syrians betraying the Fort unto him, he ſeized upon all the fugitives in the City : whom after he had put upon the rack, he tumbled down headlong. From thence he marched to Euna, where he encountered with Cleon the General, who marched out of the City to fight him : Cleon behaved himſelf very gallantly, and received many a wound before he fell : as loon as the General was ſlain, that City alſo was betrayed unto the Conſul. As for Euntus, the king of the Rebels, he took along with him 600 of his men and eſcaped as faſt as he could to the craggy mountains for his ſecurity : where for fear of the purſuers they crept into caves, from whence, he and four more of his company were dragged out, and caſt in priſon at Morgantina, where he lay fo long, until his body putrified and relolved into lice. A lamentable death it was, but his ſalutary enterpriſes deſerved no better, [Diodor. Sicul. lib. 34. in Photii. Bibliothec. cod. 214. &]

In the 8 year of Antiochus Sidetes, about 10 of the clock in the forenoon, on the 21 day of the month Peritius, or February, there happened an earthquake at Antioch in Syria ; as may be gathered out of the Chronicles of John Malela of Antioch.

L. Valerius Flaccus, and P. Licinius Craſſus, being Conſuls, it was propounded to the people, whom they would be pleaſed to aſſign for the managing of the war againſt Ariſtonicus : Craſſus the Conſul, and Pontifex Maximus, threatened to let a fine upon Flaccus who was his Colleague in the Conſulſhip, and Mars his Flamen, if he let the holy ſervices. The people took off the fine, yet enjoyed the Flamen to obſerve the Pontifex : Yet for all that, the people would by no means give their conſent, that the managing of the war ſhould be committed to a private perſon : although Scipio Africanus were the man they pitched upon, who the year before had triumphed over the Numantians : but voted the war ſhould be entrusted rather to Craſſus the Conſul, than to Africanus who was but a private perſon, [Cicero, in Philippic. 11. &] And fo the Pontifex Max. (which was more than ever was done before) went out of Italy, [Liv. lib. 59.]

Antiochus Sidetes marched with his army againſt Phraates, who ſucceeded his brother Ariſtides, or Mithridates, in the kingdom of Parthia : his deſign was to ſeize back his brother Demetrius Nicator. Phraates had twice taken him as he was fleeing away, and ſent him back into Hircania to his wife Rhodoguna and his children : not out of commiseration towards them, or reſpect of his own alliance to them, but becauſe he aſpired to the kingdom of Syria, and therefore might make uſe of Demetrius againſt Antiochus his brother, as occaſion ſhould ſerve, and the event of the war require. Whereupon Antiochus thought it beſt to begin firſt, and therefore led his army, which he had already hardened in the wars which he had with his neighbours, into Media againſt the Parthians, [Juſtin. lib. 38. cap. 9. & lib. 42. cap. 1. Liv. lib. 59. Athenæus, lib. 10. cap. 12. & lib. 12. cap. 19. Appian. Syriac. pag. 132.]

But his preparation for luxury was not leſſe, than that for the war : for 300 (Oroſius 200) thouſand ſcullions followed his army, which conſiſted of 80 (Oroſius ſaith 100) thouſand men : The greater number of them were Cooks, Bakers, and Stage-players, [Juſtin. lib. 38. cap. 10.] Antiochus entertained conſtantly every day ſuch a multitude of gueſts, that bedies what was eaten at table, and taken off by heaps, every one of the gueſts carried away with them whole joints of meat untouched ; ſheſh of four-footed beaſts, fowles, ſea-fiſh, ready dreſſed : they were moreover provided much ſweet-meats, made of candid honey, many coronets of frankincenſe and myrrhe, with knots and ribbands of Gold, which being let down at length, were as high as a man, [Poſidon. Apameus. Hiſtoriar. lib. 14. apud Athenæum, lib. 5. cap. 9. & lib. 12. cap. 19.] The ſouldiery imitating this his blind and mad profulenſe, drove ſilver nails into the ſoles of their ſhoes : they prepared alſo ſilver veſſels for kitchen ſervice, and adorned their tents with woven Imagery. All which might rather ſeem a booty to encourage the enemy, than be a means to retard and ſlacken the hands of a courageous man to purſue a victory, [Valer. Maxim. lib. 9. cap. 1. & Juſtin. lib. 38. cap. 10.]

As loon as Antiochus was come into thoſe parts, many of the Eaſtern Kings tendered themſelves and their kingdoms unto him, curſing and devoting the inſolencies of the Parthians : Neither was it long before he engaged the enemy. Antiochus having had the better in three ſeveral battles, and being ſeized of Babylon, began to be in ſome repute : ſo that the Parthians had nothing left but their own Country, the people generally falling off from them to Antiochus, [Juſtin. lib. 38. cap. 10.]

In this expedition, John Hircanus the Jews High Prieſt and Ruler, followed Antiochus with his ſupplies : of whom Nicholas Damascenus hath related this paſſage in his general Hiſtory. Antiochus having erected a Trophie near the River Lycus, where he overthrew overthrew Indates, the Parthians General, carryed there two dayes upon Hircanus the Jews contrary, becauſe it happened that one of the Jews ſolemne feſtivals fell out at that very time, during which, it was not lawful for the Jews to travel. It was the feaſt of Pentecott, which drew on after the Sabbath : all which time the Jews were prohibited to take any journey. [Iſopſitus, lib. 13. cap. 16.] When that was over, John having overthrown the Hircani, in battle, and from thence obtained the name Hircanus, (as is ſupported by Eusebius in his Chronicle, and Sverus Sulpitius, in the ſecond Book of his Holy Hiſtory.) returned home again with a great deal of honour.

P. Craſſus the Conſul, coming into Aſia, to quell King Ariſtonicus ; by his great induſtry, grew to expert in the Greek tongue, that he knew it moſt exactly, as it is divided into its five Dialects, which procured him a great deal of favour and love amongst the Allies, when they ſaw he returned anſwer to their demands, in the very ſame Dialect that they themſelves made their addreſſes in. [Valer. Maximus, lib. 8. cap. 7. Quinilian. lib. 11. cap. 2.]

When the ſame Craſſus was preparing to lay his ſiege to Leucas, and wanted a ſtrong and large beam to make a Ramme of, to batter the walls of the Town ; he wrote to the chief Carpenter of the Molcanenſes, who were confederates and Allies of the Romans, that of two Maſtes which he had ſeen there, he ſhould be ſure to ſend him the biggeſt. The Carpenter, underſtanding wherefore he deſired the Maſte, did not, as he was bid, ſend the greater, but the leſſe, ſuppoſing it more fit for the purpoſe, and eaſier for carriage : Craſſus ordered him to be ſent for, and when he had demanded, how chance he had not ſent that Maſte which he required, not weighing his excuſes and reaſons, commanded him to be ſtript, and whipt : being of opinion, that all regard and reſpect due to ſuperiors would ſoon decay and vaniſh, if ſo be a man might be ſuffered to anſwer a command, nor with that obedience which is expected, but with an officious giving his advice. [A. Gell. lib. 1. cap. 13.]

Antiochus Sidetes, in regard of his great number, divided his army into winter quarters through the Cities : which upon the exalting of free quarter, and the murthering of the ſouldiery, fell off from him, [Juſtin. lib. 38. cap. 10.] where above all others, Aethenæus, one of Antiochus his Captains, was intolerably indolent into whatſoever quarters he came. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerptis. Valeſii, pag. 374.]

P. Craſſus, Proconſul of Aſia, notwithstanding he was very ſtrong, what with his own forces, and the ſupplies ſent him from the Kings of Bithynia, Pontus, Cappadocia, and Paphlagonia, yet at the end of the year, adventuring to engage the enemy before he had put his army in a poſture to fight, was overcome, and after a great ſlaughter of his men, his army was forced to flye : As for himſelf, he fell into the hands of the enemy, being taken near Leucas, between Elea and Smyrna, by an ambuſh of Thracians, whereof Ariſtonicus had good ſtore in Garriſon. But the Conſul, remembering of what family he was deſcended, and that he was a Roman thruſt the ſtick, with which he uſed to guide his horſe, into the eye of the Thracians, who had the charge of him, who being enraged by reaſon of the pain and anguiſh, run his ſword into Craſſus his ſide : thus by contriving a way to dye, he avoided both diſgrace and ſervitude. His head was preſented to Ariſtonicus, and his body interred at Smyrna, [Liv. lib. 59. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 646. Valer. Maxim. lib. 3. cap. 2. Flor. lib. 2. cap. 20. Juſtin. lib. 36. cap. 4. Julius Obſequens de prodigiis Europ. lib. 4. Oroſ. lib. 5. cap. 10.]

M. Perperna Conſul, who ſucceeded Craſſus, hearing of his death, and the overthrow of the Roman army, made what preſe he could into Aſia : where he ſurprized Ariſtonicus, keeping, as it were, holiday for his late conqueſts, and put him to flight, not having at that time his forces about him. He eſcaped to Stratonice, whether the Conſul haſted after him, and laid ſuch cloſe ſiege to the City, that he forced it to reſign for want of proviſion ; he took Ariſtonicus priſoner, and kept him in bonds, [Liv. Patercul. Strabo, Florus, Juſtin. Oroſ. Europ. in ſupra, Valer. Max. lib. 3. cap. 4.]

Belaſius Cuma, who after the death of Tiberius Gracchus, (whom he to highly eſteemed, that if he had commanded him to let fire to the Capitol, he profeſſed he thought it no ſhame to have put it in execution) went from Rome to Ariſtonicus into Aſia : when he ſaw how Ariſtonicus his affairs, went backwards, he flew himſelf. [Plutarch in Tib. Graccho.]

Just before the taking of Ariſtonicus, news was brought to Rome, how the image of Apollo at Cuma wept for four dayes together : the ſouldiery were lo apalled at the prodigie, that they had thrown the image into the ſea, had not the old men of Cuma interceded; but the more expert southayers answered, that thereby the fatality of Greece was portended, from whence that image was brought. Hereupon the Romans sacrificed, and brought offerings into the temple. [Jul. Obsequens, de prodigiis, Augustin, de Civit. Dei, lib. 3, cap. 21.]

Phrygia was recovered by the Romans. [Jul. Obsequens, ibid.]
Phraates sends Demetrius Nicator into Syria, with a company of Parthians to seize upon that kingdom, hoping thereby to draw Antiochus out of Parthia to save his own Country; in the mean time, not being able to annoy Antiochus in open war, he endeavoured by all means to surprize him with stratagems. [Justin, lib. 38, cap. 10.]

The Cities, where Antiochus his army had taken up their winter quarters, taking it very ill that they were oppressed with the quarters, and not brooking also the incivilities of the souldiers, revolted to the Parthians: and upon a set day, all of them fell upon the army as it lay dispersed in their severall quarters, having so placed ambushes, that they could not come to assist one another. As soon as Antiochus had notice hereof, he marched to the relief of those that were next to him, with that company which quartered with him. [Id. ib.]

The Swallows builded nests in Antiochus his pavilion, but he neglecting the prodigree, encountered the enemy. [Jul. Obsequens, de prodig.] And truly, for his own part, he expressed more gallantry in his engagement with Phraates, whom he met in the way, than his army did; but at the close, his party cowardly ran away, and deserted him. [Justin, in sup.]

The first man that took himself to his heels, and deserted Antiochus, was Athenicus, who flying to some of those villages, which he had provoked by his incivilities, when he was quartered amongst them, had the doors shut against him, and was dejected with all: so that he was forced to wander up and down the Country, till at length he dyed for hunger. [Diadorm Sidonius, in Excerptis Valesii, pag. 374, 377.]

As for Antiochus himself, Julius Obsequens, [lib. de prodigiis.] Justinus, [lib. 38, cap. 10, & 39, cap. 1.] Josephus, [lib. 15, cap. 16.] Eusebius, [in his Chronicle.] and Orosius [lib. 5, cap. 10.] relate, That he was slain by the Parthians in that fight. Appian reports, That being worried in the battle, he laid violent hands upon himself. [in Syriae, pag. 132.] Elianus tells us, That upon his ill success, he threw himself down headlong from a steep place. [lib. 10, de Animalib. cap. 34.] Some Modern Writers think he was stoned to death by the Priests of the Temple Nannea in Persia, whither he came with the remainder of his army, with an intention to ransack the Temple: Supposing with Rupertus Tuitienus, [lib. 10, de victoria Verbi Dei, cap. 6, 16, 24.] that this was the same Antiochus, of whom mention is made in the Epistle of the Jews at Jerusalem to their brethren in Egypt. [2 Macc. 1, 10, 17.]

When Arfaces (so Phraates was called by the general name of the Kings of Parthia) interred the dead corps of Antiochus, Poldonius of Apamea, in the 26 book of his Histories, [according to Athenius, lib. 10, cap. 12.] reports that he said, reproving his debauchery; Thy wine, O Antiochus, and thy two great confidants have deceived thee: for thou hopest in thy great cups, to have swallowed down the kingdom of Arfaces.

After Antiochus his funerall was over, which Phraates discharged in a Princely manner, he was enamoured with Demetrius his daughter, whom Antiochus had brought along with him, and took her to wife: and now he began to repent of his sending Demetrius away: wherefore he dispatched in all haste some troops of Horse to fetch him back again; who found Demetrius, fearing some such thing, leaped in the kingdom, so that having attempted all in vain, they returned back to the King. [Justin lib. 38, cap. 10.]

Antiochus and his army being overthrown in Parthia, his brother Demetrius being freed from the siege of the Parthians, and restored to his kingdom, though all Syria at that time bemoaned the losse of the army, yet he seemed to relent the accident no otherwise than if he had managed his own and his brothers wars against the Parthians, with all the good luck that might be; (wherein the one of them was taken prisoner, the other was slain outright.) [Id. lib. 38, cap. 1.]

Antiochus being dead and gone, the Jews never after suffered a Macedonian King to recover them; but creating magistrates amongst themselves, they pestered Syria with continuall wars. [Id. lib. 36, cap. 1.] and subdued many parts of Syria and Phoenicia. [Strabo, lib. 16, cap. 761.] For Hircanus, after the death of Antiochus, revolted from the Macedonians, and never after sent them any supplies, either as subject, or friend. But at the first bruit of Antiochus his death, he led his whole army against the Cities of Syria, supposing (which was true) that he should find them bereft, and void of defendants: he stormed Medaba (of which 1 Maccab. 9. 36.) and took it, though with some difficulty, having layen fixe months before it: next he possessed himself of Samaga, and the towns adjacent. [Joseph, lib. 13, cap. 17.]

In the mean time Phraates, resolving to commence a war in Syria, in vindication of Antiochus his attempting the kingdom of Parthia, was taken off his designe, and called home to defend his own, by reason of some commotions of the Scythians in the Country. For the Scythians, the ground of the quarrel was this, The Scythians were hired by the Parthians, to assist them against Antiochus King of Syria: but they came not by their supplies, till the business was over, so that the Parthians cut them short of their pay, objecting their coming too late. The Scythians being vexed, that they had taken such a long march to no purpose, moved, That they might be either allowed their pay in consideration of their tedious march, or that they might be commanded upon some other service: the Parthians returned them but a rough answer, which, they taking exception at, became their own carvers, and fell to plundering the Country. [Justin, lib. 42, cap. 11.]

When Phraates was gone against the Scythians, he left behind him as viceroy, one Himerus, an Hircanian by birth, a great favourite of his, upon the score of the flower of his youth. But he forgetting his former condition, and not considering he was but another's deputy, proceeded with a great deal of tyranny, and vexed the Babylonians, and many other Cities upon no occasion. [Id. ib.] For he made many of the Babylonians his slaves, and dispersed them with their whole families into Media. He let also the market place on fire, and some Temples of Babylon, and pulled down all the most beautiful places of the City. [Diador, Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 377.] Poldonius of Apamea also mentions the exorbitant government of this Himerus, in the 26 book of his Histories. [Athenius, lib. 11, c. 4.] where he relates, how that one Lylimachus a Babylonian invited him and 300 more to supper: and when meat was taken off, presented to every one of those 300, the silver cup of four pound price, in which they had drunk.

In Egypt, Ptolemy Evergetes the second, or Phylcon, having reigned 15 years after his brother Philometor [as Diador, Sicul. shows in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 380.] having already by his cruelty, rendered himself so odious to those very foreigners he had invited to Alexandria, that they let his royal palace on fire, stole away privately into Cyprus, with his son Memphites, whom his sister Cleopatra bore unto him, and with his wife the daughter of the same Cleopatra. And whereas the people conferred the kingdom upon Cleopatra his sister and divorced wife: he hired an army, and waged war both against his own sister and native Country. [Livie, lib. 59, Jul. Obsequens de prodigiis, Justin lib. 38, cap. 8. Orosius lib. 5, cap. 10.]

John Hircanus took Sichem and Gazium, and demolished the Temple of the Cuthites two hundred years after it had been built by Saurballat. [Josephus, lib. 13, cap. 17.]

M. Perperna took care to get Aristonicus, and the treasure which Artalus lost in legacy to the people of Rome, to be shipped away thither, which was ill taken by Manius Aquilius Consul his successor, who forthwith made what he could to Perperna, intending to get Aristonicus out of his hands, as belonging to his triumph rather than to Perperna's: But Perperna's death decided the controversy: who upon his returne tell sick at Pergamus, and dyed of that disease. [Strabo, lib. 14, pag. 646. Valer. Maximus, lib. 3, cap. 4. Justin, lib. 36, cap. 4. Europ. lib. 4, Oros. lib. 5, cap. 10.]

Aquilius Consul, completed the remainder of the Asiatick war, forcing some Cities to resigne, by poisoning their waters: which though it occasioned a speedy victory, yet it withall rendered it in famous and dishonorable. [Florus, lib. 2, cap. 20.]

Most of the Asians, who for four years entire had assisted Aristonicus against the Romans, for fear returned to their loyalty. [Syllit, apud Appian in Mithridatic, pag. 212.] And so Lydia anciently, the Senate of the Kings, Caria, Hellepont, and both Phrygia's by joyn't resignation put themselves under the power of the Romans. [Sexius, Rufus in Breviario.]

The Massilians sent their Ambassadors away to Rome, to mediate in behalf of their founders the Phocenians, whole City and name the Senate had ordered to be quite raised out, because both now in the war with Aristonicus, and formerly with Antiochus the great, they had borne arms against the people of Rome, the Senate granted them their pardon. [Justin lib. 37, cap. 1.]

The Romans gave the greater Phrygia to Mithridates Evergetes King of Pontus, as a gratuity for assisting them against Aristonicus. [Id. ibid. & lib. 38, cap. 5.] Although it is generally believed that Manius Aquilius being well bribed for his pains, gave it unto him. Wherefore, after the death of Mithridates, the Senate took Phrygia away from his son, in his minority, (as he himself complains in Trogus Pompeius) and made it a free State and independent. [Appian, in Mithridatic, pag. 177. & 208, & lib.]

lib. 1. Bell. Civil. pag. 352, 363. compared with Iustin. lib. 38. cap. 5.

Aquilus with ten Legates, reduced Attalus his Dominion into the form of a Province, and made it tributary; and called it by the common name of the Continent, Asia, [Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 624. & lib. 14. pag. 646.]

Ariarathes, King of Cappadocia, was slain in the war against Aristonicus, leaving behind him six sons, by his wife Laodice, to whom the people of Rome gave Lycania and Cilicia, for their fathers good service. But Laodice, being jealous of her sons, and fearing lest when they came to age, they should not enjoy the kingdom long after, poisoned five of them: one young one escaped the mothers cruelty, by being secured in the hands of some of the kindred; who, after the killing of Laodice (for the people had dispatched her for her cruelty) had the kingdom to himself. [Iustin. lib. 37. cap. 1.]

John Hircanus took Adora, and Marissa, Cities of Idumea: and having subdued all the Idumeans, enjoyed them circumcised, under penalty of quitting their mansions: But they, out of love to their native Country, admitted both circumcisions, and all other Jewish constitutions: and from that time forward, they were reckoned amongst the Jews. [Ioseph. Antiquit. lib. 13. cap. 17. lib. 15. cap. 11. pag. 531. compared with lib. 4. Bell. cap. 16. al. cap. 6.] Strabo relates that these Idumeans were Nabateans originally; but being driven thence upon some sedition, they joined themselves to the Jews, and submitted to their laws. [lib. 16. pag. 760.] He adds, that Herod, the King of the Jews, came from thence, ἐξ ἰδουμαίων, virum indigenam: A stranger born. [Ibid. pag. 765.] Whereas Antigonus said he was an Idumean; that is, an half Jew. [Ioseph. lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 27. pag. 501.] For although Stephanus Byzantinus writes [in voc. Ἰδουμαῖος] that the Idumeans were Hebrews originally; yet Ammonius the Grammarian in his book de differentiis verborum, out of Ptolemies first book, de Rege Herodo, (perhaps that Ptolemy who was Herods Lieutenant, Ioseph. lib. 16. Antiquit. cap. 11.) hath noted this difference betwixt the Idumeans and the Jews. *The Jews are such as were so naturally from the beginning: But the Idumeans were not Jews from the beginning, but Phœnicians and Syrians: who being conquered by the Jews, were compelled to be circumcised, to unite their nation to the Jewish, and to be subject to their laws: And therefore were called Jews: not in respect of their Descent, but in regard of their Religion and manner of life: For there were other men which were called Jews, though they were strangers born, because they lived according to their rites and constitutions: as Diosd. hath noted in his 37 book of his Roman History. And hence it is, that, from the Hebrews, the kingdom of Herod and his posterity is styled מלכות יוֹדֵי The Kingdom of the Profelytes (not Hagarenes, as it is rendered by Munster in Seder Olam minor, and by Scaliger in Judaici Comput. Spic. legio, lib. 7. de Emendatione temporum.) For amongst the Jews, the Profelytes of righteousnesse, or the righteous Profelytes (as they termed them) such as since that time the Idumeans are thought to be, were always reckoned in the same place and account with the Jews.*

Ptolemy Phylcon, having fetched his eldest son out of Cyrene, put him to death, for fear the Alexandrians should let him up King against him: whereupon the people pulled down his Statue, and his Images. [Iustin. lib. 38. cap. 8.] Ptolemy supposed that this was done by the instigation of his sister Cleopatra, and not well knowing how to be avenged any other way, commanded his son Memphitis, who was of an ingenuous countenance, and a very hopeful child, and which he had by her, to be slain before his eyes: and cutting off his head, hands and feet, put them into a chest covered with a soldiers coat, and gave them to one of his servants to carry to Alexandria, and to present them to Cleopatra on the Festival of her nativity, when she was in the height of her jollity, for a Birth-day gift. This was a grievous and sad spectacle, not to the Queen only, but to the whole City, and it struck such a damp upon the merry meeting, that the Court of a sudden was overcast with a general sadness. The Nobles turning their Festival into a Funeral, shewed the mangled limbs to the people: to let them see what they themselves were to expect from their King, who had thus murdered his own son. [Ibid. Diosd. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 374. Liv. lib. 59. Jul. Obsequens, de prodigiis, Valer. Maxim. lib. 9. cap. 2.]

Ptolemy, perceiving how detestable he was grown to his Country, and fearing somewhat might follow thereupon, went about to secure himself by a new piece of cruelty: supposing, that if the common people were put to the sword, he should sit the faster in his Throne: At a time when the common place of exercise was full of the young men, he beggred it round with fire and sword; and destroyed them all by one of those two, [Valer. Maxim. lib. 1.]

Phraates led the army of Grecians (which he had taken in the war against Antiochus, and since behaved himself very imperiously and tyrannically towards them) along with him to the war against the Scythians: not considering, that their captivity had not abated any thing of their hostile minds; and moreover, how he had exasperated them them with fresh injuries and indignities: As too; therefore as they espyed the Parthian army to give ground, they wheeled about to the enemy, and at last put in execution the long desired revenge of their captivity: the Parthian army and Phraates himself being put to the sword. [Iustin. lib. 42. cap. 1.]

Arctabanus his Uncle succeeded him in the kingdom of the Parthians: As for the Scythians they being contented with their victory, after they had pillaged the Country of the Parthians, returned home again. But Artabanus, having commenced a war with the Thogarii (or Tochari, a people descended from the Scythians) received a wound in his arm, and died presently after: He left for his successor his son Mithridates the great; who (not long after) waged a war with Oroonides King of Armenia. [Ibid. lib. 42. cap. 2.]

In the 50 year of the third Calippick Period, or the 16 day of the Egyptian month Epiphi (August the fifth according to the Julian account) at the Equinoctial hours, at 6 in the forenoon in the Island of Rhodes, Hipparchus observed the Sun in degree 8, minute 3 of Leo, and the Moon in degree 12, minute 2, of Taurus. [Ptolem. lib. 5. cap. 3.]

In the same 50 year, on the first day of the Egyptian month Phamnouth (23 day of the Julian March) the vernal Equinox was observed by Hipparchus. [Ibid. lib. 3. cap. 2.]

The same Hipparchus, in the same year observed the Star in the heart of Leo to be distant from the point of the Summer Solstice 29 degrees, and 50 minutes. [Ibid. lib. 7. cap. 2.]

Hegelochus, Ptolemy Phylcons General, being dispatched against Marias the Alexandrians General, took him prisoner alive, but put all his Forces to the sword. When Marias was brought into the Kings presence, all believed the King would have adjudged him to some cruel death: but Ptolemy, beyond all expectation, spared him. For he now began to repent of his former bloody proceedings, and was very desirous by such acts of grace, to reconcile himself to the people, extremely alienated from him. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 377.]

Queen Cleopatra (the dayes of mourning for her son being over) seeing her brother Phylcon was marching against her, sent by her Embassadors to entreat assistance from Demetrius Nicator King of Syria, her son in law, (for Cleopatra wife to Demetrius, was daughter to this Cleopatra, and Philometor) promising him, that he should have the kingdom of Egypt for his pains: In hopes of that prize, he marched into Egypt, and made his first attempt upon Pelusium. [Iustin. lib. 38. cap. 9. & lib. 39. cap. 1. Porphyrius, in Græci, Eusebii Scaligeri, pag. 287.]

In this year, Alexander Jannæus, son to John Hircanus was born, afterwards King of the Jews, who lived 49 years. [Ioseph. lib. 13. cap. 23. fin.] As soon as he was born, he grew out of favour with his father: For it is reported, that Hircanus enquired of God appearing to him in his sleep, concerning his successfull: being very solicitous on the behalf of Aristobolus and Antigonus, whom he loved far above the other brothers, upon Gods representing unto him this Jannæus, he was much perplexed, that he should succeed him in all his fortunes; whereupon he sent him into Galilee, to receive his education; neither did he ever admit him into his presence as long as he lived. [Ibid. cap. 20.]

About this time, Simon son of Dositheus, Apollonius the son of Alexander, and Diodorus son of Jason, were sent Embassadors from Hircanus and the people of the Jews, to renew their friendship and amity with the Romans. Faunus son of Marcus, the City Prætor, procured them a meeting of the Senate for their audience VIII. Id. February; which, as the Roman year then went, falls upon the Julian November: And it was ordered by a Decree of the Senate, That Joppe and the parts thereof, Gazara and the Springs, and the other Cities, which Antiochus Sidetes had taken from them, contrary to the Decree of the Senate, should be restored. It was further ordered, That the Kings soldiers should not travel thorough their Country, or thorough any Country under their command. That whatsoever Antiochus had attempted in that war, should be null. That the Embassadors which the Senate sent, should take care to see restored whatsoever Antiochus had carried away, and to give an estimate of the damage the Country had sustained in that war. That letters commendatory should be given the Embassadors to the Kings and free people, that so they might return more secure into their Country. Moreover, Faunus the Prætor received orders, to supply the Embassadors with monies out of the common Bank, to provide necessaries for their return homewards. [Ioseph. lib. 13. cap. 17.]

In the 57 year after Alexanders death, and 6st of Nabonasar, on the 11 day of the Egyptian month Phamnouth (2 day of the Julian May) in the forenoon, Equinoctial hours 5, minute 20. Hipparchus in the Island of Rhodes observed the Sun in 7 degrees, minute 45, of Taurus: the Moon in degrees 21, minute 40, of Piciis. [Ptolem. lib. 5. cap. 5.]

In the same year, on the 17 day of the Egyptian month Payn (the seventh of the Julian July) in the afternoon, in the hours Equinoctial 3. minut. 20. Hipparchus observed in the same place, the sun in degree. 10. minut. 54. in Cancer, the moon in degree, 21. minut. 40. of Pilees. [Id. Ibid.]

In the ninth year of Hircanus his High Priesthood, and reign, Alexander the son of Jafon, Numenius, son of Antiochus; and Alexander, son of Dorotheus, Ambassadors for the Jews, presented the Senate with a Viall and Buckler of gold, valued 50 thousand Crowns in estimation, as a testimony of their ancient amity with the people of Rome: who, after they had received letters to the free Cities and Kings, to pass securely thorough their Countries and Ports, returned home. A Copy of this decree of the Senate is extant in Josephus, [lib. 14. cap. 16.] upon a far different occasion: For whereas, Josephus had said before, that upon Julius Cæsar's letters, a Decree was obtained, giving licence to Hircanus the second, for the repairing of the walls of Jerusalem, which Pompeus had demolished: I know not through what oversight he subjoined this Decree instead of the other, which did no whit concern the repair of the walls of Jerusalem: and yet he saies, this was done in the ninth year of Hircanus his High Priesthood and reign, in the month Panem, when as the Acts themselves confirm this Decree to be published in the last of December, (which fall upon the Julian September) and the Macedonian Hyperbæretus. But it Cæsar had procured that Decree in favour of Hircanus the second, then the 27 year of Hircanus should have been set down, rather than the ninth, and of his reign none at all: for Josephus himself shews in the tenth Chapter of the same book, that Gabinus had deprived him of his sovereignty, and left him only the High Priests office. That Decree therefore is to be referred to the ninth year of Hircanus the first, at which time the Jewish Common-wealth was a free State, and confederate with the people of Rome, and not to the ninth year of the second Hircanus, in whole time it was conquered, and made tributary unto them.

In the absence of King Demetrius Nicator, first the Antiochians, for his pride, which was grown intolerable by his conversation, with the cruel Parthians, and presently after the Apameans, and the other Cities of Syria, encouraged by their examples, revolted from them. [Justin. lib. 39. cap. 1.] Demetrius having received intelligence of the revolt was forced to quit Egypt, and march back into Syria.

Cleopatra the Egyptian Queen, having lost her best bulwork, (Demetrius Nicator) shipped all her goods, and made what haste she could into Syria, unto her daughter Cleopatra the Syrian, and Demetrius her son in law. [Justin. ut supra.]

And because Demetrius was every whit as odious to the Syrians, generally, as he was to the fouldest, they sent unto Ptolemy Phylcon, desiring him that he would assigne some one descended from Seleucus, whom they might appoint as King over them. [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 17.] He sent unto them an Egyptian youth, the son of Protarchus a Merchant, who was to seize upon the Kingdom of Syria by force of Arms, having made a very formal story, how he had been adopted into the blood-royall by King Antiochus: as for the Syrians, they would very gladly submit to any King whatsoever, rather than live any longer under Demetrius his infolency. [Justin. lib. 39. cap. 1.] Porphyrius relates, how that this youth was sent as the son of Alexander, (Bala, viz. who was reported to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes) and that he was called Alexander himself, but the Syrians (surnamed him Zabina, because he was generally reputed to be one of Ptolemies slaves, which he had purchased, [in Græc. Enchir. Scalig. pag. 229.] to speak truth amongst the Syrians, signifies both bought and redeemed: neither did this substituted King disdain the memory of his being bought, but allways retained it upon his coin, which bare this inscription, ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΥ ΖΕΒΕΝΝΟΥΣ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ.

When this new King was come with his numerous supplies out of Egypt, it is reported, That the relics also of Antiochus Sidetes, who was slain by the King of the Parthians, were sent into Syria in a silver Coffin, to be interred there; which were received with a great deal of observance both by the Cities and King Alexander himself. This ingratiated him very much with the Countrymen; who verily believed the tears he shed at the solemnity were not counterfeit but real. [Justin. lib. 39. cap. 1.]

Both the armies engaged about Damascus, and Demetrius Nicator was worsted, who observing how he was environed with difficulties, withdrew out of the fight, and made what haste he could to his wife Cleopatra, at Ptolemais, but the shut gates against him. Being thus deserted by his wife and his sons, with a very small remnant he made to Tyrus, hoping the Temple might be his Sanctuary, and protection. [Id. ib. with Josephus and Porphyrius, in the places above cited.]

Porphyrius gives out, how that he, being denied entrance thither, was slain as he was taking shipping to some other place, four years of his reign being compleated after his return out of Parthia. Justin, That he was slain upon command of the Governour, as he was first lauding. Josephus, That he was taken prisoner by the enemy, upon whose hard usage he ended his life. Livy, That his wife Cleopatra killed him [lib. 60.] And lo Appian also [in Syria, pag. 132.] Indeed it is very probable, that he was killed at Tyrus and the acceffory; and that, the Tyrians for to doing obtained either of her, or of Alexander Zebina's, their freedom, and liberty, to live according to their own constitutions. For that they derived from this very year, a new Epoch of their times, appears both out of Eusebius his Chronicle, where the 402 year of the Tyrians is joyned with the second year of the Emperor Probus, which is the 4990 year of the Julian Period; as also by the Tyrian judgement inserted into the ninth action of the Council of Chalcedon, where the year after the consulship of Flavius Zeno, and Posthumianus, which is the 5162 year of the same Period, is computed the 574 year of the Tyrians account. Moreover we find the commendation of being the Religion, the Sacred, and the Independent Metropolis of Phenicia.

Alexander Zebina's, having got possession of that kingdom, entered into League with John Hircanus the High Priest: and things went very well with Hircanus, during his reign, [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 17.]

Manius Aquilius, Proconsul, returned in triumph out of Asia upon the third of the Ides of November (which at that time fell upon the Julian August) as may be gathered out of the fragments of the triumphal Tables of Marble: concerning which, Mithridates in an Epistle to Arfaces, [Salust. Historiar. lib. 4.] hath this passage, The Romanes, pretending a Will, (viz. King Antialus his Will) though unjustly, led Aristonicus, Eumenes son, in triumph, who had attempted to recover by force of arms, his fathers Kingdom, Vellcius Paternus, lib. 2. cap. 4. intimates, how that Aristonicus was led in triumph by Manius Aquilius, and afterwards beheaded. For he was strangled at Rome in the prison by an order from the Senate, [Serapio, lib. 14. pag. 646. Eutrop. lib. 4. Orosius lib. 5. cap. 10.]

Manius Aquilius, being questioned for bribery, and knowing himself faulty, corrupted his Judges, and so got off, [Appian. Bell. Civil. lib. 1. pag. 362. & 363.]

M. Plautius Hypsæus, and M. Fulvius Flaccus, being Consuls: A great company of Locusts in Africa were by the wind blown into the sea, and by the waves cast up again at Cyrene: which caused such an intolerable stench, that by reason of that pestilent vapour, there ensued a lamentable mortality of cattel: and it is reported also, that 800000 men died upon the same infection. [Julius Obsequens, de prodigiis, cum P. Orosio, lib. 5. cap. 11.]

Whilst Dorylaus of Pontus (a man very expert in ordering of an army) was busied in Crete, being sent thither by Mithridates Euergetes King of Pontus, about hiring of foreign soldiers: a war was commenced in those parts by the Cnosii against the Gortynii. The Cnosii made Dorylaus their General, who quickly put an end to the war; yet not with more speed than good luck. And having had great honour conferred upon him by the Cnosii for his good service, he resided amongst them with his whole family, having a little after, received intelligence of Mithridates his death: Dorylaus was great Grandfather to the mother of Scraboth the Geographer, [Sraboth, lib. 10. pag. 477. 478. & lib. 12. pag. 557.]

In the 188 year of the account of the contracts, the Jews of Palestine, and the Senate of Hierusalem and Judas, being about celebrating the Feast of the Dedication of the cleansing of the Temple on the 25 day of the month Chisleu, wrote to Aristobolus Ptolemæ (Phylcons) master (who was descended from the Royal stock of the Priests according to Aaron) and to the Jews in Egypt, that they should do the same likewise. [2. Macc. 1. 10. 18.] Rupertus Tutenfius, [lib. 10. de vitiorum verbis, cap. 15.] conceives that Judas, to be the same Judas the Eleazan, whom Josephus reports, 19 years after this, to have foretold the sudden death of Antigonus (son of John Hircanus), and seldom failed in his prophesies, [lib. 13. cap. 19.] And as for Aristobolus, Clemens Alexandrinus, [lib. 5. Strom.] and Eusebius Cæsariensis, both [in the 8 lib. Preparat. Evangel. c. 3. and in his Chronicle.] suppose him to be that Jewish Philosopher the Peripatetic, of whom mention was made by us afore at the end of 3854 year of the World.

Seleucus Demetrius, Nicator's son, without leave of his mother Cleopatra, seized upon the Crown, and reigned one year in Syria, [Liv. lib. 60. Porphyrius in Græc. Enchir. pag. 227.]

Alexander Zebina's, with much ado, vanquished Antipater, Clonius, and Æropus, three of his most eminent Commanders, who had revolted from him, and seized the City

City Laodicea. Yet he expressed a great deal of gallantry towards them, after he had taken them prisoner, and in the close, pardoned the apostacy of them all, for he was naturally of a mild disposition, and pleasing temper, and of a wonderful affability in all his meetings and discourses; so that hereby he was extremely beloved of all men, [Diod. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valefii, pag. 377.]

Mithridates Euergetes, King of Pontus, and Armenia the less, made away by the treachery of some of his intimate acquaintance, let his wife and his sons to succeed him in the kingdom. But Mithridates, surnamed Eupator, the elder brother of the two, laid claim to the whole kingdom for himself, [Strabo, lib. 10, pag. 477, cum Justin. lib. 37, cap. 1.] For soon after, he clapt his mother (whom his father had designed joint partner with him in the kingdom) into prison, and kept her there in bonds, who, by reason of that hard usage, and long imprisonment, ended her days there: So Memnon (in Excerpt. Photii, cap. 32.) As for Mithridates himself, Salust reports in his History, That he was a very child when he first entered the kingdom, having made his way, by poisoning of his mother, [Servius in Virg. lib. 6, c. 6, enid.]

Strabo affirms, That Mithridates was eleven years of age, when he succeeded his father in the kingdom; and Memnon thirteen: we have chosen the middle year, and account him 12 years old; following Eusebius, who tells us, That he reigned 60 years, and lived 72, although Pliny, [lib. 25, cap. 2.] allows him but 56 years of reign, and Appian 57, [Vid. supr. ann. Mundi 3868.]

As there appeared a Comet in the year in which Mithridates was born, so there appeared one also in the first year of his reign, which shined by night and day for 70 days together, that the whole heaven seemed to be all a fire. For both the rays of it covered the fourth part of the heaven (or 45 degrees of the upper Hemisphere) and outvied the Sun in brightness: and also its rising and setting took up the space of four hours, [Justin. lib. 37, cap. 2.]

In Syria, Cleopatra struck her son Seleucus thorough with a Dart, either because he had seized upon the Crown without her consent, or fearing least he should in time revenge his father Demetrius his death, or because the her self managed all things with the familiarity and violence as he did. Having thus dispatched Seleucus, she let up in his room her other son by Demetrius, Antiochus Grypus, whom she had sent to Athens to receive his education: investing him with the Title of King, but reserving to her self the whole power and authority, [Livy, lib. 60, Justin. lib. 39, cap. 1. Appian, Syriac, pag. 132.] But Porphyrius hath intimated, how that Seleucus being depoyed by his mother's treachery, Antiochus the younger brother succeeded in the kingdom, in the second year of the CLXIV Olympiad, [in Graec. Ensch. Scaliger, pag. 227.] adding withal, that he was not only called Grypus, but Philometor also: which latter surname, Josephus also gives unto him, [lib. 13, cap. 20.]

Alexander Zebinas, pushed up with prosperous successes, began now by his insolence to despise Ptolemei himself, by whose means he was advanced to the kingdom. Whereupon Ptolemei reconciled himself to his sister Cleopatra, and endeavoured what in him lay, to ruin Alexander's kingdom, which he had never been able to obtain, had not Ptolemei sent him supplies out of his malice to Demetrius. To that end, he sent a very considerable force to Grypus, and professed his daughter Tryphena to him in marriage, that so he might draw several people to side with his son in law; not only because of the confederacy and association which had formerly been between them, but also by virtue of this his new relation and alliance, which proved accordingly: for when all saw how Grypus was furnished with as much strength as Egypt could levy, they began by degrees to fall off from Alexander, [Justin. lib. 39, cap. 2.]

Alexander, not being very confident of the multitude, both in regard of their rawness in martial affairs, as also their natural inconstancy, and hankering after innovations, would not adventure upon a pitched field: but having first collected the Kings Treasuries, and pillaged the Temples, resolved by night to steal away into Greece. But, whilst he attempted, by the help of some of his Barbarians, to plunder Jupiters Temple, he was seized upon, and himself and his whole army had like to have been cut off. But he soon escaped out of their hands, and made towards Seleucia: but the Seleucians having heard beforehand the bruit of his sacrilege, shut their gates against him: failing there of his purpose, he went to Pifidium, and never after departed from the sea coast, [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valefii, pag. 378.]

At length Antiochus Grypus, and Alexander Zebinas engaged in a fight, in which Alexander was worsted, and forced to escape to Antiochia. As soon as he came thither, being in distress for monies wherewith to discharge the soldiers pay, he gave order to take out of Jupiters Temple, the Statue of Victory which was of beaten gold, varnishing his sacrilege with a jest; for, said he, Jupiter hath lent me Victory. A few days after, having set his soldiers to pull down the Image of Jupiter himself, although so, as not to make any hubbub; yet he was surprized by the common people in the act, and forced to flee for it: Being in a grievous tempest at sea, and divided from his company, he fell amongst Pirates, who took him prisoner, and delivered him up to Grypus, by whom he was put to death, [Justin. lib. 39, cap. 2.] Josephus reports, That he was slain in a fight with Grypus, [lib. 13, cap. 17.] Porphyrius, That he poisoned himself upon discontent for the loss of his army, in the fourth year of the CLXIV Olympiad, [in Graec. Ensch. Scaliger, pag. 227.]

Cleopatra upon regret that her husband was likely to be somewhat impaired by the victory which her son Antiochus Grypus had obtained over Alexander Zebinas, presented him as he came ab exercitacione (an ab exercitacione) from the exercise, (or rather from the army) with a cup of poison. But Grypus, having had some intimation of the treachery before hand, pretended respect to his mother, desired her to drink first, and upon her refusal, urged her with much importunity. At last he charged her with the design of poisoning him, and sets before her the party that discovered it to him: telling her, That she had no other plea left for her innocence, than to drink her hell, what she had prepared for her son. The Queen was forced to yield, so that the her self perished by that same poison, which she had tempered for another. She being removed, Grypus was pretty fast seated in his Throne, enjoying an eight years peace, without any disturbance in State, [Justin. lib. 39, cap. 2, compared with Appian, in Syriac, pag. 132.]

The 27 Julic.

Lucius Opimius, Consul in the year in which C. Gracchus (brother to Tiberius Gracchus) the Tribune, was slain as he was encouraging the commons to sedition, the air was so temperate, that Pliny reports, how wines then made, lasted to his time, which was about 200 years, being brought to a form of candid honey, [Plin. lib. 14, cap. 4, and 14.] In the same year also there appeared a bow about the body of the Sun, [Id. lib. 2, cap. 29.]

Ptolemei Euergetes the II, or Physicon, died 29 years after the decease of his brother Philometor, [Ptolem. in Regum Canone, Clem. Alexandrin. lib. 1, Stromat. Ensch. Chronica, Epiphani. de Ponderib. & mensur. Hieronym. in cap. 9, Daniel.] He left behind him three sons. One was called Ptolemei Apion, a By-blow by a Harlot; to whom was bequeathed by his father in his Legacy, the kingdom of the Cyrenians, [Justin. lib. 39, cap. 5, cum Appiano in Mithridaticis, pag. 355.] The other two sons Cleopatra bare unto him, the daughter of the former Cleopatra, who was both his sister and wife: the younger of the two was called Alexander; but the Senior, by Ptolemei in Regum Canone, as also by Porphyrius, Eusebius, Hierome, and Epiphanius, called Soter; by Strabo, [lib. 17, pag. 795.] Trogus Pompeius, [Prolog. lib. 39, & 40.] Pliny, [lib. 2, cap. 67, & lib. 6, cap. 30.] Josephus, [lib. 13, cap. 18.] and Clemens Alexandrinus, [lib. 1, Stromat.] Laburus, or Labyrus, by Athenæus, [lib. 6, cap. 6.] and Paulinians in Atticis, Philometor: which last surname (viciously rendered Philopater by Natalis Comes who translated Athenæus) was given him by way of derision, as Paulinians hath observed: for never was there any of the Kings, that more hated his mother than he did, [Pausan. Attic, pag. 7.]

Physicon, upon his death-bed, left the kingdom of Egypt to Cleopatra his wife, and to one of the sons, whom he should make choice of. As it if were likely the State of Egypt should be more quiet, and free from commotions than the kingdom of Syria; when the mother by making choice of one of the sons, was sure to make the other her enemy, [Justin. lib. 39, cap. 3.] She, supposing that Alexander the younger son would prove more pliable and flexible to her commands, moved the Egyptians in his behalf: But seeing the could not prevail with the commons to receive him for their King, she was forced to elect her eldest son Lathurus (who was banished to Cyprus by his father upon her instigation;) They two reigned together in Egypt ten years, [Id. ibid. Pausan. in Atticis, pag. 7, 8. Porphyrius in Graec. Ensch. Scaliger, pag. 225.]

Cleopatra, before she would give the kingdom to Lathurus, took away his wife from him; and having forced him to divorce his most endeared sister Cleopatra, commanded him to marry the younger sister Selen: In which act, on the showed more partiality towards her daughter, than was befitting a mother, whilst she took away the husband from the one, and gave him to the other, [Justin. in Supra.]

After Antiochus Grypus had enjoyed to himself the kingdom of Syria 8 years entire without any interruption, up started his brother Antiochus of Cyzicenus as his rival in the kingdom; they both had the same mother, but Cyzicenus came by the Uncle Antiochus Sidetes: Grypus had a design of removing him by poison, which was the cause he appeared sooner in arms in competition for the kingdom than he thought to have done. This Antiochus was sent away by his mother Cleopatra (for fear of Demetrius Nicator her former husband whom she had forsaken) to Cyzicum, and was brought up by Craterus the Eunuch, and from thence received the surname Cyzicenus, [Justin. lib. 39, cap. 2.]

cap. 2. Apian. Syriac. p. 132. Porphy. in sup. p. 227. Joseph. lib. 13. c. 17. But Grypus hearing of his brothers levying of forces against him at Cyzicus, laid aside his intended expedition against the Jews, and prepared to meet him, [Josephus. ibid.]

Cleopatra, formerly the wife of Ptolemai Lathurus, but afterwards divorced from her husband by Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, as hath been said, was married to Antiochus Cyzicenus in Syria: who, that the might not seem at her marriage to bring to her husband the bare name of wife, trucked with the army which lay at Cyprus, and brought it over to her husband as her dowry. By the access of those forces, he thought himself to be upon pretty even terms with his brother, so that he gave him battle, but he was foiled in the field, and forced to fly away to Antioch. Grypus made after him to Antioch, and besieged it: Cleopatra the wife of Cyzicenus was in the Town: which as soon as taken, Tryphena, the wife of Grypus, commanded in the first place, that her sister Cleopatra should be fought for, not out of any mind she had to release her now she was prisoner, but lest she should chance to escape the miseries which commonly attend Captivity, who had invaded this kingdom chiefly out of emulation to her, and who by her espousals with the sworn enemy of her sister, had made her self her enemy also. Moreover, she laid to her charge, That she was the cause of bringing in the foreign forces, upon the differences betwixt the two brothers, and also, that upon her being divorced from her brother, she married out of the kingdom to one who was no Egyptian, contrary to her mothers will. But Grypus endeavoured what in him lay to save off his wife from her intended cruelty, and told her that it was against the law of arms, after victory obtained, to proceed violently against women, especially such as are allied in blood to us, as Cleopatra was, who was her own sister, his Cousin German, and Aunt to her own children. To these relations of blood he added the reverence which was due to the Temple, where she had taken Sanctuary, winding up all with this, That he should neither impair any thing of Cyzicenus his power, by putting her to death, nor advantage him if he should send her back to him inviolate. On the contrary, Tryphena, deeming these speeches to proceed from downright love rather than from pity and commiseration, sent some soldiers into the Temple, who killed Cleopatra, having first cut off her hands, as she embraced the image of the goddess, that no little hostility might appear to be betwixt the two sisters, than there was betwixt the brothers. [Justin. lib. 39. cap. 3.]

4601.

Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, the mother of these two sisters (in the fourth year of her reign) having made Alexander her younger son King of Cyprus, sent him thither in person, that by his means, she herself might seem more formidable to her eldest son Lathurus, who was her partner in the government of the kingdom, [Pausan. in Astic. pag. 75. 8. Porphy. in Grac. Euseb. p. 225.]

3892.

Alexander Jannæus, in the 16 year of his age, had by his wife Alexandra a son, called Hircanus, whom upon the tidings of Cæsars victory at Actium, H. rode put to death, when he had passed the age of 80 years, [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 9.] From whence we gather, that this Alexandra, called also Salian, by the Ecclesiastical Writers (as is above, the year of the World, 3862.) was not the same with that Salome, wife of Aristobolus, whom the Grecians call Alexandra; and who, after the decease of her husband, constituted this Alexander Jannæus, at that time 23 years old, King in his room, (for Josephus computes that he reigned 37 years, and lived 49) as is to be seen in Josephus, [lib. 13. cap. 20.]

Upon a second clash between the two brothers Antioch's, Cyzicenus and Grypus, Cyzicenus won the day, and withal, took Tryphena, Grypus his wife, prisoner; who a little before had killed her sister, &c. by serving her the same fate, sacrificed to the ghost of his wife. [Justin. lib. 39. cap. 3.] He chased his brother also out of his kingdom, and reigned over the Syrians in his room. [Apian. Syriac. pag. 132.] Grypus upon this his deprivation, withdrew to Alpendum, and from thence he took upon him the surname Alpendius. But Cyzicenus entered upon his kingdom the first year of 167 Olympiade. [Porphy. in Grac. Euseb. pag. 227.]

3893.

In the second year of the same Olympiade, Antiochus Grypus returned from Alpendum, and regained Syria, but Cyzicenus held Cœlolyria; so that the Empire was shared between them, [Id. ib.]

Antiochus Cyzicenus, as soon as he got into possession of the kingdom, applied himself to revellings and luxury, and courted altogether unbefitting Kings. For being extremely addicted to Anticks, Stage-players, and all sorts of juggling, he learned their arts with a great deal of vehemency: he applied himself also to Poppis-playing, and placed his chiefest delight in making the images of living creatures, in bulk five cubits, covered over with gold and silver, to move of themselves, and other Engines of that nature. Moreover, he was much addicted to unseasonable huntings, and often times would steal forth privately by night with a servant or two to hunt Boars, Lyons and Leopards. Many times he was in danger of his life, by his rash encountering with wild-beasts,

beasts. [Diodor. Sicul. lib. 35. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 385.] Concerning the luxury of the other brother Antiochus Grypus, see what Athenæus reports of him, [In lib. 5. cap. 9. lib. 12. cap. 19.] out of the 28 book of Pofidonius of Apamea his Histories.

The war, with which those two brothers were out one another, provided a great advantage to John Hircanus; for by this means he cutted the incomes and revenues of Judea, and had the convenience of horning up great sums of money in banco: so that, observing what pitifull havoc Cyzicenus made in his brothers Country, and how Grypus received no supplies out of Egypt to give him a check, but that he and his brother by their mutual encounters did receive many overthrows one from the other, in a while he began not to care a rush for either of them. [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 17.]

Hereupon he marched with his army against the Samaritans, who were under the dominion of the Kings of Syria, upon request of some injuries offered by them to the Marisites (were now Idumæans reduced but a little before under his command) farmers to the Jews, and in league with them. Having therefore besieged Samaria, a City very well fortified with a trench and double wall, for the space of 80 lurlongs, he left his sons, Antigonus and Aristobolus to manage the league: by whose plotting them to fast without, and by the famine raging within the Samaritans were driven to such extremity, that they were forced to feed upon such things, as were scarce means meat: and at the last, glad to beg assistance from Antiochus Cyzicenus. [Id. ibid. cap. 18.]

Cyzicenus coming as fast he could to relieve the Samaritans, was routed by Aristobolus his soldiery, and the two brothers pursued him so close at the heels as far as Scythopolis, that he hardly escaped. Upon which very day it is reported, that Hircanus the High Priest as he was alone offering incense in the Temple, heard a voice, relating unto him the late victory which his sons had obtained over Antiochus. After they had beaten Antiochus they returned back to Samaria, and forced the Samaritans to retreat within their walls, so that they were constrained once more to beg Antiochus his relief. [Id. ib.]

Antiochus Cyzicenus, with about 6000 soldiers, which Ptolemai Lathurus had sent him in spite of his mother Cleopatra's teeth (for he was not as yet depoyed by her) at the first stragled up and down Hircanus his dominions, plundering with his Egyptians, where so ere he came, not as yet daring to meet him in the field, being over-matched in strength, yet hoping by his pillaging of the Country he should draw off Hircanus from the siege of Samaria. But after he had lost many of his men by an ambuscado which the enemy had laid, he marched away to Tripolis, and committed the managing of the war with the Jews to two of his Commanders, Callimander and Epiphrates; of these, Callimander encountering the enemy with greater resolution than discretion, had his party routed, and himself was slain in the place. As for Epiphrates, it appears plainly, he betrayed Scythopolis, and some other Towns to the Jews, having been well greased in the fist for his pains: neither did he in any one particular advantage the distressed Samaritans, whilst he was in power: so that, Hircanus, after he had spent a full year about the reducing Samaria, not content with the bare surrender of the City, levelled it to the very ground, [Id. ibid.]

The Seleucians, who were seated near Antioch in Syria, having obtained a liberty of living after their own laws) make their computation from hence. [Fasti Siculi, anno 4 Olympiade 167.]

Hircanus of the sect of the Pharisees, (both a disciple and a great favourer of theirs) having invited some of the most eminent amongst them to a feast: took exception at one Eleazar, who confronted him with a false imputation, how that his mother, being taken prisoner in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, was fain to enter into service for a livelihood: and because the scandal was not to deeply reflected by the rest of the company, as he expected it should have been, he grew enraged against the whole sect of the Pharisees, by the instigation of Jonathan a Sadducee, and deserting the Pharisees, turned Sadducee. Now, the Pharisees commended to the people many traditions, which they received from their ancestors by hand, which are not found written amongst Moses his Laws. Therefore the Sadduces abrogated them, and invalidated their authority, saying, That those constitutions were only obligatory which are found in writing. And from hence arose the great contestation betwixt them both: whilst that the richer sort sided with the Sadduces, the Pharisees made use of the poplacy. Whereas therefore Hircanus would have punished some of the Pharisees, who were tenacious of their constitutions (notwithstanding, he had abrogated them) there arose a sedition amongst them: which although at that time he soon appeased, yet did both he and his sons thereby incur the odium of the common people. [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 18.]

103.

John Hircanus dyed, having executed the High Priests office 29 years, as Eusebius tells us out of Josephus, lib. 8. Demonstrat. Evangelic. cap. 2. and Hierom. translating him into Latin, repeats it in his commentaries upon the ninth Chapter of Daniel: all though in our books, and in the old translation of Rufinus, Josephus sometimes allows him 33 years. [as in lib. 1. Belli, cap. 3.] sometimes 31 years. [as in lib. 13. Antiquit. cap. 18. & lib. 20. cap. 8.] His Father Simon dyed in the 177 year of the kingdom of the Grecians, in the 11 month, Sabar, [1 Maccab. 16. 14.] about February, viz. of the 4579 year of the Julian Period. His wife Alexandra (as we shall see hereafter) decaated about November of the 4644 year of the Julian Period: There is 65 years and almost nine years difference: So that deducting that 37 years which Josephus affigges to the reign of his sons and his wife, there remains to Hircanus only 28 years, and about nine months.

Some of the Modern men are of opinion (but upon no good ground) that this John was the Writer of the first book of the Maccabees: giving out withall, that these words in the latter end of the book were added by some body else. Concerning the other thing of John, both of his wars, and his noble acts, wherein he behaved himself manfully, and of his building the walls, (viz. of Jerusalem, which demolished by command of Antiochus Sidetes) and of other of his deeds, behold they are written in the Chronicles of his Priesthood, from the time he was made High Priest after his father. Probably, in that fourth book of the Maccabees, which Sixtus Senensis in the end of the first book of his Bibliotheca Sanctæ avows, that he saw translated out of the Hebrew into Greek, in a Manuscript at Lyons, in Sontes Pagninus his Library amongst the Predicans, beginning after this manner: And after Simon was slain, John his son was made High Priest in his room. Out of which book it is supposed, that Josephus himself took his relation: who reckons up three special dignities which Hircanus held all at once, namely, the sovereign authority over the nation, the High Priesthood, and to be a Prophet: for he tells us, that by reason of his often conferences with God, he attained to so great a foresight of future contingencies, that he long fore-told the short enjoyment which his two eldest sons should have of the kingdom which their Father left them. [Josephus, lib. Belli, 2. cap. 3. & lib. 13. Antiquit. cap. 18.]

Concerning the Tower which Herod afterwards called Antonias Tower, built by him, and wherein he laid up the robe and the rest of the High Priests ornaments: thus the same Josephus writes in the 20 lib. of Antiquit. cap. 6. Hircanus, the first High Priest of that name, built a Tower near unto the Temple, and lived in it most part of his name. And because he kept in his own custody this High Priests robe, which no body used but himself, he put it off in that place, when he went to resume his ordinary apparel; which custom of his was observed by his sons also, and their posterity. After Hircanus his decease, the stones which were set in the High Priests breast-plate, and the Onyx stone upon his right shoulder, (by whose radiation the will of God was wont to be intimated to the people of the Jews) upon Gods displeasure for their prevarications and transgressing his laws, grew dimme and lost their lustre, as the same Author signifies, [lib. 3. Antiquit. cap. 9.] 300 years before he began to compose those his books, concerning the Jewish Antiquities, which as he in the close of that work declares, completed in the 13 year of Domitians Empire (that is in the 4807 year of the Julian Period).

Judas, eldest son of Hircanus, otherwise called Aristobolus, and surnamed Philotell (from his familiarity and commerce with the Greeks or the heathens) succeeded his father in the government and the High Priesthood, but he enjoyed them but for a year: and he was the first of any, who after the return from the captivity in Babylon, set the Crown upon his head, and reduced the State to a monarchy, [Joseph, lib. 1. Belli, cap. 3. Antiquit. lib. 13. cap. 16. & lib. 20. cap. 8.] Although Strabo hath writ, that his brother and successor Alexander, was the first that made himself King, [lib. 16. pag. 762.] making likely no account of Aristobolus in regard he lived so short a time after he had engrossed the sovereignty to himself.

Aristobolus advanced his second brother Antigonus, whom he affected far above the rest, to a partnership in the kingdom, but committed the other three, and kept them bound in prison. He cast his mother also into prison, who contended with him for the principality (for Hircanus had left her sovereign of all) and he proceeded to that height of cruelty, that he furnished her to death in the prison, [Joseph, lib. 1. Belli, cap. 3. & lib. 13. Antiquit. cap. 19.]

Cleopatra in Egypt being much troubled that her son Ptolemy (Lathurus) was joynted with her in the government of the Kingdom; stirred up the people against him. [Justin, lib. 39. cap. 4.] For having culled out from amongst her Eunuchs, such of whose loyalty and affection he was most confident he brought them into the publick assembly pitifully cut and slashed, charging Ptolemy, as if he had both tormented men to lie in wait for her, and also mangled and disfigured her Eunuchs. The Alexandrians were were so enraged at that spectacle, that they had like all of them to have fallen foul upon Ptolemy: but seeing he had conveyed himself privately away out of the danger, and taken shipping: they saluted Alexander King, who was returned from Cyprus, not very long after this accident fell out. [Pausan, in Asie, pag. 8.]

Before he was thus banished the kingdom, his mother Cleopatra had taken from him his wife Selene: the indignity was the greater, in regard that he had two sons by her, [Justin, lib. 39. cap. 4.] As for Alexander, who was called in by his mother, and made King of Egypt in his brothers room, he at that time reckoned upon the eighth year of his reign in Cyprus, and his mother upon the eleventh year of her reign in Egypt. [Porphy, in Græc. Ensch. Scaliger, pag. 225.] Athenæus [lib. 12. cap. 27.] notes how that Alexander grew at last every whit as fat and swagbely as his father Phylcon: where he brings in this passage concerning him, out of Polidonus Apamenus in the 47 book of his Histories. The King of Egypt out of favour with the commons, blinded with the insinuations and flatteries of his familiar acquaintance, and living in continual luxury, could not walk a step, unless he were supported by two men. But in the dancing which were usual at the Feasts, he would leap bare-foot from the higher beds, and move his body in dancing as nimbly and with as great activity as the bee.

Aristobolus marched with an army into Itruræa, and layed a great part of it to the confines of Judæa: forcing the inhabitants under penalty of banishment to admit of circumcision, and other Jewish ceremonies: which Strabo also confirms in these words out of Timagenes the Historian. He (Aristobolus) was an upright man, and one who drew on the Jews interest very much; for he enlarged their territories, and annexed part of Itruræa unto them, and made it sure under the covenant of circumcision, [Joseph, lib. 13. cap. 19.]

When Antigonus was upon his return from the wars in triumph, at what time the Jews held their solemn Feast of Tabernacles; It happened, that King Aristobolus fell sick and kept his bed in the tower which in after time was called Antonius tower: But his brother Antigonus, intending to be present at the holy solemnities, went up to the Temple very gloriously attired; but the main end of his going thither was, his devotion for the sick Kings recovery. Aristobolus having been advised by some pickthinks (who meant no good to Antigonus) that he should beware of his brother who had a design upon him, placed some of his guard in a dark vault under ground near the tower, commanding them, that if his brother came unarmed, no one should dare to meddle with him; but if otherwise, they should fall upon him and slay him: yet did he send underhand, one to desire him not to come with his armies. But Salome the Queen, and the rest of Antigonus his back-friends, persuaded the messenger to deliver unto him a clean contrary errand, and to tell him, that the King had a great mind to see him as then he was, in his warriors garb: By chance, one Judas of the sect of the Essens, a person famous amongst them for prognostications of future contingencies, had foretold, that Antigonus should die that very day in Stratos tower: nor knowing that there was any other Stratos tower besides that which afterwards was called the Clearean tower, and was distant from Jerusalem 600 furlongs. When therefore he espied Antigonus going up to the Temple on that day, he wished he might die immediately, fearing least thereby, he might be proved a false impostour, who hitherto had the repute of a true Prophet. But presently after, Judas heard that Antigonus was killed in that afore said place under ground, which was called by the same name of Stratos tower, as was that other Clearean upon the sea coast, [Joseph, lib. 1. Belli, cap. 3. & lib. 13. Antiquit. cap. 19.]

Aristobolus his dissembler, upon remorse for his horrid murdering his brother, grew worse and worse, and at last his pains were so violent, that he vomited blood. As one of his servants was carrying forth the blood to empty, it happened, that his foot slipped, so that he spilt Aristobolus his blood upon the very same place which was stained with Antigonus his gore. Aristobolus, having notice given him of the accident, acknowledged the just judgement of God therein, and immediately gave up the ghost, in extreme anguish both of body and mind. [Id. ibid.]

After Aristobolus his decease, his wife Salome (whom the Grecians call Alexandra) released his brothers whom he had kept prisoners a long while, and made Alexander Jannæus King, in regard he was both elder than any of the rest, and did also exceed them in modesty. Who as soon as he was possessed of the kingdom, put one of his brothers to death, upon discovery of some treasonable design against him; But he expressed a great deal of civility to the other, who contented himself to live a retired life, and at ease, [Joseph, lib. 13. cap. 20.] He was called Abolom, and was taken prisoner at Hircanias by Pompey 42 years after, [Id. lib. 14. cap. 8.]

Alexander Jannæus, having ordered the affairs of the kingdom in such wise as seemed most behooful to himself, marched with an army against Ptolemais: and having won the field, he forced the enemy to retreat within the walls, and then besieged them and made his batteries. At the same time, the two brothers Philometor or Grypus, and Cyzicus in Syria, weakening one another's strength by their mutual encounters between themselves, minded not the extremity the Ptolemaians were in. Zolius a Tyrant, who, observing the dissensions between the two Brothers, took an opportunity to seize upon Straton's Tower and Dora, stood the besieged in some stead, but it was very inconsiderable. Ptolemus, Lathurus thrown out of the kingdom of Egypt, by his mother Cleopatra, possessed himself of Cyprus. To him the Ptolemaians made their addresses by their Ambassadors, beseeching him, that he would come and rescue them from the danger they were in by Alexander. Upon their engagements, that as soon as he was entered Syria, he should have the Gazzeans, and the Ptolemaians on his side, Zolius also, and the Sidonians, and many other assistants, encouraged by the their fair promises, he prepared for the voyage. [Id. ibid.]

In the mean time Demetrius, a person popular, and of eminent authority, persuaded the Ptolemaians, to alter their resolutions; telling them, That they had better undergo the uncertain chance of war with the Jews, wherein happily they might get the better, than to submit to a certain bondage by calling in a Lord over them: and moreover, thereby not only undergo the brunt of the present war, but also they were to expect another from Egypt. Cleopatra would not sit still, and suffer Ptolemai to glean up forces from the parts adjacent, but would quickly be upon her march, with a strong power to hinder his levies; for the Queen endeavoured to drive him out of Cyprus also. [Id. ibid.] Neither did his conjecture fail him in this particular: for Cleopatra, after she had banished her son, did not rest satisfied in that, but persecuted him up and down with war, and not only chased him out of Cyprus, but killed the General of her own army, for that he let him escape, when he had taken him prisoner. Although Ptolemai did not quit the Island, because he thought himself not able to match her in power, but because he was ashamed to engage against his mother in a war, if we will credit Justin herein. [lib. 39. cap. 4.]

Ptolemai therefore, although he had heard upon the way, that the Ptolemaians had changed their minds, yet he failed forwards; and arriving at Sycaminum, he landed his forces there, which consisted of about 30000 Horse and Foot. From thence he marched to Ptolemais with all his force, and encamped there: but when he saw the Ptolemaians would neither admit of his Legates into the Town, nor hear them so much as speak, he was put into a great perplexity: but after that Zolius and the Gazzeans were come to him, desiring his assistance against the Jews, and Alexander who pillaged their Country, the siege of Ptolemais was raised for fear of Ptolemai. [J. Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 20.]

Alexander Jannæus, having lead home his army, began to play tricks, calling in Cleopatra privately against Ptolemai, but in public professing him his Friend and Allye. He promised him also 400 talents of silver, if in lieu thereof, he for his sake would remove Zolius the Tyrant, and give his Country to the Jews. Ptolemai very willingly took up the bargain with him, but when he saw afterwards, how that Alexander took underhand with his mother Cleopatra, he broke off the league which he had made with him. [Id. ibid.]

When the Senate had given leave to Marius (who was upon an expedition against the Cimbrians) to demand supplies from the nations beyond the seas: he wrote to Nicomedes King of Bithynia to that effect: Nicomedes replied, That the Bithinians were most of them carried away, and kept slaves by the custom-gatherers in several places: whereupon there issued out a decree from the Senate, prohibiting any free man of the Allies of the people of Rome to serve as slaves, in any province; with further order given to the governors of the provinces to set them at liberty, where any such were forced. [Diodorus Siculus, lib. 38. in Bibliotheca, Photii, cod. 244.]

This Decree of the Senate at the first promulgation of it, was duly and strictly observed; but afterwards neglected by Licinius Nerva, Pretor of Sicily, which occasioned the second servile war in Sicily, in which the revolvers made one Salvius, a fourthayer, and a mistress, their King, whom afterwards they called Tryphon. [Id. ib. cum Dion., in Excerptis Valesij, pag. 633, 634.]

C. Marius, and C. Flaccus (or rather Flavius, being Consuls, about three of the clock, there was a defect of light in the sun. [Jal. Obsequens, de prodigijs.] Which almost totall Eclipse of the sun the Astronomical calculation counts unto as happening in this 4610 year of the Julian Period, on the 19 day of July.

The Alcalonites (having obtained to be a free State) compute the time thereof from hence, as hath been noted in the Sicilian Chronicles, at the CLXIX Olympiad, which agrees the Chronicle of Eusebius, in which the 380 year of their account is joined with the second year of Probus the Emperour, falling in with the 4990 year of the Julian Period.

Ptolemai Lathurus, leaving his Commanders with a Brigade of his army, to besiege Ptolemais, which had shut her gates against him, who also at last won the City; marched away himself with the residue of his Forces against Judea, to pillage and reduce it. Alexander Jannæus having received intelligence of his coming, carried out of his own Dominions about 50 (some Writers rather think 80) thousand men, and thus provided, marched to meet him. But Ptolemai, coming unawares on the Sabbath day upon Aloschia City of Galilee, stormed it, and took it: and carried away with him about 10000 prisoners, besides other great booties. Next he fell upon Zephoris not far distant from Aloschia; having lost many men before the place, he drew off, to encounter with Alexander Jannæus, whom he met at the River Jordan over against Alosphos, not far situate from the River. As for Alexander, he had 5000 which were wont to fight in the Van bearing Targets of Brass, whom he called Hecatonotomachi: These were faced by Ptolemus Van, who used Targets of Brass likewise. They were formed by Ptolemaeus, a person skilful in ordering martial affairs, to pass over the River, where the Jews were encamped. The victory for a while was banded from one side to the other: but at last, Ptolemai's souldiers routed the Jews; and in the pursuit did execution on them so long, that their armies were wearied, and the edge of their swords blunted. It is said, that 30 thousand, (or as Timagenes hath computed in his writings 50000) Jews fell in that battle: all the other being either taken prisoners, or escaped by flight. As for Ptolemai, when after the victory he had roved all the day about the Country, at even retreated into some of the villages belonging to the Jews: which, when he saw they were thronged with women and children, he commanded his souldiers to fall on, and to slay them promiscuously, and after they had chopped them in pieces, to cast them into scalding cauldrons, to the end, that those which had escaped out of the fight, might believe that the enemy fed on mans flesh, and so might thereby become more dreadful and formidable to the beholders. This piece of cruelty, both Strabo and Nicholas Damascenus recite in their Histories. [J. Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 20, 21.]

Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, observing how her son Lathurus his power increased every day, by his subduing the City of the Gazzeans, and his uncontrolled plunderings in the Jews Country: held it small policy to let him go on as he did; especially when as he played most about the entrance into Egypt, and gaped after that kingdom: wherefore to check him, the forthwith raised forces both for sea and land: entrusting Chelcias and Ananias with the command of them, Jews both, and sons of that Onias who built the Temple in the Signiory of Alexandria. [Id. ibid. cap. 18. & 21.] For, that the Queen did all things by the advice of those two favourites, Josephus confirms, by this testimony taken out of the History of Strabo the Cappadocian. Most of those which entered Cyprus with us at the first, and of those also who afterwards were sent thither by Cleopatra, revolted presently to Ptolemai [Lathurus]. Only those Jews which were of Onias his side remained constant in their loyalty, in regard that their country-men Chelcias and Ananias, were in high esteem with the Queen.

Cleopatra, having deposited a considerable part of her wealth in the Island Cous, where also she left her grandchildren and her last will and testament: ordered Ptolemai Alexanders son, to arrive at Phenicia with a great Fleet, and upon the countries revolt, and flocking in to her, came to Ptolemais; but being denied entrance, she resolved to storm it. In the mean while, it happened that Chelcias one of her chief Commanders died, as he was in the pursuit of Lathurus about Cælophrya: as for Lathurus he quitted Syria, and made what haste he could to get into Egypt, supposing that the Garrison there were all drayned by Cleopatra, and so fancying to himself fair hopes of surprizing them unawares; but he found it otherwise. [J. Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 21.]

The Egætan and Lilybetane fugitives in Sicilia, created themselves a King, one Athenio, a shepherd, a Cilician by birth, who feigned that the gods by the stars had intimated unto him, how that he should be King of all Sicily; and that therefore it behooved him to favour the Country, and to spare the cartell and fruits therein as his own. Notwithstanding all this, as soon as Tryphon sent for him, he submitted himself to him as King, contenting himself with the Generals place of the army under him. [Diodorus Siculus, lib. 26. ut sup. compared with Cicero in Verr. lib. 2. with Florus, lib. 3. Hist. cap. 19. and with Dion. in Excerptis Valesij, pag. 637.]

Cleopatra, hearing of her son Lathurus his endeavours, and how his attempts upon Egypt had not succeeded to his hearts wish, sent a Brigade of her army thither, and chased him clean out of the Country. And now he, being once more driven out of Egypt, spent the following Winter at Gaza. [J. Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 21.]

In the mean while Cleopatra won Ptolemais, with its Garrison: Thither repaired unto her Alexander Jannæus, with presents in his hands; who was entertained by her after such manner, as was befiting one that had been oppressed by Lathurus, and had no other refuge to betake himself unto. And when certain of the Queens favourites would have persuaded her to seize upon that Country also, and not to suffer such a number of good Jews to lie at the beck of one single person: Ananias advised the contrary: telling her, what a high piece of injustice it would be, for her to strip a man of his fortunes, who was both her fellow-warrior, and the kinsman of Ananias himself: for if he did so, he would in short time, by offering injury to Alexander, lose the affections of the whole Nation of the Jews. Cleopatra followed his counsels, and did not only at that time refrain from doing him any injury, but shortly after, renewed the League which was formerly betwixt them at Scythopolis a City of Cœlœlyria, [Id. ibid.]

Alexander Jannæus being now secured from the fear he had of some imminent danger from Ptolemy Lathurus, undertook an expedition into Cœlœlyria, and besieged Gadara, [Id. ibid.]

L. Licinius Lucullus, being sent by the Senate against the slaves that had revolted, came into Sicily with an army 17 thousand strong, consisting of Italians, Bithynians, Thessalonians, Acarnans, and Lucans. Athenio the Cilician marched out to meet him with 40 thousand men: who having lost 40 thousand of his men, slain outright, and being himself desperately wounded, yet made a shift to escape, by lurking amongst the dead carcases, [Diodor. Sicul. ut sup.]

The Jews and the Arabians infested Syria with robberies by land: The Cilicians occasioned a war at sea, by their piracy, which the Romans waged in Cilicia by Antonius, [Prolog. lib. 39. Fregi.] Marcus Antonius (the Orator, grandfather of M. Antonius the triumvir) at that time Prætor, sent to that war instead of the Consul, and staying at Athens many days, in regard it was bad failing, heard Mælarachus, Carnæades, and Menædemus, 3 most learned men disputing there, as he did afterwards Metrodorus Scepius in Asia. Then being come unto the Province by the assistance of the Byzantians he encountered the pirates with good success: in the engagement he lost M. Gratiudius his Admiral, [Cicero in lib. 1. & 2. de Oratore, & in Bruto. Liv. lib. 68. Corn. Tacit. lib. 12.] To which that passage of Julius Obsequens, about the consulship of C. Marcus, and Q. Lucullus, is to be referred. The Pirates in Sicily (lege Cilicia) were vanquished by the Romans: and another passage in lib. 68. of Livies Epitome: Antonius the Prætor in Sicily (it must be read Cilicia, as in the former citation) chased the Pirates at sea. From whom also he read in triumph, as Pighius tells us in the third tome of his Annals at the DCII year Urbius (of the City) about the end.

The fourth Calippick Period begins. Alexander Jannæus took Gadara after he had spent ten months in the siege, [Jep. lib. 13. cap. 22.]

Matius and Catulus, being Consuls, — Archias the Poet of Antiochias, who afterwards described the Mithridatic war in Greek Verse (and many of whose Epigrams are extant in the Greek Anthology) came to Rome: where he had the chief hand both in Ciceros first applying himself to any studies; and also in putting him into a method, [Cicero, pro Archia, Poeta.]

C. Marius, though in a posture ready to fight the Cimbrians in Gaul, delayed the engagement, pretending how that by the advice of certain Oracles, he did only lie at catch for a convenient time and place for a victory: For he carried about with him in a Litter a certain Syrian woman, called Marthas who was reported to have skill in prophesying: He had her in great reverence, and never sacrificed but upon her intimation. She had formerly been with the Senate to treat of those matters, and foretold what should happen, but the Senate put her by, and would not vouchsafe her an hearing, [Plutarch in Marium.]

Next upon the same time, Battaces, or Batabaces, Priest of the great Mother Idea, came to Rome from Pessinunt in Phrygia; and coming into the Senate, he told them, he was commanded thither by his Goddessa with tidings of a great victory which should happen to the people of Rome, and the high renown they should get in a war: adding withal, that the religious rites of the Goddessa were profaned, and therefore publick expiation ought to be made of them at Rome. He brought also along with him a garment, and other ornaments of the body, new, and such as were never seen by any Roman before that time: he brought also a golden Crown of an unusual bulk, and a long Robe interwoven with flowers, and gilded, all very glorious and royal. After he had made a speech to the people from the Orators pleading desk, and persuaded them to receive his superstitious worship, he was entertained at the publick places of receipt for strangers: but was prohibited by Aulus Pompeius Tribune of the people, to bring his Crown with him: Being by the other Tribune brought unto the Court, and questioned concerning the expiation of the Temple; he returned a very superstitious answer. As for Pompeius, after he had called him an hedge-priest, and an

Impostor, and driven him out of the Court, dissolved the assembly and went home, where he fell suddenly sick of a violent fever: so that soon after he became speechless, and was most grievously tormented with the ignamy; and upon the third day (or as others, the seventh day) he died. All which some interpret to have happened unto him by a divine providence, for the indignity and injury he offered to the Priest, and to the goddessa herself: For the Romans were naturally inclined to superstitions. Thence it was, that Battaces in his holy duties, was treated so magnificently by the men and women, and that when he left Rome, he was attended out of Town in such great pomp. [Id. ibid. & Diodorus Siculus, lib. 36. in Photii B. Bibliotheca, cod. 244.]

A servant belonging to Servilius Cæpio, gelding himself for the worth of Mother Idæa, was transported over seas, and never to return back again to Rome. [Julius Obsequens ut supra.]

Alexander Jannæus wan Amathus the best fortified Castle of any near Jordan; where Theodorus, Zenon (son, deposited what ever things he had in highest estimation. But Theodorus, coming suddenly upon him, recovered what he had lost, & flayed Alexanders carriages, and slew ten thousand Jews. But Alexander, as soon as he had recounted his losses, set upon the Countries along that sea coast, took Raphia, and Amhedon, which Herod afterwards named Agrippias. [Joseph. lib. 1. Belli, cap. 3. lib. 13. Antiquit. cap. 21.]

Manius Aquilius, the Colleague of C. Marius, in his fifth Consulship, was sent as General against Athenio the Cilician, who after the decæle of Tryphon, was made King of the Ronagades in Sicily: He behaved himself gallantly in the service, that he got a most famous conquest over the Rebels: For he encountered with their King Athenio himself, and at last, got the better of him. Whilst the soldiery strived amongst themselves, whose prisoner he should be, he was torn in pieces by them in the contest. [Diodor. Sicul. ut sup. Florus, lib. 3. cap. 19.]

Ptolemy Lathurus quitted Gaza, and returned again to Cyprus, and his mother Cleopatra into Egypt. [Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 21.] whose hard usage of Lathurus frightened her young sonne Alexander to far, as that it occasioned him to leave him, preferring a secure and safe life before an hazardous kingdom. Wherefore Cleopatra, fearing lest her eldest sonne Lathurus might procure Antiochus Cyzineus his helping hand towards the recovery of Egypt, dispatched away supplies to Antiochus Grypus, and sent unto him also Selene (Lathurus his wife) to be married to the enemy of her former husband: and called back, by her Ambassadors, her son Alexander into the kingdom. [Josephus lib. 39. cap. 4.] And this was the ground of their civil wars which arose betwixt the Kings of Syria, which Livy recites in lib. 68.

That the Fugitives in Sicily were all put to the sword in several battles, in the time of C. Marius, and Lucius Valerius, Consuls, Julius Obsequens notes in his little Book de prodigiis: For Aquilius the Proconsul pursued the remainder of the Fugitives (ten thousand whereof yet were left) until he had reduced them all under his power, and thereby put an end to the second servile war, after it had continued almost four years. [Diodorus Siculus, ut supra.] In which wars Athenæus gives up a tally of ten hundred thousand slaves that were lost. [Id. lib. 6. cap. 7.]

C. Marius, then the sixth time Consul, chiefly by the assistance of L. Apuleius Saturninus, tribune of the people, banished Q. Metellus Numidius, who came to Rhodes, and there addicted himself to the studies of philosophy, and was at leisure to read Anthonrs, and hear the discourses of the most eminent scholars. [Cicero in Pison & pro Sextio. Livie, lib. 69. Plutarch, in Mario. Appian. Belli, Civil. lib. 1. pag. 367, 369.]

Ambassadors came to Rome from Mithridates with a good round sum of money, with hopes of corrupting the Senate therewith. Saturninus, Tribune of the people, a sworn enemy to the whole order of Senators, taking notice thereof, and supposing that he had them now on the hip, bespattered the Embassie, with reproaches and obloquies. The Ambassadors called him in question for this, and so muffled him by the instigation of the Senators, who clapped them on the back, and promised them their helping hand. Saturninus was in great danger of his head for this his violating the Ambassadors, whose privileges the Romans always held in a most religious esteem: But the people did not only rescue him in this extremity, but also declared him again Tribune of the people. [Diodorus Siculus, Legat. 34.] Yet that incendiary being engaged in a fresh mutiny, was slain therein, this very year of C. Marius, (now the sixteenth) and Valerius Flaccus Consuls. [Cicero in 3 Philippica, & pro Rabirio. Appian. Belli, Civil. lib. 1. pag. 369, 360. Oros. lib. 5. cap. 17.]

When as in every assembly, for the space of two whole years together, Q. Metellus his restoring from banishment was taken into debate: Q. Metellus his son traversed the market-place, having his beard and hair over-grown, and in a nasty garment; where with tears in his eyes, he prostrated himself to the Citizens, beseeching them to recall his father home again. The people, although they would by no means put the banishment in hopes of returning, by doing any thing on their behalf, which was contrary to law, yet in compassion to the young man, and being moved with the importunity of his entreaties, they recalled Q. Metellus from banishment, and gave to his son the surname of Pius, for his singular affection and care he had of his father. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valef. p. 390.] Yet Aurelius Victor, in his book de viris Illustribus, cap. 62, writes, how that the father, (viz. Q. Metellus) being banished to Smyrna, and recalled home by the Calidian law, when the letters to that purpose were brought unto him, as he sat accidentally in the theatre beholding the palports, he would not vouchsafe to read them, until such time that the show was over.

C. Marius, not brooking to look Metellus in the face after his return home, failed into Cappadocia and Galatia, pretending a piece of devotion, in which he stood engaged to the Great Mother Idæa, but in very deed to raile and foment new wars: and to bring his design about, he thought good to egg forward Mithridates (by whom he was received with all civility and respect, and who at that time, as it appears plainly, was busy about taking up arms) with these words: Either endeavour, O King to put your self into such a condition that you may be too hard for the Romans, or else quietly submit unto their commands. This saying amazed the King, as one who often heard of the name, but never till now of the freedom of the Roman tongue, so vent what it pleased. [Plutarch in Mario.]

Alexander Jannæus, being enraged against the Gazæans, because they had called in Ptolemy Lathurus to their assistance against him, both assaulted their City, and wasted the Country. In the mean time Apollodorus, Commander of the Gazæans, with 2000 mercenaries, and 10000 which he armed out of the Townsmen, rallied forth by night into the Jews Camp; and whilst it was a night-fight, the Gazæans had the better of it, the enemy supposing that Ptolemy was come to their relief: but as soon as day-break, and the truth of the business appeared, the Jews rallied forth into a body, and falling upon the Townsmen with all their might and main, killed about 1000 of them: yet for all this, and though victuals also grew scarce, would not they stoop to a resignation of themselves, but were ready to undergo any hardship, rather than they would be brought under the power of the enemy. Aretas also, King of the Arabians, bare up their spirits a while, by giving out, and putting them in hopes (though in vain) of some great matters he would do for them. [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 21.]

Lyfimachus, envying the great favour his brother Apollodorus was in amongst the Gazæans, killed him, and then drawing together a band of souldiers, delivered up the City to Alexander Jannæus; who at first marched in very calmly, but presently after let loose the souldiers to fall upon the Townsmen, to kill and slay without controul. The Gazæans indeed lay slaughtered in every street; yet did they not dye unrevengeed, but struggling with their assailants, killed as many of the Jews: but others of them quitted their houses, and let them on fire, to prevent the enemies plunder; others killed their wives & their children with their own hands, that they might not be led away into captivity. The Senators, 500 in number, had retired themselves into Apollo's Temple; for it happened that at that very time, that the enemy was let into the City, a Senate was held there. But Alexander cut the throats of them all, and after he had dismantled the City, returned back to Jerusalem, a year after his drawing up his forces to block up Gaza. [Id. ibid.]

At the very same time also Antiochus Grypus was put out of the way by the treachery of Hetradeon, having lived 45 years, and reigned 29. [Id. ibid.] or rather 26, as it is read in Porphyrium his fragment; eleven of those 26 years, he reigned alone the other 15, joynt partner with Cyzicenus. He dyed in the fourth year of the CLXXOlympiade. [In Grec. Ensch. Scalig. pag. 227.] Grypus left behind him five sons, the first Seleucus, whom Josephus will have to succeed his father, the second and third twins, by Tryphæna, daughter to Ptolemy Phylcon, King of Egypt, Antiochus and Philip; the fourth Demetrius Encernus; the fifth, another (named Dionysus).

To Mithridates Eupator, King of Pontus, was born a son, called Pharnaces, who lived fifty years. [Appian. in Mithridate, pag. 254.]

Cn. Domitius and C. Cassius being Consuls, Ptolemy King of the Cyrenians (Phylcon's son by a Curetan) dyed, and left the people of Rome his heir. [Liv. lib. 70. 9. 9. Obseques de prodigijs, Cassiodorus in Chronica.] The Cities of that kingdom were enfranchised by a decree of the Senate, as Livy testifies, although Plutarch in Lucullus shews, how that the Cyrenians soon after were miserably harrowed with continuall usurpations and wars.

Anna the Prophetesse, daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Aser, being married, lived with her husband seven years from her virginity. [Luc. 2. 36.]

Tigranes, son of Tigranes who was delivered up to the Parthians, as hostage, was restored by them into his fathers kingdom of Armenia, upon their receipt of 70 portions of free land of his Country, as a gratuity. [Sirabo, lib. 11. pag. 532. Joseph. lib. 38. cap. 3. Appian. in Syriac. pag. 118.] as is gathered out of the 25 year of his reign, mention whereof will be made hereafter out of Plutarch Lucullus, at the year of the World, 3934.

Q. Mutius Scævola, being sent Proconful into Asia, made choice of his most intimate friend, P. Rutilius Rufus for his Legate, (whom Pomponius in D. de orig. juris, erroneously makes the Proconful of Asia) and used his advice and counsel in managing the affairs of the province, and making laws: he also had a great hand in restraining the injuries and exactions of the Publicans, who did extremely oppress those of that province: For as often as any who had been pinched by those toll-gatherers, made their address unto him, he condemned them wheresoever he came, by upright Judges, purposely commissioned, and delivered over the parties condemned to the persons whom they had injured, to be by them confined to prison. Moreover, by his discharging both his own expences, and the expences of his retinue, out of his own private purse, he soon inclined the hearts of all in the province towards the people of Rome. [Cicero, lib. 2. de oratore. Diodorus Siculus, in Excerptis Valef. pag. 393, 394.]

Seleucus, son of Antiochus Grypus, having gotten together a considerable force, marched against his Uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus. Cyzicenus came with his army from Antiochus, and gave him battle, but was overcome: and being by his horse's running away with him, hurried into the enemies Camp, seeing no possibility of getting off again, slew himself, after he had reigned 18 years: And Seleucus having won the kingdom, retreated to Antioch. [Porphyry, in Grec. Ensch. pag. 227.] Josephus relates, how that Cyzicenus was taken prisoner in the fight by Seleucus, and afterwards put to death. [lib. 13. cap. 21.] But Trogus, that he dyed in the battle which was fought betwixt him and Grypus his sons. [lib. 40. Prolog.]

Cn. Domitius, and C. Cælius being Consuls, a Decree of the Senate came forth, whereby all persons were prohibited to lend any money to the Cretians. [Africanus, Pedianus in argument. orat. pro C. Cornelio.] See ann. Mundi 3935. out of Dion.

Q. Mutius Scævola, having held the government of Asia not above nine months, for fear he should be chargeable to the Exchequer, resigned that honour. [Cicero ad Atticum, lib. 5. epist. 17. cum Ascenio Pediano in orat. Cicero, contra L. Pisonem.] The while he held his employment in Asia, so uprightly and so stoutly did he manage it, that the Senate ever after by their decree propounded Scævola's administrations as a model and form to be imitated by all those that should succeed in that province. [Valer. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. 15.] The Grecians also inserted in their Calendar a festival day, in honour of him, which the Asian called Mutia. [Ascen. Pedian. in 3^{um} contra Verrem, & Divisionem contra eundem] concerning which Cicero thus, in Verrem 2^{da}, Mithridates in Asia, whereas he was Master of all the whole Province did not put down the Mutia, although he was not only an enemy, but such an enemy, as was too violent and cruel in other matters, yet would he not violate the honour of the man, which was hallowed with the ceremonies of the gods.

Yet was his Legate Publius Rutilius Rufus, a person of high innocence, who had joined with him in vindicating Asia from the exactions and injuries of the Publicans, called in question as a receiver of bribes, by a factious party of the Gentry, (which he with the Proconful had punished for acting exorbitantly, in gathering the rents.) But he was of such an entire trust, and innocence, that from the day that his accusers set to implead him, to the cognizance of the cause, he neither let his beard or his hair grow, nor put on an unsavoury garment, nor laid aside his Senators robes, nor cringed to his adversaries, nor inclined the Judges: neither when the Pætor had granted him leave to make his apology, did he make a speech which might seem to be laden with (such a spirit as would become every good man, whose chance it is to be laden with calumnies, and who rather putty the case of the Common-wealth, than his own condemnation) or let a word drop from his mouth, which might seem to derogate from the splendour of his fore-past years. [Liv. lib. 70. Ascen. Pedian. in Divisionem contra Verrem. Valer. Maxim. lib. 6. cap. 4. Dio. in Excerpt. Valef. pag. 637. Oros. lib. 5. cap. 17.] Concerning whom, M. Cicero in his first Dialogue de oratore, speaks thus, Seeing that man was the very pattern of innocence, and not one person in the whole City of greater integrity or sanctimony: he would not only not petition the Judges favour, but would not so much as offer his advocates to plead his cause with greater flourishes and amplifications, than the bare account of the truth it self would permit: some few particulars of his defence, he put over to Cæsar, an eloquent man, and his his sisters son. Q. Marius also pleaded some thing on his behalf, after his old manner, without any flourish, plainly and clearly. And in Bruto. At what time, that most innocent person was called to trial (by which judgement we know the Common-wealth to have been spoiled) although there were then in the City, those two eloquent men, L. Crassus, and M. Antonius; yet would he not entertain either of them for his advocate: But he pleaded his own cause himself, and C. Cotta spoke some few things, in regard he was his sisters son, who though but a youth, yet shewed he himself an Orator. Q. Marius, also spoke in Court, clearly indeed and smoothly, as he always did, yet not with such ardour and volubility, as that kind of process, and the greatness of the cause required.

And thus the Centry of Rome, having by the virtue of the Gracchian laws gotten into their hands the power of sitting in Judgement, condemned (to the great grief of the City) Rutilius, a person not only surpassing any of his time, but any that ever lived, upon the act of bribery, [Vellei. Patenculi, lib. 2.] No looner was sentence past upon him, and an estimate made in money of what he stood charged in Court, but he forthwith parted with all he had; whereby he evidenced, that he was altogether clear from the crime objected against him. For all he could rap and rend, came not near to so much, as his accusers said he got in Asia by his extortion: and every particular of his estate was by him shewed to have been conveyed unto him upon just and lawful titles. The envy of this mans condemnation, fell upon C. Marius, to whom his virtue was a great eye-sore: which was the reason that Rutilius, not liking the carriage of things in the City, not enduring to live and converse any longer with such a fellow as Marius, left his Country of his own accord, and went into Asia, and lived there an exile at Mitylene, [Diogenes, ut. sup. pag. 657, 658.] And whenas one of his friends thought to have comforted him and cheered him up in his banishment, by telling him, That civil wars would shortly break forth, and then all the banished might return home. What injury (said he) did I ever to you, that you should wish me a worse return home, than I had going into banishment? I had rather that my Country should blush at my banishment, than grieve at my return home, [Seneca, in beneficiis, lib. 6. cap. 37.] His banishment did no whit impair his former glory and wealth: for all the Cities of Asia sent their Embassadors to wait upon him: And not only Q. Murius, but whatever Cities and Kings had formerly been beholding unto him for any courtesy, sent unto him very many presents: so that now, in respect of wealth, he was in a far better condition, than ever he was before his banishment, [Plater. Maxim. lib. 2. cap. 10. Dio ut. sup. pag. 638.]

391. Antiochus Eusebes, or Pius, son of Antiochus Cyzicus, having, by the means of a Curtezan who fell in love with him for the comeliness of his person, escaped a plot which Seleucus his Cousin German had laid for him (although the Syrians ascribe his preservation to the merit of his piety, for which he got the surname Eusebes) came to Aradus, and having set a Crown upon his head, commenced a war against Seleucus, to whom in one battle he gave so great an overthrow, that he never after was able to stand in the field: but was chased out of all Syria, [Ioseph. lib. 13. cap. 21. Appian, in Syriac, pag. 133.]

Seleucus, fleeing into Cilicia, after he had been a while received by the Mopisestians, began to exact Tribute of them; but they took that his exaction so ill at his hands, that they set fire on his Palace, and burnt both him and his friends, [Ioseph. ibid.] That he was burnt in the common place of exercise in regard he had carried himself so, beyond all measure, violently and tyrannically, Appian relates, [pag. 132.] That he was burnt alive by Antiochus Cyzicus his son, Eusebius in Chronico: but Porphyrus writes, That after he had betaken himself to the City, and perceived that the Mopisestians had a design to burn him alive, that he laid violent hands on himself, [ut. sup. pag. 227.]

The two Seleuci twins, Antiochus and Philippus, drew up their Forces against Mopisestians and took it, and levelled it even to the ground, in revenge of their brothers death: which was no looner done, but Antiochus Pius, son of Cyzicus came upon them on the sudden, and discomfited them. As for Antiochus, he fleeing on horseback out of the battle, and attempting to get over the River Oreutes, was drowned in the stream. But his brother Philip (to whom Scaliger attributes a Coyne to belong, which did bear this Inscription: ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΕΥΕΡΓΕΤΗΣ ΤΩΝ ΑΙΔΑΡΑΒΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ) and Antiochus Pius, beginning their reigns together from the third year of the CLXXI. Olympiade, and having both of them considerable Forces, contested between themselves which of them two should be sole Lord of all Syria, [Porphyr. ut. sup. pag. 227.]

392. Ptolemei Lathurus, having sent for Demetrius Eucærus, fourth son of Antiochus Grypus from Cnidus, made him King of Damascus. Antiochus Pius joining his Forces with his brother Philips, opposed him very valiantly for a while, [Ioseph. lib. 13. cap. 21.] But at length, Antiochus was worsted, and forced to flee for refuge to

593. When as Mithridates King of Pontus had seized Cappadocia, having made away both the sons which the King of the Cappadocians (son of that Ariarathes, which died in the war against Aristonicus, and of another Laodice, of whom formerly) had by his sister Laodice: he reigned up the kingdom to his own son but 8 years of age, to whom he gave the name of Ariarathes, appointing Gordius for his Guardian. Nicomedes Philopator, King of Bithynia, being somewhat jealous, having now gotten Cappadocia, he might happily attempt to invade Bithynia which bordered upon it, tuborned a youth marvellous handsome, as if Ariarathes had had three, and not only two sons, who was to be a petitioner to the Senate about the restoring him to his fathers kingdom. He sent also his wife Laodice (Mithridates his sister, who after the decease of her former husband Ariarathes, was married to Nicomedes) to Rome to testify, that Ariarathes had three sons. As soon as Mithridates had notice hereof, he also with the like impudence, dispatched Gordius to Rome, whole errand was to avouch to the Senate, how that the youth to whom he had delivered the kingdom of Cappadocia, was descended from that Ariarathes, who in the war of Aristonicus, had brought supplies to the Romans, and died in the service, [Justin. lib. 38. cap. 3. 2.]

The Queen of the Galatens waged war with the Parthians. Iosephus writes, how that Antiochus Pius, Cyzicus his son, being called to her assistance, behaved himself gallantly, but had the mischance to miscarry in the fight: so that after his decease, the kingdom of Syria remained in the power of the two brothers, Grypus his sons: Philip, and Demetrius Eucærus, [lib. 13. cap. 21.] Whereas Eusebius in Chronico terminates the reign of Seleucus his race in the two years, which he attributes to Philip Grypus his son. But seeing that after this time Appian in the end of his Syriac teacheth us, that both Antiochus Pius was driven out of his kingdom by Tygranes; and Iosephus, that Philip also with his two brothers, Demetrius Eucærus, and Antiochus Dionysius, waged war with the Kings of Damascus, and possessed themselves of the kingdom of Syria, [lib. 13. cap. 22. & 23.] It seems more probable, that Antiochus Pius, being returned from the Parthians (to whom Porphyrus and Eusebius confirm, that he went not against his enemies, but as to a Sanctuary and Refuge for himself) recovered that part of Syria which Philip had usurped for the space of two years: and that Philip to repair that loss, contested with his two brothers, Demetrius and Antiochus, about the joyning of the kingdom of Damascus to his Principality, (which commotions between the Kings of Syria, seem to be those which Livy hath described in his 70 book) and claimed to himself all the remaining parts of Syria, which were not in the hand of Cyzicus his son. The Syrians being at last quite wearied out with the various skirmishes which Philip had, sometimes with Antiochus Pius, sometimes with his brothers, for the space of eight years together, they deserted the Seleucian; and as Justin shewes in themselves under the command of Tigranes King of Armenia; as Justin shewes in the beginning of his 40 book. And as for that surname of Pius, which was given to Antiochus Appian (in the forecited place) is of opinion, that it was given him in derision by the Syrians; because he had married Selene, which had formerly been the wife both of his father Cyzicus, and his Uncle Grypus: and therefore plainly testifies, That he was by the just judgement of God, thrown out of the kingdom by Tigranes.

The Senate of Rome, being well acquainted with the endeavours of the two Asiatic Kings, and their design to steal away other mens kingdoms by obtruding false titles; took Cappadocia away from Mithridates, and to cheer him up, Paphlagonia from Nicomedes: And because it might perchance be thought a disparagement to deprive those two Kings of that, which they were resolved to give away unto themselves: the Senate made both people a free State. But the Cappadocians relished this proffered liberty, and sending Embassadors to Rome, told them, That it was utterly impossible for them to live without a King: The Romans wondering thereat, gave them leave to elect a King out of their own body: so Ariobarzanes was made King, [Justin. lib. 38. cap. 2. Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 946.] The Romans, having renounced Gordius, whom Mithridates had commended unto them, [Justin. lib. 38. cap. 5.]

594. L. Cornelius Sylla, after his Praetorship was expired, (which as Velleius Paterculus intimates in a lib of his History, he discharged the year before L. Caesar, and P. Rutilius were Consuls) being appointed over Cilicia, was sent Embassador into Cappadocia; his expedition was blocked with the specious pretence of settling Ariobarzanes the new elect in his kingdom: but the true occasion of his going thither, was to crush Mithridates his designs, whose head was full of plots. Sylla brought no great force with him thither, but by means of the Allies who readily proffered their service, he flew a great company of the Cappadocians, but a far greater number of the Armenians, who came to assist Gordius; threw out Gordius himself, with the new obtruded young King

King Ariarathes, to whom Gordius was assigned Governour by Mithridates) and proclaimed Ariobarzanes King, according to the decree of the Senate, Mithridates laying not one word all the while against it. [Livie, lib. 70, Plutarch in Sylla, Appian, in Mithridatic, pag. 208. & lib. 1. Bell. Civill. pag. 396.]

The Parthian Ambassadors came to Sylla, from their King Artaces, to increat amity with the people of Rome. [Livie, lib. 70, Sextus Rufus, in Breviario.] There never being before that any correspondence held between those two nations, Orobarus the Parthian had the chief managing of the Embassy; who, meeting with Sylla, residing about Ephraim, Sylla is said to have called three Seats to be placed, one for Ariobarzanes, another for Orobarus, and a third for himself, so fearing himself in the midst betwixt them both, he gave audience to the Ambassadors; wherefore the Parthian King shortly after put Orobarus to death: Others gave out, that he slew Sylla, as if he had exposed the Barbarians to open derision; whilst others exclaimed against him, as being an arrogant person, and one who had discovered his ambition very unseasonably. It is recorded also, how that a certain Chalcidian of Orobarus his retinue; after he had viewed Sylla's countenance, and very curiously observed the temper, bent and motions, both of his mind and body, and examined his disposition by the wiles of art, declared openly, That it was impossible, but Sylla must needs come to be some great man ere long; and that he wondered extremely, that he himself could endure to make a stand where he was, and not already to be head of all. [Plut. in Sylla, compared with Velleius Paterculus, lib. 2, cap. 24.]

No sooner was Sylla returned home to Rome, but Cenforinus impeached him of bribery, as one who against law had taken a great sum of money of a kingdom in friendship and amity with the Romans: but he did not prosecute the accusation, but let it fall. [Plutarch, ibid.]

Mithridates inveigled Tigranes, King of Armenia, (not dreaming that the Romans would take any exception thereat) to side with him in the war which he had been a long while hammering out against the Romans; persuading him by Gordius to engage in war, Ariobarzanes, whom the Romans had set as King over the Cappadocians; bribing him in the ear, as if he were but a dull fellow, and such an one, who had neither spirit nor life in him at all: And to seem to play fair play, he professed him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage. [Justin, lib. 38, cap. 3.]

Mithridates, and Bagoas, Tigranes his Commanders, having driven out Ariobarzanes, who upon their first approach, took up bag and baggage, and made what haste he could towards Rome, placed Ariarathes in the kingdom: and so by Tigranes his assistance, Cappadocia began again to be under Mithridates jurisdiction. [Id. ib. Appian, in Mithridatic, pag. 176.]

At the same time, Nicomedes Philopator, being deceased, the Senate of Rome made his son Nicomedes, whom Nita, (a common dancer, as Mithridates in Justin, lib. 38, cap. 5, calls her) bore unto him, King of Bithynia. Mithridates sent his elder brother Socrates; who also himself was called Nicomedes, and surname Chrestus, or the Thrifty, against him with an army, who, after he had beaten out his brother, seized upon the kingdom himself. [Justin, ibid. Appian, pag. 176. & 178. Admon in Excerptis Photii, cap. 32.]

Nicomedes, then dejected of his kingdom, made his humble addresses to Rome: whereupon it was decreed in the Senate, that both he and Ariobarzanes should be restored into their kingdoms. To effect this, Embassadors were presently dispatched away: Manius Aquilius (who quelled the servile war in Sicily) and Malthus, or (as it is read in the MS) Marcus Alutius [Justin & Appian, ut supra.] Lucius Cassius also, who held Asia Pergamena, with a small army, and Mithridates himself was ordered to assist them. But Mithridates sat still, and helped them not, because that the siege of Cappadocia was then in dispute, and the Romans had taken away Phrygia from him. [Appian, ibid, pag. 176, 177.] but put them off with a long story of his grievances, and shewing the Ambassadors at what favours he had been at, both upon publick and private accounts. [Id. Leg. 1. 30. in edit. Græcæ, vol. 31, in Græcæ latinæ.] Although he himself in an oration of his, which Trogus Pompeius hath put upon the file, affirms, that both his son was turned out of Cappadocia, which by the law of nations appertaineth to him, as Conqueror; and also that he had slain Chrestus, King of Bithynia, in favour to the Romans. [Justin, lib. 38, cap. 5.]

Mithridates, resolving ere long to encounter the Romans, engaged Tigranes in his quarrel, upon mutual covenant, That Mithridates should have the Cities and the fields for his share, and Tigranes, the people and the plunder. And Mithridates, understanding well enough how great a task he had undertaken, sent his Ambassadors abroad, soliciting assistance: some he sent to the Cimmericians, other to the Gallogrecians, to the Sarmatians, and the Bactrians; for, by his presents and favours, he had made sure of every one of those nations before hand, when his designe of engaging the Romans came came first into his head. He commanded also an army to repair to him out of Scythia. [Justin, lib. 38, cap. 3.] All those which inhabit Tanais and Ister, and the lake Maeotis, being ready at his beck. He sent also into Egypt and Syria, to draw the Kings thence into an association with him. He had already 200 ships with decks, and builded more every day, having sent for Masters and Pilots out of Phœnicia and Egypt. He had also his fathers kingdom which was twenty thousand furlongs in length: he drew also to his side with him, many of the adjacent Countries, and amongst the rest the Colchian warlike Nation, [Appian, in Mithridatic, pag. 178, 180.] He was seized also of that Country which is bounded with the River Halys as far as Amaltrix, and some parts of Paphlagonia: Moreover he annexed to his Dominions, the Sea coast towards the West, unto Heraclea: and on the other side, he laid unto Pontus, all the Country betwixt that and Colchis; and Armenia the lesser, [Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 540, 541.] Aulus Gellius writes how that he had twenty five Nations which did homage unto him as subjects, [lib. 17, cap. 17.] Valerius Maximus 22. [lib. 8, cap. 7.] So Quinctilianus, [lib. 11, cap. 2.] Pliny, [lib. 7, cap. 24, & lib. 25, cap. 2.] and that he was thoroughly skilled in every one of their several languages, so well, that he never used any Interpreter, whensoever he had occasion to speak with the people. We read also in Sextus Aurelius Victor, his book de viris illustribus, cap. 76, how that he could speak 22 several languages: although in this place for 22. the Manuscripts compute fifty.

As soon as the Roman Legates with Cassius his soldiers and some other supplies leaved out of Galatia and Phrygia, had re-introned Nicomedes in Bithynia, and Ariobarzanes in Cappadocia; they presently advised them both, by their often incursions, to pester Mithridates his Country which bordered upon them, thereby seeking occasion of a quarrel, upon confidence of the assistance they were like to find in case Mithridates should relent the provocation. Yet had neither of them so much spirit, as to dare to provoke so potent a neighbour, by downright acts of hostility. But the Legates importuning Nicomedes (who upon covenant was engaged in deep fumes of money to the General and Legates themselves for his restitution, and in other fumes of money, which he had taken up upon interest of the Romans in Asia, which was now called in) he was forced at this pinch, though much against his will, to make his incursions into Mithridates his Dominions: so that he destroyed and pillaged the Country as far as the City Amaltrix, without the least controule or check from any body. For Mithridates, though he was sufficiently provided at this time, yet did he decline to fight, and suffered the enemy to range at pleasure; that so all the World might see, that he did not commence the war against the Romans, but upon many, and those very just, grounds, [Appian, Mithridatic, pag. 177, cum Liv. lib. 74, & Dion. Legat. 30, vol. 31.] Of which insolencies of the Romans Salust (in the 4 book of his History) brings him in thus, complaining in an Epistle of his to Artaces. For why should I name myself, who being on every side by Kingdoms and Principalities divided from their Empire, because it was reported that I was rich, and resolved against their service; they provoked by the war of Nicomedes, that was prior to their wickedness, and testified before the Kings; that afterwards ensued, &c.

As soon as Nicomedes was returned home with his rich booty, Mithridates sent Pelopidas the Oratour to the Roman Generals and Legates (knowing well enough that Nicomedes did what he did by their abetting and instigation) to expostulate with them concerning the injuries and violencies offered unto him by Nicomedes. And when as Nicomedes his Embassadors laid all the blame upon Mithridates, is giving the first occasion of those his proceedings: The Romans replied, That they were neither well pleased that Nicomedes should any wayes molest Mithridates; neither would they suffer Mithridates to right himself by waging war with Nicomedes. Mithridates receiving no better satisfaction, but rather conceiving himself plainly baffled by the Romans, sent his son Ariarathes with a great host to seize upon the Kingdom of Cappadocia: who soon beat out Ariobarzanes, and reigned himself in his stead, [Appian, in Mithridatic, pag. 179, compared with Livie, lib. 76, and 77. Eutrop. lib. 5, and Orosius, lib. 6, cap. 2.] Malthus also, or M. Alutius, the Roman Legate, was dejected there at the same time, [Justin, lib. 38, cap. 4.]

Mithridates sent his Agents to Rome, to desire the Romans, that if they accounted Nicomedes their friend, that they would either persuade him, or else compel him whether he would or no, to do what was just and right: But if they held him an enemy, that they then would give him leave to avenge himself of him. The Romans did not only not gratify him in any one particular demanded, but proceeded to threaten him, if he did not straightwayes resign back Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and conclude a peace with Nicomedes: They commanded also his Embassadors to depart the Town the same day, laying a strict prohibition upon him, that unless he submitted to their injunctions, junctions and did accordingly, he should never send Ambassadors again to Rome.

In the mean time, Mithridates dispatched away Pelopidas to the Roman Generals, whose errand was to acquaint them, how that he had sent some Ambassadors to complain of them to the Senate, and therefore warned them to be present, to justify their actions; and that they should not dare to begin, or act, any thing, until they had received a decree from the Senate and people of Rome, to authorize them. This founded something harsh and insolent, whereupon they enjoyed Mithridates not to meddle with them; and he sent the quiet Cappadocia: for they would themselves take care to see Ariarathes restored to his Kingdom. Pelopidas then charged him forthwith to depart the Camp, and never to return, but upon the Kings exhortation, of what was commanded: with this answer was he dismissed, yet not without a convoy, in case he should attempt to corrupt any by the way. Appian.

The Roman Generals (not flaying for the determination of the Senate and the people, concerning this so great war) prefently drew up their forces, out of Bithinia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Gallagracia; and to those L. Cassius his army, which he kept for the securing of Asia, joined themselves. They put their forces into severall divisions. Cassius pitched about the confines of Bithinia, and Galatia. Manius Aquilius had his brigade to make good the passage, by which Mithridates was to enter Bithynia. Q. Oppius lay in the borders of Cappadocia, each of them had 40000 Foot and Horse. They had a fleet alio riding about Byzantium; Minutius Rufus, and C. Popilius being Admirals, to keep the entrance into Pontus. Nicomedes alio sent 50000 Foot, and 6000 Horse to their assistance. [Idem.]

Mithridates had in his own army 250 thousand Foot, and 40 thousand Horse, 300 ships with decks, 100 Gallies with two oars on a bank, and other preparations unanswerable to so numerous an army. Neoptolemus and Archelaus, two brothers, had the command of these forces, the King himself also took the charge of many things on his own person. Amongst the auxiliaries, Archathias, Mithridates' son, brought 10000 Horse out of Armenia the Isfer: Dorylaus was over the Phalanges of foot (armed cap a pe) Craterus had the command of 230 Chariots with Sithes. ^[Ibid.]

As soon as Nicomedes and Mithridates his Generals (for he was not there himself) discovered each other in the Campaigns near the river Arminia, they presently put their bodies in batallio: Nicomedes all the men that were his, Neoptolemus and Archelaus, only their light harnessed Foot, Arctachis his Horse, and some Chariots, for the Phalanx consisting of 8000 men, was not yet come up, but was upon the march. The victory kept not constant to one side, but sometimes one, sometimes the other had the better still at last Mithridates his Commanders (though their foldiers were far inferior in number) with their Chariots armed with Sithes, did so mow the enemy as that it is not to be believed how many were slain in the place, Nicomedes himself was forced to flye, with his company, in Paphlagonia; so that the enemies Campaigning defeated, the plunder and the monies fell to the Conquerours. [Id. compared with Atkinson, cap. 33, and Strabo lib. 12, pag. 562.]

Nicomedes thus chaled out of the field, pitched near the place where Manius Aquilius lay, with his brigade. Mithridates got upon the mountain Scoroba, which divide the Bithynians and the Ponticks. He sent out 100 Horse of Sarmatians, as his Scouts, who lighting upon 800 of Nicomedes Horse, took some of their prisoners. Neopolumus and Nemanes an Armenian, having upon his first entrance to the Village Pachæus, about seven hours after the fight, overtaken Manius Aquilius, as he was drawing off his forces, (when Nicomedes was gone to Caffius) forced him to fight, having at that time with him 4000 Horse, and ten times as many Foot, whereof 10000 were slain outright, and 3000 taken prisoner. As for Aquilius himself, after this disaster, he made as fast as he could towards the river Sangarius, and by night got over, and to escaped to Pergamus. [Appian, compared with Livy, lib. 77. 2]

Cassius, Nicomedes and all the Roman Legates, removed their Camps, and marched to Leontopoclea, the best fortified Cattle in all Phrygia : where they exercised a company of fresh-water soldiers, which they had raked together from amongst the stragglers, husbandmen, and the scum of the people, and made a new muster of Phrygians also : but seeing that all of them seemed backward to their service, they dismissed them all, and retreated thence. Cassius marched away with his forces to Apamea, Nicomedes to Pergamus, and Aquilius towards Rhodes. As for the soldiers thereof were brought to those that were fit to keep the entrance into Pontus, they did prize themselves, having delivered the inlets of Pontus and Nicomedes his ships, as a reward to Mithridates. [Appian.]

Mithridates sent all the prisoners: he had taken in this war home, with provision in their [in] places; hoping by that act of Clemency, to get the good opinion of his enemies. [ix.] This mild passage was to cryed up every where, that all the Cities generally came flocking to him, and fided with him; in such wise, that Ambassadors came to him to all Cities, inviting him by their publick decrees, to come into them; calling him their god and deliverer. And upon notice of the Kings approach, the people came huddling out of the severall Cities, in white garments, to salute him and received him with great joy and acclamation. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. capli. pag. 401.] The Titles of honour which they conferred upon him, were to noble and to high, that they suited not with one that was but a mortal man, they called him their God, and implored his assistance. [Athen. lib. 5. cap. 11.] their Lord, Father, Prefectur of Asia, Evius, Dionylus, Nylius, Bromus, Bacchus, [Cicero. pro Flacco.] And why the Title of Bacchus was given above all the rest, Plutarch gives the reason in the fifth book of his Symposiaca.

Mithridates hereupon, (Nicomedes having flattered for himself, and withdrawn into Italy) at his very first coming, seized upon all Bithynia, so that he had nothing else to do there, but to ride in circuit from City to City, to fettle and compile things, and put them in order. [Memnon, cap. 33. Liv. lib. 76. & 77. Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 502. Appian, pag. 183.] From thence he marched with a confederate army into Phrygia, a province belonging to the people of Rome, [Liv. lib. 77.] where he took up the lame quarters to lodge in, which Alexander formerly had done: taking it for a very happy Omen, that it should fall out for Mithridates, to lodge at night where Alexander himself had taken a nap. And to he ran over all Phrygia, Myria, and Asia, provinces but barely fallen to the Romans, as far as Caria and Lycia. [Appian, pag. 182.]

316. Mithridates, having sent his Commanders round about, subdued Lycia, Pamphylia, and other places as far as Ionia. [Appian, pag. 184.] he invaded Paphlagonia, and drove out thence Pylcemen the King, who was a confederate of the people of Rome. [Eutrop. lib. 5. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 2. compared with Appian in Mithridatic, pag. 209.]

The Athenians sent an Ambassadeur to Mithridates, one Athenio, (son by an Egyptian slave, to Athenio the Peripatetic (who being after the decease of his Master left him, and enrolled a free denizen of Athens, took upon himself the name of Arition, and taught young boys Rhetoric, and the Peripatetic Philosophy) He had no sooner shuffed himself into the list of the Kings favorites, but he forthwith solicited them by his letters, to new inventions in State. [Athenus, lib. 5, cap. 10, & 11. Ex Posidoni Apamini Historia.] He was a petion compounded of impudency and cruelties, and one, who had as it were tacked the kennel of Mithridates his vices, and picked out the most vile of them for his own imitation. [Plutarch, in Sylla, and his transcriber Dio, in Valeſii Excerptis, pag. 649.]

Mithridates, having promised security and protection to the Laodiceans, inhabiting near the river Lycus, to whom Q. Oppio, Proconsul of Pamphylia had retreated with his Horse and Mercenary soldiers, upon condition that they should deliver Oppius up into his hands: they dismissed the Mercenaries indeed; but as for Oppius, they brought him to Mithridates, ordering the licitors to go beyond the river Lycus, and the daces received him in their hands, and carried him off about him whither/ever he pleased, leaving himself extremely in this, that he had taken a Roman General prisoner. Livie, lib. 78. Atheniens ut supra, cap. 11. Appian, pag. 184. l.

Mithridates his party, [weeping all before them in Asia as they went, without control, all the Cities strangely revolting from the Romans : the Leblans resolved not only to yield up themselves to the Kings but to deliver up Aquilius also unto him, who flew away to Mitilene, and lay there, to be cured of a distile. Whereupon they sent to his lodgings, a company of choice youths, stout and resolute : who came rushing into the room where Aquilius was, and took him and bound him, supposing that he would be a most rare present, and very acceptable to Mithridates. [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerptis Valisii, pag. 401.] together with Aquilius the Mytlenians, delivered other prisoners to Mithridates.

The King carried Aquilius (who had been the chief promoter of the Embarasse, and the prime author in this war) bound upon an Ase, whitherloever he went, and forced him with his own mans hands, to proclaim to the lookers on, that he was Manius Aquilius: And the fame Manius, coupled to one Baifarnes, a tall fellow, five cubits in stature, was sometimes led on foot in a chain, by a Troupier. At last after he had been scourged, and put upon the Rack at Pergamus, Mithridates commanded melted gold to be poured down his throat: in exprobration of the Romans corruption and bribery, [Athenas & Appian, ut supra. compared with Cicero in Orat. pro lege Manilia, & lib. 5. Infulan. quest. Liv. lib. 78. and with Pliny lib. 33. cap. 3.]

The King, after he had appointed Governors of the several places he had subdued, went to Magnesia, Ephesus, and Mitylene; and finding a cheery welcome amongst them all. The Ephesians upon his coming, took down all the Statues of the Romans which they had set up amongst them, [Appian.]

Mithridates Generals, received of the Cities with favour and good liking, found amongst them a good bank of gold and silver, which the former Kings had hoarded up, and a good provision for war: by this he thought himself sufficiently stocked, so that he forgave the Cities their arrears both public and private, and a release of tribute or taxes for the space of five years, [Justin, lib. 38. cap. 3.] In revenge of the injuries done unto me, drive Nicomedes out of Bithynia; recovered Asia, King Antiochus his spoils, and eased Greece of that heavy burden under which it groaned: [says he of himself, in an Epistle of his to Atalces. lib. 4. Hiflor. Salust.]

Mithridates, upon his return from out of Ionia, took Stratoneia, set a fine upon it, and placed a Garrison in it; where, casting his eye upon a very beautiful Virgin, called Monima, Philopomeas his daughter, he took her along with him, and put her amongst his women: But as for the Magnetics, he continued the war with them and with the Paphlagonians, and with the Lycians also, because they made some resistance, and would not suffer him to lay his Garrison amongst them, [Appian.] In which dispute the Magnetics about the mountain Sipylus, wounded Archelaus Mithridates his General, who lay pillaging upon their borders, and slew many of his men, [Pausanias in Atticis, pag. 18.]

Cleopatra the Egyptian Queen, thinking by some secret plot to have circumvented her son Alexander, and to have worked his overthrow; was taken her self by him, and put to death. Neither was she ever a whit to be pitied, who had played such notable pranks, as to drive her own mother from her marriage-bed, made her two daughters widows, by forcing them to barter their husbands; engaged in war against one of her sons, and never till she had banished him: and for the other, deprived him of his kingdom, and after plotted his destruction, [Justin, lib. 39. cap. 4. compared with Pausanias in Atticis, pag. 8. with Athenas, lib. 12. cap. 27. and with Eusebius in Chronico.] Yet he had reigned, together with his mother, 8 years, [Porphy. in Greek. Euseb. Scaliger, pag. 225.]

As soon as ever it came to be known, that Cleopatra was slain by her son Alexander, the people presently were in an uproar; which made Alexander shift away from himself: After whose withdrawing, the Alexandrians dispatched away Embassadors to Cyprus to Ptolemy Lathurus the elder brother, and delivered up the kingdom of Egypt unto him: who held it for the space of 8 years (or as Porphyrius hath more exactly computed the time) 7 years and 6 months, [Justin, lib. 39. cap. 5. Pausan. Porphy. & Euseb. ut supra.]

Anna the Prophetess, daughter of Phanuel (her husband being deceased, a widow) went not out of the Temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day for 84 years together, until such time as the law Christ himself in the Temple, [Luc. 11. 37.]

The Italians which had revolted from the Romans, sent unto Mithridates, to solicit him to march with his Forces into Italy against the Romans; for by that means it would prove no great piece of business for their united Forces to shatter the Roman power. Mithridates replied: That he was resolved to march into Italy, but not until such time he had completed his Conquest over Asia, with which his hands were now full. The Italians upon Mithridates his refusal of associating at present, began to despair, and grew quite out of heart: whereby it came to pass, that the war with the confederates, or the Marian war, was laid asleep, [Diodor. Sicul. in Bibliotheca, Photi, ood. 244.] In which, amongst the supplies sent unto the Romans from foreign parts (mentioned by Livy in his 72 book) there were sent from the Heraclots of Pontus, two galleys with four oars on a bank; whereof Memnon makes mention in his History of them, [cap. 31.] And on the Italian side, amongst others, Agamemnon the Cilician Pirate appeared, [of whom Diodor. Siculus speaks in Excerpt. Valefi, pag. 398. and P. Orosius, in lib. 5. cap. 18.]

Mithridates, finding how that the Citizens of Rome which were dispersed thorough the Cities of Asia were an hindrance, to the accomplishing of his design, sent private letters from Ephestus to the Governors, and Magistrates of the Cities, giving order to them, that they should all of them upon the same 30 day, let upon the Roman and Italian sojourners, with their wives, children, and all other free-borne inmates of the Italian Race, kill them, and let them lie unburied: One moiety of their goods were to go to the Kings, the other to the assassins. He threatened also by a common cryer, to lay a fine upon any that should dare to bury any of the slain, or should conceal any of

of them that had escaped the massacre: propounding a reward to those that should discover them; engaging to a slave his liberty, if he would murder his Master, and to the debtour one half of his debt, to kill his Creditor. Their instructions being privately sent to all of them; when the day appointed was come, it is not possible to express or compute in words, what a multitude of Roman Citizens were massacred at that time, in what a sad condition most of the Provinces were in: how pitiful a plaint there was compounded either to betray his innocent guests and friends, or they themselves were compelled to the penalty and fine imposed upon those that should secure them, [Appian, in Mithridaticis, pag. 185. 206. 209. 212. compared with Cicero, in Orat. pro lege Manilia, & pro Flacco, and with Memnon in Excerpt. cap. 33. with Livy, lib. 78. with Velleio Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 18. with Flor. lib. 3. cap. 5. with Euseb. lib. 5. and Orosius, lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Then the Ephesians dragged such as had taken sanctuary in Dianas Temple, from the very embraces of their shrines, and put them to the sword: the Pergamenians in their quarters, struck them through with darts, as they clung to the flames in the Temple of Esculapius, whither they had flown for succour, when as they could not by any means be persuaded to come forth. The Adramytiens killed them with their children in the waters as they attempted to swim over sea: the Carians (who after the conquest gotten over Antiochus, were assigned over to the Rhodians, and a little before, restored by the Senate to their privileges, hated the Italians (who had escaped to the sacred Court of that City) from the very Altars; and after they had slain the infants before their mothers eyes, proceeded in the same cruelty against them, and last of all, put their husbands to the sword, [Appian, ut supra, pag. 185.] The Trallians indeed flew not one man with their own hands but (to avoid the scandal of imbruing themselves in the blood of such as had put themselves under their roofs) hired a bloody fellow, one Theophilus, a Paphlagonian to do the task: who acted to savagely, that he shut them up in the Temple of concord, and then fell upon them with his sword, cutting off their hands, as they embraced the statues, [Id. ibid. compared with Dion, in Excerptis Valefi, pag. 642.]

P. Rutilius Rutilus, a person who had been Consul, living in banishment amongst the Mitylenians, escaped the Kings fury against all Gown men, by taking upon him the Philosophers buskin and mantle, [Cicero, pro. C. Rubinio Posthumo.] So that the fiction of Theophrastus the Mitylemian (he that wrote the affairs of Pompey the great) is not at all to be credited; who reported, how that in the fort Korus, which was taken by Pompei, there was, amongst other precious secrets of King Mithridates his, found an oration of Rutilius his making, whereby he put the King upon this cruel massacre of the Romans, [Plutarch in Pompeio.] For other Romans besides Rutilius, were put to this shift of changing their garb, the better to escape the danger which was at that time so imminent, [Athena, lib. 5. cap. 11.] The floating Islands, Calamiz, in Lydia, saved many of the Citizens lives, [Plin. lib. 2. cap. 95.] yet for all that, there was slain in that one day fourscore thousand of them, [Memnon, cap. 33. Valer. Maxim. lib. 9. cap. 2.] and not 150, as the tally is given up by Plutarch, [in Sylla] and by Dion, who trode in his steps, [Legat. 36. vel. 37.]

Mithridates waited over into Cous, where he found a party willing to receive him; the Coians presented unto him the son of that Alexander, who had reigned in Egypt formerly (who was called also Alexander) whom his grandmother Cleopatra had left in Cous, with a great stock of monies: he received him at their hands, and brought him up like a Kings son, and he was well supplied out of Cleopatras treasures with wealth, exquisite jewels, made by the Artificers, Jewels, all things belonging to womens dresses, and a great herd of monies, all which he sent away unto Pontus, [Appian, in Mithridaticis, pag. 186. 252. 253. & Bell. Civil. lib. 1. pag. 414.] Josephus from the books of Strabo his Histories avoweth, how that Mithridates (besides those treasures belonging to Cleopatra) carried away with him 800 talents of the Jews money; which he supposed was deposited by the Jews in Asia in that Island, out of fear of the Mithridatick war, and that that money was designed for the Temple of Jerusalem, [lib. 14. cap. 12.]

Alexander, the father of the foresaid young Alexander, in the 19 year of his reign in Egypt: (on Cyprus 26.) was kyled in a sea fight by the Egyptians, Tyrrus, one of the Blood-Royal being Admiral: in such manner, that he was forced with his wife and daughter, to flye to Myra; a City in Lycia: from whence, as he was bending his course towards Cyprus, he was encountered by Chares, a sea Captain, and was slain. [Porphy. in Grec. Eusebius, Scaliger, pag. 225.]

Athenio, or Ariftio, Ambassadour, upon his return home to the Athenians out of Asia from Mithridates, was driven by tempest to Caryllia in Eubæa, to teach him thence thence the Athenians sent some long ships, and a chaire supported with silver feet: the greatest part of the City running out of town to salute him. He had no sooner got the power of the City into his own hands, but he acted the Tyrant; either killing those that favoured the Romans, or else delivering them up to Mithridates. Many, to avoid their falling into his clutches, escaped to Amisus, a Colony of the Athenians in Asia, and were received into the City, [Pollidionis, Apameus, apud Athenienses, lib. 5, cap. 11, compared with Plutarch in Lucullo, and with Pausanias in Attica, pag. 18.]

Whatsoever Italians escaped out of Asia, found a sanctuary at Rhodes, and amongst those was L. Cassius the Proconsul of Asia. The Rhodians fortified their Walls, and Ports, and placed their Engins: some Teimiffians and Lycians affording their assistance. Upon Mithridates drawing near with his Fleet, they pulled down the Suburbs, that they might not be as a shelter to the enemy, or serviceable to them; and put their ships into a posture of fighting, some in the front, others on the sides, [Appian.] The Rhodians were over-matched in nothing but in the number of ships: in all other things they had the odds by far: as being the better Pilots, knew better how to order their ships, ply the oars, had the more sprightly fouldiers, the more expert and valorous Commanders: When as on the contrary, the Cappadocians were but fresh-water fouldiers, seldom exercised at sea fights, and which commonly proves the bane of all, did all tumultuously and without any order, [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 402.]

The Cappadocians being now ready to engage with the enemy at sea in the presence and eye of their King, desired to approve their loyalty and affections unto him; and seeing that their advantage lay only in that their ships were more in number than theirs, they enleavoured all they could to surpise and intercept the enemies Fleet, [Diod. Sicul. ibid.] But at length, Damagoras the Admiral of the Rhodians Fleet, after Sun-set, with six ships fell upon 25 of the Kings: two of which he sank, and forced other two to flee into Lycia: and lo having spent the night at sea, returned back again. In this encounter, one of the Chian ships, an associate, in the route fell foul upon Mithridates his ship as he was encouraging his fouldiers: so that the King himself had like to have fallen into the enemies hands, for which he afterwards punished the Master and Pilot, and was displeased with all the Chians. After this, as Mithridates his land Forces were upon sail to him out of Asia, in ships and gallees, a sudden storm drove them upon Rhodes. The Rhodians fell upon them as they were disordered and dispersed by the tempest; boarded some of them, sank others, and fired other one: and brought away 400 prisoners. At last Mithridates, having brought his engines and scaling-ladders to take the City, was beaten off, and forced to retreat from Rhodes in disgrace, [Appian, compared with Memnon cap. 33, and with Livy lib. 78.]

From hence he went to Patara and besieged it; where wanting materials for engines, he began to cut down Latona's grove: but was by a threatening dream commanded to desist, and not to meddle with those consecrated trees: Leaving Pelopidas to carry on the war in Lycia, he sent Archelaus into Greece to draw either by fair or foul means, as many Cities as he could into his association: Whilst he himself, entrusting his Commanders with many great businesses, employed himself in levying of fouldiers, making armies, and sporting himself with his Sratonicean women: He also busied himself in the examination of all such persons as were impeached of treason, either by attempting somewhat against his own person, or innovation in state, or any which were but in the least manner inclined that way, [Appian, pag. 188.]

Archelaus the Kings General, being sent before into Achaia with 20 thousand Horse and Foot, had the City of Athens delivered up into his hands by Aristo the Athenian, [Livy, lib. 78, Entrep. lib. 5, Orat. lib. 6, cap. 2.] From whence he went out with his Fleet and provisions to Delos, which had revolted from the Athenians, and reduced other Castles. He also seized upon some monies which had been dedicated to Apollo, and sent it away by Aristo to the Athenians, appointing a convoy of 2000 fouldiers to secure it upon the way, [Appian, pag. 188, 189.] But it happened, that Apellion Teus, as Appian, reports in, lib. 5, cap. 11. an Athenian Citizen, and a most intimate friend of Aristo, or Aristo, (in regard they were both Peripateticks) came with all speed with some companies of Foot to Delos: where he stayed a while, thinking himself safe enough; whereas he had neither placed the guards with that care he ought, nor yet secured the hinder part of the Island with Garrison or Trench: Orobius (or Orbius) the General of the Roman army, to whose trust Delos was committed, observing the mans negligence and imprudence in that particular, came with his Forces in a dark night, and fell upon them, heavy with sleep and drink; cut the throats of the Athenians and their auxiliaries, to the number of six hundred, as if they had been to many sheep: about 400 of them he took alive; but Apellion, who lo worthily commanded the Party, gave them the slip: Many of them for their security flew to the the villages adjacent; but Orobius pursued them, set fire to the houses, and burnt both them, their Helepolis and other engins, belonging to a League: And when all was done, erected a Trophy and Altar with this Inscription.

Metrophanes sent by Mithridates with another band of fouldiers, made great populations in Eubaea, and the Country of Demetrias, and Magnesia: Cities extremely averse to the Kings faction. Brytius (or Brutus) Sura, Sentius, Praetor of Macedonia, Legate, as Plutarch shewes) with some small forces which he brought out of Macedonia, set upon him, and encountered him at sea: and having sank one great ship, and one frigat called Hemiolia, put to sword all the men that were in them, Metrophanes standing by and looking on. But the spectacle seemed to dreadful to him, that he voyd sail and made away with all speed: Brytius after him as fast as he could drive, but the wind lo befriended Metrophanes, that Brytius was glad to give over the chase, and fall upon Scythus an Island which was the common receptacle for the Barbarian thieves and robbers. As soon as he became Master of the place, he hung up all the slaves that were found therein, and the free-men he punished with the losse of their hands, [Appian.]

Of the sons of Mithridates, one of them held that ancient kingdom in Pontus and Bosphorus, as far as the waste above the Lake of Maeotis: not one body offering to appear against him. The other Ariarathes, proceeded in the conquest of Thracia and Macedonia. The several Generals which Mithridates sent forth with armies dominated also in other quarters: Archelaus the chief of them having with his Fleet got the command almost of the whole sea, brought the Islands Cyclades under his jurisdiction, and as many others as did lie within Malea, [Plutarch in Sylla.] Eretria, Chalcis, and all Eubaea coming in, and siding with Mithridates, [Memnon cap. 34.]

Lucius Sylla (L. Cornelius Cinna the Consul, pressing forward his march) went as Proconsul into Greece with 5 legions, and some other companies, to manage the Mithridatick war, [Plutarch, in Sylla, Dio, in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 642, Appian, in Mithridatic, pag. 390, & lib. 1, Crv. Bell, pag. 399.] Mithridates at that instant resided at Pergamus, where he was very busy in distributing amongst his friends, his wealth, principalities, and places of command. Amongst the many prodigies which presented themselves to Mithridates whilst he abode at Pergamus, it is said, that at the same instant, that Sylla put to sea with his Fleet from Italy, the Pergamoniens in the Theatre were letting down with an engine a Statue of victory, bearing a Crown upon Mithridates his head: but it chanced, that when the Crown was just come to his head, it fell to the ground, and was burst in peices. This accident being no good omen, struck the people with a strange kind of horror, and Mithridates himself was in great amazement thereat, although at that time, all things had succeeded well to him, [Plutarch in Sylla.]

Amongst the other strange visions which appeared to Mithridates upon his first designing his war against the allies of the people of Rome, these are recited: at the time of the Consulship of L. Sylla, and Q. Pompeius, by Julius Obsequens, these following. At Stratopedo, where the Senate usually sat, the Crows killed a Vulture, with their beaks; The form of Isis seemed to assault with thunder an huge Star fallen from heaven upon the same place. At what time Mithridates was busy in firing the Grove dedicated to the Furies a great laughing was heard, but no body found to whom it might be ascribed as the author: and when by the advice of the Soothsayers, he would have sacrificed a Virgin to the Furies, a sudden fit of laughing burst forth from the throat of the Dæmoel which disturbed the sacrifice.

M. Cicero, at Rome, applied himself close to Molon the Rhodian, who was both the the most eminent for pleading offences, and the best instructor. [Cicer. in Bruto.] this was that Alabandian Orator out of Caria, as hereafter shall be declared out of Strabo, in the year of the World, 3927.

Sylla, being entred Attica, having sent away part of his forces to oppose Aristion in the City, marched in his own person straightway to Piræum, where Archelaus, Mithridates his General, had retreated within the walls. [Appian.]

Winter season drawing on apace, Sylla encamped near Eleusine, where he drew a deep trench from the mountains to the sea; and wanting ships, he sent to Rhodes to fetch them. [Id.]

Sylla, at last, took Athens, having been a long while pinched for provision, and that in the Calends of March, as he himself relates in his commentaries, ἡντι ἡμέρῃ σαραντῆς ἡμέρας τῆς ἐκείνης τοῦ Ἀνθιστηνίου—μηνὸς δὲ α' τῆς τριχλίας ὑπομνήματι πένθαι τὴν διὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν ἡμέραν δὲ τὴν εὐχὴν ἡμέρας δέκα τὴν αὐτὴν τῆς ἡμετέρας ὑπομνήματι—as Plutarch hath it. Comparing that day with the beginning of the month Anthestion, of which time the memory of Ogygis his flood is celebrated by the Athenians. But howsoever the Athenians lunar Anthestion in Plutarch's time, may sometimes answer the Julian March, yet in the false computation of the year, observed at this time by the Romans, the Calends of March might seem rather to fall out upon the Arrick Pofideon, and the Julian December.

The Rhodians, finding it altogether impossible for them to bring supplies to Sylla by sea, in regard that Mithridates fleets lay straggling about, advised L. Lucullus, a man of great repute amongst the Romans, and one of Sylla's Ambassadors, to sail privately into Syria, Egypt, and Libya; and from the Kings and Cities there, which used the art of navigation, to gather together what ships he could, and so join that fleet with their Rhodian fleet: He in the midst of winter, not at all dismayed at the present difficulties at sea, with three Grecian banks, and as many Rhodian Frigates, put himself upon the hazard of the wide sea, and the enemies ships, which (in regard they were masters at sea) lay straggling thick up and down the main; yet for all this, he arrived at Crete, and got that Island to side with him. [Appian, Mithridatic, pag. 192, Plutarch in Lucullo.]

Aristio the Tyrant, and others, who upon taking of the City, retreated into the fort of Athens, after they had been a long time besieged by Curio, were forced at last to resign up for want of water. And upon the same day and moment, on which Curio brought the Tyrant out of the fort, the Skie over-cast on the sudden, whereupon issued such a violent storm of rain, that the fort was supplied afresh with water. Sylla proceeded by Capitall punishment against Aristion and his company, and all such who had borne any office amongst them, or had any manner of wayes violated the constitutions which the Romans felted amongst them, after their conquest of Greece: to all the others he granted his free pardon. [Appian ibid. pag. 195. 196. Plutarch in Sylla, Strabo, lib. 9, pag. 398.] Paulan reports, That upon Aristion's flying to the Temple of Minerva for sanctuary, Sylla commanded him to be dragged thence, and put to death. [in Attic, pag. 18.] Others say that he was poisoned by Sylla. [Plutarch, in Sylla.]

Magnesia, which was the only City in all Asia, which remained loyal, valiantly defended it self, and held out against Mithridates. [Liv. lib. 81.]

Lucullus, observing how that the Cyrenians were always infested with Tyrants, and continually embroyley in war, settled the affairs of their Common-wealth, and enacted laws, whereby to secure the peace of the State for the future. [Plutarch in Lucullo.] For after their enfranchisement by the Romans, which was ten years before, they had been grievously oppressed by Nicocrates and his brother Leandri; and lately caled and relieved from under that pressure by the industry of Arcetaphia, Nicocrates's wife, as Plutarch throws in his little book of womens vertues. And another ten years after, Cyrene was made a province by the Romans, as shall hereafter be made to appear out of Appian, ad annum Mundi 3928. But Josephus affirms, out of the books of Strabo his Histories, that Cyrene was at this time disturbed by a mutiny of the Jews; and that Lucullus was dispatched thither in all hast by Sylla to pacifie it. [lib. 14. cap. 12.]

As Lucullus was bending his course from Cyrene, into Egypt, he very neer lost all his ships, by a sudden incursion of Pyrates: yet he himself escaped safe in person to Alexandria, where he was received with a great deal of honour; for the whole fleet gloriously trimmed, and adorned, went to meet him; as their custom was to do unto their Kings, when he at any time returned from sea. Ptolemæus alio (Lathrus, whom Plutarch very unjustly in this place calls a youth) treated him very courteously; for he appointed him his lodging & his table at Court, which was never before known to be done to any foreigne Commander, and for the discharge of his expences, and defraying his his cost he allowed him not as usually he did to others, but four times as much: yet did not Lucullus admit of any thing but necessities, neither did he receive any presents, although some of them were worth 80 talents. It is said, that he neither went to Memphis, nor stopt to see any of the famous wonders of Egypt; those things being fights for some idle spectatour, or one that travels for pleasure, and not for such as he, who had left his General in the open field marching against the Garrison of the enemy, [Plutarch in Lucullo.]

Aurelius Victor writes, that Lucullus wrought Ptolemæus King of Alexandria, to side with Sylla the Consul, [de vir. illust. cap. 74.] But at that time, neither was Sylla Consul, but Proconsul: neither would Ptolemæus then be brought to admit Sylla into his affection, for fear he should draw a war upon his own head. Yet did Ptolemæus grant unto Lucullus ships to convoy him into Cyprus: and when he was upon his imbarquing, saluted him, and courted him, and tendered him an Emerald set in gold; which Lucullus at the first proper refused, but when as the King shewed him his own picture cut upon it, he dared not but take it; left, if he should be thought to depart in some discontent, he might chance to be way-laid at sea, [Plutarch, ut sup.]

Lucullus with those ships, he had gathered from amongst the port Towns as he failed by, renouncing all such as had been engaged in piracy, crossed over into Cyprus: upon intelligence that the enemy lay lurking under the promontories to catch him, he thrust his Fleet into harbour, and wrote to the Cities thereabout to provide him with quarters, and provisions, pretending he would abide there with his Fleet till Spring. But as soon as ever the wind served, he put to sea again. In the day time he failed with low sails, in the night he spread all the canvas he had, and by that stratagem arrived safe with his Fleet at Rhodes, [Id. ibid.]

Cinna the Consul, sent his Collegue Lucius Valerius Flaccus with two legions into Asia, to govern the Province, and to manage the war against Mithridates. He was but a raw souldier, and therefore C. Fimbria, one of the Senators, went along with him, who was a man of repute amongst the souldiers. Livius, Aurelius, Victor, and Octavius, call him Flaccus his Legate, Dio his Lieutenant General, Strabo Quæstor, Velieus Paternulus, General of the Horse. When they took this employment upon them, the Senate gave them in charge, that if they saw Sylla stood entire to the Senate, then they should assist him, but if they found him otherwise inclined, they should fight him. But it happened that soon after they had put to sea from Brundisium, many of their ships were shattered and torne with a tempest; and a party alio from Mithridates fired the ships which were upon the foreloyn. [Memnon, cap. 38. Liv. lib. 82. Strabo, lib. 13, pag. 594. Vellei Paternul. lib. 2, cap. 24. Dio. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 650. Appian, lib. 1. Bell. Civil. pag. 396. & in Mithridatic, pag. 203. compared with Orosius, lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Taxiles, Mithridates his General, marching out of Thracia and Macedonia with 100 thousand Foot, and 10 thousand Horse, and 90 Chariots with fishes, solicited Archelaus to side with him: these two uniting their Forces led under their colours 120 thousand men (Memnon acknowledged more than 60 thousand) consisting of Thracians, Ponticks, Scythians, Cappadocians, Bithynians, Galatians, Phrygians, and others which came out of Mithridates his new Provinces. Sylla, taking along with him L. Hortensius, who had brought 6000 men out of Italy, engaged with Taxiles his forces near Charonea, although he had not at that time above 1500 Horse, and not less than 15000 Foot, as Plutarch gives up the tally: but Appian says, that his whole body was so small that it answered not to so much as the third part of the enemies. Yet Sylla was the day, having killed upon the place 10 thousand of the enemy, (or 100 thousand, as in Livies Epitome) and pillaged their Camp. Archelaus made shift to escape to Chalcis with not many more than 10 thousand men. Sylla gives out, that he misd of his army at this bout, not above 14, (or as others, 15) men: and that two of those alio, returned towards evening to the Camp, who were supposed to have been dead, [Memnon, cap. 34. Liv. lib. 82. Plutarch in Sylla. Appian, in Mithridatic, Eutrop. lib. 5. Orsi. lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Sylla, having received intelligence how that Flaccus (who being of the other faction) was sailing over the Ionian Sea with some legions, pretending that he came against Mithridates, but indeed against himself: marched into Thessalia to meet with him, [Plutarch.] Flaccus was a person very ill qualified, covetous, rigorous, and cruel in punishing, which made him so detestable to the soldiery, that part of those which were sent by him into Thessalia, ran away to Sylla's Camp: and it is probable, the rest had followed, had not they been kept from revolting by Fimbria, who was reputed the better souldier, and of a softer temper. [Appian, cap. 204.]

Archelaus (in regard the Romans were unprovided of a Navy) roved about the Islands securely, making what havock he pleased all along the coast; and which is more: He adventured ashore, and laid siege to Cerinthus; but being way-laid in the

In the interim, Flaccus came to Byzantium, where Fimbria caused a mutiny against him: Flaccus had given command to his soldiers to abide without the walls, whilst he himself entered the City: whereupon Fimbria began to accuse Flaccus for receiving money of the Byzantines: boasting by way of oblique, that he was gone to pamper his genius in the City, whilst they abroad in the field under their skins, endured the roughness of the Winter. These passages so highly enraged the soldiers, that they broke into the City, and killing some few of which they met by chance on the way, they dispersed themselves into several houses. [Dio, in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 650.]

L. Valerius Flaccus, passing through the confines of the Byzantines into Bithynia, encamped at Nicæa, [Memnon cap. 36.] whereof Cicero (in his Oration for Flaccus, this mansion) it was one and the same time when all Asia shut her gates upon L. Flaccus the Consul (or now rather Proconsul) but did not only receive that Cappadocian (Mithridates) into their Cities, but sent purposely to invite him to come unto them.

Upon some difference betwixt Fimbria and Flaccus his Treasurer, Flaccus was chosen Umpire: who had so small regard of Fimbria's honour, that Fimbria threatened (as Appian hath it, to return home to Rome) or (as it is in Dion) Flaccus threatened to lend him to Rome whether he would or not. Whereupon Fimbria so vilely reproached Flaccus, that Flaccus took away his command from him, and assigned another to succeed him, [Appian, pag. 204. Dio, in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 650.]

Fimbria thus upon that variance calthered, [Aurelius Victor, de vir. illustrib. cap. 70.] repaired to the soldiers at Byzantium: where he saluted them as if he were going to Rome, and desired letters from them to their friends there: complaining moreover of the great injury done unto him, and advising them to bear in mind the good turns he had done them, and that they should take heed and look to themselves; covertly hinting hereby, as if Flaccus had some design upon them. When he found his words had made some impression upon them, and that they wished him well, but were jealous of Flaccus: then he ascended the pulpit, and in plain terms stirred them against Flaccus: and amongst other things, he laid to his charge, that he received money to betray them, [Dio, ut sup.]

Fimbria, having again crossed the Hellespont, animated his soldiers to rapines and all kind of villanies, exacted monies from the Cities, and divided it amongst the soldiers: who having obtained an uncontrolled licence to do what they listed, and allowed moreover with the hopes of a large income, loved Fimbria as one who had delivered extremely well of the whole army, [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 409.]

Flaccus being gone towards Chalcedon with his fleet, Fimbria took the advantage of his absence; and first began with Thermus who was left Proprietor, and took from him the Falces, or Ensignes of his authority, as if he had taken that Magistracy upon him from the army: This put Flaccus into a chafe, and fetched him back again, but Fimbria made him ply his heels, and take sanctuary at a private mans house: whence in the night he scaled the wall, and stole away first to Chalcedon, and thence to Nicomedia, and caused the gates to be shut. But Fimbria following him close at the heels, made the Roman Consul (or rather one that had been Consul, as Velleius styles him) and the Commander in chief in this war, to hide himself in a well, whence Fimbria dragged him and slew him. After he had cut off Flaccus his head, he threw it into the sea, but left the corps lying upon the ground unburied, [Appian, pag. 204. 205. compared with Memnon, cap. 36. and 42. Liv. lib. 82. Velleius, Patensis, lib. 2. cap. 24. Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 504. Aurelius, Viſtor, de viris illustrib. cap. 70. and Orosius, lib. 6. cap. 2.] As for Nicomedia, that became the soldiers booty by Fimbria his concession, [Diodor. Sicul. in Excerpt. Valesii, pag. 409.]

Mithridates, having sent an army against those that had revolted from him, after he had reduced them, proceeded most rigorously against them, [Appian, pag. 202.] He forced all the Cities in Asia, and miserably pillaged the Province, [Liv. lib. 82.] But fearing lest others should prove disloyal: he made the cities of Greece free; promised by the publick Cryer to all debtors, a cancelling of their obligations: to all inmates enlargement in their several Cities they dwelt in: and to servants their liberty; hoping (which indeed happened no longer after) that by these his acts of grace, he might engage all that were in debt, all inmates and servants, to stick close to him, and tooth and nail help to maintain that power he was now in, [Appian, ut sup.]

In the mean time Mynio, and Philotimus, Smyrneans, Clisthenes, and Alcibiadotus Lesbians, (every one of them the Kings intimate friends, but Alcibiadotus had also sometimes been Commander of his mercenary soldiers) conspired against Mithridates. Alcibiadotus himself was the first that revealed it: and that he might procure credit to what he said, he caused the King to lie under a bed, and hear what Mynion should say. The Treason being thus discovered, all the Conspirators died upon the the rack: yet many others were shrewdly suspected to have a hand in it. But when as 80 Pergameans were seized on, as being complices in this conspiracy, and others in other Cities, then the King dispatched his Inquirers into all parts, who executed about 1600 men upon this account: Every one of the Iniquitous, charging their enemies with treasonable engagement. The accusers themselves, no long after, were either punished by Sylla, or killed themselves, or accompanied Mithridates in his flight into Pontus, [Appian, ibid. & pag. 213. compared with Orosius, lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Amongst others, Diodorus, Mithridates his Praetor, who professed himself an Academick Philosopher, and a pleader of cause; and a Rhetorician, slew all the Senators of the Adramiteans, to please the King. And being gone with the King into Pontus, upon his being deposed, he starved himself to death, to prevent the disgrace which was likely to fall upon him, by reason of some great enmities, which were to be charged upon him, [Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 614.]

L. Lucullus, by the addition of some Rhodian ships, with that fleet which he gathered together out of Cyprus, Pionicia, and Pamphylia, waded all the enemies coasts, and now and then by the way, skirmished with Mithridates his fleet, [Appian, 207, 208.] He persuaded the Coans, and the Cnidians, to thrust out the Kings Garrison, and take up arms with him against the Samians, He drove the Kings party out of Chios: He relieved the Colophonians, and let them at liberty, having seized upon Epigonius their King. [Plutarch in Lucullo.] And by Marcia his means in Asia, brought off Mithridates his fleet to Sylla, [Aurelius, Viſtor, de viris illustrib. cap. 74.]

C. Fimbria, (having slain Flaccus in Bithynia, and being seized of his army) now saluted General (as it is in Velleius, lib. 3. cap. 24.) got the Cities under him: some voluntarily submitting themselves, whilst others were forced to stoop whether they would or not, [Memnon, cap. 36.] But he put many persons to death, not out of any justice or merit, but merely to gratify his passion, and out of cruelty. For, having on a time commanded some posts to be fastened to the ground, to which he was used to have men bound, and scourged to death: when he saw that there were more posts provided, than persons adjudged to this punishment; he ordered to lay hold on some of the company that stood by, and bind them to the posts: lest otherwise they might seem to have been set up to no purpose. [Dio in Excerptis Valesii, pag. 653.]

The same Fimbria, being admitted into Cizicum, professing himself a friend to the place, as soon as he was got in, began to impeach all the wealthiest of them, and charged them with some crime or other: two of these, the principall men of the City, after he had passed sentence on them, he caused to be whipt with rods, to terrify the rest, and afterwards struck off their heads, and let their goods to sale; forcing others out of fear to give to him all they had, [Diodor. Sicul. ibid. pag. 409.]

Mithridates, Mithridates his son, joyning with Taxiles, Diophantes, and Menander, three most expert Commanders, and being well provided with an army, marched out against Fimbria: And in regard they surpassed in multitudes of soldiers, Fimbria received some loss in the fight. But they being come to a river, which parted both armies: Fimbria in a great storm of rain (which happened somewhat before morning, passed over the river, and so surprized the enemy, as they lay asleep in their Tents, that they never perceived him: He made such great slaughter amongst them, that very few, onely of the Commanders and Horse, escaped, [Memnon, cap. 36.]

Amongst them was Mithridates the Kings Horse, chased out of Asia to Miletopolis, got safe from thence, to his father at Pergamus, with a company of Horse. But Fimbria making an assault upon the Kings ships, as they lay in harbour, drove him out of Pergamus: and after he had taken the City, pursued him as he was flying into Pitane, where he besieged him, and endeavoured to draw a trench about the place, [Id. ibid. Liv. lib. 38. Appian, pag. 205. Plut. in Lucullo, Aurelius, Viſtor, de vir. illustrib. cap. 70. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Mithridates, being now driven clear out of the land by Fimbria, and penned up by him into a corner, looking (as I would) and called together all his fleet, from their several quarters: being somewhat loath to engage in fight with Fimbria, who was both a smart fellow, and a Conquerour to boot. Fimbria observing this, in regard he was himself at present destitute of a fleet, sent in all haste to Lucullus, to desire him by all means, that he should bring his fleet, and joyn his hand in taking him, who of all the Kings was the most bitter and cruel enemy of the people of Rome. And to speak truth, they had snatched him, if Lucullus would have preferred the weak publicity, before the gratifying of some private animosities, and would have straightened him at sea, by driving up with his fleet against him, but he not yielding to that advice, gave opportunity to Mithridates to escape by sea, and occasion to Fimbria to delude his army, [Plut. & Oros. ibid.]

Mithridates

Mithridates being gone with his Fleet to Myrleue: Fimbria went up and down the Province, clapping fines upon the heads of those that were of the Cappadocian faction, and wasted the grounds of such that had shut their gates against him, [Appian, ut. sup.] And by reason of theundry revolts of Cities to the Romans, he recovered a very great part of Asia, [Memnon, cap. 36. Liv. lib. 83.]

But making the like attempts upon the Trojans, they posted away to Sylla; who after he had engaged himself to come to their relief, and warned Fimbria not to meddle any further with those that had submitted themselves to him, he commended them for returning to that alliance they formerly had with the people of Rome: Yet he told them, it was not much matter to whether of them two they submitted themselves, in regard, that both of them were Roman Citizens, and alike defended from the Trojans. For all this, Fimbria stormed the City, and entered it upon the eleventh day, vapouring how that he, within the space of eleven days, had reduced that City, under his power, which Agamemnon, though provided with a Fleet of a 1000 ships, and the whole power of Greece, had much ado to take in ten years time. The reason is plain, replied a certain Trojan: Because there was not amongst us an Hector, who would stand stoutly to maintain the City. He killed all he met, making no difference at all, and fired almost the whole City: Those that were employed upon the Embassage to Sylla, he tormented to death. Neither did he forbear the holy things; no, nor from such who had fled unto the Temple of Minerva for sanctuary; but burnt them and the Temple together. Moreover he pulled down the walls, and the day following surrounded the City, espying whether he could find any thing that had escaped his fury: neither did he suffer either any fair court or consecrated house, or statue, to be left in the City, [Liv. lib. 83. Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 554. Appian, pag. 205. Dio, in Excerptis, Valerij, pag. 653. Ors. lib. 6, cap. 2.]

Although Fimbria commanded Troy to be fired, because they were something slow in opening the gates to him: yet Aurelius Victor writes, how that Minerva's Temple stood untouched, [De viris illustribus, cap. 70.] Which as the faith, was without all doubt preserved by the Goddesse herself. But Julius Obsequens and Appianus confirm, that both the Temple was then burnt, and that amongst the ruins thereof the Palladium that ancient Image, which was supposed to be taken away by Diomedes and Ulysses in the time of the Trojan war, was found false and entire: Which Image at that time found out by Fimbria, as Servius upon the second book of the Æneid, hath noted, was afterwards carried to Rome. Norwithstanding Strabo informs us, that several like Images of Minerva were shewn at Lavinium, Luceria, and Siris: as though they had been brought from Troy, [Liv. 6. pag. 264.] Appian writes that this destruction of Troy, happened on the CLXXIII. Olympiad, [pag. 205.] and that some compute 1050 years distance betwixt this and that former overthrow by Agamemnon: whereas according to Eratosthenes, Apollodorus, and Diodorus Siculus, accounts, there were 1099 years betwixt that former destruction of Troy, and the fourth year of the CLXXIII. Olympiad, in which this desolation happened.

Lucullus first routed the Kings Fleet about Lesdon in Troas. Again at Tenedos, when he saw Neopolemus making towards him with a greater provision than before: He rid at some distance, before off his Fleet, in a Rhodian Frigor with five oares. Demagoras was Master of the ship; one who withed extreme well to the Romans, and was most expert at sea fights. Neopolemus coming onwards very violently, and commanding the Pilot to direct his forecable against the enemy: Demagoras fearing the bulk of the Kings ship, and the force of its brazen beake, dared not to clove in the front, but gave order to the Pilot to stop the course of the ship by turning her hastily about: and lo by breaking the blow off, the enemy running violently on, the ship was not hurt, in regard he struck onely against such parts of the ship which were under water. But as soon as the residue of the Fleet came up to him, Lucullus commanded the Pilot to flee about: and then after sundry expressions of his valour, he compelled the enemy to hoyst fail, and drave as fast as he could in the pursuit of Neopolemus, [Plutarch in Lucullo, 7.]

Aretas, King of Cœlolyria (invited by the Damascens to take the government upon him out of the ill will they bare to Ptolemei Mennæus) being entred with an army into Judæa: after he had given the foile to Alexander Jannæus at Adida, marched home again upon articles, [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 23.]

When Cinna and Carbo began to play their pranks at Rome, proceeding violently against the most eminent persons of the City without controule, the greater part of the Nobility stole away first into Achaia, and afterwards into Asia unto Sylla; so that in a short time, there was in his Camp an appearance of a Senate, [Vellei. Paternuli, lib. 2. cap. 23. Plutarch, in Sylla, and out of him Dio, in Excerptis, Valerij, pag. 649.] All of them were instant suiters to him, that he would haften to the relief of his own Country, which was at present not onely in extreame hazard, but in a manner lost already, [Europ. lib.

lib. 5. Ors. lib. 5. cap. 20.] Metella also his wife, having hardly elaped with her own life and her childrens, came to his house, telling him how that his house and the village pertaining thereto were fired by the enemy, and therefore beseeching him to come and help the City, [Plutarch, 7.]

Mithridates, casting up with himself what a number of men he had lost (and in how short a time) since he first advanced an army into Greece, wrote to Archelaus to make peace with Sylla, upon as honourable conditions as he could, [Appian, pag. 206.] Sylla was now in a great perplexity, neither enduring to desert his Country in that bad exigence it was now in, nor yet very well knowing how he could leave Asia, having not as yet completed the Mithridatick war: whereupon Archelaus of Delos offered himself to negotiate the treaty, having brought along with him some hopes, and private instructions from Archelaus the Kings General. Sylla was so well pleased herewith, that he in all haste would go himself to conferre with Archelaus. They met at Sea near Delos, where Apollon's Temple stands. Archelaus beginning his Speech, demanded of Sylla, that he would give over his Asian and Pontick Expedition, and go home to quench the civil war there: That the Kings, his Master, would supply him with what silver, ships, or men, he pleased. Sylla replying, advised him to declaim Mithridates, and he himself should reign in his stead: That himself would call him an Ally and friend of the Romans, if he would resign up the Kings Fleet to him: Archelaus seeming to desert to treacherous a motion; at last Sylla propounded some conditions of a peace to be concluded with the King, [Plutarch in Sylla, 1.] Amongst which, this was one: That the King should draw out all his Garrison soldiers from all places, except those in which he had soldiers before the violation of the peace. Archelaus hearing this, forthwith cleared the Garrisons. Concerning the other Articles, he wrote unto the King to know his pleasure therein, [Appian, pag. 207.]

The Articles agreed on, Sylla draws off, and comes to Hellepont, passing thorough Thessalie and Macedonia: having Archelaus in his company, who was very civilly treated by him: for Archelaus, falling into a most dangerous dilema near Larissa, Sylla stoppt his march; and took no lesse care of him in his sicknesse, than if he had been one of his own Commanders or Pretors: which thing increased the suspicion that lay hard upon Archelaus; how that he shewed none of the fairest play in the battle at Chæronæa, [Plutarch, in Sylla, and out of him Dio, Legat. 33. or 34.]

Ambassadors from Mithridates came hither to Sylla: their errand was to desire of him, that the delivery up of Paphlagonia and the ships, should not by any means be included in the Articles; adding withal, that they could obtain easier conditions from the other General Fimbria. To whom Sylla in a rage replied, That Fimbria should smart for this, and that he himself would see, as soon as he came into Asia, whether Mithridates stood in greater need of peace or war. But Archelaus interceded to Sylla, and taking him by the hand, allayed his fury with his reares: And at last intreated, that he might be sent to Mithridates; engaging, that Mithridates should either conclude a peace upon Sylla's own terms, or else if he refused to sign those Articles, he would either be the death of Mithridates, or else (for the Greek copies vary in this particular) dispatch himself, [Plutarch, and out of him Dio, Legat. 34. or 35. Appian, pag. 207.]

Alexander Jannæus, after the concluding of a peace with Aretas, (in the sixth year before his death) leading an army against the neighbouring people, took the City Diaby storm, [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 23.]

Archelaus being returned from Mithridates, met with Sylla at Philippi in Macedonia: telling him, how that all things fell out according to his hearts wish; but withal, that Mithridates desired by all means that he would give him a meeting. Whereupon Sylla marched thorough Thracia to Cypella: having sent Lucullus (who was now come with his Fleet to him) aloft to Abydos. Lucullus afforded him a safe passage out of the Chetconesses, and helped him much in transporting the army, [Plutarch in Sylla, & Lucullo, Appian, pag. 207 & 208.]

Sylla met with Mithridates at Dardanus, a Town of Troas. Mithridates had there with him, 200 ships with oares, 20000 of land Forces, 600 Horse, and a great strength of Chariots, armed with fishes. Sylla 4 Regiments of Foot, and 200 Horse. There they parled, both of them being gone aside into the field with a small Retinue: each army looking on. Mithridates coming up to him and reaching forth his right hand, Sylla asked him, whether he would accept of a peace upon Archelaus his condition? The King demurring a while, and each of them casting complaints and accusations in one anothers teeth, at length Mithridates (sared therewith by Sylla's passionate Oration, consented to those Articles of peace which were tendered to Archelaus. After which, Sylla saluted him, embraced him, and kissed him, [Memnon, cap. 37. Plutarch, in Sylla, and out of him, Dio, Legat. 35. or 36. Appian, pag. 208, 209, 210.]

what was his fathers that is, with what command he had in Pontus, and should not have any thing to do with Asia, or Paphlagonia. That he should resign Bithynia to Nicomedes, and Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes. That he should release all Commanders, Legats, Prisoners, Runnagadoes, Fugitives, the Chians, & all such as he had carried away captives with him out of the Cities into Pontus. That he should pay to the Romans two, or (as Memnon hath it) 80 ships, pointed down with brals, with all their ammunition. And lastly, That the Cities now under the Roman Jurisdiction should not be questioned for their revolting to the Romans side. Yet did the Romans soon after, bring many of them under slavery, and bondage, contrary to the tenour of the articles for peace. [Memnon, and Plutarch ut supra, and Dio transferring Plutarch, Legat, 33, or 34. Appian, pag. 207. Liv, lib. 85. Vellei, Paternul, lib. 2, cap. 25.] And thus was the first Mithridatic war, (begun four years before) ended by Sylla, who in less than three years space, flew 160 thousand of the enemies, recovered Greece, Macedon, Ionia, Asia, and severall other nations which Mithridates had seized on, took the Kings fleet, and confined the King himself to the Strait tether of his fathers kingdom. [Appian, lib. 1. Bell. Civil, pag. 396. cum Mithridate, pag. 206. & 209, & 210.] Not was there any one thing in all Syllaes several achievements more remarkable than that, although Cinna and Marius his faction were up in Italy for three years together, yet did he not conceal his intention of coming against them to fight them, nor did he lay aside the businesse he had now in hand, adjoining it the right Method, first to crush in pieces an enemy, and then to avenge a Citizen: First, to secure from fear abroad, by getting a conquest on a foreigner, and afterwards to repress a rebellion at home. [Vellei, Paternul, lib. 2, cap. 24. compared with Plutarch in Collat. Sylla & Lyfandri.]

Mithridates, having resigned up his ships to Sylla, and 500 archers, with other things due upon covenant; he sailed with the remainder of his ships into his fathers Kingdom, into Pontus. [Memnon, ut supra. Strabo, lib. 13, pag. 594. Plutarch, and out of him Dio, Legat, 36, or 37. Appian, pag. 210.] But Sylla, (perceiving this peace was not very toothsome to the soldiery) who thought it hard, to see the Kings, who was the most bitter enemy they had, and who had slain in one day, so many thousands of such Roman Citizens, who lived in Asia, now with his treasure, and the spoiles he had got in the war to saile away out of Asia, which he had almost exhausted for some years together, by plunder and imposition, cleared himself, telling them, he was glad to be rid of Mithridates upon any condition, for fear he should have joyned with Fimbria, and then he should have been too weak, to grapple with them both. [Plutarch & Dio, ibid.]

From thence Sylla removed within two furlongs of Fimbria who lay encamped about Thyatira. Sylla demanded of him, that he would deliver up the armies to him, in regard he took that command upon himself against lawes. Fimbria in a flout replied, That he himself, did not come very well to the command he was in. Upon this, Sylla laid siege, and beginning to draw his trench, Fimbrias soldiery came running out of their Garrison, to salute Syllaes men, and were very servicable to them in helping them to cast up the trench. [Plutarch ibid. Appian, pag. 210. Oros, lib. 6, cap. 2.]

Fimbria, admiring at this sudden alteration, assembled the residue of the soldiery, and desired them to stick to him: but they refusing to be brought by any means to fight against their fellow Citizens, he rent his garment, and shooke every one of them, by the hand begging of them not to desert him. But when that did nothing prevail, and observing, how that very many were stealing away to the enemy, he went about to the Colonels Tents, and having corrupted some of them, summoned the soldiery again, and pressed upon them an oath of allegiance. And when the Venetians cried out, that every soldier ought to be called by name to the oath: he commanded the Cryer, to name onely such as he had by his bounty made his own creatures, and afore all, Nonius was cited one, who had been his Camplice in all villanous attempts. But he also refusing to swear, he drew his sword at him, and threatened to kill him, but was glad to desist, because the soldiery by a joyned shout, seemed to resent it. [Appian, ut supra.]

After this, Fimbria tuborned a slave, tempting him with monies and hopes of his freedom, to go to Syllas Camp, making shew, as if he had been a runnagado, and there to stab Sylla: but his heart beginning to faile him in the enterprise, and being suspected by his trembling, that he came upon no good errand, and thereupon being laid hold on, he confessed the whole businesse. This filled Syllas army with anger and scorn; so that they standing about Fimbrias trench, by way of reproach, called him Athenio, which was the name of one, who was King for a few dayes over the fugitives in Sicily. [Id, ib.]

Fimbria, seeing this plot would not take effect, and now past all hopes, betook him self to a strong Fort, and from thence invited Sylla to a parley. Sylla would not go himself, but sent Rutilius in his stead. This went to Fimbrias hearts: that Sylla should not vouchsafe that to him, which was never wont to be denied, even to common enemies. And after he had craved pardon, it happily he had offended by reason of the rancour of his years: Rutilius replied, That Sylla was willing he should passe safe to the sea side, upon condition he would quit Asia (of which he was the Proconful) to him, and saile away. Fimbria told him, he knew a better way than that, and to returning to Pergamus, went into Eculapius his Temple, and stabbed himself with his sword. But finding the wound was not mortal, he desired his servant to do so much for him, as to dispatch him; who first killed his Master, and afterwards killed himself. Sylla gave his body to be interred by his chief servants. [Id, pag. 211. compared with Livy, lib. 83. Vellei Paternul, lib. 2, cap. 24. Plutarch in Sylla Arel, Vitor, de vir illustribus cap. 70, and Oros, lib. 6, cap. 2.]

Fimbrias army came and rendered their service to Sylla, who entertained them, and joyned them to his own body. Soon after, he sent Cuno with command to settle Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes in their kingdoms. He sent also a full narrative of all occurrences unto the Senate, taking no notice at all how that they had voted him an enemy to the State. [Appian, p. 211.]

Sylla rebuilt Troy, which was demolished by Fimbria. [Oros, lib. 6, cap. 2, compared with Strabo, lib. 13, pag. 594.] He also settling the affairs of the Province of Asia, Enfranchized the Trojans, Chians, Rhodians, Lycians, Mignicians, and severall other people, and enrolled them among the Allies of the people of Rome, either as a remuneration for their assisting him in the wars, or to cheer them up after those great calamities they had undergone out of the great affliction they bare to the people of Rome. But to all other Towns he sent Souldiers to see proclamation made, requiring all slaves whosoever had received their freedom from Mithridates, to return immediately to their masters respectively. This edict was leighted by many, and many Cities revolted also upon it, so that there ensued hereupon great bloodshed, both of the slaves, and free born, promiscuously, upon sundry occasions. The walls of many Towns in Asia were demolished, and some of the inhabitants were sold under the spear, and what men or City loever were found to be of the Cappadocian faction, were severely fined; especially the Ephesians, who through a base obsequiousness had in a scorn taken down out of their Temples, the Roman offerings. [Appian, pag. 211.]

After all was quiet and hushed again, Cryers were sent throughout the Province, summoning the chief persons of all the Cities in Asia, to appear before Sylla at Ephesus, upon a set day; who when they were met together, made a speech to them upon the judgement seat; wherein he recited how well the Romans had deserved of the Asians, and what ill requitals the Asians had returned them, and in the close, pronounced this sentence upon them. I amerce you a whole five years tribute, which I charge you presently to pay down upon the naile; and moreover, you shall discharge the monies spent upon this war; and what other sum the present state and condition of the Province shall require, I shall lay the tax upon the Cities proportionally, and fix a time for the bringing of it. Such as I shall find to make default herein, I shall look upon them as enemies. Thus said, he distributed the mulct by portions to the Lurenates, and assigned persons also to levy it. [Id, pag. 211, 213.] And to that end was that division of Asia made by him into 44 regions, which Cassiodorus in his Chronicle makes mention of, at the fourth time of L. Cinna's Consulship, and the second of Cn. Pappyras. For as Cicero in his fifth epistle of his fifth book, Q. Frateus confirms his laying an impost upon all parts alike, so doth he also in his oration, to Flaccus avouch, That he laid it proportionally upon all the Cities of Asia.

Plutarch writes how that Sylla besides this amercement of 20000 talents which he levied generally upon the whole; he plagued them severally also by quartering insolent and unruly soldiery in their private houses: Ordering every Landlord to pay to a soldier quartered in his house, 16 Drachmas a day: and that he should find him not onely his supper, but provid also for as many friends as he would bring along with him. A Captain was to have 50 drachmas a day, and two suits of cloaths, one to wear at home, and another abroad. [Plutarch in Sylla.] The care of collecting the general Tax of 20000 talent, and of coyning the money, was intrusted to Lucullus: which seemed to the Cities of Asia some alleviation and easement of Syllas hard usage: in regard he had alwayes demeaned himself, not onely harmelesly and uprightly, but mercifully and mildly, in such a sad and penfive Province as this was at present. [Id, in Lucullo.]

But the Cities being extremely impoverished, and over head and eares in debt, some of them pawned their theaters to the Mithers, others their places of receipt, or their their arsenals, or their ports, or something or other which belonged to the Publick: So importunate were the souldiers with them, and pressing for their monies. After payment was made, they carried the monies to Sylla: Asia in the mean while becoming the sad calamities they lay under, [Appian, pag. 213.]

At this same time also, the Pirats were busy in all parts of Asia, and they appeared so openly, as if they had been to many true and lawful Fleets. They were first put to sea by Mithridates, who being likely to lose all he had gotten in those parts, was resolved to do what mischief he could: but now they were increased to so great a number, that they were not only dangerous to such as sailed at sea, but grew formidable to the very Ports, Castles, and Towns. It is certain, that Jullus, Samus, Clazomenæ, and Samothrace, were taken when Sylla himself resided in these parts: and it is generally reported, that they took out of the Temple at Samothrace, as many ornaments, as were in estimation worth 1000 talents. But Sylla, either because he thought them unworthy to be protected by him, or they having carried themselves so basely towards him: or because he halted to Rome to quell the commotions there, waisted over into Greece, [Id. ibid.]

When as Sylla professed to carry home again with him P. Rutilius Rufus, who lived an exile at Mitylene: he continued in banishment, lest he might do anything which was not consonant to law; and from thence he removed to Smyrna, [Valer. Maximus, lib. 6. cap. 4. Seneca, epistle 24. Quintilian lib. 11. cap. 1. Dio in Excerpt. Vales. pag. 638.] He was made a free Denizen of that City, [Cicero, pro Bibli.] and there spent his years in Italy, [Oros. lib. 5. cap. 17.] Nor could ever be brought to return home to his Country, [Dio in sup.] Of whom Seneca in lib. de providentia, cap. 2. Is Rutilius to be looked upon as unfortunate, because those that condemned him will plead his cause in all ages? because he more contentedly suffered himself to be plucked from his Country, than to part with his banishment? because he only of all the first, dared to deny Sylla the Dictator something, and when he was called home, did not only give back, but flew farther off? And Ovid in Pont. lib. 1. Elia. 4.

Et grave magnanimi robur mirare Ruili,
Non cui reditus conditione dati:
Smyrna virum tenuit ———

Rutilius his fortune admire,
Who being call'd home, had rather still retire;
In banishment at Smyrna than return;
For Sylla's prefer he alone did scorn.

But Alexander, son of Ptolemei Alexander, late King of Egypt, who fleeing from Mithridates (to whom he was delivered up by the Choons) to Sylla, was entertained by him, and admitted amongst those of his more familiar acquaintance; and went along with him out of Asia into Greece, and from thence to Rome, [Appian, lib. 1. Bell. civil. pag. 414. Porphy. in Græc. Enchir. Scaliger, pag. 225. in.]

Alexander Juvens led his army against Elia or Gerasa, where Theodorus, son of Zeno, had secured whatsoever he thought most precious, and he esteemed of greatest value. After he had beginn'd the place with a triple wall, at length he became Master of it, [Joseph. lib. 13. Antiqu. cap. 23. compared with cap. 21. and lib. 1. Bell. cap. 3. & 4.]

L. Munæra with the two Fimbrian (or Valesian) Legions, was left behind by Sylla to settle and order matters in Asia, [Appian, pag. 213.] To which is to be referred that passage of Julius Exuperantius concerning Sylla. He left Munæra his Lieutenant over the Province, and appointed him over the Valesian Souldiers, whose fidelity as to civil wars he somewhat suspected: and with the other moiety of the army in a passion he marched away to suppress the Marian faction, which was up. Although that Author writes this passage as happening before Sylla commenced the war with Mithridates, at which time there was no Valesian or Fimbrian Legions, and not after the war was ended.

L. Lucullus was left Quæstor in Asia with Munæra the Prætor; who carried himself so discreetly whilst he had the command of the Province, that he got abundance of credit by it, [Cicero in Lucullo.] So that by reason of his employments in Asia, he was not engaged in the commotions of Sylla and Marius in Italy, [Plutarch, in civi. Vita.]

Sylla, putting off with his Fleet from Ephesus, arrived the third day at Pyræum; and having discharged the Rites of Religion, he took to himself the Library of Apellion the Teian, wherein were many books of Aristotles and Theophrastus which yet were very rare to come by, [Plutarch in Sylla.] For Apellion having a good pure and well lined, had purchased Aristotles Library, & many other good Libraries beside. He got also into his clutches by stealth out of Merourum (the Temple of the Phrygian Goldfeet) the Originals of the Decrees which were published by their ancestors; and out of other Cities he scrap'd together whatsoever was either ancient or secret, and kept close as a rarey, [Athenæus, lib. 5. cap. 1. ex Paphlagon. Apamæus.] For all this, he was a person which was more taken with the sight of the books, than the study of them: for, having purchased of the heirs of Nileus Sceptius, with a great sum of money Aristotles and Theophrastus their books, many whereof were spoiled with wet and worm-eaten, out of a desire he had to repair those places which were gnawn out, he transcribed the books afresh, but was mightily out in filling up the void places; so that at the books he set forth abounded with Errata's. Upon the decease of Apellion Sylla took his Library to himself, [Sirach, lib. 13. pag. 609.] and enriched his own Library at Rome therewith, [Lucian in lib. adv. Cris. inductum.]

Mithridates, being returned unto Pontus, reduced in a very short time many of those Nations which, when he was in his low ebb, revolted from him, [Memnon, cap. 37.] beginning first with the Colchi. But they, when they saw him marching towards them, desired of him that his son Mithridates might be appointed King over them: which was no sooner granted, but they returned to their obedience. The King being jealous that his sons ambition was the cause of that motion, called him to him, and bound him with fetters of gold for a while, and not long after put him to death: Notwithstanding the singular good service he had done him in Asia against Fimbria, [Appian, in Mithridatic. pag. 213, 214.]

When Sylla lay at Athens, a bounding distemper fell into his feet, which made him fall to Adipisus, and there he used the hot baths, keeping holiday all the while, spending his time at stage-plays, [Plutarch in Sylla.]

Sylla arrived with his army at Byzantium, in the CLXXIV. Olympiad, [Appian, Bell. Civil. lib. 1. pag. 401.] L. Scipio and C. Cæsarbus being Consuls, [Liv. lib. 83. Julius Obsequens de prodigiis, Eutropius, lib. 5.] returning into Italy, on the fourth year after his putting out thence, and not after the fifth year, as Julius Obsequens hath delivered it.

The Thebans having revolted from Ptolemei Lathurus, he waged war against them, [Pausan. in Attic. pag. 8.]

L. Lucullus was very desirous to bring the Mitylenæans, who had openly revolted from Sylla's side, to acknowledge their fault, and to submit to some ease punishment for following Marius. But when he saw they grew more furious upon it, he set upon them with his Fleet, vanquished them, and forced them to retire within their Walls. Whilst he beleaguered the Town in the day time he sailed openly towards Elia; but came back again privately in the night, and cast anchor, having placed an ambuscade near the City. The Mitylenæans came tumbling out of the Town in great disorders and very furiously, with an intention of seizing of the Camp, supposing it had been deserted by the enemy: but Lucullus came upon them ere they were aware, and took a great number of them prisoners: of those that resisted he slew five hundred; led away six thousand slaves, and took with him a huge booty, [Plutarch in Lucullo.]

Mithridates provided a Fleet and a great army to go against the Bosporanæ, who had shaken off their allegiance to him. The preparation he made was so considerable, that most thought (as Cicero intimeth in Oratio pro lege Manilia) he never intended to make use of it against the Bosporanæ, but against the Romans: for neither had he as yet, resigned to Ariobarzanes the whole and entire possession of Cappadocia, but reserved some places thereof to himself; and did also suspect Archelaus, as if (when he was in Greece) he had granted more to Sylla than was meet, in the Articles of peace, [Appian, in Mithridatic. pag. 214.]

Archelaus posted away in a flight to L. Munæra: and by his instigation prevailed with him to be beforehand with Mithridates, and to war upon him first: as Appian hath in his Mithridatic. And that Archelaus revolted to Sylla (whose Deputy Munæra was in Asia) Dio writes in his 39 book: and that he and his wife and children went to the same Sylla, Orosius delivers, [in lib. 6. cap. 2.] So that small credit in this particular is to be given to Memnon, who hath delivered, that Archelaus, did not only abide all the while with Mithridates; but that he did also stand stoutly to him in the last Mithridatic war, [Vid. sup. ann. Mæand. 3919.]

L. Munæra, out of an itching desire he had to ride in Triumph, renews the war with Mithridates, [Liv. lib. 86. Appian, in Mithridatic. pag. 213.] For passing thorough Cappadocia he made an invasion upon Comana the greatest City under Mithridates his command, and famous for the Religion and costly Temple that was therein: and besides this, he killed some of the Kings Cavaliers, [Appian, ibid. pag. 214.]

Mithridates dispatched some Ambassadors to Murena; who, being Grecians by birth, and Philosophers by profession, did rather condemn, than commend the King. Upon their pleading the articles of peace concluded with Sylla; Murena denied that he ever did see any such covenants: for Sylla never wrote any, but contenting himself with the execution of what was agreed betwixt them, left the Country. Thus said, Murena falls presently to plundering, not sparing the monies which was consecrated for holy uses; and to taking up his winter quarters in Cappadocia, he made the kingdom thereof furer to Ariobarzanes, than ever it was, and built the City Ecinima upon the frontiers of Mithridates his kingdom. [Memnon, cap. 38. Appian, pag. 214.]

Seeing now by reason of the mutual enmity of the Seleucidae amongst themselves, both the Kings and kingdom of Syria were quite exhausted by a deadly war; the people thereof ran to strangers for succour, and began to look towards foreign Kings; some judging it most convenient to call Mithridates King of Pontus, others to invite Ptolemei out of Egypt, but considering again with themselves, how that Mithridates was engaged already in a war with the Romans, and that Ptolemei had ever been a professed enemy to Syria, they generally concluded upon Tigranes King of Armenia, who besides his own strength at home, was fortified with the Parthian association to boot, and an affiance with Mithridates. Upon this he was called into the kingdom of Syria, and kept it 18 years. [Justin, lib. 40, cap. 1. & 2.] until such time that Pompei deprived him of it, and laid it to the Roman Empire.

Fourteen of these 18 years, Magadates was over Syria, with an army, as Tigranes his Vice-Roy, until such time as he was forced to march away with that army to the relief of his King: But upon the defeating of Tigranes, the kingdom of Syria was by Lucullus given to Antiochus Asiaticus. [Appian, in Syria, pag. 118, 119. & 133.] In the interim, Antiochus Pius (father to this Asiaticus) who was by Tygranes dispossessed of Syria, as far as from Euphrates to the sea shore; and by him dispossessed also of part of Cilicia, kept closea while in another corner of Cilicia, which as yet neither Tigranes nor the Romans had meddled with. [Appian, in Mithridatic, pag. 243. Justin, lib. 40, cap. 2.] But his wife Selene, with her twosons, reigned in Phenicia, and some other parts of the lower Syria; as we gather out of the 13 book of Josephus, cap. ult. and in the fourth of Cicero in Verrem.

Mithridates sent both to the Senate and to Sylla, to complain of Murena. [Appian, pag. 214.] And both he and Murena sending Ambassadors one against the other, to cite the Heraclians for supplies. But in regard the power of the Romans seemed dreadful to them on the one side, and that they feared the necessity of Mithridates on the other side, they answered the Ambassadors; That in such a storm of war as this, they had much ado to secure their own houses, much less could they attend the relief of others. [Memnon, cap. 38.]

Alexander Jannæus was Gaulana and Seleucia. [Josephus, lib. 13, cap. 23.]

Murena, having waited over Halys, a great river of it self, and at that time swelled with violent rains, took 400 of Mithridates his Villages; the King making no opposition at all, expecting the returne of his Ambassadors from Rome. Murena, when he thought he had got booty enough, returned back again into Phrygia and Galatia; where Callidius, who was sent to him from Rome upon Mithridates his complaints, presented him indeed with no decree of the Senate, but denounced in the open audience of all, that he should forbear any farther to molest the King, who was a confederate with the Romans. This said, he took him aside, in the presence of others, and talked with him privately; yet for all this did not Murena abate any whit of his former violence, but at that instant made incursions upon the frontiers of Mithridates. [Appian, pag. 214. & 215.]

Some, and those not a few, advised Murena to invade Sinope, and attempt the getting of the Kings palace it self; for that being once taken, other places would be subdued without any difficulty. But Mithridates, having well fortified that place with garriſons, begins now to fall to the business himself. [Memnon, cap. 38.] And having commanded Gordius to fall upon the neighbouring Villages, he himself got together many cattle, and carriages, Countrymen as well as Souldiers, and pitched on the other side of the bank, opposite to Murena his Camp. Neither parties engaged, until Mithridates was come with a greater army, and then there followed a bloody fight betwixt them. There the King got over the river in sight of Murena's teeth: having also got the better of Murena otherways, the King plyed him so hard, that he was forced to retreat to a hill naturally fortified, and make what halt he could through the mountains, to get to Phrygia, having lost many of his men, either in the fight, or in the flight. [Appian, pag. 215.]

This famous, quick, and (as it were by the By got) victory, and bruited abroad by the nimble wing of fame, brought many to side with Mithridates; who having beaten, even out off Cappadocia, all Murena's Garriſon ſouldiers, made a great Bonfire on the top of a high Hill, after his country manner offered sacrifices to Zeus, or to Jupiter powerful in war, [Id. ibid.]

L. Cornelius Sylla, created Dictator, that he might leave to continue (till the ancient model of the Common-wealth, permitted M. Tullius and Cornelius Dolabella to be made Cofsi by the people: although he being evidently sole Monarch over all, was above them too, [Appian, lib. 1, Bell. civil. pag. 412.] In the beginning of whose Consulship he triumphed gloriously over King Mithridates (as Euripus hath it in his fifth book) on the third of the Calends of February (as appears by the pieces of the Marble on which the Triumph was engraved) which day falls upon the Julian November. And although that Triumph was very great in regard of the stateliness of it, and rarity of the spoils they had taken from the King: yet did the new receive a greater lustre and splendor from the exuls. For the most eminent men and chief of the City, bearing Crowns on their heads, attended Sylla's Chariot, calling him their Deliverer, and their Father, in regard they were by his means brought back into their native Country, and had their wives and children restored unto them, [Plutarch in Sylla.]

This one thing of Sylla deserved commendation; that when upon the laying down the command he had in Asia, he rode in Triumph, he did not bear before him the name of any one Town belonging to the Citizens of Rome; as he did of many Cities in Greece and Asia, [Valer. Maximus, lib. 2, cap. 8.] Sylla transferred 30000 pound weight of Gold, and 7000 of Silver, under that account; which his son C. Marius had brought from the conflagration of the Capitol and other devoted places to Praeteste. He also the day before transferred of all the other Spoils of the Victory 50000 pound weight of Gold, and 150000 of Silver, [Plin. lib. 33, cap. 1.] From whence it is plain the Triumph held for two dayes space.

Alexander Jannæus, having reduced under his power the valley (called Antiochus his valley) and the Fort Gamala, put Demetrius Lord of those places beside his command there, having received many accusations against him; and at the just end of the third year of that his Expedition, led his army home again: the Jews giving him a hearty welcome home for his good success he had had. At this time the Jews kept many of the Cities of the Syrians, Idumæans, and Planicians, near the sea coast. The Town of Siraton, Apollonia, Joppe, Jamnia, Azotus, Gaza, Antheodon, Raphia, Rhinocorura. In the Mediterranean parts, in the Country of Idumæa, Adora, and Manſia, and Samaria: the mountains also of Carmel and Iſabry; besides these; Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulanitis, Seleucia, and Gabala; some Moabitish Cities also: Bilebon, Medaba, Lemba, Oronas, Telithon, Zara, Aulon of Cilicia, and Pella: the last of which they demolished, because the inhabitants refused to admit of the Jewish ceremonies. They possessed also some other Cities of Syria, and those no obscure ones, all which they lately annexed to their kingdom, [Joseph. lib. 13, cap. 23.]

L. Cornelius Sylla Dictator, adjudging it a great shame that Mithridates a confederate should be infected with a war, sent Aulus Gabinus, to charge Murena in good earnest, to desist from his hostility with Mithridates: and that he should endeavour to reconcile Mithridates and Ariobarzanes one to the other. At that meeting, having given himſon about 4 years old, as hostage to Ariobarzanes: and that under that pretence, keeping still to himſelf that part of Cappadocia which he had garriſoned, and something else over and above: made a general entertainment for the company: At which he designed a certain weight of Gold to those that should get the better at drinking, or eating, jesting, singing, and other solemn sports: Every body had a share herein, but only Gabinus, [Appian, in Mithridatic, pag. 215, 216.]

Thus was the second Mithridatic war ended, in the third year thereof, [Id. ibid.] In which Murena after he had with a great deal of violence and vigilancy afflicted Mithridates, drew off from him, leaving him rather abated in something, than quite crushed in pieces. As Cicero speaks in his Oration for Murena his son, whom the Orator adds to have been a help to his father in his difficulties, a comfort in his labours, and a rejoicer in his victories. Who also in his 1. lib. against Verres, teacheth how that the people of Miletus upon Murena's order, built 40 ships out of the revenues of the people of Rome, as the several Cities in Asia did proportionally; which Fleet was by covenant to serve the Romans in all extremities as sea war should: as Alconius Pedianus hath noted upon the same book, or the Oration against Verres.

L. Lucullus spent the time of his Quæstorship in the peace of Asia, whilst Murena was waging war in Pontus, [Cicero in Lucullus.]

Sylla Dictator, called Murena out of Asia, [Cicero pro lege Manilia.] M. Thermus succeeded him in the Praetorship of Asia, [Sueton in Julio, cap. 2.] It is probable also that that Lucullus was called back from his Prætorship of the same time with Murena, upon this ground, because he sat upon the bench at Rome, with Aquilius Gallus, the Judge in Quintus his cause; which (as Aulus Gellius lib. 5, cap. 28. and Hieron. in Chronic. tells us) was pleaded by Cicero in the 26 year of his age; M. Tullius, and Cn. Dolobella Consuls.

Alexander Jannæus, as soon as he had a little respite from wars, fell into a disease, a quartan ague which held him three whole years, he might thank his intemperance for it; yet for all that, did not remit any thing of his warlike employments; [Joseph. lib. 1, Bell. cap. 4, & lib. 13, Antiquit. cap. 23.]

L. Murena, being come to Rome, triumphed very honourably; his son graced his triumph with some military pretences; who served under him whilst he was General, and made his fathers victory and triumph, the only end of his taking up his arms, [Cicero pro Murena.]

Mithridates, being now at leisure, subdued Bosphorus, and appointed Machares, one of his sons, King over that nation, [Appian. pag. 216.]

Molo, the Rhetorician, coming Ambassadors to the Senate, concerning the rewards of the Rhodians, was the first of any strangers that had audience without an interpreter: He deserved that honour, in regard the Roman eloquence was beholden to him for that force and vigour, which it hath; at which time Cicero himself plied under him, [Cicero in Bruto, Valerius Maximus, lib. 2, cap. 2.] as he had done also some six years before, as we have hinted in its due place.

Julius Cæsar being sent by M. Thernus Prætor of Asia, sent into Bithynia to fetch the fleet, married a while with Nicomedes: It was whispered abroad, how that he had prostituted his chastity for the Kings lust to tyre upon; and the bruit was improved by his going to Bithynia again in a very short time, under pretence of getting in some monies which were due to a certain free man, one of his clients. [Sueton. in Julio, cap. 2.]

L. Cornelius Sylla, Dictator, whereforever he found amongst the slaves of those persons he had persecuted a lusty young fellow, he made him one of the commons; and of these he made above 10000, first conferring on them their freedom and enfranchisements, and called them Cornelians, after their Patrons name: the policy of this was, that he might be sure of a party of 1000 in the City amongst the commons, to side with him upon all emergencies whatsoever, [Appian. lib. 1, Bell. Civil. pag. 413, & 416.] Servius upon the tenth of the Enclides, reckons Polyhistor, to be one of those which were made free Demozons by Sylla. And that Alexander Polyhistor lived in Syllaes time, was made free, and surname Cornelius (although he was to be called from his Patron Cornelius Lentulus, to whom he was sold, and whose School-master he was made) is confirmed by Suidas in Ἀναξάνδρου τοῦ Μαντιῶ. For he calls this Grammarian Crætus his Scholler, Mithridem: whom Stephanus Byzantinus avows to be the son of Alcibiades of Cocyteum, a City in the lesser Phrygia, and to have written 42 books of all kind of things. Concerning whom, Eusebius is to be consulted, [lib. 9, Evangelic. Preparat. cap. 17.] where also he cites many passages out of the book he wrote concerning the Jews.

Ptolemy Lathurus, having reduced the Thebæans in the third year of their revolt, fined them to extrem rigorously, that whereas before they could outvie the richest Cities in all Greece for wealth; they had not now left them the least print of their former fortune. So Paulanias in his Atticks, [pag. 8.] relating this, as if it belonged to the Boeotian Thebes, and not to the Egyptians. Whereas we have observed out of Appians Mithridaticks, [pag. 190.] how that almost at the very same time in which the Thebæans revolted from Ptolemy, that greater Thebes of Boeotia, fell off from Archelaus, Mithridates his General, to Sylla the Roman General.

But this Ptolemy Lathurus, dyed not long after. [Paulanias in supra.] 36 years and six months, after the decease of his brother Philometor. His daughter Cleopatra, wife of Ptolemy Alexander (who was younger brother to Lathurus, and had killed his mother, who was compartner with him in the throne) succeeded him; she reigned six months, [Porphyry in Græc. Euseb. Sciliger. pag. 225.] Paulanias avows that of all Lathurus his issue, Berenice was only legitimate, [in supra] who dying before his father, her Bastard issue, Ptolemæus, seized the kingdom of Cyprus, Cleopatra, and after her Nephew Dionysius, or Auletes the kingdom of Egypt, unless happily the whom Porphyrius calls Cleopatra, be the same with her whom Paulanias names Berenice.

Sylla Dictator, sent Alexander son of that Ptolemy Alexander, who killed his mother (whom he had admitted to his own familiar acquaintance, and brought along with him out of Asia) to the Alexandrians, to be their King: their issue made failing, and the women being forced to have some of their own blood for their husbands; Sylla's drift was, the hopes he had of getting together a good hord of gold out of that wealthy kingdom, [Appian. Bell. Civil. lib. 1, pag. 414.]

C. Julius

C. Julius Cæsar in the gaining of Mitylene was rewarded by M. Thernus, with corona civica, [Sueton in Julio cap. 2.] Mitylene was quite demolished to the ground: It was the only City which kept up arms after Mithridates was delected, [Livy, lib. 89.] And lo that noble City by the law of Wars, and right of Conquest, was brought under the jurisdiction of the people of Rome, [Cicero in Agraria, 2.]

Alexander, having taken to wife Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, after he had reigned 19 days with her, killed her, [Porphyry in supra.] Appian writes how that this King, being very domineering and insolent upon presumption of his interest in Sylla, was by the Alexandrians on the 19 day of his reign, dragged out of his Palace into the place of exercise, and there put to death. But it will appear out of Suetonius and Cicero, that he reigned 15 years after the death of his wife; against the common error of Historians and Chronologers; who begin the reign of Ptolemy Auletes here, and conlound his years with the years of Alexander.

Mithridates, making attempts upon the Achæans, neighbours to the Colchians, who were (as some phanfic) reliques of those who returning from Troy, came thither upon mistake of their way, lost two moieties of his army; partly by being circumvented with an ambush: partly in plain fight, and the hardneste of the weather, [Appian. pag. 216.]

Mithridates, at his return home, sent some to Rome to copy the articles of the League betwixt him and Sylla. Ariobarzanes also sent others, either voluntarily, or by the instigation of others, to inform that Cappadocia was not entirely resigned unto him, and that Mithridates did keep back the greater part of it to himself. But Mithridates was commanded by Sylla to quit Cappadocia, before the Articles should be enrolled, [Id. ibid.]

After the Province of Cilicia was stiled, Cn. Dolobella was sent thither to be Proconsul: Cicero affirms, that there was added to this Province, besides the three Territories of her own, the Pamphylian, Iauric, and the Cilician, three other Territories of Asia; the Cibynic, Synnadenian, and Appamenean, situate in the Regions of Phrygia, Pisdia, and Lycæonia. But when Dolobella bringing along with him C. Maliculus his Questor, and C. Verres his Lieutenant, was come as far as Delos: Verres there caused some ancient images in the night time to be taken covertly out of the Temple of Apollo, &c. to be put abroad the ship that was appointed to carry burthens. Upon the sudden there arose such a violent tempest, that Dolobella could not only not possibly lanch forth, when he would, but had much ado to abide at anchor in the haven, so monstrously did the waves beate against the ships. The ship which was fraught with the images being driven and cast out by the violence of the waves, is split; those images of Apollo are found floating upon the shoare: by Dolobellas order they are layed up again in the Temple, the tempest abates, Dolobella looses from Delos, [Cicero alt. 2, in Verrem, lib. 1.]

The same Verres carried away very neate images from Chios, Erythræ, and Halicarnalus. He took also from Tenedos (to the great grief of the City) the Statue of Teneas, a very curious piece. It is said that he built the City, and that it was called Tenedos from his name, [Id. ibid.]

Verres, having by his importunity prevailed with Dolobella, that he might be sent to the King, Nicomedes of Bithynia, and Sadala of Thrace, Allies of the people of Rome, came to Lamplacus in the Hellepont: where, upon Rubrius his Pages attempting to carry to Verres the daughter of one Philodamus, a most eminent Citizen: the Lampfacens by the perswasion of Themistagoras and Theffalus, came flocking together in the night to protect the Virgins chastity: in the hurly burly Cornelius, Verres his licour, was slain outright, and some of his servants, whereof Rubrius was one, received some cuts: They had much ado also to lave the Lieutenants house from being fired. Dolobella upon Verres his suite, giving over the war (which at that time was by him managed in Cilicia) and marching out of that Province into Asia, obtained of C. Nero (who succeeded M. Thernus in the Prætorship of Asia) that Philodamus and his son might after judgement passed upon them, be beheaded, [Id. ibid. compared with Asconius Pedianus upon the same.]

Charidemus, Captain of a ship at Chius, being commanded by Dolobella to attend Verres departing Asia, came with him as far as Samos: where Verres assaulted the most ancient Temple of Juno of Samos, and carried from thence the Pictures and the Images. The Samians went to the Chians and charged Charidemus with the sacrilege: but he made it evidently appear, that what was done, was none of his doings, but Verres his. Upon this, Embassadors came from Samos to C. Nero into Asia, to complain of him: who received this answer; That such complaints as these, which concern the people of Rom's Legate, ought not to be carryed to the Prætor, but to Rome, [Cicero ibid.]

The

The Milesians had a fleet, which upon covenant the people of Rome were to make use of upon any occasion at sea. Verres demanded of them one of those ships to attend him as a convoy to Myndus; they immediately furnished him with a gallant ship, the choicest of ten, and well trimmed. Verres, as soon as he arrived at Mindus, commanded the Souldiers and the Sailors to return to Mileum on foot by land, and sold the ship to L. Magius, and L. Fannius, who left Marius his army, and came to live at Mindus, but afterwards they sided with Sertorius and Mithridates. He that had the command of the ship, declares what Verres had done: the Milesians caused the Declaration to be entered into the publick registry. But Cn. Dolabella, upon Verres his request, did his best to have him, that made the Declaration, punished, and besides that, gave strict charge to have the Declaration taken out of the rolls again. [Id. ibid. compared with Asconius Pedianus upon him.]

C. Malleolus, C. Dolabella's Questor, being slain in the war, Verres forthwith obtained the office of Questor-ship from Dolabella, who, having gotten the guardianship of a Ward, began to finger his goods. [Ibid.]

When the Provinces were allotted to the Consuls, Cilicia fell to Servilius, Macedonia to Appius, Claudius Servilius having gone to Tarentum to visit his Collegue, who lay sick there, took his journey to the City Corycum; [Salust. Historia, lib. 1. apud Priscian, lib. 15.] being ordered to go to quell the Pirate, who, under the conduct of Hifodorus, roved about in the next sea, (betwixt Crete and Cyrena, Achaea, and the creek of Malea) which from the spoyls was called the Golden Sea. [Flor. lib. 3. cap. 6.] Julius Caesar served under Servilius, but it was for a very short time, [Sueton. in Julia, cap. 3.] and L. Flaccus was Tribune of the Souldiers, [Cicero pro Flacco.]

Cn. Dolabella, being called home from his province of Cilicia, and accused of extortion at Rome, by a young fellow, M. Emilius Scaurus, was condemned, and sent away unto banishment. The Action was estimated at thirty hundred thousand sesterces, merely upon those particulars. This his Questor C. Verres had exacted above measure from the Cities of Lycia, Pamphilia, Pisdia, and Phrigia, corn, hides, hair-cloths, facks and such wares: and that he did not receive them in kind, but exacted money for them. Verres himself, who was the main actor in the business, and a complice, gave strong evidence against him. For Verres was unwilling to give account of his Lieutenant-ship, and his questor-ship, till such time that Dolabella (who only knew where to find fault with them) was condemned and ejected. [Cicero, ad. 2. in Verre lib. 1. Vid. Pighius Annal. Rom. tom. 3. pag. 280, 281. & 286, 287.]

Alexander Janæus, tyred out with his quartan ague, and on that consideration, engaging himself in an unreasonable warfare, at length being quite spent, dyed in the confines of the Gerasens, having reigned 27 years. At that instant he was besieging Ragaba Castle, which is situated beyond Jordan. Upon his death-bed, he advised his wife Alexandra, to conceal his death for a while from the knowledge of the Souldiers: and that after she were returned in conquest to Jerusalem in great state, she should give the Pharisees a little more freedom than ordinary; in regard that those kind of people had a great influence upon the Jews, when they had a mind, either to do a third turn to an enemy, or to pleasure a friend. For the common people did place a great deal of confidence in them, though prone through envy to appeach any man whatsoever: and that he himself got the ill will of that nation for no other cause; but that he had given some offence to that sect. He persuaded her therefore, that she would give way, that they might have the disposal of his corps, and that she would not act any thing in state-administrations, but upon their determinations, and good liking; and so it would fall out, that both he should be the more honourably interred, and she and her son should reign without molestation. [Joseph lib. 1. Bell. Judaic. cap. 4. & lib. 13. Antiquit. cap. 23. compared with lib. 20. cap. 8.]

Queen Alexandra (called also Selena, by Ecclesiastical Writers) having taken the Castle Ragaba, according to her husbands intimations, left all things concerning either his Corps, or the kingdom to the discretion of the Pharisees, and thereby reconciled them to her, that they became her friends, who before were her most implacable enemies. Hecupud did the Pharisees assemble the common people, and made a speech to them, crying up the famous exploits of Alexander, and bemoaning what a good King they had lost. They wrought upon the people, that they sided all their hearts, and caused them to put finger in eye: neither was there any King before him, for whom they made so stately a funeral. [Id. lib. 13. Antiquit. cap. 24.]

It seemed, that Alexander drawing on towards his end, had in his last will and testament both left the administration of the kingdom to his wife Alexandra, and also the election of the High Priest to her discretion. She declared Hyrcanus her eldest eldest son High Priest, not so much for the prerogative of his years, as for that the law he was a meer slug, one that had no metal in him, and so little fear of his attempting any thing against that power he had gotten into her hands. As for her younger son Arithobulus, he was very well contented that he should live a private life, in regard he was of a more fiery and brightly disposition than his brother. She governed the kingdom nine years, her son Hircanus holding the High-priesthood all that while. She was very gracious with the people, both because of the favour she was in with the Pharisees, as also because she seemed to be much troubled at her husbands exorbitance. To speak truth, she was only honoured with the bare title of Queen: the Pharisees had the managing of all State-affairs, to whom also, the people were expressly charged to give obedience: So that, if it appeared that Hircanus her father in law had abrogated any of the ordinances, which the Pharisees had brought in according to the traditions of their Elders, whatsoever it was, she caused it forthwith to be restored, and put in force again: the Pharisees also gave order for the calling back of exiles, and for the release of prisoners. Yet some things there were which the woman her self ordered and disposed: and besides she maintained a great number of hired souldiers, and did so mightily improve her strength, that she was formidable to the neighbouring Princes, and took hostages of them, [Id. ibid. compared with lib. 26. Antiquit. cap. 8. & lib. 1. Bell. cap. 4.]

Mithridates, upon an expresse from Sylla, restored all Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes; and thereupon dispatched away Embassies to Rome to get the Articles of the Peace to be enrolled. [Appian, pag. 126.]

M. Lepidus, and Q. Catulus Cossi: Sylla died, [Liv. lib. 90. Appian, lib. 1. Bell. Civil. pag. 416.] He made an end of the 22 book of his Commentaries, two dayes before his death: he said, That the Chaldeans had foretold him, how, that after he had lived very splendidly for a while, he should dye in the flower of his felicity. [Plutarch in Sylla.] He bequeathed in his Will thye his Commentaries to Lucullus, whom moreover, he nominated upon his death-bed, as Guardian to his son; passing by Pompey: which one thing, was thought to be the very source from whence sprang that grudge and emulation which ensued betwixt those two, both of them being youths, and their bloods boiling with a desire of glory. [Id. in Lucullus.]

M. Cicero, after he had been six months at Athens with Antiochus Asiaticus, a most Renowned and most Sage Philosopher of the ancient Academies, and with Demetrius Syrus, a well experienced, and no mean Orator, hearing of Sylla his death, sailed into Asia: and travelling cleane thorough that Country, exercised his faculty with the choicest Oratours in those parts. The chief of them were, Menippus a Stratonicean (surnamed Carocæ, of Caria) Dionysius Magnes, Elchylus a Cnidian, and Xenocles an Adramyteean, [Cicero in Brutus, & Plutarch in Cicero: compared with Strabo lib. 13. pag. 614. & lib. 14. pag. 660. and with Diogenes Laertius in Menippus.]

At the same time also, a certain woman of Mileum was sentenced to death, for that she had caused an abortion to her self by poisons; being hired thereunto for a piece of money by those which were the second heirs; neither had she more than the deserved: who had by that one fact of hers destroyed, the hope of a parents memory of a name, the support of a kindred, the heir of a family, and in all likelihood, a Citizen of the Common-wealth. [Cicero pro Anio Cneio.]

P. Servilius Proculus, subdued Cilicia: He fo disordered the Pirats light and flying Barks with his heavy men of War, that he got a bloody victory over them, [Liv. lib. 90. Flor. lib. 3. cap. 6. Eutrop. lib. 6.] He let upon Cilicia and Pamphilia with that violence, that he almost utterly ruined them, being desirous only to bring them under. [Oros. lib. 5. cap. 23.]

Julius Caesar, upon the bruit of Syll's death, left Cilicia, and returned in all haste to Rome. [Sueton in Julia, cap. 3.]

In regard that Mithridates (Sylla being now dead) could hear nothing from the Magistrats at Rome, concerning his Embassie: to the Senate: the King suborned Tigranes his son in law, to make an invasion upon Cappadocia, yet was not the plot carried to covertly, but the Romans had an inkling of it, [Appian in Mithridatic. pag. 216.] Amongst whom, Salust (in lib. 1. histor.) brings in L. Philippus, (in an Oration of his at that time before the Senate against Lepidus) speaking in this manner. Mithridates in latere vestigium nostrorum quibus, &c. id est: Mithridates lies upon the borders of our revenues, which we yet enjoy, watching an opportunity to make war upon us.

Tigranes, having encompassed Cappadocia round as it were with a net, that no one could escape him, brought away with him from thence about 300000 men, and carried them into Armenia, assigning them places with others to inhabit: where he first put the Crown of the kingdom of Armenia upon his head, and called the place

Tigranocerta, that is, the City of Tigranes. [Id. ibid.] He built the City betwix Iberia and Zagma, which lies near Euphrates, and peopled it, with those men he brought out of the twelve Cities of Greece, which he had wasted. [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 532.] In that City there were abundance of Greeks, driven out of Cilicia, many Barbarians running the same fortune with them Greeks, Adiabaniens, Assyrians, Gordyens, Cappadocians, all whom he brought thither, having ruined their several Countries, and forced them to replant there. [Plutarch in Lucullo.] At this very time also, at which he wasted Cappadocia thus with his incursions, he drove the Mazaceans out from their habitations, and carried them into Meloporamia, and stocked the greater part of Tigranocerta with those inhabitants. [Strabo, lib. 12. cap. 539.]

Geminus, an excellent Mathematician, wrote his book of Astronomy, out of which Proclus his Sphere is taken 120 years after that the Egyptians Isis fell on Eudoxus his winter Solstice, or the 28 of December; as he himself shews in [cap. 6. Vid. ann. Mundi 3807. a.]

M. Cicero being come to Rhodes, applied himself to the same Molon, whom he had formerly heard at Rome; he was both an excellent pleader in true causes, and a good writer, and also very discreet in taxing and noting of faults, and wise in instructing, and in teaching, he did the best he could to keep Cicero within the Channel, and to repress him in regard that he did, by a kind of youthful licentiousness, commonly over doe, and as it were, overflow. [Cicero in Bruto.]

At the same time Apollonius, a great master of Oratory, grew in great esteem; whom Strabo surnames Μελανθεύς, or the Soft, and others Molo: which is the reason that some (amongst whom Quintilian is one, lib. 12. cap. 6.) confound him with the other Molon. They were both of them Alabandians of Caria, Schollers of Menelaus the Alabandian, and both coming out of his School, professed the same art at Rhodes; although Molon came thither later than the other: which was the ground of Apollonius his applying that of Homer to him, Ἰσχυρότατος. [Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 655, 660, 661.] Cicero always calls out of them Molon; the other in lib. 1. de oratore, he calls Apollonius the Alabandian: where M. Antonius is brought in thus speaking of him, For this one thing I always liked that famous teacher, Apollonius the Alabandian: who although he taught for money, yet did he not suffer any whom he thought incapable of being made an Orator, to lose their labour with him, but sent them home again; and that his custom was to exhort and persuade every one to buckle himself to that art, he in his judgements thought him most fit and inclinable unto.

It is reported of this Apollonius, that in regard he was not through paced in the Roman tongue, he desired Cicero to declaim in Greek: Cicero was well enough contented with the motion, supposing that Apollonius could the better correct him in case he should do any thing amiss, whilst others stood in a maze admiring him, and others strived to outvie one another in applauding him, Apollonius was observed neither to look cheerfully any time of that while he was speaking, and after he had done, to sit a good time, as it were musing, and pensive. But at last, perceiving Cicero took home regret at this his carriage, he said thus: Truly Cicero I commend and admire thee; yet I cannot but pity Greece her condition: when I see the two only ornaments which were left us, Learning and Eloquence: that they also should be by thee carried away to the Romans. [Plutarch in Ciceroe.]

Cicero heard Posidonius the Philosopher at Rhodes, as Plutarch affirms, and Cicero himself reckons him in the list of those which instructed him; [in lib. 1. de natura Deorum, & lib. de fato.] As for this Posidonius, Philosopher of the Stoick Sect, he was indeed born at Apamea in Syria; but being in process of time made a Citizen of Rhodes: he was called a Rhodian, as appears by Strabo, [lib. 14. pag. 654.] and out of Athenaeus, [lib. 6. cap. 6.] where this also is to be noted by the By: that, whereas Josephus writes, how that Posidonius and Apollonius of Malon, or Molon (as it is writ elsewhere) afforded to Apion the Grammarian, matter for those his fables, concerning the Jews and their Temples, [lib. 2. contra Apion, pag. 1065.] by the name of the first he means, this Posidonius the Apameian, Cicero's Master in the Stoick Philosophy: out of the books of whole Histories, we have quoted so many passages above: but by the name of the later, that Apollonius we last spoke of, or rather that Molon his equal, who (as above said) is reckoned by Cicero [in his Bruto] amongst the Writers, and by some deemed to be one and the same person with that Apollonius.

P. Servilius, Proconsul in Cilicia, subdued the Iaur's, and wan some Cities of the Pyrates. [Liv. lib. 93.] He demolished the City Iaura it self, and dismantled many forts which the Pyrates held along the sea coast. [Strabo] who saith, that he had seen Servilius, [lib. 12. pag. 568, 569. & lib. 14. pag. 665.] He took Lycia also, and the Cities

Cities of note therein, having besieged them, & forced them to resign. Besides, he roved all over the mountain Olympus, and levelled to the ground three great Cities: Olympus, Phaelis, and Corycum. He was the first of any Romans that led an Army through Taurus, he made it the bound of his march, and having taken a strict view of the side of the mountains which incline towards Cilicia, he brought the Iauri, quite worn out with the wars, under the power of the Romans. [Oros. lib. 5. cap. 23. compared with Florus, lib. 3. cap. 6. with Salust. lib. 1. Histor. and Priscianum lib. 15. with Africanus Pedianus, in 3. Verriam, and with Eutropius, lib. 6.] Cicero in his first and second Agraria, confirms, how that the Countries of the Atrialians, Phaelians, Olympians, and the Country of the Agaracules, Oindians, and Gedulians were brought in to the people of Rome, by Servilius his victory. Cicero also [in 40 contra Verrem lib.] adds this passage particularly concerning Phaelis. That Phaelis which P. Servilius took, was not at first a City of Cilicians and Thieves: Lycians, who were Grecians, inhabited it: But in regard it was situated in such a place, and lay so high and strong, that the free booters which came out of Cicily, necessarily had recourse thither: the Pyrates associated with that Town, first by commerce, and after by alliance.

L. Magius, and L. Fannius, both runnagados out of Fimbria's army, joyned themselves with Mithridates, and persuaded them to enter into an association of wars with Sertorius, who at that time was up in arms in Spain against the Romans. Mithridates sent these two as his Ambassadors with letters to Sertorius, promising him a supply of money and ships for the war, and requiring of him in lieu thereof his confirmation of all Asia unto him, which he had resigned up to the people of Rome, upon the articles of peace betwix him and Sylla.

The Ambassadors being come into Italy in that bark which the Mithridians bought of Verres: and from thence halting away to get to Sertorius: The Senate noted their enemies to the State, and ordered to attach them: yet, for all that they could doe, they got safe to Sertorius: who, having called together an assembly of his own friends about him, which he called his Senate; he would by no means allow of those conditions, although all the rest were generally for them: For he denied that he would ever give way that the Province of Asia, which he had unjustly taken from the people of Rome, and which, after Fimbria had wrested it from him again by force of arms, he had returned back upon articles with Sylla, should ever relapse into Mithridates his power again. But as for Bithynia and Cappadocia, which had ever been under his command, and did not at all belong to the people of Rome, he did not envy him these; yet, upon these terms, the league was concluded betwix them, and confirmed by mutual oaths; That Mithridates should supply Sertorius with 3000 talents, and forty ships; and that Sertorius on the other side should make him a grant of Cappadocia and Bithynia (to which two Appian adds, not only Paphlagonia, and Galatia, but Asia it self also) and that he should send him a General and Soldiers accordingly. Mithridates dispatched into Asia the General which was sent him; M. Marius, (Appian calls him, Varius) one of the Senators which were banished; and joyned with him the two Lucii, Magius and Fannius, to be as his Counsellors, who, looting from Dianium, a sea town of Spain, arrived at Sinope of Pontus, where Mithridates then was; upon their telling the King how that Sertorius had denied him Asia: the King said to his friends, What will Sertorius sitting in his Palace injoyn hereafter, who, though as far distant from us as the Atlantic Ocean, takes upon him already to prescribe bounds to our kingdom; and to denounce war against us, in case we should attempt any thing upon Asia? For all this, Marcus Marius concluded a league with him to Sylla's content. The King kept Marius with himself, and in a very short time preferred him a General into Archelaus his place, who had deterred him, and turned to Sylla. [Cicero, pro lege Manilia, & pro Marcina, item, alt. in Verrem, lib. 1. compared with Africanus Pedianus in eundem, Livie lib. 93. Plutarch in Sertorio. Appian in Mithridate, pag. 216, 217. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 2.]

After the Capitol was rebuilt (together with which (some eleven years before) the books of Sybilla were burnt) C. Curio the Consul motions the Senate, That some Ambassadors should be sent to Erythra, who were to take care to get the Sybills verses again, and bring them to Rome. P. Gabinus, M. Oracilius, and L. Valerius were sent upon that errand, who got those verses transcribed by private hands, and brought them to Rome: and Curio and Octavius, the Consuls, laid them up in the Capitol, which then was repaired again by Q. Catulus. [Festus, quoted by Lactantius, lib. 1. institut. cap. 6. & lib. de ira Dei cap. 22.] Upon which grounds Varro says that Erythra was believed ved to have writ those books of the Sybils, which the Romans have recourse unto; because those Verles were found in the Island Erythraea, after the firing of Apollo's Temple, in which those books were laid up: if we may credit Servius, [in Æneid. 6.] For the Temple which was burnt was not Apollo's, but Jupiter Capitolinus his: and although after the Temple was repaired, Embassadours were sent by order of the Senate to Erythra in Asia, to get those Verles transcribed: yet those books which were afterward extant and brought to Rome, were not got out of Erythra onely, but procured from other Cities besides, both Italian and Grecian; and out of private mens Libraries also, under what name soever of the Sybills those books went: in which also many things are found to be suppositions, as appears by the difference of those which they call Actiocrifices. As we find out of Varroes own books of divining things: to be related by Dionysius Halicarnassensis, [lib. 4. antiquit. Roman.] and by Lactantius Firmianus, [lib. 1. in Instit. cap. 6.] and Tacitus also in [lib. 6. Annal.] hath declared how, That the Verles of Sybilla, whether one or more, were sought for in Samos, Troy, Erythra; and thorough all Africa also, and Sicily, and the Italian Colonies: and that the Prophets had in charge, with all the care that mortal men could take, to discover the true from the false.

Pliny in the 2nd book of his natural History, cap. 35, reports, how that in the time of Cn.O. Varus, a Scythian Curio Collis, Lucius Syllanus Proculus, and his company, came from a Star, which increased in bulk as it came nearer the earth, and being grown to the bignesse of the Moon, gave as much light as it had been some cloudy night; and when it withdrew upward, the heaven againe it grew into the fashion of a lamp. But seeing that Syllanus is no where found amongst the Roman luminaries, Pighius is of opinion, that instead of Licinius Syllanus in Pliny; it should be L. Junius Syllanus: So that Junius (who about this time was sent with the Proculus authority into Asia in the room of Cn. Nero) might seem with his company to have been an eye-witnesse of this Prodige.

3929. Nicomedes King of Bithynia dying without issue, made the people of Rome his heirs by testament: whereupon his kingdom was reduced unto the form of a Province, [Liv. lib. 93. Vellet. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 4. & 39. Appian. lib. 1. Bell. civil. pag. 420. & Mithridatic. pag. 175. & 218.] To this relates Mithridates his complaint of the Romans in an Epistle of his to Artaces, [lib. 4. Salust. hisfor.] After Nicomedes was dead, they rifled all Bithynia: notwithstanding his son Musius, whom he nominated King, was without all question then born.

In the same year 516 (with which ended the CLXXVI Olympiad,) the people of Rome left their bounds widened by the accele of the Province of Cyrene unto them : Ptolemei Apion the King thereof, of the Family of Lagidarus, having bequeathed it as a Legacy to them ; as Apian writes [in his 1. lib. Bell. civil. pag. 420.] adding moreover in the end of the Mithridaticks ; that this King was a Saitard of the Family of the Lagi : which character of Apian, sheweth that he was the same person with whom Juffin related in lib. 39. cap. 5. to be the sonne to a Curtezan, and who passed over the inheritance of the Crown of Cyrene to the Romans : where notwithstanding hee dees, That that part of Libya was made a Province : whereas we have heard before out of Livie (at the year of the World 598.) how that after Ptolemei Apion's decafe, the Senate of Rome entranchized all the Cities of the kingdom of the Cyreneans : So that, at that time they might seem to have received their grant of freedom, but now to be reduced into the form of a Province. And that then Ptolemei King of Cyrene upon his death-bed, did make the Romans his heirs in his last testament, in the first year of the CLXXI Olympiad : and that afterwards Lybia was left to the Romans as a Legacy by King Apion in the fourth year of the CLXXVIII. Olympiad Hierom hath noted [in Chronico Eusebiano:] placing this later almost eleven years later than Apion's accounts here require. Eutropius hath related this very thing nine years later, viz. That that Cæcilius Metellus's Cretan triumph. At which time (as fayeth he in the sixth of his Breviary) Lybia also was annexed to the Roman Empire by the last will of Apion, who was King thereof : in which Brenice, Ptolemis, and Cyrene, were the Cities of greatest note. Joanneades, [in lib. de regn. & tempor. lucet.] hath thus written concerning this matter. Lybia, that is to say, all Pentapolis, was granted unto its liberty to the Romans by that self Ptolemei : and afterwards rebelling, Apions decree subdued it to the people of Rome. And before him Sixtus Rufus in his Breviary. They were beholden to Ptolemei the elder his bounty for Cyrene, and the other Cities of Lybia Pentapolis : Lybia came to be ours by King Apion's last will and testament, and Ammianus Marcellinus followed him. The dryer Lybia we got into our hands by King Apian's last will : Syrene and the other Cities of Lybia Pentapolis, by Ptolemei's liberality. See the learned Valerius his notes upon the place, who lo explains this History, that he denies that there were two Ptolemei Apions, besides, Cicero [in 2 Agrarias] mentions the Cyrenian lands which were Apionist as Cornelius Tacitus [in 14 annal. lib.] does the land which were once King Apions and by him bequeathed to the people of Rome, together with his kingdom.

The remainder of this Summer, and the whole Winter following, Michridates spent in preparation of wars against the Romans: in felling of Timber, building ships and making arms, [Appian in Michridate, pag. 217.] He contracted his forces to a right and meet cantling; for he dismissed the rabble multitudes, the hideous Barbarians, took away the provision of such arms as were gullt, and let with pretious tones: instead of these, he made (words after the Roman fashion, compelled good substantial Shields, and made a muster rather of well managed and experienced horses, than of those which were neat and handsome. Moreover, he provided ships that were not adorned with Cabbins gutt over, or batis for Curtzeans, or delicate Chambers to keep his women in, but (such as were throwed with arms, darts, and money. [Plutarch in Lucilla]. He carried to sea 200 Myriads of Medimna's of corn. He had supplies ready at hand, besides his old forces, Chalcians, Armenians, Scythians, Taurians, Acheians, Heniochians, Leucifyrians, and those that inhabit about the river Thermoodon, commonly called the land of the Amazons. There came in to him in Afia his old forces. He had supplies also beyond sea out of Europe, Sarmatians, Bafians, Jazygians, Corallians, Thracians, and all the nations which inhabit about the river Ister, and the mountains Rhodope and Æmus; and the Bithynians also, who were the gallantest men and stoutest of them all. [Appian in supra.]

Julius Cæsar, a very youth (about 25 years of age) resolved to withdraw to Rhodes; with an intention, at his leisure to apply himself to Apollonius Molon, the most eminent teacher of Oratory that at that time; as he was sailing higher in the winter quarter, the Pyrates (who now were so well furnished with ships, that they persecuted the sea) took him prisoner about the Island Pharmacusa, (which lies near the Asiatick coast, a few miles above Miletum.) When the Pyrates demanded of him 20 talents for his ransom, Cæsar laughed at them as being ignorant who it was that was their prisoner, and promised that he would give them 50 talents; and sent forthwith his companions, officers and servants to the Cities of Asia, to procure the money for his release; keeping only with him one Physician, and two others to attend him in his Chamber. Being left with these three for 28 days together amongst a company of Cilicians, the most savage of all the people in the World, he behaved himself after that manner, that he struck both a terror and reverence into them: neither would he all that time suffer his throats to be pinched off, or ungirt himself; that, in case there should happen some extraordinary alteration, he might not be suspected by them, who had clapped no other guard upon him, but that of their eyes: wherefore he went to repole himself, and take his rest, he sent one to them to be hully, and keep n d n : and he would familiarly play with them, and exercise with them, as if they had been of his retinue, and not be their prisoners. He wrote verses also and orations, which he pronounced in the midst of them. If any of them did not admire and applaud them, he would call them openly dull fellows, Barbarians; and often in a meriment would threaten to hang them. They were very well pleased with his humour, ascribing that freedom of his tongue to his familiarity and years. [Vallii Paterni, lib.2, cap.41. Sæcon in Julio, cap.4. Plutarch in Cæsare.] It is reported, that whilst he was in hold, he cried out, O Crallus, how wilt thou be tickled at the heart, when thou shalt receive tidings of my captivity. [Plutarch in Mæcio Crasso.]

The monies of all the Cities was brought from Mileum to Caesar, but Caesar would by no means pay down the 50 talents, until he had forced the Pyrates, to deliver up hostages to the Cities: After this, being fed on shore, the night following he gets away from the fleet, such as could scramble together of the luddain, and I wish it, looting out of the port of the Milesians, he made towards the Island, before which the Pyrates as yet lay at anchor: part of their fleet he forced to hoist and away, others of them anchored, and the residue of the ships he boarded, and became master both of them and the men that were in them. Overjoyd with the triumph of the nights expedition, he returned to his company: the Pyrates money he seized upon, as his own booty, and the Pyrates themselves he committed to prison at Pergamum. When he had done that, he went to Junius the Proconsul of Asia, into Bithynia (for he at that time had the command both of Asia and Bithynia, lately reduced into a Province) demanding justice might be done upon the Captives, and crucified them: as in meritment he had often in the Island foretold them he would do. [Parselm. lib. 2. cap. 42. Sueton. & Plutarch (supr.)] But because, before their yielding themselves up, he twice he would crucify them: he first commanded their throats to be cut, and then to be fastened to the Crosses [Sueton. cap. 74.]

The Spring coming on wards, the third Mithridatick war was commenced; which after it had continued for eleven years and an half, was at last ended, by the death of Mithridates himself. Mithridates, having now called in all his fleets together, sacrificed (as his custom was) Reginae Dii, or to Jupiter, powerful in battle, and drowned his Chariot and Horlos in the Sea, as a sacrifice to Neptune; and thus done, made what halt he could into Paphlagonia: with Taxiles and Hermocrates, Generals of his army, [Appian, in Mithridates, pag. 217, 218.] He had in his army 120, (or 140, as Appian hath it) thousand Foot, trained up after the Roman model, 100 thousand Horse, besides a hundred Chariots with Sithes: There followed also the Camp, another great company of such as were to guard the wayes, carry burdens, and of such as did trafficke also, [Id. ibid, in Lucullo.]

Mithridates, as soon as he was arrived at Paphlagonia, made a high vaunting speech to the soldiery; and when he saw he had sufficiently flurried them to a detestation of the Roman, he made an invasion upon Bithynia, which had lately been bequeathed to them by Nicomedes his testament, [Appian, pag. 218.] Livie sayes, that Mithridates got it all into his hands, [Id. 93.] and Plutarch in Lucullo, that he was very willingly entertained by all the Cities of Bithynia.

Alia also, by reason it was most intolerably oppressed by the hard usages of creditous and publicans, lapied to Mithridates, [Plutarch ibid.] He with M. Marius or Varius, (whom Sertorius had sent to him out of Spain to be his General) took some Cities thereof: and when they entered the Cities, the King put Marius formost with the rods and axes, as if he were the supreme Magistrate, and then the King followed, as one of his Officers. Some of the Cities he entranced upon his own score; To others of them, what immunities he granted, he said they came not from him, but were Sertorius his acts of grace. Thus Alia, which before was plagued with the Publicans, and oppressed by the covetousness and abuses of the garrisoned soldiery, begins to pick up again, and did heartily wish, that alteration of Government which was expected, might take effect, [Id. in Sertorio.]

Julius Cæsar, observing what havoc Mithridates made in the adjacent countries, being alhamed to sit still with his hands in his pockets, when the Allies were in that distresse: left Rhodes, whither he was gone, and passed over into Alia: whereto getting together what supplies he could, he drove the Kings Lieutenant clean out of the Province, and by that means kept the Cities, which before were wavering and ready to revolt, constant in their loyalty, [Sueton, in Julio, cap. 4.] although he (Junius) whom the people of Rome had appointed their chief Magistrate in Asia, did out of cowardliness put some remora to his undertakings, [Fellei Patercul, lib. 2, cap. 42.]

Eutropius or Orosius (out of Livie, as their manner is) relate, how that P. Servilius ended the war in Cilicia and Pamphylia within three years, and thereupon was called Isauricus. In Cicero lib. 3. in Verrem (which Orator is called Oratio Frumentaria) he is said to have commanded the army seven years. Whereupon we have referred his first going into the Province to the year before this fifth year, in which also he was Consul. Cicero in lib. 5. contra Verrem, affirms, that this one man took more of the robbers Commanders alive, than all they had done, which had been before him: and how amongst the rest, he recovered one Nico, a famous Pirate, who had broken his chains and escaped, with the same gallantry that he first took him prisoner. Ammianus Marcellinus (in lib. 14. Histories) writes, how that Cilicia and Isauria mutually engaged in a war of piracy, and having some troops of land robbers, were by Servilius the Procurator made to passe sub jugum, and after that made tributary. Jordanes in lib. de regnorum ac temporum successione, writes, how that he overcame Pamphylia, Lycia, (or rather Cilicia, and Pifidia) and reduced them all into Provinces: And that Octavius this yeares Consul, was sent into the Province Cilicia, we gather from Plutarch in Lucullo.

Which way soever Servilius marched, it was a very pretty fight to see the several prisoners and captives he carried along with him: People came flocking unto him from all parts, not only out of those Towns thorough which they marched, but from all the places adjacent, purposely to see: which made the people of Rome take more delight, and to be more pleased with this triumph, than with any that ever had been before, [Cicero, in Verrem, lib. 5.] In this triumph also the several images, and ornaments, which he brought away from the City Olympus after he had taken it, were carried on Chargers in State before him that rode in Triumph: all which he afterwards caused to be entered into the common tables, and brought into the Treasury: wherein the number of those images were not only specified and described, but the bulk, figure, and condition, of each one in particular, [Id. in eundem, lib. 1. & Acon, Pedanius ibid.] Valerius Maximus mentions this Triumph of Servilius, [lib. 8, cap. 5.] Eutropius, Sextus Rufus, and Claudian the Poet, (in lib. 1. in Eutropium,) thus speak of him:

Indomitos currus Servilium egit Isaurus,

Servilius Charioted th' untam'd Isaurus.

M. Antonius,

M. Antonius (father to M. Antonius the Triumvir,) having by the favour of Cotta the Consul, and Cæthegus his faction, obtained of the Senate, an unlimited command: for guarding of all the sea coasts, wheretoever the people of Rome had any command: and being a most vile person himself, had his companions forced accordingly, wasted Sicily, and all the Provinces, [Cicero, att, 2. in Verrem, lib. 2. Lactant, Institut, lib. 1. cap. 11. Acon, Pedanius in Divinationem, and and upon the foretold place of Cicero, contra Verrem.]

The Province of Gallia Cisalpina, fell to L. Lucullus the Consul, but Octavius, dying, who held Cilicia, Lucullus having by the means of Plætia, a common flatterer, made Cæthegus his friend, who at that time bore all the sway at Rome, got the Province Cilicia assigned to him; and in regard that Cappadocia lay near to Cilicia, they generally voted that Lucullus should undertake the Mithridatic war. Yet M. Cotta his Colleague in the Consulship, after much importunity, prevailed with the Senate, that he might be sent with a fleet to guard the Propontis and defend Bithynia, [Plutarch in Lucullo.] And so both the Consuls were sent to this war: the one was to make good Bithynia, the other to follow Mithridates in Asia. [Cicero pro Murena, Mennius cap. 39. Eutrop, lib. 6.] For that Lucullus the Consul had not only Cilicia, but Asia also, (properly so called) allotted unto him, and that he had the command of it for the space of seven years, is evident out of Velleius Paterculus, [lib. 2, cap. 33.]

Lucullus, having lifted a Legion in Italy, passed over with it into Asia; where he takes to him the Fimbrian Legions, and two others besides; which, to a map of them, were long since corrupted through luxury and covetousness. The Fimbrians, in regard they had lived a long while, as it were, masterlesse, and uncontrolled, were more intractable, and malapert; yet yet warlike, and both skilful and patient in military labours and undertakings. But Lucullus reformed the one, and calmed the fierceness of the other, [Plutarch at supra, compared with Appian in Mithridatic, pag. 219.] He did the best he could also by inflicting punishments upon the Ulerses, and the Roman Publicans, by whose exactions the Asian were brought to revolt, to make them more moderate in their dealings: and he quelled all insurrections of several people, when as there was scarce a nation but was up in arms. [Plutarch ibid.]

Mithridates, having both another numerous army upon the march, and also 400 ships of 30 oars, besides a great company of lesser ships, which they commonly called Pentecosters and Ceræres, sent away Diophantus Marthas, with a considerable force into Cappadocia, to thrust in Garrisons into the Cities; and if Lucullus intended to enter Pontus, to intercept and stop his passage. As for Mithridates himself, he kept with him 150 thousand Foot under colours, and 12 thousand horse, and 120 Chariots with Sithes, which followed the Horse: and good force of all sorts of warlike Engines. Thus provided, he making a flying march through Timonitis, Cappadocia and Galatia: within nine dayes he reached Bithynia. Lucullus in the mean while commanded Cotta to stay with all his fleet in a Port of the Chalcidians. [Mennius cap. 39.]

Mithridates his fleet staying by Heraclea in Pontus, were denied admittance, yet the Citizens gratified them so far in their requests, as to afford them the freedom of their market: where after some truckings, and chaffering betwixt them, as are usual in those places, two of the most eminent persons of Heraclea, Silenus and Satyrus were carried away prisoners by them: they could not get off again, but upon this condition, That they should assist Mithridates in this war against the Romans, with five Frigates. This made the Romans fall out with the Heracleans: For whereas the Romans had appointed in the other Cities publick sale to be made of the Citizens goods. They exposed Heraclea also to sale. Upon the coming in of these which were commissioned for that business, and their exacting monies, contrary to the customs of the Common-wealth; the Citizens grew much perplexed, who looked upon this action as a banell of that slavery which would shortly ensue. Whereupon (when as their condition was such, that it required rather an Embassy to be dispatched to the Roman Senate, to beg their favour, and to put a stop to the sale of their goods) they, by the persuasion of a bold desperate fellow in the City, murdered the Publicans, and that with such secrecy, that there was not any one body which had the least intimation of their death. [Id. cap. 40.]

M. Cotta, upon the bruit of Lucullus his coming, and that he was already encamped in Phrygia, making account that he was now clojure of the victory, made what halt he could to fight Mithridates, before Lucullus was come in to him; that Lucullus might not share with him in the glory of the victory. [Plutarch,] Marius (or Varius) and Eunachus, Mithridates his Generals against Lucullus, having in a short time drawn together a great army, engaged with P. Rutilius (M. Cotta his Lieutenant)

at Chalcedon, in which battle Rutilius was slain, and the best part of his army. [Orof. lib. 6, cap. 2.] the Bithynians having routed the Italian foot, and done great execution upon them. [Memnon, cap. 41.]

Mithridates marching up to Chalcedon, whither the Romans flocked from all parts to Cotta: Cotta being but a raw Soldier, came not out against him: But Nodus, the Admiral of his fleet, with a brigade of the army, took the field, on that part which was best fortified; but being beaten off thence, made back to the gate of Chalcedon, over hedge and ditch. When they came to the gate, there was such a crowding of them to get in, that those that had them in pursuit, could not throw a dart, which was not sure to hit. But as soon as they let down the Port-cullis for fear of the enemy, they drew Nodus and some other Commanders into them with ropes; all the rest were slain in the midst of their friends and enemies, they all the while holding up their hands to both, but to no purpose. [Appian.]

Mithridates, thinking that it was best for him to make use of his late good fortune on the same day moves with his Fleet toward the haven: where having broke down, the iron chain which was in the entrance of the haven, fired four of the enemies ships; and carried away the other 60, tying them to one another sterns: Neither Nodus, nor Cotta, making any resistance, but keeping close all the while within the walls. The Romans in the engagement, lost about three thousand men, amongst whom Lucius Manlius a Senator was one. Mithridates lost 20 of the Bithynians, who were the first that attempted the haven. [Idem.] Plutarch tells us, that Cotta lost upon land 4000 foot besides those 60 ships with which men. Memnon says, that in one day the land and sea were most shamefully filled with the carcases of the Romans: eight thousand of them being slain outright in the sea-fight, and 4500 taken prisoners: and of the army of Foot which consisted of Italians, 5300, were cut off; whereas Mithridates on his side, lost only about 30 Bithynians, and 700 others, out of his whole company.

And this was that battle near Chalcedon, in which M. Aurelius Cotta the Consul was defeated. [Liv. lib. 93.] of which Mithridates in an Epistle of his to Ariates, (lib. 4. Hiftor. Salust.) thus writes. I totally routed Marcus Cotta the Roman General near Chalcedon on land, and have deprived him of a most gallant fleet at sea. The sad calamitous condition Cotta was now in both at sea and land, mightily advanced both the Kings wealth, and his name. [Cicero, pro Muræna.] For by this success of Mithridates, all mens spirits began shamefully to flag. But Lucullus who lay encamped along the river Sangarius, hearing of this greater overthrow, and observing his soldiers courage somewhat damp'd thereat, quickened them up again with a parcel of good words. [Memnon, cap. 42.]

When as Archelaus (formerly one of Mithridates his Commanders, but now turned to take part with the Romans) would have made Lucullus believe that he might with his bare look obtain the whole Kingdom of Pontus, (Mithridates being now with his army in Bithynia) he replied, That he would not be deemed a greater coward than the common Huntsmen are, that not daring to adventure upon the wild beasts themselves, he should go to their empty dens; Tusaid, he marched against Mithridates, having in his company 30 thousand Foot, and 5500 Horse. When he came first to the view of the enemy, he was astonish'd to see such a numerous body, and therefore desired to wave an engagement, and to gain time; but recollecting, how that Marius (whom Sertorius had sent out of Spain to be Mithridates his General) was marched up against him, and did provoke him to fight, he drew up into battle. Just as the army were set to engaging, (upon no evident change, but the Heaven cleaving asunder of the sudden) there seem'd to fall betwixt both armies, a great flaming body resembling a hogfish in shape, and silver fire hot: this strange apparition so frighted both parties, that it staved them off from fighting. They say this prodigy happened in Phrygia, about Otryx. [Plutarch.]

L. Lucullus the Consul, with his Horse had some skirmishes with Mithridates his Horse, and came off with good success: He made also some expeditions, and was fortunate in them; which so fluted his Soldiers, and made them so eager upon fighting, that he had much ado to keep them from mutiny. [Livie lib. 94.]

Mithridates, looking upon the City Cyzicum as a gate to let him in into Asia, which, if he could but once break open, and pluck up, the whole Province would lay open to him: resolv'd to remove thither the hot brunt and violence of the war. [Cicero pro Muræna.] For it was the most famous City of all Asia, and a faithful friend to the people of Rome. [Id. pro lege Manilia.] and which in the late overthrow at Chalcedon, had lost 3000 Citizens, and 10 ships. Hereupon the King, meaning to give Lucullus the slip. As soon as he had supped, having the opportunity of a thick and misty night, removed his Camp, and by break of day, gets to the top of the mountain Adraflia (otherwise (otherwise called Dindymus) which was situated opposite to the City. [Plutarch.] Strabo writes how that Mithridates with 150 thousand Foot, and a great body of Horse, made an invasion upon the Cyziceniens, and took the mountain Adraflia, and the Suburbs. [lib. 12, pag. 575.] Appian relates how that Lucullus, having in all but 50000 Foot, and 16000 Horse, encamp'd over against Mithridates about Cyzicum; and that he learned from the runnagadoes, that Mithridates had about 300000 men. Nay it is reported that he left in the siege of Cyzicum, above 300000 men, by famine and sickness; as we read in Orofius. [Orof. lib. 6, cap. 2.] Moreover it is given out (as we find in Plutarch) That of the whole rabble of Scullions, and Soldiers Lucullus slew no less than 300000 men. Whereas Eutropius in the sixth book of his Breviary hath writ far more modestly. The following Winter and Summer, Lucullus slew of the Kings party very near an hundred thousand men.

Mithridates, having begirt the Cyziceniens with ten brigades, assaulted them also by sea with a fleet of 400 ships. [Strabo pag. 575, 576, compared with Plutarch.] And seeing the Cyziceniens, knew not what was become of Lucullus: The Mithridatians gave out that those his tents which were pitched before their eyes, were supplies of Armenians and Medes, which Tigranes had sent to Mithridates. Demox, sent from Archelaus into the City, was the first that inform'd them of Lucullus his being nigh at hand: but they gave no credit to him at all, supposing what he said was a meer forgery, whereby to alleviate their present sufferings: until a boy, who had been taken prisoner by the enemy, and made an escape, pointed out to them with his finger the place where the Romans lay encamp'd. [Plutarch.] Lucullus sent a messenger to them, one of his souldiers, who had the command of his tongue, to bid them be of a good courage; this Souldier bearing himself up above water with two bottles.

Lucullus, falling upon Mithridates his reare, defeated the Ponticks, and got a glorious victory, in which he slew something more than 10 thousand of them in the fights and took 13000 prisoners. [Memnon, cap. 42.]

Lucullus espied a mountain very convenient to pitch his Tents in; which if he could but once get into his hand: he was sure to get provision enough for his army, but to starve the enemy: There was but one passage to come to it, and that a very narrow one: which also Mithridates had clapp'd a guard upon to secure it, being thereunto advis'd by Taxiles and some other of his Commanders. L. Manius or Magius, the umpire of the league betwixt Mithridates and Sertorius, sent privately a messenger to Lucullus and then perswaded Mithridates to permit the Romans to pass by, and to encamp where they thought best themselves; buzzing him in the ear, that the Fimbrian Legions, which formerly had served Sertorius in the wars, would leave their colours and turn away to him; and this they would do within a day or two: and that that might spare the expence of sweat and blood, when they were sure of a victory without striking a blow. Mithridates, suspecting nothing was so unwise as to listen to his counsel, and thereupon suffered the Romans quietly to enter the passage, and to fortify the mountain against him; by which reason the Romans might have a plentiful supply of provision from all those parts which lay behind them, when as Mithridates on the contrary being shut out by a lake, mountain and river, was debarr'd from all importation by land, and therefore could expect but slender incomes to his Camp. Seeing that there was no way for him to get out, neither could he by force of arms make Lucullus retreat, merely because he neglected the passage. The winter quarter also drawing onwards, was likely to hinder all importations to him by sea. [Appian.]

Plutarch writes, that Lucullus encamp'd about Thracia, which they called, Comes; as deeming it the most fit place to obstruct all ways and quarters from whence Mithridates could hope for a supply of provisions. As for that party which Mithridates sent to bring in the Fimbrian Legions to him, who made head as if they intended to turn to his side, Memnon tells us, that they were all put to the sword by the same Legion.

Nicomedes a Thracian, had fram'd notable Engines to batter the City, [Plutarch.] amongst which the Helepolis, as they call'd it, about a hundred cubits high, was the most remarkable one. Upon this another Tower was erected plac'd with Engines, to sling out stones, and several sorts of weapons: But before they planted the Engines, Mithridates gave order that three thousand of the Cyziceniens, whom he had taken prisoners, should be brought in the ships to the walls of the City: if happily the City, out of pity to them, and relenting at their cries, would give up. But seeing that they was to no purpose, (there being by the command of Lysistratus their General, a Cryer appointed, who from the walls exhorted them, That seeing that it was their hard fortune to fall under the power of a stranger, to bear it out as well as they could) Mithridates used all the strength he could both by sea and land, to reduce the City: the Townsmen all the while within being as injurious to defend it; yet, do what they could, they could not perfect their walls entire, but that part of them being fired, fell down about evening: but the heat of the fire was so torching, that the enemy was not able to enter. The Cyziceniens themselves by night repaired the breach. [Appian.]

At last Lucullus found a way in the night to send into the City some Auxiliaries. [Strabo.] For finding that in the lake Dalcylite, there were pretty big boats: he took away one of the biggest of them, and carried it in a Wagon to the sea side, and put as many Soldiers in it, as it could well hold; who privily by night got into the City, the enemy knowing nothing thereof. [Plutarch.]

Now was the time of Proterpina's festival, in which the Cyziceniens were wont to offer a black Heiter. They being unprovided with such an one at this time, made one of dough, and brought it to the Altar. The Heiter which was designed for Proterpines festival, was feeding with the rest of the Cyziceniens Herds on the other side the sea. Upon the day of the Festival, the left the other Herds, and swimm'd over alone to Cyzicum, passing all the way through the enemy's fleet, and by diving under water, got through the bars which are at the mouth of the harbour, and so passing through the midst of the City, came to the Temple of Proterpina, and presented her self before the Altar. The Cyziceniens sacrificed her, and upon this grew mightily enlivened in their hopes. [Jul. Obsequens de prodigiis, Plutarch, & Appian.]

It is reported that Proterpina appeard by night in a vision to Aristagoras (who was the chief Magistrate, as saith Julius Obsequens) for Plutarch gives him no other title, but that of his being the peoples tutor; and told him, that the had provided a piper against the pipers: or, as Plutarch renders it, truth: forthwith sent a Libyan piper against the Pontick trumpeter. The Cyziceniens wondering with themselves what this voice should be, about break of day it began to be foule wether: after at sea, as if it had been a tempestuous winde. The Kings engines which were now drawn up to the walls, by their creaking and crashing first disclosed what was ready to issue: Presently after there arose an extreme violent South wind, which in the moment of an hour did so shatter the rest of the Kings engines, that they were made utterly unserviceable; and did so shake the wooden tower which was erected upon the Engins, that it overturned it on the ground. [Id.]

It is Chronicled also, that at Troy Minerva appeared to many in their sleep, dropping with twear, and shewing how that part of her vaile was cut off: telling them, that she came from the relief of the Cyziceniens. The Trojans were wont to shew the pillars whereon the decrees and letters concerning this accident were engraven. [Plutarch.]

Mithridates was adviced by his friends to loose with his Fleet from before the City: but he not one whit dismayed at what had happened, got up to the mountain Dindymus, and from thence callt up a bank all along to the walls of the City; upon which he erected Towers. He caus'd also Mines to be made under the very walls. [Appian.] The Cyziceniens notwithstanding all this, held out so stoutly, that they had very near taken Mithridates alive in one of the Mines, which he himself had digged, by countermining him: but he got away safe, having epyed the danger he was in. [Strabo, pag. 576.]

The Winter being come, Mithridates was cut short also of victual by sea; if so be he had any at all. The army therefore being in great distresse for necessary provision, many of them died by famine, some were glad to feed on mans flesh, others using herbs for their constant food, fell into diseases, and the dead carcases lying all the while unburied, ulthered in the plague to boot. [Memnon, cap. 42. Strabo, pag. 576. Flor. lib. 3. cap. 5. Plutar. Appian. Orosius, lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Whilst Lucullus was gone to gain some cattle or other, Mithridates strives to make some use of this opportunity: Hereupon, commanding part of his Forces to march home with their armes; but with this item, That they should be sure not to come in fight of the enemy, he sent almost all his Horle, those also which were for burden, and of his Foot, such as were little serviceable, unto Bithynia: for the horles were now grown weak for want of provender, and starke lame by reason their hooves were beaten and worn away for want of shoes. Lucullus hearing of this, halted to the Camps again by night as fast as he could; and by break of day, made after them with 10 companies of Foot, and all his Horle. Although at that instant there fell such a violent storme, that many of the foulders, what with the Snow, and other inconveniences, for very cold were forced to lie down, not being able to follow: with the rest he overtook the enemy at the passage of the River Rhyndacus, where he did such execution on them, that the women of Apollonia came out and plundered the carriages, and stripped the slain. There were taken at this fight 6000 Horles, and an infinite number of beasts for burdens, 15 thou. and men: all which Lucullus carryed away with him, besides the pillage of the enemies Camp. Lucullus as this batt killed more than 5000 men men; if we may credit Orosius. Salust is of opinion, that this was the first time the Romans ever saw any Camels: as it thot, who under Scipio their General defeated Antiochus, and those who fought with Archelaus at Orchomenon and Cheronea, had not known well enough what kind of beasts Camels were. [Plutarch, Appian. Oros.]

Fannius, who clapt in with Mithridates, and Metrophanes the Kings Pretor, having received a blow from Mamerus, elaped with two thousand Horle into Media: and removing from thence unto Moxonia, fell upon the dry and parched hills and champion of Inarime: where being welded for a long while, at last they got out, and arrived at the Kings Camp, without any notice taken of them. [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Eumachus the general, and other of Mithridates his Colonels, up in armes in Phrygia, killed many Romans, with their wives & children. They subdued the Pisidians also, the Lauri, and Cilicia, until Decaracus, one of the Tetrarchs of Gallogracia, lighting upon them as they were roving about, killed them and many of their fouldiers, and so gave a stop to proceedings. [Liv. lib. 54. Appian. pag. 222. Oros. ut sup.]

Jublie the XXXVIII.

The Cyziceniens having undermined those mounts which the King had cast up all along from Dindymus to the City, and fired his Engins, and knowing well enough that the enemy was much weakened by famine, did so pester them with often sallies, that Mithridates was relolved to draw off and be gone. [Appian.] Of which he himself in a letter of his to Arfaces, [Salust. lib. 4. histor.] thus: At my laying siege to Cyzicum with a great army, I wanted provision, and in regard I could get none from all the parts about, and that the winter also had blocked up the sea that none could be expected that way; I was forced (not by any compulsion of the enemies) to march back into mine own kingdom. For Plutarch tells us out of Salust, how that Lucullus, first at Cyzicum, and afterwards at Amisus, lay encamped with his fouldiers two whole Winters. Concerning the raising of the siege of Cyzicum, see Cicero [in orat. pro lege Manilia, pro Murana, & pro Archia poeta.]

Mithridates relolving suddenly to be gone, that he might keep off Lucullus from following too fast upon his reare: sent Aristoniscus a Grecian Admiral of his Fleet to lea: but Lucullus by some foule play, took him prisoner just as he was putting off from shoar; and withal seized upon 10000 crowns which he carryed along with him to invaigle part of the Roman army. [Plutarch.]

The King left his land Forces with the General to march with them away to Lampacus: Hermus and Marius (the Generals which Sertorius sent) conducted thither 30000 men. But Lucullus following hard upon the reare, at last overtook them unawares as they were passing the River Elepus, whose waters at that time were higher than ordinarily they were wont to be. He took very many of them prisoners, and killed 20000 of them outright (above 10000 of which were reported to have been Marius his fouldiers) so that the two Rivers, Granicus and Elepu, were all ove coloured with blood. But one of Mithridates his Nobles, knowing how mightily the Romans were addicted to covetousnesse, commanded the fouldiers to tearer their snappacks and money about, purposely to retard the pursuers in their march. [Memnon, cap. 42. Polybæus stratagem. lib. 7. Flor. lib. 3. cap. 5. Plutarch, Appian. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 2.]

As for Mithridates himself, he, purposing to return by sea, failed by night to Parium, [Appian.] whilst his fouldiers intending to put off with him crowded on every side so thick into the ships, whereof some were already filled, others were to be filled presently after, that it happened, that, by reason of the multitude striving to get a ship-board, some of the ships were sunk, and others overturned. The Cyziceniens observing this, assailed the enemies Camp, where they cut the throats of the sick that were left behind, and carryed away whatsoever they found there. [Memnon, cap. 42.]

Lucullus entring Cyzicum, was received with a great jollity, and magnificence, [Plutarch.] In honour of whom they afterwards instituted some plays which they called, Lucullæ, [Appian.] The Romans conferred a great deal of honour upon the City, and granted them their freedom. [Strabo lib. 12. pag. 576. Tacit. annal. lib. 4. cap. 36.]

Mithridates, after his men were driven to Lampacus, and besieged there by Lucullus, sent his Fleet thither, and transported them and the Lampaceniens together: And having left fifty ships with 10000 men aboard them unto Marius or Varius, the Sertorian General, Alexander a Paphlagonian, and Dionysius the Eunuch, himself with the greater part of them made for Nicomedia: But it happened that many of these and the others, were cast away in a storm, [Ibid.]

Mithridates, having scrambled up together as well as he could some forces in Pontus, sat down about Perinthus, and made some attempts against it: but (seeing he could not master it, he sent his forces away into Bithynia. [Memoir, cap. 42.])

Antiochus (the Asiatic) and his Brother, the young sonnes of King Antiochus, (Pius) who kept in their hands part of the kingdom of Syria (which was not seized on by Tigranes) came to Rome, to request the kingdom of Egypt which they thought did of right belong to them and their mother Seleuc; and there they tarried almost two whole years, keeping all the while a Princely guard and retinue. [Cicero lib. 4. in Verrem.]

Antipas, or Antipater, the Idumean, the prime of his Nation, both for birth and wealth (son of the other Antipas or Antipater, who they say was by Alexander King of the Jews, and his wife Alexandra appointed Governour of all Idumea) had by his wife Cyprus, (who was born at an eminent place, amongst the Arabians) his son Herod; afterwards King of Judea, for he was 25 years old when his father let him over Galilee, of which more is to be said at the year of the World, 3957. [Vide supra, ann. Mundi, 3875.] although Nicolaus Damascenus to carry favour with Herod (whose life he writ whilst he was yet alive) hath derived Antipater's pedigree from the Princes of the Jews, who came from Babylon into Judea; [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 2.] as also in the 35 Chapter of the Arabic History of the Jews, (set out at the end of the Parisian Bibles, with many tongues) we read, how that Antipater was a Jew, descended from the loins of some of them which came up out of Babylon with Ezra the Priest; and that he being appointed by Alexander Jannæus, Governour of the Country of the Idumeans, took a wife from thence. But Julius Africanus in a letter of his to Aristides, (in Ensch. l. 1. Histor. Ecclesiast. c. 6. §. 7.) and Ambrosius, who followed him, [lib. 3. comment. in Luc. cap. 3.] reports upon a tradition of those who were called the kinsmen of our Saviour, according to the flesh, how that Antipater was the son of one Herod, an Alcalonite, who had the charge of Apollo's Temple there; and that being by some Idumean robbers carried away captive from Alcala, he was instructed in the manners and disciplines of the Idumeans. And this is the most received opinion of all the Christian Fathers.

Borba, coming with a strong band of Italians and Triarius, one of Lucullus his Commanders, laid siege to Apamea. The Citizens, for a good while, stood it out as well as they were able against the enemies, but in conclusion opened the gates, and let them in; as Memnon hath it: Although Appian writes, how that Triarius, being arrived there, took the City by storm, and put to the sword abundance of the Apameanians in their Temples, whither they flew for sanctuary. Soon after the Roman army took Prusa, a very well fortified City, under the mountain Olympus: and after they had won it, pillaged it. From hence Triarius removes with his army to Prusias, which lay upon the sea. Prusias King of Bithynia took it from the Hecataeans, and called it after his own name, being formerly called Cierus (or Chius) from the river which glided by it. As soon as he drew the City, the Prusians thrust out the Ponticks, and received them in. Thence they came to Nicæa, which was a Garrison of Mithridates: But the Ponticks, understanding full well, how that the Citizens hearts inclined to the Romans, stole away by night to Mithridates at Nicomedia; so that the Romans got that City under their command without any trouble at all, [Memnon, cap. 43. §. 49. Appian, pag. 223. compared with Oros. lib. 6. cap. 2.]

Lucullus being come to Hellepont, got his fleet ready, and arriving at Troas, stepped aside into the Temple of Venus. The same night in his sleep he fancied to himself that he saw the goddess standing by him, and saying,

Τὴν αἰώνιον μαρτυρίαν λαὸν, νεκρῶν δὲ τὴν γῆν;

Quid dormis animose leo, quom proximus adis?

Hinnulus ecce frequens.

Sleep'st thou now Lion stout?

Whole Herds of fawns rove here about.

Whilst he was telling this his dream to his friends, day not yet broke, some came from Troy and told him how that there appeared 13 of the Kings ships, with five oars a bank, at a port of the Achæians, and that they were bound for Lemnus. Lucullus presently puts off from Troas, took all the 13 ships, and killed Idorus their Admiral, [Plutarch, compared with Appian.]

Lucullus, in pursuit of his victory, made after Marius, or Varius (who was sent by Scerorius to be General) Alexander and Dionysius, and overtaking them about Lemnus, in the desert Island (where Pailoctes his Alar, with the brazen Serpent is to be seen) bare up to them, using all the while, but came language to them before the engagement, he gave order to his Soldiers, that they should by no means kill any one that had but one eyemeaning Marius who had lost an eye, whom Lucullus had designed first to vex with obloquies & reproaches, and then to kill. Lucullus observing how that they stood still in a place, and had drawn all their ships to the shoar, held fill his oars, and sent two ships out of his company, to try if he could make them land forth. But they made not towards them; but defending themselves from their hatches, did mightily gaul the Romans. The place was such, that they could by no means wheel about, nor was it possible for the ships which were tossed by the waves, and floating to make any considerable impression upon the enemies fleet which leaned to the land, and had as it were good luck sailing: wherefore Lucullus sent a squadron of ships another way, by which there was a passage into the Island, and landed all his chief Foot there. Who coming upon the backs of the enemy, killed some of them, and made the others retreat to the ship-board: they were so fearful of Lucullus, that they dared not adventure to launch into the deep, but sailed along the coast; so that now they were played upon, both from sea and land, to their great laughter and confusion, striving to get away. [Plutarch.] Lucullus either sunk, or took two and thirty of the Kings ships, besides a number of ships for burdens. Among those that were slain, there were very many of them who had been prescribed by Sylla. [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 2.]

The day following, the three Generals were drawn out of the cave, where they had hid themselves. Marius (or Varius) was by Lucullus his order put to death. [Id. ibid. compared with Appian.] Alexander was relieved for that solemnity; but Dionysius soon after dyed of a draught of poison, he carried about with him. [Appian.]

These were the two sea victories which Lucullus got, one before Tenedus, the other in the Egean sea, both indeed distinctly mentioned by Memnon, [in 44 chap.] but celebrated by Cicero in diverse places, as but one. For in Orat. pro lege Manlia he says, That the great and well trimmed fleet which Scerorius his Commanders were in all fiery hauling into Italy, was overcome and vanquished by Lucullus; and pro L. Murena. Do you think that that sea fight at Tenedus, when the enemies fleet heightened in their hopes and spirits, made a direct course for Italy, under most spiritly Generals, was ended after small bickering, or a light skirmish? and in Orat. pro Archia poeta. Where he cries up Lucullus his defeating the enemies fleet, and that incredible sea fight at Tenedus.

Lucullus dispatched his letters laureat to the Senate, with a recital of his achievements as was the manner of conquerors. [Appian.] And when as the Senate decreed to lend him three thousand talents to procure him a fleet, he wrote them word back again, That he had no need of the money; valuing himself, That he was also to drive Mithridates out of the sea, with the ships of their Allies. [Plutarch.]

After this, he pushed with all speed to to chase Mithridates, being in hopes to find him about Bithynia, secured there by Vocionus, whom he had sent with a squadron of ships to Nicomedia, to attend upon Mithridates in his flight. But Vocionus, being engaged at Samothrace in the religious ceremonies, and solemnizing the festival days there, came too late. Mithridates hoist sail, and made what halt he could to get to Pontus, ere Lucullus should come up to him, but was taken with a tempest, so that his fleet was partly shattered, partly sunk, that all the coasts about, for many days together, were spread with the wracks cast up thither by the waves. They say, that this tempest was raised by Diana Priapina, against the Ponticks, in revenge of their killing her Temple, and taking down her image out of its place.

Dio writes, how that Mithridates was twice wrecked, as he was failing to Pontus, and that he lost by this unhappy accident about 10000 men, and 60 ship: The remainder of them being dispersed severally as the wind took them. Mithridates himself in a letter of his to Artaces in Salust, says, That he lost his best Soldiers and his fleet by two wrecks, at Para and Heracles. Orosius saith, That Mithridates, having manned his fleet, and sailing against Byzantium (whither Eutropius saith he was chased by Lucullus) was caught by a tempest, and lost 80 ships with broken banks. To conclude, Florus reports, That a tempest beating upon this fleet of above 100 ships, and a very great preparation for war in the Pontick sea, did so tear and shatter it, as if it had been done by a formal sea fight.

Whereas the hulk in which Mithridates was, by reason of its great bulk, was judged by the Pilot not possible to be brought to shoar in so boisterous a storm, in regard it already already leaked, and was almost filled with water: Mithridates, though perswaded by his friends to the contrary, leaped into the ship of one Seleucus a Pirate, the Pirate himself helping him: trusting himself with Pirates, who brought him safe to Heraclea in Pontus, (as saith Plutarch;) thence to Sinope, and afterwards to Amisus Appian and Orosius.

Cotta, willing to save up his former losses, removed his forces from Chalcodon, where he then lay, to Nicomedia: and encamping 150 furlongs off the City, was sometimes wary how he engaged the enemy. There Triarius of his own accord in all haste, and as it were with running marches, comes in to Cotta, and then, both the Roman armies prepared to go against the City. But the King, knowing that Lucullus had obtained already two notable Victories over the Ponticks at sea, and seeing himself at present over-matched by the Roman Forces, removed back his Fleet into the River: where he lost some ships with 3 oares a bank, in a tempest: yet he himself got away with most of his ships to the R. ver Hyphasis, [Memnon, cap. 44.]

Mithridates, (staying here because of the tempest, heard lay, that Lamachus of Heraclea (a trusty old friend of his) sat at the helme of the Common-wealth: whereupon he trucked with him by many fair promises, to receive him into the City, and to do the best he could for him: he sent him also some monies upon this account. Lamachus, having prepared a great Feast for the Citizens without the City (during which he had engaged upon his word to Mithridates that the gates should not be shut) made the people drunk, that so Mithridates (which was plouted) might upon that very day come upon them unawares, and catch them napping: So that the City became his own, nobody, so much as, dreaming of his coming. Next day the King summoned the City together; spake very friendly to them, and after he had exhorted them to remain loyal to him, committed the City to be kept by Connacortiges, placing a Garrison therein of 4000 men. His pretence was, merely to defend and protect the Citizens, in case the Romans should attempt any thing against it. From hence he failed directly towards Sinope: having before his leaving the City, distributed some monies amongst the Citizens, but especially the Magistrates, [Id. ibid.]

Lucullus, having recovered Paphlagonia and Bithynia, passing thorough Bithynia and Galatia, made an invasion upon Mithridates his kingdom: and joyned his Forces at Nicomedia with Cotta and Triarius his Brigades, that so they might break in into Pontus, [Europ. lib. 6. Plutarch, & Memnon, cap. 45.] But news being brought of the taking of Heraclea, when as yet they knew nothing of the plot, but supposed it to be resigned upon a voluntary desertion of the whole City; Lucullus thought it the best way, that he, with the whole power of his army, should march thorough the Mediterranean and Cappadocia, against the King and his whole kingdom; that Cotta should endeavour to regain Heraclea, and that Triarius should take the Fleet and intercept Mithridates his ships which were sent into Crete and Spain, in their return, about the Hellespont and Propontis, [Memnon, ut sup.]

Mithridates having received intelligence hereof, applied himself for new preparation of war, and thereupon sent for supplies in all haste to his son in law Tigranes the Armenians, and to his son Macharus then reigning in B. phorus, and to the Parthians. He ordered also Diocles to go to the bordering Scythians, to sollicite them with many gifts, and a great weight of gold: but he ran away with the gifts and the gold to Lucullus: The other also refusing to meddle. Tigranes, though he hung back a great while (a letter of Mithridates his to Arsaces inserted in the 4. book of Salusts Histories, confirms that this war was begun upon his denial to be an assistant therein) yet at last he promised to send supplies being wearied thereunto by the importunity of Mithridates his daughter, [Id. ibid. compared with Appian.]

The Embassadour which Mithridates sent to Tigranes, was Metrodorus Scepius, who left his Philosophy and turned Politician: Mithridates had promoted him to that degree of friendship, that he was called the Kings father: and being made a Judge, it was not lawful for any man to appeal from his sentence to the King. Tigranes, asking the Embassadour what he thought of this business of sending supplies against the Romans: the Embassadour replied; As I am an Embassadour I advise you to send, as I am a Counsellor I am against it. Tigranes sent Metrodorus back to Mithridates, whether he would or no; but he died by the way, either by the Kings contrivement, or falling into some disease; for there is talk of both. For Tigranes had informed the King, of what he had said, supposing that Mithridates would think never a whit the worse of Metrodorus. Tigranes, to expresse his sorrow for what he had done, interred his corps very nobly, (paring for no cost for him; now dead: whom he had betrayed when he was alive, [Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 609, 610. Plutarch, in Lucullo.]

got the better, [Memnon, cap. 45.] At the first Lucullus was in such a distresse for victual, that there were 30 thousand Galatians which followed the Camp, whose work it was to bring each of them a measure of corn upon their shoulders. But after he had marched a little farther, he subdued and spoiled all the way: and presently again, as being in a fortunate Country, and such as for many years had not felt the dint of war, a slave was sold for 4 Drachmae, an ox for one Drachma: a goat, sheep, cloath, and other things, at the same cheap rate. And because they were not able to carry away all the booty, there being such abundance of all things: some of them left it behind them; others spoiled it, [Plutarch & Appian.]

After this, Lucullus attempted to reduce Amisus, and Empatoria, which Mithridates built near to it, and called by his own surname, and made it his Palace Royal: but a Brigade of his army he sent to take Themiscyras, situated upon the River Thermodon. They used towers against the Themiscyrians, and cast up works, and digged such large mines, that the parties often fought under ground: The Townsmen opened their mines on the top, and thorough the holes let down Beares and other wild Beasts, and swarms of Bees amongst the pioneers. They met with some hard services at Amisus: The Amisians fighting stoutly in their own defence, sometimes by sallies, sometimes by provoking them to single duels, [Appian.]

Lucullus, spinning out the time before Amisus by a lingering siege; his army began to cry out of that his loytering: and grumbled extremely, that all the Cities they had taken were taken by a free surrender, and not one of them by storm, and that he as yet had not given the plunder of any one City to the Soldiery. Lucullus replied, That as for his seeking out and prolonging the siege, it was done upon good grounds: for he hoped thereby to wear out Mithridates his Forces, by little and little: neither would he willingly compel him, departing of his own strength, to repair to Tigranes for succour, and so make him his enemy also. Concerning whom Plutarch thus brings in Lucullus, speaking thus. It is but a few dayes march out of Cibra into Armenia, where Tigranes resides, that lasie king of kings; who is so powerful, that he wrests Asia from the Parthians, carries the Grecian Cities into Media; holds Syria and Palestine, detribes the Seleucus his successours, and plucking their daughters and wives from their mansions, carries them along with him prisoners. This Tigranes is a neighbour to Mithridates, and his own son in law.

Cotta, removing his Camp, marched with his Romans first to Pausia, formerly called Citerus: and from thence went down to the Pontic Sea, and passing by the sea coast, pitched before the walls of Heraclea, which stood upon the top of an hill. But the Heracleans did trust much to the strength of the situation, and joyning with them soldiers which Mithridates had garrisoned amongst them, resisted Cotta, who made valiant attempts against them. And to speak truth, more full of the Roman side, than of the other; yet the Heracleans received many a wound from the Romans Darts. Wherefore Cotta gave over the storm, and founded a terrace to his soldiers: and pitching somewhat farther off, let himself wholly to offset the coming out of the besieged for to fetch victual in to them. Whereupon the Heracleans being to a distresse for victual, sent their Embassadors to the Colonos about, desiring that they would let them have victual for their money: and the Embasie was gladly entertained, [Memnon, cap. 49.]

A little before this, Triarius, furnished with the Roman Fleet, out of Nicomedia, had made an assault upon the Pontic ships which Mithridates had sent towards Crete and Spain: But when he had notice given him, that the rest of the ships were gone back unto Pontus (for many of them were lost by storm, and sea fights in several places) he made after them, and overtaking them at Tenzicus, fell upon them: Lucullus had with him 70 ships, the Ponticks somewhat fewer than 60. After they had ran violently upon one another with their forebeaks; the Royallist for a while endured the enemies brunt pretty well: but soon after, they were made to run, and the Romans obtained a complicate and famous victory: And this made an end of that great Fleet which Mithridates brought with him into Asia, [Id. cap. 50.]

Mithridates sent provisions, armes, and soldiers, very plentifully to the besieged Amisians from Cabrie: where having taken up his winter quarters, he levied another army, [Appian.] There came to him thither, 40 thousand Foot, and 4 thousand Horse, as Plutarch and Appian gives up the number: or 40 thousand Foot, and 8000 Horse, as Memnon computes them.

Othacus, (whom Appian calls Olcabas, a Scythian) Prince of the Dardani, who inhabited about the Lake Maeotis, a person highly commended for warlike exploits, counsel, and civil deportment, being in some of Mithridates his Garrisons, and consulting with some of the Princes, his countrymen for superiority, promised to do a great exploit in the behalf of Mithridates: viz., That he would kill Lucullus. The King highly commended him; but made as if he had been angry with him for it, and very formally formerly reproached him, whereupon he takes his Horse, and rides away to Lucullus, and was very friendly treated by him. [Plutarch.]

The first year of the CLXXVII. Olympiade now at hand, in the spring time, Lucullus, leaving Murena with two Legions to continue the league at Amisus, with three other Legions, marched through the mountains against Mithridates. [Ptolemy Trallianus. Chro. lib. in Bibliotheca Photii. Cod. 97. Plutarch. Appian.] This Murena was Lieutenant to Lucullus the General, and son to that Murena, whom Sylla had left Prætor in Asia. During the time of his Lieutenantship, (as Cicero declaims in an Oration on his behalf) he led an army, fought battles, defeated the enemies forces, took many Cities, some by storm, others by siege: he behaved himself so in Asia, which at that time was well provided with all delicacy, that he left not the least impress of his covetousness or luxury. He demeaned himself so gallantly in that great war, that he did many noble acts, without the Generals assistance, the General nothing without him.

Mithridates had so ordered his guards, that they might both keep off Lucullus, and give notice also by fires, in case any thing should happen extraordinary. Phœnix, one of the Blood-Royal, had the charge of them; who indeed, according to agreement, gave a sign of Lucullus his approach, but he himself and all his forces run away to Lucullus; and the mountains being hereby now made securely passable, Lucullus marched down to Cabira. [Appian.]

Mithridates, having passed the river Lycus, and come into the wide Champain, provoked the Romans to fight. [Plutarch.] Having sent Diophantus and Taxiles against them. At the first their armies, by their daily skirmishes, did but try one anothers strength. [Memnon, cap. 45.] But afterwards, their bodies of horse engaged, in a fight, wherein the Romans turned their backs, and Lucullus was forced to retreat back to the mountains. In this fight Pompeius or Pomponius, General of his Horse, was taken prisoner, and brought to Mithridates grievously wounded. When Mithridates asked him, Whether it he should grant him his life, he would become his friend for the future: Truly, faith he, I shall, if so you will conclude a peace with the people of Rome, but if not, he should still persist to be his enemy. Upon this reply, the Barbarians would have killed him, but the King would not suffer them; Saying, That he would not expresse any cruelty upon valour, merely because unfortunate. [Plutarch & Appian.]

After this, Mithridates drew up his forces into Battalia, and stood in that posture for many dayes together; but seeing Lucullus would not come down to fight, he looked every way about, which way he might march up to him. [Appian.]

In the mean time Olcabas, or Othacus the Scythian, being in regard he had been a means in preserving many Romans in the last engagement of the Horse, admitted to the society of the Table, counsails, and secrets, came to Lucullus, as he was at noon sleeping in his Tent; having, as usually, a short dagger by his side, as if he had had some matter of moment to impart unto him. But being put back by Menedemus, Lucullus his Chamberlaine, fearing lest he might be questioned, stole out of the Camp, and getting a horse-back, rode away to Mithridates. [Plutarch & Appian.] He discovered to the King also another Scythian, named Sobadacus, who intended to run away to Lucullus, who was presently seized upon. [Appian.]

Lucullus, being afraid to come down into the plain in regard the enemy was too hard for him in horse, and yet much troubled how to pass through that mountainous region, which was both long, full of woods, and combersome: he light by chance upon some Grecians, who had hid themselves in a certain Cave thereabouts: The ancientest of them, Apollodorus (who, as Appian says, was an Hunter, and well versed in the tracks of the mountains) undertook to be his convoy, and to bring him down to a place where he might safely encamp; which also had a Castle hanging over Cabira. Lucullus, making use of this guide, kindled fires in the Camp, and marched away; and having got through the woods, without any inconvenience, through a path never yet trode by any, arrived at last at that Castle. At day break, he was clyped pitching his Tents over the enemies heads, in such places, where, if he had a mind to fight, he might fight; but if minded to sit still, he could not be forced to fight: yet for all this, he avoided the fields, for fear of the enemies horse, and encamped behind a lowess full of vvaies. [Idem.]

Whereas neither of the armies thought of fighting at present. It is reported, That as the Kings party were in pursuit of a deer, the Romans crossed the way, and stop their chase. Here begun the quarrel, more flocking in on both sides. At length the Romans were made to fly: but Lucullus coming down into the plaine himself alone, and running up to the foremost of those which were running away, commanded them to stay and march back again with him against the enemies. These submitting to the General, the others stopped also, and so rallying together, they easily made the enemy to fly, and pursued them to their very Camp. Lucullus, being returned from pursuing the

the enemy, put them to the wonted disgrace, viz. took away their arms, commanded them to dig a Trench of twelve foot all the other souldiers standing by and looking on. [Plutarch.]

Virtual beginning to fail, Lucullus sent a party into Cappadocia to forrage: H: often skirmished with the enemy, until at one time the Royalists beginning to ply their heels, Mithridates run from the Camp, and, railing at them for flying, forced them back again; and did put such a dread upon the Romans, that they ran back without any stop to the mountains: yea, though the Royalists gave over the pursuit, yet every one flew from his fellows, supposing the enemy had been still at their heels, such a strong fear had possessed them all. Mithridates sent messengers to all parts, to signify this his victory. [Appian.]

Sornatus, being sent by Lucullus with ten companions of foot to fetch in provision, (seeing Menander, one of Mithridates his Commanders following after him) stopped till they came up to him, fought them, and killed many of them, and put the rest to flight. [Plutarch.]

After this, Adrianus was again sent by Lucullus with some forces into Cappadocia, that to the army might be provided plentifully with victual. Taxiles and Diophantus, Mithridates his Generals, sent Menemachus, and Miton against him, with 4000 foot, and 3000 horse, hoping by placing an ambuscado in the vvaies, they might intercept their carriages on their return homewards. [Memnon, cap. 45. Ptolemy, ann. 1. Olymp. 177. & Plutarch.] For, seeing that Cappadocia was the only place from whence Lucullus might expect supplies of provision for his Camp, Mithridates was in good hopes to reduce him to the same distresse, he himself was put to at the league of Cizycum. [Appian.]

But the Kings party, failing by chance upon a party of the foragers, in some narrow passages, and not tarrying till they came into more open places, could not make use of their horse in those tracts. Whereupon the Romans, drawing themselves up as fast as they could into rank and file, the cragginess of the places where they were befriending them, set upon the Kings party, slew some of them, forced others of them down the precipices of the rocks, and the rest they made run away by whole troupes. [Id.] The Romans, having received some supplies from Lucullus, pursued them to the very Camp of Diophantus and Taxiles: where followed a stout encounter, and the Ponticks stood to it for a while: but as soon as their prime Commanders began to give ground, the whole army slunk back, and the Commanders themselves were the first that carried the tidings of this defeat to Mithridates. [Memnon, cap. 45.] Plutarch says, That all the Horse and Foot which came with Menemachus and Myron, were cut off excepting two only. Eutropius writes, That 3000 of the Kings choicest Souldiers were routed by 5000 of the Romans. [lib. 6.] Livy hath given out, That Lucullus fought in Pontus against Mithridates with very good successe, having slain more than 60 thousand of the enemy: [lib. 97.] taking into the account those also, who a little after were slain, when Mithridates was made to fly.

The news of this defeat came not so soon to Lucullus his ears, as it did to Mithridates. [Appian.] And Adrianus had marched by Lucullus his Camp in great pomp, carrying along with him a great number of Waggones laden with provision and spoile: at the sight whereof Lucullus began to dispond, and his Souldiers to fear and tremble. [Plutarch.] But the King, being confident Lucullus would suddenly be upon the bones of him, now he was distressed of Horse, began to be afraid, and think of flying: which resolution of his he trait discovered to his friends in his pavilion. But they, not waiting so long till the Trumpet sounded to trusse up bag and baggage, removed all their goods out of the Camp before break of day; there were such a company of them, that the Trumpet-beats crowded one another: which was no sooner clyped by the army, who knew the drivers of the Trumpet-beats, but they, then feare improving their suspicions, taking it very unkindly, that they had not notice given them, as well as the rest, rushed violently out of their Trenches. [Appian.] And running in a great chase to the gates, tilted the packs, and fell foul upon those that were carrying them away, putting them all to the sword. Amongst whom Dorylaus the General was one: who having about him but a purple garment, which he had upon his back, was killed for that very garment. Hermæus also a fouthlayer, was trod to death in the gates. [Plutarch.]

The Souldiers run away over the fields, observing no order, but every one making the best shift for himself: not staying till they received order from their Generals and Commanders. As soon as the King perceived in what disorder they ran, and what half they made, he came running out of his pavilion, thinking to have laid something to them, when no body would lend him an ear, but pressed to hard upon him, that he fell down in the crowd. [Appian.] Memnon writes, That he lay close for some time at Cabira

Cabira, and afterwards made his escape. [cap. 46.] but Appian reports, That he presently took horse, and away to the mountains, having but a small retinue with him. Plutarch tells the story thus. Mithridates, having not so much as a Sergeant or a Groom staying with him, went out of the Camp with the other throng, neither was there any of the Kings party which had a Horse ready at hand. But at length, though late, Ptolemei the Eunuch, who was provided of a Horse, spying him toiled to and fro in the fight, leaped off, and proffered his Horse to the King.

Lucullus being certified concerning the victory of his victuallers; and seeing the flight of their enemy, he sent a good brigade of Horse to pursue them in their flight: And as for those which remained in the Camp, and had put themselves in a posture of defence, those he environed with his Legions; giving them charge to forbear pillaging the enemies Camp, till such time that they had killed as many of them as might be thought requisite. But the Souldiery, casting their eyes upon the gold and silver vessels, and the rich garments, regarded not the Generals prohibition. [Appian.] The King himself had been taken by a company of Galatians, which had him in chafe, though they knew not so much, had not one of his Mules, which carried the Kings treasure, cast himself betwixt the King and his pursuers; either of its own accord, or by the Kings policy to stop them: For whilst they were busie in gathering up the gold, and quarrelling amongst themselves about dividing the spoile, the King made a shift to escape their clutches. [Memnon, cap. 46. Plutarch & Appian.] And when as they had taken Callistraus the Kings Secretary, and Lucullus had given command to bring him into the Camp; those that conducted him, finding that he had a girdle about him, in which he had saved 500 crowns, killed him by the way. [Plutarch.] Cicero writes this escape of Mithridates out of Pontus, thus, Mithridates, flying away, left behind him in Pontus, a very great bank of gold and silver, and other precious things; part whereof he had received from his ancestors, and part raked up together in his first war in Asia, and piled it up together in his own kingdom. Whilst our men were over-busie in strussing up all they found, the King himself slipped out of their hands.

Lucullus came as farre as Talarea in the pursuit of Mithridates: from whence, because, this being now the fourth day, Mithridates had gotten the start of him, and escaped into Armenia, to Tigranes, (not into Iberia, as it is read amisse in Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 24.) he marched back again, and gave the Souldiers the plunder of the Kings Camp. [Plutarch.] He sent M. Pompejus Commander in chief against Mithridates, whilst he himself, with all his forces removed to Cabira. [Memnon, cap. 47.] But Mithridates, in a letter to Artaces, [in lib. 4. histor. Salust.] puts this varnish upon the whole business: Having recruited my army at Cabira, and there having passed many battles betwixt me and Lucullus, both of us fell into distress of victuals. He was supplied from Artobazanes his Kingdom (Cappadocia) which had not felt the smart of war. And I, in regard that all parts about were wasted and destroyed, withdrew into Armenia.

Mithridates, having got safe to Comana, from thence hyed him away to Tigranes with 200 Horse. [Appian.] But he could by no means get his sonne in law to treat with him; for he would not vouchsafe him, who had lost to great a Kingdom, to much as to come into his sight, or acknowledge him his kinsman: yet he procured from him a grant for the protection of his person, and assigned him a princely table in some of his Castles, nor was wanting in such duties of hospitality. [Memnon, cap. 48. Appian.] Although Plutarch writes that he put him off with a great deale of contempt and scorn, and that he was in some remote corner, cooped up in morr and unhealthful places.

When Mithridates was upon his flight, he sent Bacchus, or Bacchides, one of his Eunuchs, to kill (it mattered not what way) his Sisters, Wives, and Concubines, which were kept at Pharnacia. [Memnon, cap. 49. Plutarch & Appian.]

Amongst the many that were of them, two of the Kings sisters, were Roxane and Statira; who had lived Virgins almost forty years: and two of his wives Ionians borne, Berenice a Chian, and Monima a Milestan. When Bacchides came to them, and told them that they must dye, but they should have the liberty to chuse what kind of death they thought most easie, and freest from pain. Monima plucked the diademe from off her head, and made it fit for her neck, and hanged her self by it: but that presently breaking, O thou cruel head, (said she) wilt thou not serve for this use? Then she kicked it about, and lay on it, and presented her bare throat to Bacchides. Berenice took a cup of poyson, part part whereof she gave to her mother, who was present there, and asked for it: so they drank both together. The poyson did work upon the weaker body, but it did not dispatch Berenice, in regard she had not taken her full dose. Wherefore Bacchides seeing her in pangs, and a long while dying, stepped to her, and strangled her. It is reported also, That of those two Virgins-sisters, one of them, after many a curse and reproach against her brother, drank off her poyson: but Statira spake nothing bitter or unworthy of him, but praised him highly in that, when he himself was in jeopardy of his life, should notwithstanding have some consideration of them, as to provide, that they should dye free women, and unconfronted. [Plutarch.]

Lucullus, having besieged Cabira; the Barbarians resigne upon articles, whereupon he takes them into league, and takes possession of their holds. [Memnon, cap. 37.] Upon the surrender of Cabira, and many other Forts, he found rich treasures, and Prisons, wherein many Grecians, and many also of the Kings acquaintance were bestowed: who, having long since given themselves over as to many dead men; might not so well be said to be presented alive by Lucullus his favour, as to be brought to life again, and as it were receive their second births. Amongst the rest, Nysa, Mithridates his sister, was taken, to her great perversion, [Plutarch.]

The Governours of Mithridates his Garrisons, came all unanimously into Lucullus, excepting a very few. [Appian.] Amongst these, was Strabo the Geographer Grandfather, by the mothers side (brother to Moaphernes, the Governour of Colchis, under Mithridates, as he shews in lib. 12. pag. 499.) the reason of his falling off, was, because Mithridates had lately killed Tibius his Cousen German, and his sonne Theophilus. He was the cause of the revoking of fifteen other Garrisons from Mithridates to Lucullus. [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 557.] And thus was Pontus laid open to the Roman Legions, which before was on all sides blocked up, that the people of Rome could not enter it. [Cicero, pro. lege Manilia, & pro Archia.]

The Romans, having done their work with Mithridates, fell aboard the Cretians, merely out of an ambition to reduce that noble Island; yet they pretended, as a cause of their so doing, That the Cretians favoured Mithridates, and had let him have Souldiers for his money in his army against the Romans; and that for his sake he had entred into an association with the Pirates, which M. Antonius had at that time in chafe, and offered Antonius himself the Legate, an affront; and had given him two arrogant answers. Hereupon Antonius presently invades the Island, in such great hope and confidence of a victory, that he carried in his ships, more chains than arms. But the enemies intercepted many of his ships, and binding those that they took prisoners with sailes and ropes, hung them up; and in that manner the Cretians hoisting saile, returned back triumphantly to their harbours. As for Antonius himself, he fell into a discale, and so by his death ended the war which he had undertaken with little successe: yet for all this he obtained the surname of (Creticus.) [Livie lib. 97. Flor. lib. 3. cap. 7. Asconius in Oratio, de pratura Verrii Siciliensi, Appian, Legat. 30.]

Antiochus (Asiaticus) sonne of Antiochus (Pius) having tarried almost two whole years at Rome with his brother, and yet not permitted from the Senate a grant of those things he demanded concerning the kingdom of Egypt. Upon his returne home, took his journey through Sicily, and came to Syracuse; and there lodged in the house of Q. Minucius Rulus. He brought along with him to Rome a Candlestick, very artificially made of bright gemmes, which he intended to have bestowed in the Capitol: but in regard the Temple there was not yet completed, he resolved to carry it back again with him into Syria; and to send it back to the Capitol, by the hands of his Ambassadors, with some other presents at the time of the dedication of Jupiters Image, which was done the year following by Q. Catulus. But this Candlestick, and many other cups of gold beset with gemmes, and another Cup for wine, cut out of one great gemme, which Verres, the Prator of Sicily, cheated him off; and when he demanded them back of him again, Verres charged him to depart the Province before night, telling him, That he had received advertisement, that the Pirates were coming out of his kingdom into Sicily. [Cicero in Verina 6. five lib. 4. in Verrem.]

Upon frequent massacres in Judea, of the old friends of Alexander (Jannæus) which were effected by the subtilty of the Pharisees, Queen Alexandra dissembling the business; the chief of them with Alexandræ younger sonne

Aristobolus, made their addresses to the Court and beseeched the Queen, that they might either be all slain there, or else that they might be dispersed severally into Castles, where they might pass the remainder of their lives in some security from their enemies treacheries. Whereupon the (for want of better counsel at that time) entrusted them with the command of all the Castles: Excepting Hircania, Alexandrium, and Machærus, in which places the had treasured up whatsoever things were of highest estimation with her, [Joseph. lib. 12. Antiq. cap. 24.]

Cotta, lying still at the League before Heraclea, had not as yet made an assault against it with his whole army; but had only brought up against the Town some few of his Romans, placing the Bithynians in the front. When he saw many of them were wounded and slain, he betook himself to his Engins: none of them terrified the besieged so much, as that which they called their Testudo (which was an Engin fenced with boards and raw hides, under the shelter whereof they might safely scale the walls) hereupon Cotta draws up his whole Body out of the Camp, and led them up against a Tower, which they had great hopes to make a breach upon. But seeing that the Tower had not only endured one or two batteries without any hurt at all, contrary to all their judgements, but the Ram also was broken off from the Engin: the Heracleans began to cheer up, Cotta contrariwise to despair of ever taking the Town. The day following they played their Engin again, but to as little purpose as before: So that Cotta burnt the Engin, and cut off the Carpenters head which made it. And then leaving a sufficient guard at the walls of the City, with the residue of his army, he encamped in the Lycæan Champain; in regard it afforded plenty of provision: whereby he reduced the City to a great exigence, all the country about Heraclea being utterly destroyed. Whereupon they forthwith dispatched an Embassy to the Scythians the inhabitants of Cheroneſus; and to the Theodosians, and to the Princes about Bosphorus, about an association: which took effect accordingly, [Memnon. cap. 51.]

Whilst the enemies played the City from without, they were almost as badly plagued by broils amongst themselves within the Town: For Mithridates his Garrison-souldiers, were not only not content to feed upon what the Townsmen themselves lived on; but scoured the Citizens, and enjoyed them to provide them such things, which at that time could not be easily procured. The Governour Connacrix himself was more urgent than his souldiers; for he did not refrain their insolence, but freely permitted them to do what they did, [Id. ibid.]

Lucullus subdued the Chaldeans, and the Tiberians; [Plutarch.] He gained also Armenia the left, which before Mithridates was Master of [Id. & Europ. lib. 6.] And after he had gone over all Pontus, and settled the Province, he came up with his Fleet to the Cities thereof, which he upon the sea coast, [Appian.]

Amisus was still besieged: Callimachus the Governour having quite tired out the Romans, with his Engin-devices and his plots, [Plutarch.] Lucullus came to the League himself, and exhorted them fairly to resign; but seeing he could not prevail, he removed the siege to Eupatoria; seeing as if he had been very careless in the assaulting it. Those that kept the Garrison, encouraged by the like example of carelessness, continued still in their security. Whereupon Lucullus commanded his souldiers in all haste to apply the scaling-ladders to the walls: And so Eupatoria was taken, and immediately pulled down to the ground, [Memnon. cap. 47.]

Nor long after Amisus was taken, which (as Plutarch confirms out of Salust.) had held out another winter siege. For at the same hour of the day on which Callimachus was wont to draw off his souldiers, to refresh themselves: on the same did Lucullus with his ladders scale the walls, [Id. ibid. & Plutarch.] A little part of the walls being taken by the enemy, Callimachus, either out of his envy that the Romans should have any that would not fly and away) left the City and let it on fire. As soon as the flame caught hold of the perishing City, would have kept the fire from without the walls, and exhorted his souldiers also to help to quench it: But none of them regarded him, but shouted and clattered their arms. So that Lucullus was forced to give the plunder to the souldier, that he might save the City from being burnt to the ground. But they did clean contrary; for when, as all places already began to be chapped and gape with the fire, and the flame preep out of every corner, the souldiers themselves let fire on some houses. Whilst the City was taking, the fire was quenched by a storm which fell miraculously. Lucullus repaired many places before he departed thence, [Plutarch.] and staying off the souldiers from any farther slaughter of the Citizens, he gave both the City and the Country to those that survived, [Memnon. cap. 47.]

At the same time that Tyrannio the Grammarian was taken prisoner, whom because Lucullus would not willingly have made a slave, Murena received in gift and manumitted mitted him, using the gift nothing ingenuously. He was an Amilen by birth, as Strabo who was one of his auditors, shews in his 12 book, [pag. 548.]

Selenæ the Queen, (otherwise called Cleopatra, who alter the death of her husband Antiochus Pius, reigned jointly with her sons in that part of Syria which Tigranes King of Armenia had not seized upon) solicited the Syrians to drive out Tigranes. And some Cities of Phœnicia did draw off from their allegiance to him. Tigranes hereupon entered Syria with a vast army to quell the rebellion, [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 24. compared with Plutarch in Lucullus.] In which Expedition, it is probable, that Tigranes recovered those 70 Valleys of Armenia fortified about with hills and mountains, which when he was an hostage he gave to the Parthians as a gratuity: and walked the Countries of the Parthians which lies about Ninus and Arbela, [Strabo. lib. 11. pag. 532.] For this undoubtedly is that late war of Tigranes against the Parthians, mention whereof is made in Mithridates his letter to Ariarces the year following (in lib. 4. hieor. Salust.) in which also Dio affirms (in his 5. book of histories) That a certain country, about which there was a dispute, was taken from the Parthians.

In the ninth year of Alexandria, Queen of the Jews, to Matthias Curtus the Priest of Iosephus was born: he was Grandfather to Jolephus the Historian; as he himself shews in the beginning of the book of his Life.

Alexander sent his son Antiochus with an army to Damascus against Ptolemy Menæus, who had been a very troublesome neighbour to that City: But he marched back again without any remarkable action, [Joseph. lib. 13. cap. 24.]

About this same time it was noised about that Tigranes was cutted Syria with an army of 500000 men, and that he would suddenly come into Judæa: the brute thereof, and that not without cause, put the Queen, and the whole Nation into a fright: whereupon they dispatched Embassadors unto him with rich Presents lying at the League of Ptolemais, which City he took soon after. The Embassadors having found him there, intreated that he would be content he should receive no other than fair and square dealing from their Queen, and the whole Nation of the Jews. He on the other side, commended them for their coming to long a journey to do their homage to him, and bid them hope all well from him, [Id. ibid.] For although Appian writes how that Tigranes over-ran all the Nations of the Syrians on this side Euphrates as far as Egypt, [In Syriac. pag. 178.] and Lucullus saith expressly, in Plutarch that he got Palæstina, yet, That he marched not towards Egypt beyond Phœnicia is evident out of the sixth book of Eutropius, who saies that Tigranes was master but of part of Phœnicia only.

Lucullus sent Appius Claudius (his wives brother) Ambassador to Tigranes, to demand the delivery of Mithridates unto him, [Memnon. cap. 48. & Plutarch.] The Kings Captain brought him through the upper Countries, a way which they needed not to have gone, winding and turning, and far about; until such time as one of his own free men, a Syrian born, shewed him the right way. Having him for their guide, in five days they reached Euphrates, and came to Antioch, which was called Epiphane. Having received orders to tarry there for Tigranes, (who was gone from thence to subdue some other Cities of Phœnicia, which were not yet reduced under his power) he made many of the Princes in those parts who did not obey the Armenian heartily, to side with the Romans. Amongst whom Zartebius King of the Gordians was one, [Plutarch.]

Appius, besides, promised Lucullus his assistance to many other Cities (brought under Tigranes power) which had covertly sent Ambassadors to him; but charged them for the present to sit still, and not make any commotion. For the Armenians did to him over the Grecians, as was grievous and intolerable. The King himself above the rest, grew so arrogant, and high flown upon his good successes, that whatever mortal men with to themselves and admire, he thought was not only at his disposal, but purposely created for himself: many Kings waited upon him as his Servitors. But first he had in his retinue, as his attendants and guard, who in their liveries ran on foot by his horses side. And when he sat upon his throne, and gave answer to the nations that applied themselves to him, they stood with their hands clasped together, and their fingers locked one within another; which posture above all others, was accounted an acknowledgment of their vassalage, [Id.]

L. Metellus, appointed to succeed Verres in the Prætorship of Sicilia, [Africanus in Dione.] going against the Pirates in Sicilia, (not Ciliæ, as false in Livies Epitome) drove off with honour, [Liv. lib. 98. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 3.] Upon the Sicilians impeaching Verres of extortion, Cicero, (who was designed the Edil) on their behalf fell into a contest with Hortensius, who was designed Consul, [Cicero in Bruto.] In which Q. Cecilius Niger endeavoured what he could, but all in vain, that himself, and not Cicero, might have the managing of the impeachment of Verres. This Q. Cecilius Neger was Verres his Quæstor in that Isle. He was a Sicilian indeed by descent,

(as Peditian hath observed, in Divinatione adversus Caelium) but a free man by condition, and a Jew by Religion. Plutarch writes in the life of Cicero, where also he relates the jest which Cicero put upon Caelius for being a Jew, Quid Judas cum verber?

That passage of Cicero in his fifth book against Verres, contributes somewhat towards the discovery of the state, in which things were at present. Notwithstanding all this, let him come if he please, let him engage with the Cretians in a battle; let him free the Byzantines, let him call Ptolemy King; let him speak and think whatsoever Hortensius would have him. To which agrees another passage in an Epistle which Mithridates wrote the year following to Ariaces, Salust lib. 4. hiftor. The Cretians were at that instant the only people which retained their freedom, and King Ptolemy: And a little after, Ptolemy puts off the day of battle being hired thenceunto. The Cretians have been now once assaulted, and are resolved not to make an end, but in their inter extinguishtment. By comparing of which two places together, any man may gather, how that the Romans did turn that right which Antiochus (Asiatius) made use of amongst them for the recovery of the kingdom of Egypt, to their own advantage: that they deemed it convenient that Ptolemy Alexander should be called King, so long as he would purchase the quiet possession of that kingdom by paying a constant salary: and that they fully resolved to commence afresh the first Cretick war, which happened to be interrupted by the fall of M. Antonius; which was performed accordingly, as we shall see in the History of the year following.

Lucullus being marched into Asia, which as yet was in arrears a fourth part of the fruits upon the account of a fine, in which Sylla had amerced it, imposed a tribute proportioned to their houses and number of servants, [Appian.] For the Collectors and Usurers had made such havock of the Cities of Asia, and had treated them so slavishly, that they were not only compelled privately to sell their sons and their daughters, but to put to publick sale their ornaments, pictures, images, and the upshot of all was, that they became slaves to their creditors.

Lucullus took such a course with those pestilent fellows, that within four years time, all obligations were satisfied, and possessions restored free again to their owners to inherit. This publick debt was twenty thousand talents, which Sylla had laid upon Asia: The creditours were allowed only double the sum, which by their usuries had amounted to 120 thousand talents. The creditours thought this something too hard measure, whereupon they traduced Lucullus at Rome, and wrought some of the Grandees there to be against him. But Lucullus was not only beloved of those Nations to which he had done those good services, but also was mightily endeared to all the other Provinces, who esteemed those people very happy, whose fortune it should be to have such a Governour as he was, appointed over them, [Plutarch.]

Lucullus, after he had fully settled Asia with many excellent laws, and an universal peace, did not omit Pleasures and Festivities. For residing at Athens, he delighted the Cities with Shewes, Triumphal Feasts, Wrestling, and Fencing. The Cities kept these Lucullia by course in honour of him, with which notwithstanding he was not so much taken, as he was with the intimation of the cordial affection they bore unto him, [Idem.]

Tigranes killed Cleopatra, surnamed Selena, having a while kept her close prisoner in the Castle at Selucia, [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 749.] whereby it happened that Antiochus Asiatius, who had some hopes of recovering the kingdom of Egypt in right of his mother, was disappointed also of that part of Syria which he held.

No sooner was Tigranes returned to Antioch, but Appius the Legate declared openly, that he was come to fetch away Mithridates, as belonging to Lucullus his Triumphs, and upon his refusal to surrender him, to proclaim war against Tigranes. Tigranes was somewhat troubled at the Legates peremptoriness: but held his countenance to see what he had more to say. In almost 25 years time he had not heard a free voice until now: for so many years he had reigned, or rather played the part of a forgerer. To Appius he replied: That he knew well enough that Mithridates was a very naughty man, yet he must have a respect to the alliance which was betwixt them: And that all the World might well cry out on him, if he should resign up his wives father into the hands of his enemies. He was therefore resolved not to desert Mithridates, and if the Romans would bring in a war, he could return them as good as they brought. He was much offended at Lucullus, because in his letter he had saluted him King only, and not King of Kings: and therefore to be quit, writing back to him, he would not vouchsafe him the title of General. Appius returned with all speed to the General, having amongst many other Presents, accepted only of one cup of Gold, lest happily the King might have taken dislike, if obstinately refused them all, [Id. compared with Memnon, cap. 48.]

Zarbius, King of the Gordyans, together with his wife and children, was put to death by Tigranes, upon discovery that he had covertly strook hands with Lucullus, [Plutarch, in Lucullus.]

As soon as Appius was returned, and the war intended with Tigranes appeared on foot: Lucullus paid his holy vows to his gods at Ephesus, as if the work had been done already. And then marched back again into Pontus; and encamped before Sinope, or rather besieged the Kings party of Cilicians which were garrisoned therein, [Id. compared with Appian, pag. 228.] For as the City was assaulted from without the walls by the Romans, so was it within the walls by the Commander which King Mithridates had appointed to keep the Town: viz. Cleochares, as Orofius, or Bacchis, as Strabo calls him: For he, learning some piece of treachery ere long, and thereupon committing several massacres amongst the Citizens, brought things to that pass, that the Citizens had neither heart courageously to resist the enemy, nor yet were they in a capacity to treat upon articles of surrender, [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 546.] Which Tragedy we have delivered more at large by Memnon, thus:

Leonippus, to whom with Cleochares, the care and defence of the City was entrusted by the King, perceiving things in something a forcible condition, lent do Lucullus about delivering up the City. But Cleochares and Seleucus the Arch-pirate (for even he was Mithridates his Legate, and was in equal authority with the rest) having sent out the plot, called a Council, and accused Leonippus: but the Citizens would by no means listen an ear to the accusation, being highly opinionated of the mans integrity; whereupon Cleochares his faction, being afraid of his interest amongst the Commons, slew him treacherously by night. The Commons indeed laid the accident deeply to heart: but Cleochares and his party bore all the way, and did what they list themselves: supposing that by their carrying things with such an high hand, they might happily escape calling to an account for the massacre of Leonippus, [Memnon, cap. 55.]

Mean while Centorius, Admiral of the Roman Fleet, sailing with 15 Gallies, carrying three oars a bank, which were fraught with provision, from Bosphorus to the Roman Camp, arrives near Sinope. Cleochares and Seleucus their Sinopian Gallies under the command of Seleucus, put to sea, and fought with Centorius: the Gallies were worsted, and their ships with their provision brought away as prize. Cleochares and his Colleague, elevated with this success, deport themselves more tyrannically than before; for they hale the Townsmen to execution without any legal process, and cruelly abuse them sundry other ways. But it chanced that Cleochares and Seleucus fell at odds, whilst Cleochares deemed it best to continue the war, but Seleucus would have all the Sinopians put to the sword, and the City to be delivered up to the Romans as a gallant gratuity: But seeing they could not agree about the business, they put all they had into ships, and sent them away to Machares, Mithridates his son, who at that instant was resident at Colchis, [Id. ibid.]

About the same time, Lucullus drew up closer to the City, and made a most furious storm: But Machares Mithridates his son, dispatched an Embassage unto Lucullus, whereby he petitioned that there might be a League of friendship and association betwixt them. The petition he courteously received, and told him, that there should be a firm League betwixt them, provided that henceforward he should not send any supplies of provision to any of the Sinopians. Who not only observed what was enjoined him, but whatsoever was designed for the relief of Mithridates his Party, he took order to have it conveyed to Lucullus, [Id. cap. 56.] Upon this Machares King of Bosphorus, having presented Lucullus with a Coronet of a thousand crowns in estimation, was admitted an ally and confederate of the people of Rome, [Liv. lib. 98. compared with Plutarch, & Appian.]

Cleochares and Seleucus, observing how things went, thought themselves but in a desperate condition: Whereupon they fell foule upon the Citizens, and massacred many of them, carried abundance of wealth on ship-board, gave the Town first to the soldiers to plunder, and afterwards set it on fire. Thus done, they burnt their greater ships, and in the lighter they sailed away by night to the inner parts of Pontus, inhabited by the Sarmatians and the Lazians. Lucullus perceiving by the blaze of the flame what was done, commanded his soldiers to scale the walls: And as soon as he was entered the Town, he put to the sword 8000 of the Kings Party who remained behind: but took pity on the rest, and made what speed he could to quench the fire, and restored unto the Citizens their goods. Thus was this miserable City by the counter-change of friends and foes, ruined by them that came to defend it, and preserved by them that came to ruin it, [Memnon, cap. 56. Plutarch Appian. Orofius lib. 6. cap. 3.]

Thereupon why Lucullus took such a care of preserving Sinope, and afterwards of his enfranchising it, is bruited to be some admonition which he received in a dream.

For in his sleep one appeared at his bed side, speaking these words; Go a little forwards Lucullus, for Antiochus is coming to meet thee. When he was awake he could not possibly imagine, what this should mean: yet that same day he took the City, and in his pursuit of the Cilicians, (who made what haste they could to ship themselves and away) he espied a Statue lying upon the shore side: The Cilicians purposed to have made it their companion in their escape, and to that end wrapped it up in cloaths, and bound it up with cords; but they had not time enough to bring it a ship-board. When they had unfolded it, Lucullus saw, that it was like him who had appeared unto him in the night, and learned afterwards that it was the Statue of Antiochus, who was the founder of the City of Sinope: Upon the hearing this, there instantly came into his minde Sylla's injunctions, who in his Commentaries gives this hint; how that nothing is to be accounted to lure and certain, as that which is exhibited in dreams, [Plutarch, & Appian.] This Statue of Antiochus, which was Sthenides his handy-work, and Billarus his Sphere he took along with him; but left all other ornaments of the City behinde him, [Strabo, lib. 12.]

After he had done at Sinope, he restored Amifus also to its inhabitants, who in like manner had all conveyed themselves away by shipping: and to the City he granted the exercise of their own laws and their freedom, [Appian.] He peopled Cities for other Grecians also, even for as many as would but desire that favour of him: adding thitherto each City 120 furlongs of land. Moreover, of the Athenians, who in the time of Sylla had fled thither to dwell because of Antioch's tyranny, as many as he found surviving, he clad decently, gave to each of them 200 diachmes, and lent them back into their Country, [Plutarch.]

Amalea (Strabo the Geographers country) as yet stood it out in arms, but it was not long ere it also did fealty to the Romans, [Mennon, cap. 56.]

Cotta, having destroyed all about Heraclea, once more attempted the walls, but perceiving his souldiers somewhat slack and coole in the charge, gave it over; and sent for Triarius, ordering him with all speed to block up the way, and intercept the Townsmen receiving supplies by sea, [Id. cap. 51.]

Triarius accordingly took along with him all the ships he had of his own, and 20 Rhodian, which altogether made 43. and with this Fleet sailed away into Pontus: upon timely notice given to Cotta of his coming, Cotta drew up his army to the walls of the City, and Triarius discovered himself at sea. Hereupon the Heracleans, somewhat troubled at Triarius his sudden approach with his Fleet, put to sea with 30 ships, indeed, but they were not so well manned as was requisite: all the other were employed in making good the City against the enemies assaults. The Rhodians gave the first onset on the Heraclean ships, in an instant there were sunk three of the Rhodians ships, and five of the Heracleans. Hereupon the Romans came into the fight, who although they were soundly shattered in the scuffes, yet they did more hurt to, than they received from, the enemy; and in the close, routed the Heracleans, and forced them to retreat back to the City, with the losse of 14 of their ships. The conquering fleet rode into the great Port, and Cotta also drew off his foot from storming the Town, [Id. cap. 52.]

Triarius his men every day made their sallies out of the port, to hinder the bringing in of provision to the besieged; whereupon there ensued such a scarcity of victuals in the Town, that a pottle of corn was risen to 80 Atticks: and amongst other perplexities, the pestilence brake in amongst them, occasioned either by some distemper of the air, or an untimely course of dyet. It ended them not all alike, but some after this manner, some on that, as if their maladies had been different. Amongst whom, Lamachus himself was one, whose pangs of death were more violent and tedious, than any of the others. This contagion raged most amongst the Souldiers of the Garrison, in so much, That of three thousand, there dyed one thousand, [Id. ibid.]

Conacorex, now even ready to faint under this heavy pressure of so many afflictions, resolved to betray the City to the Romans, and to purchase his own recovery, though he made the Heracleans pay for it. Damophes, an Heraclean, was assiduous to bring about the plot, one who stood in great emulation with Lamachus: in all consultations, who also, after Lamachus his decease, was appointed over the Garrison. Conacorex, providing for himself, not daring to trust Cotta overmuch, who was but a slippery fellow, and not much to be relied upon, imparted the matter to Triarius: neither did Damophes shew himself a slug in bringing the business to a head: so that having struck up so fair a bargain for the surrender, as that they thought themselves in a good condition, they applied themselves close to their works. But it happened that the conspirators transactions came to be blazoned amongst the common people: whereupon they flocked altogether, and called for the Governour of the City, and then Brithagoras, a person of eminent authority amongst his Country men, earnestly netly requested Conacorex, that he would give way to a treaty with Triarius, concerning the general safety of them all; but he was very obstinate, against any such pacification; yet did he very charitably draw the Heracleans with his fair words into a wile, [Id. cap. 53.]

Hereupon Conacorex, in the dead of the night, shipped all his men, and quitted the Town, for that was the tenour of the covenant made with Triarius. That they should march away quietly, with all their bag and baggage: as for Damophes, he opened the gates, and let in the Roman army, and Triarius: some of them came rushing in at the gate, others clambered up the walls. And now the Heracleans saw they were betrayed, some of them yielded up themselves, and the rest were slain: their household stuffe, and whatsoever things they had laid aside, in hopes to secure, were plundered; indeed, the enemy proceeded with a great deal of cruelty against the Citizens for the Romans remembered, what great losses they had received in the late fight, and what great troubles they were put to, in assaulting the Town: In revenge whereof they did not so much as forbear those who had escaped for sanctuary to the consecrated places, but slew them near the Altars and the Temples, though earnestly crying for quarter. Their condition seemed to desparate, that many escaped over the walls, and dispersed themselves about the Country, whilst others were forced to fly to Cotta, [Id. ibid.]

Cotta, being certainly informed by these that came in to him, how that the City was taken, many men slain, and the Town plundered, was all a fire at the news, and in great indignation marched as fast as he could to the City. His army also was very deeply discontented, not only that hereby they had lost the glory of their valiant achievements, but were also in a manner cheated of all their prizes and booties: whereupon, they fell most bitterly upon their Country men, and had undone one another, by killing each other, had not Triarius, hearing of the combustion, interposed, and put an end to the civil war, by pacifying Cotta, with a parcel of good words, and promising faithfully an equal distribution of all they had taken in the Town. [Id.]

Cotta, having received intelligence, how that Conacorex was seized of Teium and Amastus, immediately dispatched away Triarius to recover their Cities again out of his hands, whilst he himself abode at Heraclea, where, taking into his custody, those that submitted themselves, and the prisoners, he proceeded to other matters; in all his administrations, expressing the height of cruelty. For searching up and down in every corner for the wealth of the City, he kept not his fingers off from consecrated things. He took down the statues and images, very fair ones, and good store of them; yea, he carried Hercules out of the market place, and plucked off his ornament from the pyramide, and sundry other things out of the Temple and Cities every whit as rare and beautiful as they, and put them a shipboard. And for his farewell, he commanded his Souldiers to bring fire, and burnt the City in many places. Thus was Heraclea taken and subdued, having stood out two years siege. [Id. cap. 54.]

Triarius, arriving at the Cities assigned him by Cotta, recovered them upon articles, having engaged Conacorex (who thought to palliate his delivering up Heraclea, by seizing on other Cities) for his sailing away without let or molestation, [Id. ibid.]

Cotta (having dispatched things after that manner as hath been said) delivered up all his forces, both Foot and Horse, to Lucullus, and dismissed the Auxiliaries which he had of the Allies respectively into their Countries, and to sailed away himself with his fleet. But it happened that part of the Fleet which carried the spoiles of Heraclea, being over heavily freighted, sunk under water, not far from shoar, and the other moiety, was by a contrary North wind dashed against the sands, which caused the ships to discharge much of their loadings. [Id.]

Lucullus, leaving Sornatius behind him, with 6000 souldiers, to order the Province, took along with him 12 thousand Foot, and lesse than 3000 Horse (two Legion, and five hundred Horse, (saith Appian) and entered Cappadocia; where, having Ariobarzanes his friend, he marched very long marches to the River Euphrates, where Cappadocia is severed from Armenia. [Salust. Histor. lib. 4. apud Nonium, in voc. Navis edicaria, Mennon, cap. 58. Plut. Appian.] Euphrates at that instant, was by reason of the winter swelled high, and rough: but about evening, the water began to abate, and by break of day, the river was reduced within the bounds of its own banks. Whereupon the inhabitants fell down in adoration of Lucullus, in regard the waters did not overflow, as they had hab nab before, but as it were on purpose in the very nick to afford him a ready passage. No sooner had he wafted over his army, but a pleasant prodigy presented it self to him. One of the Oxen consecrated to the Perian Diana (whom the Barbarians beyond Euphrates worship with high reverence) though those beasts are not usually taken, but with much ado, came of its own accord, and offered it self for a sacrifice to Lucullus. Lucullus also himself sacrificed a bull to Euphrates; for his to fortunate passage over: All that day he encamped there. [Plutarch.]

The next day, and some dayes after, he marched through Sophenes; he offered not the least injury to the inhabitants, they having both resigned themselves up to him, and cheerfully entertained his army, [Idem.] only he demanded some monies from them; for the inhabitants of those Countries have a kind of a natural antipathy against all fighting; inasmuch, that they would not vouchsafe to interpose themselves when Tigranes and Lucullus were to hard at it. [Appian.]

In those parts there was a Castle, wherein a great deal of Treasure was conceived to be deposited; the Soldiers had a great minde to have a bout with it: But Lucullus, pointing at Taurus, which might be seen aloof off, Let us, said he, rather set upon yonder strong hold; what is here stored up, it is only reserved to reward the conquerours, and to marching onwards, he passed Tigres, and entered Armenia. [Plutarch.]

Upon this instant of Lucullus his invading Armenia; Alexandra, Queen of the Jews, fell dangerously sick. Whereupon Aristobolus her young sonne, affecting the kingdom, stole out in the night, taking along with him only one servant, and repaired those Castles, which his fathers friends had the command of: his wife was only privy to the designe; whom he left at home with his children. The first place he came to was Agaba, where Galates was one of those in command. He received Aristobolus very readily. [Josephus, lib. 13. cap. 24. compared with lib. 1. Belli, cap. 4.]

The day following, the Queen took notice of Aristobolus his absence, yet had no thoughts of his being gone about innovation in the State. But when as messenger after messenger came and brought the news of this Castle, then of that Castle being seized on by her sonne: then both the Queen her self, and the whole Nation were in a maze and confusion, fearing that if he should chance to get the kingdom into his hands, he would call them to a strict account for their hard usage of his intimate friends. It was therefore thought fit to secure his wife and children in the Fort which was near the Temple. In the mean time, there was great confluence of men to Aristobolus, hoping to get something by this innovation in the State, so that now there was not wanting either the noise, or the garb of a King. Aristobolus gleaned up an army out of mount Libanus, Trachonitis, and the neighbouring Provinces. [Id. ibid. lib. 13. cap. 24.]

Whereupon Hircanus the High Priests, and the Elders of the Jews, make their address to the Queen, desiring her speedy advice in these state emergencies, he bid them do whatsoever they in their judgements thought most conducive to the publick interest, and to employ the present strength and treasure of the kingdom to that behoof. For her own particular, she was at present in such a weak condition, both in body and mind, that she could not be lessure for those publick administrations. Thus said, she not long after dyed. [Idem.]

After her succeeded Hircanus, her eldest son, in the third year of the 177 Olympiade. Q. Hortensius, and Q. Metellus (afterwards surnamed Creticus) being Consuls, [Id. lib. 14. Antiqui, cap. 1.] His mother in his life time had passed over the kingdom to him, but Aristobolus, though younger brother, did exceed both in strength and authority. [Id. lib. 1. cap. 4.]

Upon the Consuls casting lots for their Provinces, the managing of war designed against the Cretians, fell upon Hortensius: but he, taking more delight in the City and the Forum, (in which he had the first place after Cicero) freely granted this expedition to his Colleague Metellus. [Xiphilin, ex Diono.]

Upon the Senates decree of going to war against the Cretians, the most grave and sage ones amongst them, deemed it most convenient to dispatch Ambassadors to Rome, to clear all allegations, and to pacify the Senate with fair words, and bag their reconciliation. This motion was entertained: whereupon they sent thirty of their most eminent men, upon this Embassy to Rome; hoping that they should not only obtain a new ratification of their former contracts, but also looked to be thanked for the favour they had shewed to their Quarter and Soldiers, which they had taken prisoners in the late engagement with M. Antonius. The Ambassadors by giving private visits to the Senators, at their several Houses, had so wrought them to their side, that when they were brought into the Senate, and had given discreet satisfaction to the charges that were against them, and exactly rectified the good offices they had done, and their association of War under the Roman General. It was resolved, That the Cretians impeachments should be

be taken off, and that henceforward they should be reputed amongst the Friends and Allies of the people of Rome: but Lentulus, (surnamed Spinther) got this decree reversed: whereupon this particular business was several times taken to debate by the Senate; and in the upshot, it was concluded, That the Cretians, in regard that they had sided with the Pirates at sea, and had been sharers in the prizes taken, should tend to Rome all their Pirate-ships, even to very boats of four oars, and whatsoever ships they had in their possession, which they had taken from the Romans. Demand also was made, for the resigning up all Prisoners, Runnagadoes, the 300 famous hostages. Lathenes also, who had fought with Antonius and Panares, and besides these, 4000 talents of silver. [Diod. Legat. 35. Appian, Legat. 30. Dio, Legat. 37. al. 38.]

The Romans did not wait for a reply from the Cretians, which were at home, to those particulars; but presently sent one of the Consuls, to receive what was demanded, and if in case they refused to part with them, to wage war with them. And certain it was, they would not part with them: For was it imaginable, that those, who, at the beginning, are any such things were exacted from them, or before they had obtained a victory, would by no means be brought to acknowledge any misdemeanour committed by them, should now, after they had been flustered with a victory, tamely submit to so many, and such high demands. The Romans knowing full well what would be the result of all, and suspecting the Legates would be tampering with some, by greasing them in the first, to obstruct the wars, made a decree in the Senate, prohibiting any person whatsoever, to lend them any thing. [Dio, ibid.]

The Cretians, debating the commands of the Senate, the most politick of them were of opinion, That every particular was to be observed; but those of Lathenes his faction being somewhat obnoxious, and fearing they should be sent to Rome, and there smart for what they had done, animated the people, exhorting them earnestly to contend for their liberty. [Diod. Legat. 35.]

Cotta being now returned to Rome, was highly honoured by the Senate, and ennobled with the surname of Ponticus, because he had taken Heraclea. [Memnon, cap. 61.]

Mithridates had been resident in the parts of Armenia, a year and eight moneths, and as yet had not been admitted to the sight of Tigranes his son in law. But being at last overcome by his importunity, to present himself, he met him with a gallant train, and received his father in law with a Princely magnificence. Nevertheless, three dayes passed without any conference betwixt them, but afterwards, by the lumpcousness of the entertainments, he gave sufficient intimation of his affection towards him. [Memnon, cap. 57.] Then in the conference, which was held very private at Court, they abated the suspicion of Metrodorus Scepius, and other friends on both sides, on whom they fathered the cause of all, and so Mithridates was sent back again into Pontus, being furnished with ten thousand Horle. [Memnon.]

Lucullus drew up a company against the City, wherein he was informed that Tigranes had secured his Curtesians, and most of those things which he held most dear, and were had in greatest estimation by him. [Idem, cap. 58.]

Tigranes having hanged up a fellow, who brought the first news of Lucullus his being upon his march, as a mover of the people; no body ever after brought him any tidings. But at last, finding it to be so indeed; he sent out Mithrobarzanes against Lucullus, with two (as Appian) or three (as Plutarch hath it) thousand Horle, and a vast number of Foot, with orders to take Lucullus alive, and bring him to him, that thereby others might be deterred from that or the like enterprise. [Plutarch and Appian.]

A moiety of Lucullus his Forces were encamped, the remainder, were upon their march, when the Scouts brought news of the enemies approach. Whereupon Lucullus fearing lest the enemy should fall upon his men, finding them in a distraction and in no posture: he made an halt, and applied himself to fortifie his Camp: But sent Sexilius the Legate with 1600 Horle and almost as many foot, with orders to stop when he was come up to the enemy, and not to stir till word was brought him that the Camp was thoroughly fortified. Yet Mithrobarzanes came so furiously upon him, that he was necessitated to fight: Mithrobarzanes himself was slain in this engagement, all the rest, excepting a very few, took themselves to their heels, and were slain in the pursuit. [Plutarch.]

Tigranes removed from Tigranocerta, and committing the custody of the City to Mancus his trust, went about the country to levie an army, and retreating to Taurus, made that place the general Rendezvous. [Id. compared with Appian.] But Lucullus ployed him to close, that he could not draw into a Body: For he sent Mitrana to supplese and take all companies he found marching to Tigranes: Scitulus also went another way, to meet with a great band of Arabians, and to hinder their joining with the King. [Plutarch.]

Scitulus, coming upon the Arabians ere they were aware, as they were encamping, took the greatest part of them: Mitrana marching after Tigranes, overtook him with a very great company in an uneven and narrow dale, who having gotten some advantage of the place, he engaged him: but Tigranes, leaving behind him all his carriages, made away as fast as he could. Many of the Armenians died in the fight, but far many more were taken prisoners. [Id.]

Scitulus having forced Mancus to retreat into Tigranocerta, fell to plunder the Kings Palace which was situate without the walls: and to draw a trench about the City and the Castle, to place the batteries, and undermine the walls. [Appian.] At last Tigranus himself came in to them, and layed close siege to the City: supposing that Lucullus would not suffer him to sit still before the Town, but in a rage would come down and fight him. [Plutarch.] But the Barbarians did him a great deal of mischief, not solely by their darts, but with their Naphtha, or fire-pitch which they took out of their Engines. This Naphtha, is a kind of a pitchy substance, so Kalding, that it burns up all it cleaves to, neither will any moisture quench it, but with a great deal of difficulty. [Xiphilin, ex. Dione.]

Mithridates by Embassadors and by letters, (as Plutarch, not in person, and then first meeting with Tigranes, as Appian hath it) was very instant with him, by no means to fight the Romans, but by declining all engagement, to rove about the country with his Cavalry, and to waste all about, if possible thereby to bring the enemy to a distresse of victuals. Just as Lucullus had not long since before Cyzicum, made him moulder away an army without fighting a stroke.

The Armenians and the Gordians joyed with Tigranes: To these, every man of the Medes and Adiabans were brought by their Kings. The Arabians also came flocking in from the Babylonian sea, many Albans from the Caspian sea, and the Iberians their neighbours, and not a few of those free people which inhabit near Anaxes. [Plutarch.] Of these, some came out of mere affection to the King, others being solicited thereto by gifts as Plutarch, and others out of very fear, as Cicero hath observed, in Oratione Manilianæ. For a strong and vehement opinion had wholly possessed the minds of those barbarous people, that the Roman army was drawn into those quarters, upon no other design, but to ransack their Regions and wealthy Temple. And upon this very account, many Nations, and those very considerable ones, rose up in arms against Lucullus.

Upon the general Rendezvous of all these Forces, Tigranes his eating-tables, and council-tables sounding nothing but Victory, Victories, and how roughly they would handle the enemy, if they once got them under their clutches. Taxiles himself, who was Mithridates his Legate, and of his assistance, was in danger of losing his head: because in a Council of War, he was altogether against fighting with the Romans: saying, that the Roman armies were things utterly unvanquishable: and in regard Mithridates himself seemed out of envy to put Tigranes by the glory of that Victory, he would not wait until he came, lest he might share with him in the glory of the day. [Plutarch.] whereas but just before he had dispatched some in all haste to call him back to him. [Memnon, cap. 58.]

Tigranes ordered about five thousand soldiers to go and defend the City in which his Courtizans were kept: who there charging thorough the Roman Brigades, got into the Town; and finding their return intercepted by a valley of archers, sent away the Kings Concubines, and the Treasures safe by night unto Tigranes: But upon break of day, the Romans and the Thracians fighting with those Armenians, slew a very great many of them; neither was the number of the prisoners taken inferior to those they slew in the battles. [Memnon, cap. 58. and Appian. whose account is rectified out of Memnon.]

Tigranes marched against Lucullus with the residue of his army: very much troubled (as they say) that he was now to conflict only with one of the Roman Generals: viz. Lucullus, and not with the whole herd of them. For he had in his army, of Archers and Slingers 20000. of Horse 5000. of Foot armed Cap a pe, digested partly into Regiments, partly into Squadrons, 15000. of those who were designed for barracadoing passages, and such like services 35000. [Plutarch.]

As soon as Tigranes appeared with all his host upon Taurus, and from the top of the hill, took a view of the Roman army, beleaguering Tigranocerta: the Barbarous rabble in the City, welcomed the Kings arriving with howlings and acclamations, and rancoring the Romans from the top of the walls, pointed them to the Armenians on the hill. [Plutarch.]

Lucullus, leaving Mitrana with six thousand Foot, to continue the siege of Tigranocerta, marched himself against Tigranes: leaving in his band 24 Regiments of Foot, (amongst whom there were not above 1000) all his Horse, Slingers and Archers, being about 1000, and encamped near a river, in a great spacious field. [Id.] No sooner had Tigranes a sight of the Romans Camp, but he presently disdained the chineffe of them, and reproached them, saying: If these men be come as Ambassadors, there are abundance of them indeed; but if as enemies, there is but a sorry company of them. [Memnon, cap. 59. Plutarch, Appian, & Xiphilin, ex. Dione.]

As Lucullus was waiting his army over the river, some of his Commanders advised him to have a care of what he did that day, in regard it stood in the Kalender amongst the unlucky (they call them the black) dayes: For on that very day, the Cimbrians defeated the army under the conduct of Cephion: Lucullus replied, It behoves us therefore to fight the more stoutly now, if happily we may render this so dismal and black day, a day of jollity and gratulation to the Romans: That day was the day before the Nores of October. [Plutarch in Lucullus, & Camillus, & Appian.] as the year indeed then went with the Romans: but talling is according to the Julian computation, with the fifth month, or July, upon the beginning of the fourth year of the 177 Olympiade, to which this fight is truly referred by Plutarch.

Lucullus, perceiving his Soldiers somewhat fearful of those which were armed cap a pe, bid them be of good courage, there being greater trouble in stripping elan in overcoming them: and he first charging them upon the hill, and perceiving the Barbarians to give ground, cried out, We have overcome them, fellow Soldiers! [Plutarch in Apobegm.] No sooner was Tigranes his right wing forced to fly, but the left also began to shrink, and in conclusion, they all turned their backs, and so the Armenians fled confusedly, and in a hurry, and the laughter was answerable to the number of men. [Memnon, cap. 59.] The Romans continuing the execution for 120 furlongs, trampled all the way upon bracelets and chaines, till night came upon them. Being forced thereupon to give over the chase, they fell to stripping the dead bodies, which Lucullus by proclamation had prohibited, until such time they had done sufficient execution on the enemy. [Appian.]

Plutarch gives up the tally of the number slain of Tigranes forces, to be 5000, and more taken prisoners, besides a rabble route: Orotius faith, [lib. 16, cap. 3.] That 30000 men were reported slain in that battle; of Foot above 20000, faith Plutarch, tell that day, and very few of the Horse escaped. Of the Roman army there were but 100 wounded, and five slain. Anaxiochus the Philosopher, in his Commentary, De Div. mentioning this fight, avows the Sun never to have beheld the like. Strabo in his history, relates, How that the Romans themselves were ashamed of what they had done, and jeered themselves for putting on their arms against such cowardly slaves. Livy faith, That the Romans never in all their lives, fought at such a disadvantage for number; the Conquerors, not equalizing the twentieth part of the Conquered; nay, not so much. [Plutarch.]

Suppose, we say with Eutropius, Sextus Rufus, and Jornandes, that Lucullus had 18000 men in his army; that number multiplied by twenty, will make 360000, now ascribe to Tigranes, not 1900 (as Plutarch) but 250 (as Appian) thousand Foot, of Horse not 50, (as Appian) but 5 thousand as Plutarch: so that he with Plutarch 20000 Archers, and 35000 Pages: the residue will be, the aforesaid 360 thousand; which it to be admitted for exact, then neither Plutarch, nor Memnon account, came not near the truth, as too low the one assigning Tigranes to have in his army 40000 Foot, and 30000 Horse: the other allowing him but 80 thousand Foot and Horse together. As their account is rated lower, so Eutropius is as much extravagant in over rating. The King (saith) he came with 600 thousand Clibanarii, and 100 Archers and armed men: The Clibanarii were Horse armed cap a pe in armour of proof, as they are described by Salust. [lib. histor. 4. cited by Nonius in voc. (ut abstratti.)] now Plutarch intimates, That Lucullus himself wrote to the Senate, that Tigranes had in his army only 17 thousand of those Clibanarii, so that there is no doubt, but Eutropius was extremely mistaken in giving up that monstrous sum of 600 thousand. In Sextus Rufus his Breviary, there are not reckoned above 7500 of those Clibanarii: but of Archers 120 (al. 130.) thousand.

Tigranes, in the very beginning of the engagement, quitted the field, running as fast as he could to one of his Calities, having scarce 150 Horse in his company; where, finding his son in as terrible a condition as himself, he pluckt off the Diadem and Turban from his head, and resigned them up to him, bidding him, not without tears in his eyes, to shift for himself, if he could devise any possible means, which had not as yet been essayed. The young Prince dared not carry those Ensigns-Royal, up and down with him, but committed them to a most trusty friend, to preserve for him; who soon after had the ill fortune to be taken prisoner, and brought to Lucullus; and the Soldiers at the same time also seized upon the Turbans and the Diadems, and gave them to Lucullus, [Memnon, cap. 59. & Plutarch, compared with Oros. lib. 6, cap. 3. and Xiphilin, in Epitome Dionis.] as for Lucullus, he marched back to Tigranocerta, and played the siege more closely than ever before. [Memnon, ibid.]

Mithridates made no great haste to the fight, supposing that Lucullus would manage this war with the same caution, and delay as formerly he was wont to do; and about that account, being lent for by Tigranes he played the trower in his marches. But soon after, lighting by chance upon the way with some few Armenians amazed and ready to drop down for fear, he thought all went not right on Tigranes side: But soon after meeting with other companies stript and wounded, from whom he received an exact narrative of the defeat; he made what haste he could to find out Tigranes. And finding him both dejected and dejected, he insulted not over him, as he had served him formerly; but dismounted from his horse, and (after a mutual bemoaning each others sad misfortune) resigned up to him his own princely Retinue which attended him, and bid him courage for the future, [Plut.] Having somewhat cheered him up, he furnished him with royal Robes, as rich as any he was wont to wear. He made also some proposals concerning levying new Forces, (being himself already provided with a considerable army) making no question but another field would repair all the former losses. But Tigranes, ascribing more prowess and discretion to Mithridates, and thinking him fitter to deal with the Romans in a war than himself, left all to his managing and arbitrament, [Memnon, cap. 59.]

Mancaus, taking from the walls of Tigranocerta a sad view of his friends defeated, fell to disarming all the Grecian Mercenaries, supposing they would prove false to him: who fearing they should be laid hold on, provided themselves with good cudgels, and drew themselves up into a body, and to kept together day and night. And seeing Mancaus coming and marching against them with his armed Barbarians, wrapping their garments about their arms instead of bucklers, they bravely charged them: and as fast as they slew them, presently divided their arms amongst themselves: And supposing they were now sufficiently provided with arms for the present, after they had seized upon some Forts upon the walls, they called in the Romans that beleaguered them, and received them into the Town. So Appian and Plutarch, who dissent in no one particular from him. Dio in his 35 book relates, that the most part of the Inhabitants were Cilicians, and that they upon some difference which happened betwixt them and the Armenians, let the Romans into the Town by night, who plundered all, but what the Cilicians were owners of. But Memnon delivers out, how that Mithridates, or rather Tigranes his Commanders, seeing how desperately things went on their side; having procured articles for themselves, delivered up the Town to Lucullus, [Memnon, cap. 59.]

Lucullus, having won Tigranocerta, and taken the Kings Treasures which were there, he gave up the City to the plunder of his soldiers, in which (besides other riches (there were found 8000 talents of coined money: Moreover he gave out of the spoils 800 drachmas to every soldier; and finding many players which Tigranes (being about to dedicate the Theater he had built) had gathered together from all parts, he made use of them for his interludes and Triumphs, [Plutarch.] Many wives of the chief Officers which were taken, he preserved from injury, and by that means drew their husbands to his side, [Dios. lib. 35.] The Grecians he furnished for their journey and sent back into their Country: The Cappadocians, Cilicians, and other Barbarians that were forced thither, he suffered also to return. And so it happened, that by the ruin of one City (for the Works being but half finished, Lucullus had demolished them, and left only a small village) many, having received back their Citizens, were repaired, by whom, as he deserved, he was afterwards esteemed as their Founder, [Plut. cum Strabone, in fine lib. 11. pag. 532. & lib. 12. pag. 539.]

Then came there Embassadors almost from all the East begging his friendship, [Oros. lib. 6, cap. 3.] and the Nations of the Sophenians, joyed themselves to him: Antiochus King of the Commagene (which is a Country of Syria situate by the river Euphrates and Taurus) Alchaudonius a petty Prince of Arabia and some others having sued for peace by their Embassadors were received, he joyed also a great part of Armenia to himself, [Plutarch & Dio, lib. 35.]

Q. Metellus advancing with three Legions to the Cretian war, and having overcome Lathenes near the City of Cydonia, was called Emperor, and destroyed the whole Island with fire and sword: forcing the Cretians into their Castles and Cities, [Florus lib. 3, cap. 7, Phlegon Olymp. 174, an. 4. apud Photium, Appian legat. 30.] making no reckoning of their friendship when it was offered to him,

Cleopatra

Cleopatra the Daughter of Ptolemy was borne at Auletta, being the last Queen of Egypt of the Macedonian race, she lived 39 years as Plutarch witnesseth in Antonia.

Tigranes, and Mithridates, going about the several Countries, raised another army the Command of which Mithridates was intrusted with, [Plutarch & Appian.]

Magadates, who in the behalf of Tigranes had with his army commanded all Syria by the space of fourteen years, brought it away to the assistance of his King: by which means Antiochus, the sonne of Antiochus (the holy) & Sileas, who had obtained the name of Asiaticus, because he had had his Education therein, wrought himself into the Kingdome by the connivance of the Syrians. Nor did Lucullus that had newly beat out Tigranes from the lands he had gotten, inveig him his ancient possession [Appian in Syriac, pag. 118, 119. 133.] but Strabo about the end of his eleventh book writes that Lucullus beat out Tigranes, out of Syria and Phoenicia, and that by the same Lucullus after he had overcome Tigranes, Antiochus the sonne of Cyzicus, (or rather his Grandchild by his sonne) was called King of Syria until that Pompey took that away which Lucullus had conferred, but we read in lib. 40, cap. 2. of Justin that there were four years (space betwixt the time he received it and the time it was taken away).

Tigranes and Mithridates sent Embassadors to beg aid, both of their Neighbours, and of Arfaces the Parthian King, traducing the Romans to him, and suggesting that as soon as by their being detestful, and forsaken by others, they had conquered them, they would turne their armes upon him, [Dio, lib. 35.]

This Arfaces was called to being the common appellation of the Kings of Parthia, his proper name was Pacorus from Xiphilinus, but he was called Phraates from Memnon: and it is delivered by Phlegon Trallian (in Phoeni Bibliotheca, ed. 97) that in the year before which was in the third year of 177 Olympiads that Phraates succeeded Sinatruus, the deceased King of the Parthians, but Dio more lately reports Phraates to have succeeded Arfacus, yet Appian saies he succeeded Sinatruus, which we shall see in its proper place, and that this Arfaces had enjoyment of the Empire six years before the third war of Mithridates was begun, these words mentioned in an epistle he writ to the same man (of which more hereafter) do sufficiently show, Thon being removed a far off send all others being obnoxious I again renewed the war; from whence we conclude his proper name was either Sinatruus or Sinatruus.

This Arfaces was offended with Tigranes for stirring up a new war, about a certain Country that was in controversy betwixt them, which Country Tigranes had new yielded up to him againe. Moreover the Parthian lookt to have the great Valleys Mesopotamia and Adiabene should have bin delivered into his possession, as the reward of his Confederacy, but Lucullus being certified of the Embassages, Tigranes and Mithridates had sent to Arfaces, he allowed some of his with threats to be assisted them, and promises if he would take part with the Romans, And being urged by Lucullus's Embassadors that he would either assist him, or at least stand Neuthe he promising friendship privately to both, performed it to neither, [Memnon cap. 60, Plutarch & Appian & Dio, 35.]

Amongst the reliques of the fourth book of Salusts History there remains the intire letter of Mithridates, to Arfaces about this very affaire in which he seemed to turn the indignation he had conceived against Tigranes for wagging the late war into his advantage, for he (saies he) being guilty shal receive what alliance you please, and extenuates the great victory the Romans had obtained against him by saying, that by constraining the Multitude into so narrow places that they could not fight he lost the field, and they attributed their victory to their own virtue, which indeed was but his impudence; and afterwards stirs him up against the Romans in this manner, But you (saies he) to whom Seleucia the greatest Citie, the Kingdome of Persia, and very great riches do belong, what can ye look for but deceit for the present, and war for the time to come? the Romans have war every where, but it is most violent where the victory of their adversaries affords the richest spoils, they invade, they Conquer, but of one war they pick occasion for another, and by those means (being made great) they either suppress the designs, or destroy the Authors, which is not difficult, if you in Mesopotamia, and in Armenia inviron your armies whilst they are without vittuals, and relief, &c. and thus shal you have the reputation to have assisted great Kings, and to have supplie great Robbers, Which I do desire and exhort you to do, unless you had rather by our ruine enlarge one Empire then by our friendship become a Conquerour your self.

As soon as the unwelcome tidings of the affaires M. Cotra had managed at Heraclea, arrived at Rome, he was in publick disgrace, and his great riches augmented their envy, to avoid which he brought back most of the spoils into the treasury, which yet could not make the Romans the more moderate in as much as they suspected he restored a few things out of that great abundance he had got, having learned allo that the prisoners at Heraclea were suddenly to be dismissed by a publick decree, [Memnon cap. 61.]

Moreover

Moreover Thralymedes an Heraclenian, before on Assembly, did publicly accuse Cotta, and commemorated the benevolence of his City to the Romans, and shewed, that if they had any way transgressed, it was not done by the consent of the City; but by the fraud of their Magistrates, and the power of their adversaries: with great lamentation he laid before them the burning of the City, and forgot not with tears to remember how Cotta had converted all to his private profit. There came also a multitude of captives men and women with their little ones clothed in mourning weeds, and kneeling, with great lamentation held up their hands. The Roman Nobility inclining to commiserate their case, Cotta came forth, and after he had pleaded a little in his own tongue, he returned; when Carbo answering replies: We O Cotta gave you Commission to take, not to destroy the City. And after him some others arose, and with like crimination express their indignation against him. To many therefore he seemed worthy of banishment, but with more moderation, they only took away his Dignity. And restored their lands, sea, and harbours, to the Heraclenians: with this proviso, that none of them should be made slaves, [Id. ibid.]

Thralymedes, these things being past, sent back the people into their Country, but stayed himself with Brithagora, and Proplo the son of Brithagora for some years at Rome, performing those things which the custom of the Country required, [Id. cap. 62.]

Lucullus was condemned not of strangers only, but his own Citizens, that he would not pursue Tigranes, but give him leisure to escape, whom he might easily have subdued, had he not aimed at the continuance of his own command; and therefore the Government of Asia (properly so called) which was committed to him before, was assigned to the Prætors, [Dio. lib. 35.]

Lucullus went then to the Gordyens, and celebrated the Obsequies of their King Zarienus: whom Tigranes had killed, forasmuch as he had secretly entered into League with him, and put fire himself to the pile of wood that was garnished with Royal Robes, and Gold, and the spoils had been taken from Tigranes, pouring on the sacrifice with his friends and kindred, and pronouncing him his friend, and a Confederate of the people of Rome. To these he commanded a sumptuous Monument to be made out of the Kings Treasury, and dedicated to him: by which means the Gordyens were so devoted to Lucullus, they would have left their habitations and have followed him with their wives and children, [Plutarch.]

In the Courts of Zarienus, there was found much Silver and Gold, and in his Granaries there was laid up ten times three hundred thousand medimni, which is about 5 bushells. So the soldiery was supplied, and it was a great honour to Lucullus that he had taken nothing out of the Treasury, but kept up the war with the spoils of the war, [Id.]

Here met him Embassadors from Arsaces King of the Parthians, desiring his friendship and alliance; which being not unwelcome to Lucullus, he on the other side sent Scyllius, or rather Sexilius to him; but Arsaces suspecting from his Eminence in matters of war, that he had sent rather in relation to the discovery of his Country and strength, than to the treaty they were about, yielded no supply to the Romans; yet he carried himself so, as that he attempted nothing against them, but kept himself as a neuter between both parties, [Id. cum Dione, lib. 35.]

When Lucullus had learnt that he was wavering in his counsel, and that he desired privately of Tigranes Mesopotamia, as the reward of his friendship; he resolved to pass by Tigranes and Mithridates as enemies already conquered, and by hastening his march against the Parthians to try their valour and strength. He sent therefore into Pontus to Sernatius his Embassador there, and to several others, that they would bring the forces they had there to him, as if he had been to advance from the Country of the Gordyens against the Parthians; but the soldiery were refractory and would be won neither with fair means nor force, declaring, that if they were left there without relief, they would depart to Pontus. The report of these things being brought to Lucullus, corrupted even those soldiery he had with him, by reason of their riches and luxury, banking after ease, and having the severity of war: But as soon as they understood the fury of the Ponticks, they cried them up as persons fit to be imitated and esteemed; professing they had already by their many achievements merited their rest and discharge. And so Lucullus was forced to lay aside his Expedition into Parthia, [Plutarch.]

Furthermore the Island of Delos is seated in the Egean Sea, to which placethy flocked with their Merchandize from all parts. It is full of riches, small and without a wall, yet secure and feared nothing (as Cicero speaks in his Oration, pro lege Manilia) The Pirate Athenodorus took it, and carried the inhabitants captive, destroying the images of their gods: but Caius Triarius repaired the ruins and built a wall about it; as Trallianus Phlegon hath observed in his fifth book of his Chronicles, in the the fourth year of the 177 Olympiads, [In Bibliotheca, Phocii, cod. 97.]

Mithridates made armies in every Town, and calling a muster, took account of almost all the Armenians; out of which selecting 70000 Foot, and half as many Horse, he dismissed the rest; which, after he had dismissed into companies and troops, according to the Italian Discipline, he delivered over to the Ponticks to be trained, [Appian.]

In that year wherein Q. Marcus the King did alone execute the office of Consul, Lucullus in the midst of Summer (for by reason of the cold he was not able to invade them sooner) he advanced with his army against Tigranes. After he had passed the mountain Taurus, and discovered the green fields, he was astonished; that the season was there so backward by reason of the cold. Nevertheless, he came down into the plains, and after two or three battles, in which the Armenians assaulted him, he routed and dispersed them, [Plut. cum Dione, lib. 35.] And whilst Mithridates remained upon a hill with the Foot, and part of the Horse, Tigranes, falling with the remainder upon the Roman foragers, was overcome; by which means, they fetch their provisions with more security afterwards, and nearer Mithridates, and removed their Tents nearer also, [Appian.] and intercepting the supplies were carrying to Tigranes, they brought (which they greatly feared) a great scarcity upon their enemies, [Plutarch.]

Lucullus destroyed one part of the Country, supposing the Barbarians might have been provoked to have fought in its defence; but when he found that would not do, he marched out against them, and his Horse being very much preyed by the Cavalry of the enemy, (there being no conflict at all with the Foot) he coming in with his Targets to their relief, put them presently to flight, yet they received no great loss themselves, but casting their arrows back upon those that pursued, they killed many outright, and wounded many, which wounds were very grievous, and hard to be cured for the arrows had a double point, and so placed, that they were presently mortal, whether they were pulled out or left in, [Dio.]

In Creet, when Lathenes the Governour of Gydonia, was besieged therein by C. Metellus the Proconsul, and had fled from thence to Gnotus, Panares, another Governour of the City, making his peace, delivered it to Metellus; who afterward laying siege to Gnotus, Lathenes put all his wealth into a house, and set it on fire, and then fled from Gnotus, [Appian. Legat. 30.] Gnotus, Lycetus, and Eithraza, with many other Cities, were taken by Metellus, [Livy, lib. 99. Florus, lib. 3. cap. 7. Appian Legat. 30.] but the Cretians being long besieged by Metellus, and brought to great extremity, were constrained to quench their thirst with their own urine, and their Cattle, [Plutarch. Max. lib. 7. cap. 6.]

Lucullus brought his army against Artaxata, Tigranes's Court, where his wife and children were; which he not enduring, raised his Camp, and after four dayes march, came and sat down by the Romans, having the river Arsanias betwixt them, which the Romans must of necessity pass to attack Artaxata, [Plutarch.]

Lucullus, having performed his sacrifice to his gods, drew forth his army, as if he had been certain of victory; and placing 24 Cohorts in the front, he disposed the rest into relieves, lest they might be encompassed by the enemy, in whole army there were placed a great and select body of Horse; before whose colours there stood the Mardian and Iberian Lancers, that used arrows aloft on horse-back, in which Tigranes did principally trust, as the most valiant amongst his strangers, yet they performed nothing remarkable, only skirmishing for a while with the Romans, but not able to endure the force of the Legions; they ran away themselves, and drew the Horse after them [Id.]

As soon as they were dispersed, and he beheld Tigranes Horse advance, suspecting their splendour and multitude, he remanded his own from the pursuit; in the mean time with those nobles and officers he had about him, marched up against them that came towards him, who, being affrighted, fled before they came to a charge. Of the three Kings, that were then in the field, Mithridates, King of Pontus, ran away most shamefully, not so much as enduring the shout of the Romans. The Romans having them in chase, so long a space as a whole night, were not only weary of killing, but taking prisoners, and were tired with taking and carrying away their very money and prizes. Livy reports, that in the former battle, there were more, but in this, the nobler and more considerable of the enemies, taken and slain, [Id.]

The Pirates were at this time grown to that height, that having overpreyed the whole sea, they did not only intercept provisions intended for the fleet, but would land and destroy both Provinces and Islands: so that the Romans, that had conquered the whole World, were only insecure at sea, [Plutarch in Pompeo. Appian, in M. lib. Dio lib. 36. Euseb. lib. 6. Orat. lib. 6. cap. 4.] which the next year, Cicero in his Oration for the Manilian law recalled thus to their Memories, what country forbids you not have you feared from Robbers? what spend or contribution to your selves? what Consider are have you defended? or who is it was protected by your ships? how many Islands think you are defended how many Cities either forsaken for fears, or taken by Pirates from your friends? it was anciently the property of the Romans to war far from home, and rather exerted their forces in the defence of their friends fortunes, than of their own: shall I say for these many years your seas have bin shut up to your friends, and though our Army was at Brundisium they durst not send but in the midst of winter? why should I complain they were taken that came to us from abroad, when the very Embassadors of the people of Rome are redeemed, shall I say the sea is not safe for our Merchants: when twelve of our guard (there being two Prætors Scævulus and Bellinus taken as Plutarch reports) fell into the hands of the Pirates; why should I remember you of Colophon and Samos two noble Cities, or of many more that have bin taken, when you know your own harbours, and those very parts you inhabit your selves, have bin taken by these enemies; was there then this Government, when the Roman Embassadors, Prætors, and Quæstors were intercepted, when publick and private Commerce out of all provinces was forbidden us; when the seas were so shut up that we could have no trading either in private or in common? this (as all things else) he exprest most Elegantly.

The common receptacle of these Pirates, was Cilicia the rough and the principal seat of the war: they had in every place Castles, Towers and desert Islands, and secret creeks for their ships, but more especially they came forth out of this part of Cilicia called the rough, which was without harbours and sitting with exceeding high rocks, from whence by all people they were called by the common name of Cilicians; because that evil which began in Cilicia, drew the Syrians, Cyprians, Pamphilians, Ponticks, and all the Eastern Countries into a combination, who by reason of the redi-outness of Mithridates's war, being more inclinable to do mischief then to endure it, they changed the land for the sea, so that in a short time there became many thousands of them. [Appian pag. 234.]

They had above a thousand Pickeroones, and 400 Cities that they had taken, and the Temples at Clarius, Didæmus, and Samothrace that were inviolate and untouched before, they pillaged and dispoyled that which was dedicated to Tellus at Hermonia, to Æsculapius at Epidaurus, to Neptune in Isthmus, Tænarus and Calauria, Apollo in Actum and Leucade, Juno in Samos Argis and Lucanum, they performed some rites of Strangers in Olympus; some secret Mysteries of which those which had their denomination from the Sun remained, being at first shewn by them: after a worse manner they insulted over the Romans, for if any of their prisoners called himself a Roman, they presently counterfeiting fears knockt their knees together, and falling down at his feet, humbly implored his pardon, and whilst he imagined them real and sincere, some of them furnished him with shoes, others with garments lest he should be otherwise any longer unknown, and when at this rate they had long mockt and deluded the man, putting down a ladder into the Sea they bad him go down in safety, if he would not they tumbled him down headlong, and drowned him. [Plutarch in Pompeio.]

About the Autumnall Equinox great tempests unexpectedly infested Lucullus his Army, it snow'd for the most part, and froze when it was clear, and the ice was troublesome, by which meanes it fell out the rivers overflowed but little water for the Horses and if they brake the ice, the pieces hurt their legs and made it difficult to passe: the Country being woody they were daily dabled with the fall of snow from the trees and constrained to rest in commodiously in the wet: first therefore they petitioned Lucullus by their Tribunes, afterwards growing tumultuous they in the night cryed out to their armes, Lucullus begged earnestly but in vaine, beseeching they would only cheer up to long till they had destroyed the work of the greatest Enemy of the Armenians, since Carthage was taken, for it is reported (as above said in 4926 year of the Julian Period) that Artaxata was built by the advice of Hannibal the Carthaginian, but prevailing nothing he retreated [Id. in Lucullus.] which retreat of the Roman Army, Cicero endeavours to excuse in his Oration for the Law Manilia after this sort. Although our Army had taken a City in Tigranes Kingdom called Tigranacerta, and had fought several Battails with good success, yet were they moved with the tediousness of their march, I will not say any more here, the objection was so complained, our Soldiers return out of those places was more burdensome than their march was long.

Lucullus, returning thorough Armenia into Melopotamia, pass Taurus in another place, and defended into the Country of Migdonia, a Country very warm and fruitful: in which there was a City large and populous called by the Barbarians Nisibis, by the Grecians Antiochia Migdonica. [Id. ibid. cum Oroso lib. 6. cap. 3.]

That City was built by the Macedonians [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 2.] but Tigranes had taken that and all Melopotamia from the Parthians and placed his treasure, and many other considerable things therein, it was encompassed with a double brick wall of a great great thicknesse, and a ditch so deep and broad, that the wall could neither be shaken, nor undermined. [Dio. lib. 35.] Guras, Tigranes brother, commanded in chief, under him Callimachus, (he that had performed noble exploits at Amilius) commanded as a person of great knowledge in fortifications, and of great experience in war. [Plutarch.]

Lucullus, having formed his league, all manner of Engines were provided for a storm, [Id.] But in the beginning of the Winter when the Barbarians thought themselves certain of victory, and the Romans already departing, they began to be careless. And Lucullus having gotten the opportunity of a night in which the Moon being not to be seen, and a great tempest with thunder was risen, so as the Barbarians could neither see nor hear, and for that reason leaving a few there only, they had almost dejected the outward wall, and the ditch between, and by his Workes he gat easily over the wall: and killing without much ado those few Sentinels he found, and with earth that he threw in (for they had before this thrown down their bridges) he filled up a part of the ditch, and when the Enemy could not hurt them with their arrows nor fire, by reason of the rain, he wan the ditch, and possessed himself immediately of the City, their inward walls being not made so strong, because they built more confidence upon that without, [Dio.]

Those that fled into the Castle, he received upon terms, [Id.] Guras the brother of Tigranes surrendering himself, he intreated civilly. Callimachus he would by no means hear, though he promised to discover great sums of money that were hid: but because he had burnt Amilius, robbing him of his glory, and disposing that thing which should have declared his bounty to the Grecians, he referred him in chains to be punished, [Plutarch.] Much money being afterwards taken, Lucullus wintered at Nisibis. [Dio.]

In the mean time, those which bare the sway in the Assembly, out of envy charged Lucullus, that out of covetousnesse and desire of command, he protracted the war. One said Cilicia, Asia, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontus, Armenia, and all the Provinces as far as Phasis, were already conquered, and that now he was only forraging in Tigranes's Countries, as if he had been sent rather to plunder Princes, than to vanquish them: this (as is reported) Lucius Quintus one of the Prætors did speak, by whom the people of Rome being perverted, gave orders for the sending others to succeed him, and disbanded many of those soldiers that had served faithfully under him. [Plutarch.]

In his Camp, P. Clodius, a man of great insolence and dissolutenesse, brought great disturbance to his affairs; he was brother to Lucullus his wife, with whom (he being a lascivious woman) he was reported to be bought: he degenerating by reason of his manners, was turned from the command Lucullus had first given him: for which cause he stirred up the Fimbrians, (or Valerians) against him; those I mean which he had brought out of Fimbria, to destroy L. Val. Flaccus the Consul, and should have taken him for their Commander. These men, being seduced by Clodius, would neither follow him against Tigranes nor Mithridates, but under pretence of winter, protracted the time at Gordene, expecting some other Governour to come and succeed Lucullus. [Id.]

Tigranes (when Lucullus was before Nisibis) conceiving it invincible, moved not towards its relief, but sending Mithridate into his own Country, he marched himself into Armenia, where for a while he besieged Lucius Fannius, till Lucullus, hearing his condition, marched to his rescue. [Dio. lib. 35.]

Mithridates, marching into Pontus, the only kingdom that was left him, there followed him four thousand of his own men, and as many that he received from Tigranes, [Appian.] with which, invading one of the Armenian's and other Countries, he assaulted many stragling Romans unawares, and destroyed them, others he fought fairly and vanquished, and recovered many places with great expedition; for because he was of that Country himself, and his father had ruled there before, those men were very inclinable to Mithridates, and took up an indignation against the Romans, for that they were strangers, and some of their Governours Tyrants, and by that means came freely to Mithridates. [Dio.] To which that place in Tullies Oration for the Manilian law is to be referred. Mithridates (says he) had now confirmed his own soldiers, and those which had joyned themselves to him out of his kingdom, and with great supplies both from foreign Countries and Kings, he was re-inforced, which we have heard indeed does frequently happen, that Princes calamities do easily procure compassion from men, especially if they be either Kings themselves, or do live under government; because the name of a King is very reverend and sacred, and by that means he is affected more by being overcome, than if he had been safe he durst ever have hoped for.

Mithridates overcame M. Fabius, whom Lucullus had left Governour of those parts; but it was by the assistance of the Thracians who were then at hostility with Fabius,

Fabius, although they had received pay under him formerly, nor were the slaves in the Roman Camp a little conducive to it, [Id. cum Appiano.]

For first of all, Fabius having sent out some of the Thracian Scouts and they returning with uncertain intelligence, he advanced carefully, and fell before he was aware upon Mithridates, which time the Thracians revoking, assailed the Romans, and put them to flight; in which conflict, there were five hundred slain. After that, Fabius fearing all the slaves that followed his Camp, fought him for a while doubtfully, when Mithridates promising liberty also to the slaves, they all fell off to his side, and had doubtfully destroyed all the Fabians, had not Mithridates been hurt with a stone in the knee, by reason of which, and another wound under his eye with a dart, he was suddenly carried off the field. And whilst the Barbarians were solicitous of the health of their King, they gave Fabius opportunity of a safe retreat, with the remainder of his men. The Agari, a people of Scythia, well skilled in confections of the poison of Serpents (and for that reason they were always near his person) had then the care of the King. [Id. inter se collati.]

Fabius, after this being flut up and besieged in Cabisris, was relieved by C. Triarius; for he, marching that way out of Asia to Lucullus, and understanding his (success, he got together as great a body as he could, of thole that were present, and terrified Mithridates so much, that (imagining them the whole army of the Romans) before ever he saw them, he removed his Camp. Upon which Triarius taking courage, pursuing them into the Country of the Comagenes, (or rather Comans, in Cappadocia; of which hear Dio hereafter) he fought and overcame them. Mithridates had incamped on the one side of a river, and the Romans came down on the other, and in hopes he might find them weary, and tired with their march, he advanced immediately himself, and commands the rest thole (over another bridge) assault them whilst they were engaged. After they had fought a long time, and with various fortune; the bridge (oppress with the number of men that were passing) brake, and so hindered Mithridates supplies, and was the occasion of his defeat. It was winter now, and both of them, after this battle, betook themselves to their quarters, and rest. [Dio, cap. 26.]

cap. 35.] Aulus Gabinius, as tribune, prevailed with the people, that an Emperor might be chosen out of those which had been Consuls, with full and absolute power against the Pirates in General; and that his command might last for three years, and he furnished with very large supplies, and many Legates: it is not certain, whether he was put upon this by Pompey (whom notwithstanding he did not name) or carried by a designe only of ingratiating himself; however, he did it not for the advantage of the Republick, being a most wicked man, [Id. lib. 36.] Of whom Cicero in his Oration, after his returne to the Senate : Who, had he not been protected by his being Tribune he could neither have avoided the power of the Prator, the number of his creditors, nor the preceptors of his goods; at which time, had he not got that order concerning war with the Pirates, necessity and wickedness would have constrained him to turn Pirate himself; but with lesse danger and detriment to the Common-wealth, for as much as their adversity had been within their walls.

This order of the people, which the Senate (though against their wills, as Dio affirms in his 36. book) confirmed. Velleius Paterculus, in his second book, and 31. chapter, gives an account of: How that when in the manner of a war, not of this kind, they had frighted the whole World with their ships, and not by any suddain or secret expedition; and had moreover destroyed some Cities in Italy: Cnæus Pompeius was sent to suppress them, and had an equal command in all places, within fifty miles of the sea, with the Proconsuls; by which decree of the Senate, the Government of the whole World, almost was devolved upon one man: yet the same thing was decreed two years before in the Prætorship of M. Antonius, as Velleius reports; yet it seems to me, that it should rather be six years before; than two since, it appears that M. Antonius died three years before in the Cretian war; and that Marcus Antonius dying in the Cretian war, departed this life two years before, and that the great care of all the sea coasts, within the Roman Empire, was committed to him in the Consulship of Lucullus, and Cotta, Alconius Pedianus, in his Oration of Verres Prætorship in Sicily, has taught us, as is demonstrated before in the year of the World, 3936, and 3937.

By this Gabinian law, Pompey had for three years the command given him, not only of the Navy, but (as Plutarch saies) for all men, as well within the Provinces within 400 furlongs of the sea, as in all the Mediterranean, in which compasse, he had power to command all Kings, Governors and Cities, to his aide and assistance: so Appian [pag. 235.] calls it, 50 miles; which Velleius and Plutarch interpret 400 furlongs, attributing to every mile, eight furlongs: Xiphilinus, out of the sixth book of Dion, calling it 400 furlongs, out of the 35 book, three dayes journey from the sea, comparing every day's journey at one hundred thirty three furlongs, which is sixteen miles.

By the same law also, Pompey had power to chuse fifteen Deputes out of the Senate, to whom he might commit the charge of several Provinces, that he might take also from the Treasury and the Officers for receipt of monies, as much thereof as he might think good; and 200 ships, and leavy war forces he pleased. And calling a Convent of the people, he prevailed for many things more of theirs, and doubled his preparation. He manned out 500 ships, though Appian faith he had but 270, the smaller vessels reckoned and all, of Foot he tiled 120000, of Horse five, or with Appian, four thousand: Caprains, and thole which were in command, he chole out of the Senate four and twenty, or as Appian fays, five and twenty, and made them delegates under him. He had two Quintors allowed him, and fix thousand Atrick talents; so considerable a thing it did appear, to purchase so many Navies in to great a cause, and where there were so many lurching places, by reason of which, they could easily escape when assaulted, and affaile when they were unexpected. [Appian]

Pompey being very well supplied both with ships of his own, and his confederates, from Rhodes: he possessed both sides of the Ocean, with Dputies and Commanders of his own, and by that means, in every Port, Bay, Creek, Recept, Promontory, Frith, or Island, flur up as it were, what ever belonged to the Pirates, in a net. [Florus, lib. 3, cap. 6.] To those Officers he had chosen out of the Senate, things being seized at sea, he gave Ships, Horrific and Foot, and pretorian Standards to every one, so that every one had absolute authority in that place that was committed to his charge; and those of the Pirates that were taken by some party, were delivered to others, lest any should be drawn to too long a pursuit, or by failing too far, might protract the war.

The Gaditane straits were given to Tiberius Nero, the Balearic sea, to Manilius Torquatus, to both of them was committed the care of Spain; Caecilius blocked up the Ligustick sea, M. Pomponius, the French, and the Ionian sea, Pompey, (the Emperor) the Adriacke, Sardinia, Corlick, and the adjacent islands, Publ. Atrilius possessed the Libyan Lenculus, the Egyptian, Marcus Lenculus of all betwixt Sicily and Epirus: the Tullan sea, and the coasts of Italy, Lucius Lenculus, the most learned of the Roman sea was given to Ploetius Varo, and Terentius Varo, (the most learned of the Togat) of whom Pline speaking in his third book, chap. 11. and seventh book of the 30. chap. and 16. book, and fourth chap.] that he was in this sea prebent with a Naval Crown, Pompey, L. Cinna had the oversight of Peloponessus, Atrica, Eubea, Theffaly, Macedonia, and Beroia; L. Cullius of all the Ægean sea, and the Hellespont, (although Florus gives the Asiatick Capio) Metellus Nepos of Lycia, Paphlagonia, Cyprus, and Phoenicia. P. Piso of Bithynia, and Thracia, and Porcius Cato lay to close upon the straits of it with his ships, that he blocked up the Propontis, as it had been a gate. [Florus, l. 3. cap. 6. & Appian, pag. 236.] Pompey himself, like a King of Kings, overlooked all, requiring every body to keep their Station, lest whilst he perceived the Pirates, before he could accomplish his victory in any one place, he should be distressed in another; and ordering that whilst all were ready to relieve one another, they should not suffer the enemy to escape, by roving up and down. [Appian, ibid.]

His forces being dispersed in this manner thorough the whole Sea, Pompey began from the lower part; they encompassed the enemies Navy, and dragged a net into their Harbours; those which cleaped, fled into Cilicia to hide themselves, like Bees to a hive. [Plutarch in Pompeio.] And having thus in fourty days time, by his own industry, and his Officers, cleared the Tulean, Alitrican Sardaois, Cortican, and Sicilian fées, returning to Rome, he performed what he desired, [Id. ibid. cum Livio: lib. 99. & Apian, pag. 236.]

Pompey, looting from Brundisium, headveins (in the beginning of the Cilician war) with 60 very good ships; the enemy prepares to fight him, yet not out of any hope, but that being oppressed, they cannot find themselves incompetent, they throw away one charge; for the immortals, finding themselves incompetent, they throw away their arms and oars, and with a general shout (with the figure of their submission) they begged their lives. Florus, lib. 2, cap. 6, cum Plutarch & Appian. Cicero affirms in his Median Question, that in one and fifty days after, he fell from Brundisium; he brought all Cilicy to subjection to the people of Rome, which story, of the recovering all Cilicia in to flourish a time, is to be looked upon, but as an Oratorical correction in the traffic of Pompey. [Vid. ann. per. Julius, 4651.]

After it was told that Mithridates, having beaten Fabius, was marching against Soranus and Triarius, the Fimbrian (or Valerian) Soldiers being moved with flame, followed Lucullus when he went to their relief. Mithridates in the mean time (Manius Acilius Acilius Glabro, and Cai. Pifo, being Consuls) having encamped over against Triarius near Gazurfa, he seeks to drill and provoke him to fight, by training and exercising his men in sight of the Romans, that by engaging him before Lucullus came, and prevailing (as he did hope) he might recover the remainder of the kingdom; but not able to draw him forth, he sends part of his men to Dadafa to besiege a Castle in which the Romans had left their train; to the end, that the Romans coming to its relief, might fall into his hands. Nor did his design deceive him; for Triarius fearing the multitude of Mithridates, and expecting Lucullus (whom he had sent for) would come, kept himself close in his Camp; but hearing Dadafa was besieged, his soldiers were afraid of the goods they had there, and in a tumultuous manner threatened, that unless he would draw them out, they would go to defend them without his leave; by which means he marched out against his will, [Dio, lib. 35.]

Aciliu

When Triarius had drawn out against Mithridates, there happened such a storm as was never known before in any mans memory, throwing down the tents in either Camp, beating the cattle out of the way, and tumbling down some of theouldiers from the Hills; for which cause they both of them retired: but when it was told Triarius that Lucullus was at hand, as if he desired to snatch the victory from him, before day he assails Mithridates Camp; and after they had fought long with equal fortune and courage, the King trusting to his own wings, at length received the day, and pressing upon the enemy, forced their Foot into a dirty ditch, where having no footing they were cut down without loss; and following his victory, he courageously pursued their Horse thorough the fields, until a Roman Centurion running as a servant by his side as fast as his horse (despising to kill him by reason of his Breast-plate) gave him a deep wound in his thigh; he was himself cut presently to pieces by those that were about him, and Mithridates carried into the furthest part of the army, [Appian, Ann. Plin. & Dione.]

Upon this, the Kings friends founded a retreat, and called back theouldiers from a notable Victory, which being unexpected, cast some kind of fear upon them lest some evil might have happened from some other place; until it was known, they got tumultuously about the body of their Kings, and at length Timotheus the Phrygian having tipped the blood, held him up on high to their fight. The Romans (who but by this accident had been utterly destroyed) in this time got away and escaped. Mithridates coming to himself, reproves them that occasioned the retreat, and that very day raises his Camp, and marches against the Romans, which now, theouldiers being afraid, was utterly deserted. Above 7000ouldiers were said to be killed in this fight, amongst which 150 Centurions, and 24 Tribunes, which number of officers was never known to be lost in any battle before, [Ibid.] Appian says this encounter happened near the mountain Scotius, a place by reason of Mithridates victory, Triarius misfortune, and the loss of the Roman army very eminent in those parts, [p. 254.] As Hirtius reports also in his Commentaries of the war in Alexandria, where he shews it is not much more than three miles distant from Zela, a Town in Pontus.

This is the defeat Cicero in his Oration for the Manilian law half a year after commemorates by the By. Town army was resolute and victorious, but Mithridates fell upon them: yet suffer me in this place (like those who the Roman affairs) to slip over our misfortunes, which were so great, that the tidings came not to Lucullus by a Messenger from the fight, but by rumour and report. And afterwards, Having received that overthrow in Pontus, of which a little before I remembered you against my will when our friends and confederates were afraid, the wealth and courage of the enemies increased, and when the Province had no Garrison or strength for to trust to, As had been lost O Romans, had not fortune in the nick of time brought Pompey as it were from heaven to the relief of those Comries, whose arrival stopped Mithridates though swelled with his success; and retarded Tigranes who with great strength was threatening of Asia.

Mithridates being cured of his wounds, and suspecting there might be more of the enemy amongst his men, he selected a party upon another pretence, and commanding every one suddenly to their tents, the Romans were found alone, and killed, [Dio, lib. 35.]

From thence he went into that Armenia which the Romans call the Lesser; all the provision he could he carried with him, the rest he spoiled lest it should become useful to Lucullus. About which time Atilius a Roman Senator (that for fear of justice had long since fled to Mithridates and been received to favour) was found guilty of conspiracy, whom out of reverence to his former dignity he would not torture, contenting himself only with his death; but his companions he tormented grievously, his servants whom he had made privy to his design, for their Masters sake, he sent away untouched, [Appian.]

Lucullus, coming up to Triarius, whom theouldiers being angry did require, privately carried him away, [Plut. in Lucullo.] leaving those unburied which had died in the the fight; which is thought to be the first thing alienated the affections of his ownouldiers, [Id. in Pompeio.]

Mithridates sat down with his army upon a hill near Talaura, expecting Tigranes that was coming with great Forces to him, and declined fighting till they were both joyed: But Mithridates the Mede, one of Tigranes sons in law, falling suddenly upon the Romans as they were scattered abroad, gave them a great overthrow, [Plut. Appian. Dio.]

Quintus Marcius the King, (that was Consul the year before) was now sent Proconsul into Cilicia, Lucullus his chief Province, who as he marched with three Legions thorough Licaonia, being invited by Lucullus to his aid, excused it, complaining hisouldiers would not follow him, [Salust. historiar. lib. 5. apud Priscian. lib. 18. & Dio, lib. 35.]

Marcius being entered into Cilicia, received Menemachus (who had revolted from Tigranes) into his favour; and made P. Clodius (whose sister he had married, and Lucullus had married another) the same that had fled from Lucullus for fear of what offences he had committed at Nisibis, Commander of his Naval affairs, [Dio, lib. 35.]

Clodius, falling unawares amongst the Cilician Pirates, and being taken prisoner, they demanded a ransom of him: he sends to Ptolemei King of Cyprus that he would pay it and redeem him; but he by reason of his covetousness sending only two talents, which the Pirates despised: nevertheless being in fear of Pompey, they thought it best to enlarge him for nothing, [Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 684. Appian. Bell. civil. lib. 2. pag. 442. Dio, lib. 35. & 38.]

By the Gabinian law, Manius Acilius Glabro Consul this present year, was made Succellor to Lucullus in the command of Bithynia and Pontus, and the Valerian or Fimbrian Legion, (that once before being discharged with victory, ease, and plenty, and disbanded, which when they found luxuriating with victory, ease, and plenty, and living at that time without Lucullus, who for the most part was abroad, they began to mutiny, and despite Lucullus as an ordinary person, [Salust. historiar. lib. 5. apud Priscian. lib. 18. & Dio, lib. 35.]

Dio [ibid.] says, that P. Clodius was the chief author of this dissention; and Cicero affirms in his Oration of the answer of the Aristiplex, that being set free by Pirates, and having by great treachery corrupted Lucullus his army, he fled thither; Dio says, he went to Antioch in Syria to assist them against the Arabians which they had war with; and there in like manner he stirred up sedition, and was very near being destroyed himself, [Dio, lib. 35.]

Lucullus was at a stand, he durst not move out of his place, nor durst he stay there; at length he resolves to march against Tigranes, hoping to fall upon him; either when he did not expect him, or when he was tired with his march, and by that means compose the distractions in his Camp, but neither succeeds; hisouldiers follow him for a while, but finding they were to bend toward Cappadocia, all of them unanimously without speaking one word, turned their backs, and the Valerian or Fimbrian, when they heard they were discharged at Rome, and that Lucullus's command was conferred upon others, they all stole from their colours. Lucullus in the mean time reflects no means that might reconcile them, with great dejection & tears in his eyes, he goes to their tents, beseeches every one, taking some of them by the hand; but they rebuke his embraces, throwing down their empty purses, and declaring, that as he had alone enriched himself by them, he should alone fight with his enemies, [Plut. & Dio.]

The sedition of theouldiers which would not follow Lucullus, kept him from the pursuit of Mithridates and Tigranes, and giving a perfection to his Victory. The Valerian Legions cryed out they were disbanded, and forsook him, [Liv. lib. 98.] But at length overcome by the intreaty of their fellowouldiers, they consented to keep to their colours that Summer, upon condition, that if no body came to fight them at that time, they might depart. Lucullus was forced to be quiet with these men, or leave that Province (destitute of a Garrison) to the Barbarians; he kept them therefore under no command, neither did he draw them out into battle, but thought it sufficient if they only staid. He suffered Tigranes to forrage in Cappadocia, and Mithridates to insult over the whole, [Plut. in Lucullo.]

Lucullus had written to the Senate, that he had finished the war with Mithridates, and there were come to him officers depured for the settling of the affairs in Pontus, as if all had been quiet, [Id. ibid. Dio, lib. 36.] but they found that even he himself was not at his own disposing, but mocked and derided by theouldiers which were gotten to that height of insolence and contempt of their Commander, that the Summer being past, they took up these arms, and drawing their swords, called for their enemies, which they could find nowhere, having already retired themselves, and going out of the Camp with shouting and throwing up their arms, declared, that the time they had promised Lucullus to carry was expired, [Plut. in Lucullo.]

When Acilius Glabrio, the Consul, was arrived at the province was given him, he sent criers about and pronounced, that the Senate did discharge Lucullus his army, and confiscate his goods, by reason he had protracted the war, and refused to obey their Commands. The Soldiers upon this for the most part forsook him: only some few, who being very poor and so not fearing their punishment, chose rather to continue with him. [Appian] and upon this score Mithridates recovered most of his Kingdom, and brought no small detriment upon Cappadocia: Lucullus neither withstanding nor Acilius defending it, for although he taunted as if he would have rob'd Lucullus, of his victory, yet when he understood their condition, he came not up to the Army, but prolonged the time in Bithynia. [Dio, lib. 30.]

To this may be added that place of Cicero in his Manilian oration to the Romans in which in favour to Lucullus, he in this manner extenuates the business: L. Lucullus (saies he) who in some measure might perhaps be bettered by his misfortunes, being constrained by your commands, (because you had refused according to ancient example to stop the continuance of his Authority) did dismiss that part of his army, which had served out their time, and sent the ether to Glabrio: and thus having done with Lucullus we will return to the Piratical or maritime war (as Salust and Cicero call it) that was managed and this summer finish'd, by Pompey.

The chief and better part of the Pyrates having feign their Children wealth, and the unusefull multitude into their Castles, and strong holds near the mountain Taurus, they themselves encountered Pompey at Coraceion in Cilicia; where, being overthrown, they were presently besieged; at length they sent out Commissioners and delivered up themselves, their Islands and Townes which by reason of their strength were very difficult to be taken. [Plut. in Pomp.]

Pompey advances into Cilicia with a very great number of Engins, resolving by all means to attempt those forts that were seated upon the rocks, but of those things he had no need, the very eminence of his Name and the report of his preparation to terrify the Robbers, that, supposing he would be more mercifull if they forbore fighting him, first they which commanded the great Castles of Crages, and Anticragus, and after them all the Cilicians upon the Mountains, came in and submitted themselves: and much arms both flint and making, besides many ships half made in the Docks, others ready for sayle, brals, and iron prepared for thieues, sailes, ropes, and divers other materials, a great number of Captives bound that they might either be forced to ransom themselves, or constrained to work in their Prisons. Pompey burns the materials, carries away the ships, and sent the prisoners home, where many of them meet their own monuments, being suppoled long since to have bin dead. [Appian in Mithridatic.] thus they were overcome, and the whole strength of the Pyrates subdued in every part of the sea, and that in no more time than three months [Plutar, ut supra] or two if we will hear Lucan in his second book,

*Ante his exaltum quam Cynthia conderet orbem
Omne fretum metuens pelagi pirata reliquit
Angusti aque domum terrarum in sede poposcit*

Before twice Cynthia did wax and waine,
To seek a dwelling in some private plain

Pompey burnt above 1300 smal boates, and destroyed their places of retreat [Strabo lib. 14. pag. 661.] there were 72 ships taken by force, and 306 yielded up as Appian reports, Plutarch reckons them 800 and of these 90 with Beaks of Iron: Pliny affirms there were taken or sunk 846, [Lib. 7. cap. 25. & 36.] 120 Townes, Castles, and store-houses, and of those which endeavoured to fight there were slaine about ten thousand, [Appian]

There were 30000 of the Pyrates left alive which Pompey resolved not to kill nor yet thought it safe to suffer them to depart, or that many soldiers and desperate persons should meet together. [Plut.] least poverty therefore might constrain them to some attempt, he disposed them into a certain place remote from the Sea, he gave them those fields he saw forsaken, for till, and those Cities that wanted Inhabitants to possess, and giving them a capacity of living without it he restrained them from rapine [Livy 99. lib. viii. Pater, lib. 2. cap. 32. Florus lib. 3. cap. 6. Dio, lib. 36.] he gave them orders to plant in Malum, Adana, Epiphania, and what other Townes were unfrequented in Cilicia (the Sion.) [Appian] and into a sea Town of Cilicia called formerly Solos; after Pompeiopolis: which he repayed, having bin destroyed by Tigranes the Armenian King he disposed many, and many he transferred to Didymena a place then wanting inhabitants. [Strabo, lib. 14. Plut. in Pomp. Dio, lib. 36.]

Thus

Thus that war that, was so long, and of so large extent, and wherewith all Nations were infested, Pompey prepared for in the midst of winter, began in the spring, and concluded in the middle of Summer, as Cicero in his Manilian Oration, having spoken of it before, This war (saies he) so cruell, so ancient, and so largely dispers'd, who would ever have thought that either all the Commanders in the world could have finish in one year; or any one Commander in all the ages of the world? the which Florus admittes, That besides the swiftnesse of dispatch, and the felicity in the success, there should not be one ship lost; and then the perpetuity, there being Pyrates no more, which was procured by the singular conduct of the Captain, by removing them that had been so used to the Sea from the sight of it, and pinning them up as it were in the midland Countreys; yet is he not to be heard, when he speaks of the speediness of the Conquest; because that what was delivered only of his success in the lower Seas, (which has indeed enough of wonder in it) he attributes to the Generals bloody shour, as if all had bin finish in forty dayes, which Cicero directly denies, nor to speak of Dion who signifies in these words, ut nemo possit negare, quod the greater part of the Seas Pompey made quiet within the compasse of a year.

In Crete (which after Cilicia Plutarch affirmes to be the next fountain of Pyrates) the prisoners were so hardly dealt with, that most of them payed themselves: others sent to Pompey, though he was absent, that they would deliver up themselves [Florus lib. 3. cap. 7.] he was then in Pamphilia, whether thier Embassadors coming promised all the Cities in Crete would yield themselves to him, he spoiles not their hopes; but demands hostages [Cicero, pro lege Manilia] in the mean time he forbids Metellus meddling in that war, and writ to the Cretians that they should not obey him, [Plutar. in Pompeio] and also commanded him to depart the Island, for he would take that charge upon him as a part of the care committed to him. [Appian, legat. 30.] he sent one of his officers L. Octavius thither, but without an army, not so much that, he should undertake the war, as to receive the Cities into the favour of the people of Rome; who shutting himself up within the walls with those that were besieged and fighting together with them, he rendered Pompey not only odious, but contemptible. [Plut. ut sup. Dio, lib. 36.]

Metellus despising Pompey's command in another province, proceeded in his intended war; and was the more bitter in that he exercised the right of a Conqueror upon his Enemies, halting to incommode them before Pompey could come, [Florus Plut. Dio.] and sending letters to Rome he complained that the glory of his actions were taken away by Pompey, and paid by: he sending his Embassadors into Crete to admit the surrender of the City, to which Pompey replying gave them an account that he ought to do so. [Livy, lib. 99.]

Cornelius Sileana at this time Governour of Grace came with his army into Crete and admonished Metellus that he should spare the people, but not being able to persuade him from his design, he performed nothing that compelled him. [Dio, lib. 36.]

Aristion, marching from Sidon, having beaten Lucius Baius, that was drawn out to meet him, he took Hierapridna, and defended that City against the Romans [Id. ibid.]

Metellus, having corrupted many within, took the City Eleuthera by treachery, the conspirators to looting a great tower of brick, (that was extream hard to be taken) with vinegar for some nights that it could easily be broken, Afterwards having laid a Tax upon Eleuthera, he took Lappa by force, not at all demurring at Octavius commanding there, but he used no violence to him, only kill'd the Cilicians he found about him [Id. ibid.] but dismiss'd Octavius himself after he had bin mocked and abused with many ignominies in the Camp. [Plutarch.]

Octavius, disdaining to be thus used, daillyed not now as before; but, taking the command of Sileana's army upon himself: (who was lately dead of a disease) he relieved them that were opprest by Metellus, and then betook himself to Aristion; and there manag'd their war by common content and having for some time continued in that manner, and hearing Metellus was advancing against them, they forsook their Castles, and launcht into the sea, where they were overtaken with a tempest, and after the losse of many of their men constrained to run a shoar. [Dion, lib. 36.]

Marcus Cotta, after he had cast off his treasurer P. Oppius upon suspicion of defrauding the treasury, and conspiring besides was himself (having crapt together great summs in Bithynia) accused by C. Carbo and the same Cotta (though before that he had received no other honour than to be a Tribune of the people) was for that very act adorned with the honours of a Consul. [Id. ibid.] see before at the end of the 3935 year of the world.

Eccc

Sinatruus

Sinatruces, (whom Appian call Sintricus; Dio by the common name of the Kings of Parthia, Arsaces) being dead, his son Phraates succeeded him; the second King of Parthia of that name, who by a most impious appellation, was called, the god. [Appian, in Mithridatic, pag. 242. & Dio, lib. 36, collat. cum Ptolemy, in Bibliothec. Genet., cod. 97. Vid. eund. Anno Mund. 3955.]

Hircanus (as we read in Josephus, the 16. book, cap. 9.) was driven out of his kingdom by Aristobolus his younger brother, three months after the death of his mother Alexandra: But since it appears there were six years from the time Hircanus began to reign. R. Hortensius, and Q. Metellus being Consuls, to the latter end of Aristobolus, which was that year Jerusalem was taken by Pompey, C. Antonius, and M. Iulius, Cicero, being Consuls; and of them Josephus himself attributes but three years, and as many months to Aristobolus, Hircanus must of necessity be allowed three years, not three months, out of which we conceive two months must be taken out, and the time will be made exact.

About this time, they having joyned battle at Jericho, many of Hircanus's men went over to his brother Aristobolus; by which means he fled into a Castle, in which the wife and children of Aristobolus were; by Alexandra his mother put to be kept: the rest of his party, for fear of the Conquerour, betook themselves to the protection of a Temple, and in short space, delivered up themselves. At length, the brothers came to treat of peace, and it was agreed Aristobolus should reign still, and his brother be permitted to lead a private life, quietly enjoying that wealth he had gotten by his wits. This covenant they both entered into in the Temple, and after all oaths and joyning of their hands, and embracing one another in the sight of the people, they withdrew one to his Court, the other as a private person to Aristobolus's house. [Josephus, lib. 14, cap. 1.] And thus Aristobolus obtained the government of the Kingdom, and chief Priest in three years and three months, as it is said. [Id. lib. 20, cap. 8.]

Lucius Tullus, and Æmilius Lepidus, being Consuls, in the beginning of their Consulship, in the Kalends of January, which as the year was then altered by the Romans, fell out in the Julian October, the Senate abrogated a law, which C. Manilius, a Tribune of the people, had the evening before tendered, by which those servants which were made free, should have as good a suffrage as their masters: but for this cause, Manilius fearing himself, and being Mercenary and Ministerial to those that were in power, that he might curry favour with Pompey, he proclaimed another law, That the conduct of the war with Tigranes and Mithridates, together with the Legions and Provinces that were under Lucius; Cilicia also under the command of Marcus the King, and Bithynia under Acilius Glabrio, should be resigned to Pompey, and that he should continue in his Maritime commands, as he received them at first. [Dio, lib. 36, cum Livi, lib. 100. Vellei. Pater, lib. 2, cap. 33. Asconio Pedian. in Orat. Cornelianum, & Plutarch in Pompeio.]

Livy notes this law to be past with great indignation of the Nobility, it seeming to the Senate no less than a manifest injury to Lucullus, nor was he sent to succeed him in the war to much as in the Triumph, and to take possession of the spoils he had taken, rather than the administration of the war. [Plutarch in Lucullo.] Nor did it please them, that they were forced to call Marcus and Acilius from their commands, before the time they had given them was expired. [Dio, lib. 36.] But they were chiefly jealous of Pompey's power to whom by this means, the whole Roman Empire was subjected; for those Provinces which by the former Gabinian law, he did seem not to have obtained, as Phrygia, Lycania, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, the upper Colchis, and Armenia, by this he engrossed. [Plutarch in Pompeio.] That power being given him, both of war and peace, that he might by his own will, judge any body his enemy, or make any his friend and associate, as he thought good himself. He had also the command of all armies, whatsoever, which were out of Italy; all which the people of Rome had never heaped together upon one man before. [Appian, pag. 238.]

Upon this occasion it was, that Cicero then Prætor, made his Oration for the Manilian law in the 23. year after that cruel slaughter of the Citizens of Rome, which was perpetrated in Asia, by Mithridates command in one day, He now reigneth (saies he) the three and twentieth year from that time, and reigneth so, not as to hide himself in Pontus or Cappadocia, but to break out and invade the tributaries, and breathe your Asian air.

Pompey was as yet pursuing his victory over the Pirates in Cilicia; or as (Plutarch saies in his life) the war being ended, and he void of business, he was visiting the Cities thereabout: but when by his letters from Rome, he understood what was done there, his friends being present, and congratulating the news, he is reported to have frowned, and strook his thigh, as if he were already weary, and discontented with his command;

mand; whose mind they all knew to be very covetous of it; [Plutarch in Pompeio, Dio, lib. 36.] And although he had formerly made a shew of sailing into Cete to Metellus, he forgot that now, and all his maritime business, if there was any thing left undone, and address himself wholly to war with the Barbarians; [Dio, lib. 36.] calling back every where the Souldiers to him, and requiring the assistance of those Kings and Porentates he had received to amity. [Plutarch, ibid.]

Tigranes the younger, Grandchild to Mithridates, by his daughter, revolting from his father, is overcome by him, but not being taken, he joynd with the chief of them that were discontented with his father, and went over to Phraates King of the Parthians. [Livy, lib. 100. Appian, pag. 242. Dio, lib. 36.]

Pompey, proceeding in his war with Mithridates, renewed his league with Phraates King of Parthia. [Livy.] Upon the same conditions were tendered formerly to Sylla and Lucullus, of which Pompey speaks in Lucian eighth book,

— si fœdera nobis

Prisca manent, mihi per Latium jurata Tonantem, Per vestros astricta Magos.

— If those pacts were sworn to me

By th' Lætan Thund'rer, continu'd be
Which your own Magi joyn'd —

And according to agreement, Phraates with Tigranes the younger, invaded Armenia, which was subject to Tigranes, and advancing as far as Artaxata, (having overcome all opposition they met by the way) they far down before it: whilst Tigranes the elder, for fear of them, retired amongst the mountains. [Dio.]

Pompey, to discover Mithridates mind, sent Metrophanes to him with very friendly proposals; but he being in hopes that Phraates (newly posselt of the kingdom of Parthia) would have joyned with him, rejects them; but understanding that he was preoccupied by Pompey, and engaged to invade Armenia, his heart misgave him, and he sent immediately Ambassadors with propositions of peace. Pompey requires he should lay down arms, and deliver up those that had revolted. [Dio.]

As soon as this was heard in Mithridates army, the Runaways (of which there was a great number) suspecting they should be given up: and the Barbarians (supposing they should be forced to maintain the war without their assistance, fell into a mutiny, and had done some mischief to Mithridates, had he not pretended that he sent his Ambassadors rather to decry the posture and preparation of the enemy, than to desire peace. [Idem.] He (wore moreover he would neither have amity with the Romans, by reason of their covetousness, neither would he deliver up any of them, or do any thing, but for the common advantage of all. [Appian.]

When Pompey was come into Galatia, Lucullus came to meet him, [Dio.] at the Castle of Danala, [Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 567.] Lucullus, in respect of his age and dignity of his Consulships was the better man: but Pompey's dignity, in respect of the number of his commands, and two Triumphs that he had had, was the greater: Both of them had garlands of laurel carried before them, in honour of their victories, Pompey's laurel by reason he had come a long journey, through dry and fould Countries, were dead and withered, which Lucullus's Lictors observing, they courteously presented him with some of theirs, which were fresh and green: which passage the friends of Pompey looked upon as a good omen, that he should carry both the rewards and ornament of Lucullus's victories. [Plutarch in Lucullo, & Pompeio.]

Lucullus told him all things were already subdued, neither was there need of that expedition at all; and that there were for the same reason, persons arrived that the Senate had deputed for the settlement and compulure of affairs: but failing to persuade Pompey to go back, he fell to complain and asperse him; [Dio, lib. 36.] inasmuch, that there began to be a great contest betwixt them: Pompey objecting to Lucullus his covetousness, Lucullus to Pompey his insatiable desire of command, and neither of them could be accused of saying false in what they said. [Velleius Pater, lib. 2, cap. 33. Plutarch in Pompeio.]

For this cause Lucullus disposed of those lands he had taken from the enemy as he pleased, and gave away many good gifts besides, for which he was sharply reproved by Pompey, in that he settled and conferred honours and rewards, whilst the enemy was on foot, which used not to be done, till the war was done and accomplished, Pompey (offended) removes his Camp a little further from him, and commanded no body should obey, or come near him: and by public edict, forbade the confirmation of his acts, or what the council often officers should suggest, having also the greater army he was not a little formidable: and leaving him only 1600 for his Triumph, he drew away all his souldiers which he carried away: though they were as useless to him by reason of their mutinousness, as they were angry with Lucullus, [Plutarch in Pompeio, & Lucullo.] Only the Valerian (or Fimbrian) Legions he called to himself, which (however they were refractory with Lucullus) served him without any sedition, [Dio, lib. 35, & 36.]

Lucullus returned from thence to Rome, and brought along with him good store of books (which were part of his Pontick prey) [Isidor. Origin, lib. 6, cap. 3.] with which he furnished his Library, which was always open to all people, especially the Grecians, [Plutarch in Lucullo.] He was the first also that brought Cherries into Italy, [Pliny, lib. 15, cap. 25.] And (however he had been injured exceedingly by Pompey) he was received very honourably by the Senate, [Plutarch in Pomp.]

Metellus, having overcome the Cretensians, took away the laws from an Island which before that time was free, [Livy, lib. 100.] and finished the liberty they had long enjoyed, by laying his taxes upon them, [Velle, Patere, lib. 2, cap. 38.] Orosius writes in his sixth book, cap. 4, that Metellus overturned that Island in 2 years time, and wearing of it out with continual skirmishes, reduced it to his power. Eutropius in his sixth book says, that in several great battles he overcame the whole Country in 3 years. Velleius Patere, according with him, who in his second book, the 34 cap. has these words: Above that time the Island of Crete was brought into subjection to the Romans, which with an army of 24000 young men, perished in respect of their agility, patient in respect of labour, and skillful in respect of the management of their arms, under the command of Panarces and Laesthenes, had for three years together tired the Roman army. L. Flaccus together with the Commander in Chief, sustained the fury of that war, [Cicero pro Plancio.] Caius Nallennius, a Suetian free-man, commanded the 8 Century, which was called the chief, [Id. ad Brut. epist. 8.] and Caius Plancius (a person very much approved by C. Sacerdos the Embassadour, and by L. Flaccus) was a souldier under Q. Metellus, [Id. pro Plancio.]

After this manner the Cretensians that before this time had lived always free, and had never yet known any foreign commands, were brought under the yoke, and Metellus received the name of Cretensian from them, [Dio, lib. 36.]

Anupas, called also Antipater, Governour of Idumea, and father to Herod King of Judea, being a rich man, factious and bussy by nature, fearing Aristobolus's power by reason of some grudges betwixt them, he fell to Hircanus his party, and with secret aspersions of Aristobolus prevailed, that the chief of the Jews entered into conspiracy against him: suggesting it would be very ill to let him possess a command he had to unjustly usurped, he having put by his elder brother, and dispoiled him of the prerogative of his birth: and with the same language he played Hircanus constantly: adding withal, that his very life was in danger unless he prevented it by a timely flight, for Aristobolus's friends were in perpetual consultation, how they should establish the Authority upon another when they had removed him out of the way: But Hircanus being of himself a good man, and not easily admitting reports, gave but small credit to his informants, which quietness and lenity of mind procured him the imputation of being foolish: but Antipater nevertheless gave no over complaining of his brother, as if he had laid wait to kill him, [Joseph, lib. 14, cap. 2.]

Phraates finding the siege of Artaxata likely to be a long work, left part of his Forces with Tigraues his son, and returned home himself, [Dio, lib. 36.]

The nether Spain fell to C. Julius Cæsar, for when he was Quæstor, who being commanded by the Prætor to travel about the several Countries and decide matters of law: Arriving at Gades, he observed in Hercules Temple, Alexander the Great's Tomb, and as if it had upbraided him for having done nothing Memorable at the same age (which was 34) that Alexander had conquered the World, he fell into great melancholy, and importuned he might be sent back into Rome, that he might take the first opportunity of attempting some noble thing: and departing accordingly before his time, he went to some Italian Colonies that were then in agitation about their returns, and had excited them to something, had not the Consuls with their Legions which were raised to go into Cilicia, kept them from it, [Sueton. in Julio, Cæsare, cap. 7, & 8.]

Pompey, possessing with his Navy all the Sea betwixt Phœnicia and the Bosphorus, advanced against Mithridates, having under his own command a select choice army consisting of 30000 Foot dispoiled into a Phalang, for the safeguard of his Country, besides as Plutarch says 2000, as Appian 3000 Horse, [Plutarch in Pomp. Appian, pag. 238.] Moreover that because Lucullus had lately harassed that Country and brought great scarcity amongst them, there were many come to him, though the King used all the severity he could (either throwing them down steep rocks, or putting out their eyes, or burning burning them alive) against them he took; by which means he frightened many indeed from running away, but however they were distressed with want, [Appian, libid.]

Pompey, having placed some of his troops in ambush, sent out others to face the Kings Camp, and provoke him out, with command that they should turn and flee after they had got them forth, till they had driled them into their trap: and had not the King suspected it and drawn out his Foot, they might possibly have pursued them so as to have entered their Camp with them: and this was the first skirmish betwixt the Hosts, [Id. libid.]

Mithridates for a while, being not equally furnished with men, avoiding fightings, and destroying the Countries where he came, endeavouring by marching up and down to tire his enemy, or to afflict him with want of victuals. But as soon as Pompey was entered into Armenia the Lesser, which was subject to Mithridates; partly for this very cause, and partly that he might take possession of it, being forsaken: at length Mithridates doubting lest that Province should in his absence fall into the hands of his enemies, he went thither, [Dio, lib. 36.]

Mithridates sat down upon a strong and secure Hill over against his enemy, where he lay quiet with his whole army, hoping to drive the Romans into distress; and by intercepting their necessary provisions, to destroy them: Whilst he himself being in his own Country, was plentifully supplied from all parts. Under this Hill there was a Plain, into which he dispoiled some Horse to encounter and cut off all they met; by which means it happened that many came off from the enemy to him, [Id. libid.]

Pompey, not daring to assault the enemy in that place, raised his Camp, and removed it to another commodiously compassed with woods, whereby he secured himself against their Troops and Darts: and having laid ambush in a convenient place, he himself with a few advances and faces their Camp: and raising a tumult, he travell'd the enemy from their Works to the place he had designed, and gave them a great defeat: by which accident their courage being revived, he sent out others to the other parts of the Country to bring in provisions, [ibid.]

After Mithridates had left the Hill where he pitched his tents, as a barren place and dry, Pompey came and possessed it, and imagining by the forwardness of the throbs, and the hollownesse and convexity of the place there must needs be water underneath, he commanded they should dig Wells up and down, and they had such plenty of water in their Camp presently, that it was a wonder Mithridates found it not in so long a time, [Plutarch.]

Mithridates sat down upon a Mountain near Dastira in Aciliana, which was very well furnished with water, and not far from the River Euphrates which divides Aciliana and Armenia the Lesser, [Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 555.] And here Orosius writes, that Pompey blocked up the Kings Camp near the Mountain Dastira in Armenia the Lesser, [lib. 6, cap. 4.] making a line about the King of 50 furlongs, and raising several Castles within it that he might thereby render their forrage difficult. Which Work the King not hindring, either out of fear or folly (which be commonly the fore-runners of mischief) [Appian.] he was besieged as Plutarch says 45 dayes: but Appian reports, that for the space of 50 dayes, they could scarce keep themselves alive, having slain all the Cattle they had, and reserved nothing but the Horses.

Mithridates, at length understanding that the enemy had been supplied with victuals, and had taken a Country in Armenia, called Manatim, many of his men falling off to him, and that Marius his army (together with the Legions, which Suetonius has said were raised for Cilicia, of which place he was Governour) were come to him; being affrighted, he resolves to leave that Country, [Dio.] And killing those that were sick, and of no service, he brake forth in the night, with an intire body, and with great silence, by the way he made his escape. [Plutarch, Appian, and Orosius.] determining (by marching in the night) to go into Armenia the greater, which was subject to Tigraues, [Dio.] and there to beat back Pompey, if he pursued him. [Oros. lib. 6, cap. 4.]

The next day, Pompey, having with much ado overtaken him, fell in upon his rear, but the King (though perfwaded by his friends) could not be tempted to a battle, contented to beat back the enemy with some Horse only, and in the evening to retire into the woods, [Appian.]

The day following, Mithridates got possession of a Village, that was every way incompass'd with rocks, to which there was but one ascent, and that was kept by four companies of Foot. The Romans also made a stand over against them, to prevent the escape of the King, [Idem.]

When they were come even upon the borders, Pompey fearing Mithridates should get before, and pass Euphrates, and by that means make his escape. He resolved to endeavour to give them battle in the night. [Plutarch & Dio.] So he removed his Camp & deceived the Barbarians that rested till noon: he marched the same way they were to come; and having gotten a convenient place among the hills, he drew up his men into the highest parts of it, and expected the enemy. The Barbarians, to whom nothing as yet had fallen out crossly, believing they had come into a safe place, and secure; not doubting but the Romans were gone, they lent out not so much as one Scout to discover. [Dio.]

It is reported, that Mithridates had at this time a vision in his sleep, which did forewarn him of what did follow: he did seem to be falling with a fair wind in the Pontic sea, and to be come within sight of the Bosphorus: and being overjoyed with certain and unquestionable safety, began pleasantly to accost them that carried him; but of a sudden, he found himself deserted, and left upon a small fragment of ships. Whilst he was occupied with these motions and fancies, his friends that were about him waked him, telling him, Pompey was at hand. When therefore he found he must of necessity fight for his Trench, bringing out their armies, both Captains drew into battle. [Plutarch.]

Pompey, seeing them prepare for to fight, thought it not best to engage in the night, but to incompass them rather, that they might not escape, and to assault them next morning with his army, which was much the stronger: yet the elder, and chief of his Officers, with their prayers and exhortation, provoked him. [Ibid.]

It was agreed therefore, that all the Trumpets together should sound a charge, after that the souldiers and the whole multitude should give a shout; and then some should strike their spears against their vessels of brass. The mountains being hollow, made the noise more horrible, which the Barbarians hearing suddenly, in the night, and in a desert place, they were exceedingly dismayed, supposing they were fallen into some misery inflicted by the gods. In the mean time, the Romans, from aloft, threw down stones, arrows and darts, on every side, and the multitude being so great, none fell in vain: having spent their arrows, they ran down violently upon the Barbarians, who kicking and pressing each other forward, were slain, being neither able to defend themselves, nor assault the enemy, for as much as they were for the most part Horsemen and Archers, whom in the dark, and in those straits, no endeavour or attempt of theirs could advantage. [Dio.]

As soon as the Moon got up, the Barbarians conceiving they might repel the enemy in the light, took courage, and it might indeed have been some benefit to them, had not the Romans had it upon their backs, for the Moon being in its wane, and their shadows appearing long before their bodies, and pressing upon the enemy, who judged of their nearness, by the means of their shadows, sent all their darts in vain, assaulting their shadows, as if they had been at hand themselves: when the Romans afterwards assaulting them, as if they had been unarmed, overcame them without any pains. [Id. cum Flo. Plut. & Eutrop.]

That this battle was in the night, [Livy, lib. 100.] Florus, [lib. 3.] Plutarch, [in Pompeio.] Dio, [lib. 36.] Eutropius, [lib. 6.] and Orosius, [lib. 6, cap. 4.] do agree: only Appian says it was in the day time, and after this manner. Both armies were drawn up early in the morning, and some sort of both sides advancing, they skirmished amongst the rocks. Some of the Kings Horse also running on foot without orders to the relief of their fellow-souldiers, and being charged with a great number of the Roman Cavalry, ran back in one company to their tents, that by mounting they might encounter the enemy upon equal terms: But the Ponticks that were upon the Guard, observing from an eminent place, with what noise and haste they did run, supposing their Camp had been entered in some other part, and that that was the cause of their flight, they threw away their arms, and betook themselves also to their heels: but no passage being open for the escape, they fell foul upon one another, till that by their thronging they threw themselves down the rocks. It was easier for Pompey to perform the rest, to kill and take them prisoners that were unarmed, and so entangled amongst the rocks. There were 10000 slain, their Camp taken, and all their ammunition and baggage. So Appian, [in Mithridatic. pag. 239, 240.]

Plutarch speaks of a far greater number than 10000. Dio that there were very many slain, and no little number taken prisoners. Eutropius 40000. Orosius says there were to many either killed or taken: Eutropius says Pompey lost only twenty or thirty of his men, and two Captains. Orosius says the Romans had a thousand wounded, but scarce forty killed outright.

Mithridates himself with a Body of 800 Horse brake thorough the Romans, but was at length, (the rest having forsaken him) left with three only: amongst which Hy-

sicratia was one, (Plutarch calls her his Concubine, but Valer. Maxim. and Eutropius speaks her his wife) whom the King by reason the was of a Malicious spirit, called always Hyppicrates. But then though he had put on the habit of a Persian man, and was one horseback; yet was the neither tired by the tediousness of her own flight, nor with the care and solicitude of the King. [Plutarch, Valer. Maxim. lib. 4, cap. 6. Eutropius, lib. 6.] His Daughter also Drisipene bore him by Laodice the Queen, but exceedingly deformed by a double row of teeth, bore her father company in his distress. [Valer. Max. lib. 1, cap. 8.]

And in the King having by flight slip thorough the confusion of the battle, and (being befriended by the clearness of the night) escaped, leading his horse himself in his hand when he came into by places, and trembling at every noise he heard, [Oros. lib. 6, cap. 4.] till at length he fell amongst some mercenary Horse, and 3000 Foot, by whom he was conveyed into the Castle of Sinoria, where he had heaped up much money, [Appian.] which Castle Plutarch calls Iuxra, Strabo Sinoria, or Synoria, seated in the borders of both the Armenia's. [Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 555.]

There he gave gifts and a years pay to those which had borne him company in his flight: and took, says [Appian.] six thousand talents complete along with him. He gave also rich garments to those that returned to him from the rout; besides deadly poison that he gave his friends to carry about with them, lest any of them should fall into the enemies hands. From hence he marched into Armenia to Tigranes. [Plutarch.]

Tigranes being importuned by Embassadors from Mithridates, would not only not receive him, but clapt his Embassadors in prison: pretending he was the cause of the sedition of his son Tigranes: and thus Mithridates being frustrate of his hopes, having passed the River Euphrates, he bends his flight into Colchis. [Plutarch, Appian. Dio.] which he had formerly subjected to his power. [Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 555.]

And having nowhere delayed his journey, the fourth day he past Euphrates: then arming for three dayes and disposing of those supplies he had with him, or which came in to him, he assailed Chocenis the chief Town in Armenia, by reason the Chocenians, and Iberians had attempted with slings and darts to hinder his march; but he beat them off, and advanced to the River Abarus. [Appian.]

Pompey sent out to pursue Mithridates, but he had past the River Phasis, and escaped. So Pompey built a City in the same place where he gained his Victory. [Dio. lib. 36.] betwixt two Rivers which proceeded from several causes in one Mountain: that is to say, Euphrates and Araxes, situate in the Lesser Armenia, and for that cause were called Nicopolis. This City he gave by the content of his souldiers to those that were old, or lame, or sick, or wounded, or disbanded: to which many of the neighbours repairing, the Nicopolitans lived afterward after the manner of the Cappadocians. [Id. ibid. cum Strabo, lib. 12, pag. 555. Appian. pag. 243. & 251. Oros. lib. 6, cap. 4.]

Tigranes the father advanced against Tigranes his son, who was left alone to besiege the Artaxati, and overcame him: he being sent to flight, fled first toward Mithridates his Grandfather; but hearing he was beaten himself, and in more need of assistance than likelihood of assisting him, he joyined himself to the Romans. [Dio. lib. 36.] flying most submissively to them, though he was grandchild to Mithridates by his Daughter, [Appian.] and met Pompey at the River Araxes. [Plutarch.] By his command Pompey brought his army into Armenia against his father, as a confederate of Mithridates. [Dio.] aiming at Artaxa to the Court of Tigranes. [Appian.]

Tigranes the father, understanding this, was terrified exceedingly, but hearing Pompey was of a gentle and pleasant nature, he sent a Trumpeter to him, and withal delivered up Mithridates his Embassador that he had clapt up: but his son hindering him from obtaining any tolerable conditions, and Pompey nevertheless passing over the River Araxis, and approaching near Artaxati; Tigranes at length delivered up the City and all the Garrison was in it, he and his friends and kindred going out to meet him, without lending so much as a Herald before, surrendering all his right into his hands, and appealing to him for justice against his son. [Plutarch, Appian. Dio.]

But to the end he might appear to Pompey worthy of reverence and compassion, he ordered it so, that as far as in him lay, he would retain a mediocrity betwixt the dignity of his former, and the misery of his present condition; for he had put off his Gown that was half white, and his Royal Robe of Purple: but wore his Diadem and the ornaments for his head. [Dio.] To whom when Pompey sent the Captains and Officers of his Horse to meet and do him honour; his friends that did accompany him doubting their security, because they had sent no Heralds before, ran back and deserted him. [Appian.]

When

When Tigranes was come to Pompey's Camp, which was sixteen miles off from Artaxata, two Lieutenants from Pompey came to him, and commanded him to alight from his Horse, upon which, according to the customs of his Country, he had entered the very words, for no man living was ever seen to enter the Roman Camp on horse back. Tigranes obeyed, and unbuckling his sword, delivered it to them. [Euseb. Plur. & Di.] Pompey, beholding him entered on foot, and (having thrown away his Crown, and cast himself upon the ground) adoring according to the manner of the Barbarians, touched with compassion, he leaped to him, and catching him by the hand, lifted him up, and put on the Crown again that he had cast away, commanding him to sit down on one side of him, and his son on the other, who neither rose up to his father, nor used any other ceremony to him. [Cicero pro P. Sextio, Europ. lib. 6. Dio. Appian & Plutarch, turn in Pompeio, turn in Lucul. & Cimonis colatione.]

Tigranes delivered up himself and his kingdom to Pompey's command: declaring before, That there was no man, neither of Rome, nor any other Nation, to whose friendship he would have surrendered himself, but only Pompey: and that he nevertheless, any fortune that should befall him for him, whether it was good or bad, should be acceptable to him; saying moreover, it could not be any disparagement to be conquered by him, whom it was a sin to conquer; nor was it dishonourable to submit to him, whom fortune had exalted above every one. [Vellei. Pater. lib. 2, cap. 37.] He and his son were afterwards invited by Pompey to supper; but his son absenting himself, gave Pompey the first occasion to be offended with him. [Dio.]

The next day, their controversies being heard, Pompey restored the kingdom of Armenia (the ancient possession of his forefathers, to Tigranes the elder, and as Strabo says, added the greatest and best part of Melopotamia lib. 16, pag. 747.) taking away those Countries he had gained in the war, and laying a mulct of six thousand talents of silver upon him, which was to be paid to the people of Rome, because he had waged war with them without a cause: but to his son he gave only the command of Gordana and Sophena, with liberty of enjoying the rest of Armenia, when his father dyed. But the treasure in Sophena (a Country in the borders of Armenia) he adjudged to the father, because by any other way he could not pay the money he had agreed for. [Cicero, Vellei. Pater. Plut. Appian, Dio. & Europ. at aforsaid.]

Tigranes, the father, being very glad of these conditions, and that he was called King by the Romans, he departed not only through Cappadocia, and some parts of Cilicia, but through all Syria and Phenicia, from Euphrates to the sea; for these Provinces with part of Cilicia, he had possessed, by throwing out Antiochus Pius. [Livy, lib. 101. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2, cap. 37. Plutarch, Appian, Dio. & Europ.]

Tigranes the younger, taking it in disdain, that he was so disappointed of his hopes, plotted to escape; which Pompey very feebly perceiving, restrained him, but with liberty, and sent messengers to those that kept the money, to demand it for Tigranes the elder: which they refused, pleading, That they were not to be commanded, but by Tigranes the younger, whose Country that was then judged to be. He is himself sent to the Castle, who finding it thus, came up to it, and though against his will, commanded them to open: nevertheless, the keepers would not obey, objecting, That Tigranes summoned it not out of any desire in himself, but by constraint; which Pompey taking very ill, cast the young man into chains, and by that means, his father at length got the treasure. [Dio. lib. 36.]

Appian says, that the Armenians which deserted the King in his journey to the Roman Camp, solicited his son that continued with Pompey, to make away his father; but he was himself taken and clapped into irons: nevertheless, in letters, he by his messengers persuaded the Parthians against the Romans, pretending he was relieved for the Triumph.

The father received his money, he gave many things, and a greater portion of money than was agreed upon by Pompey; he gave freely to every Soldier, 50 groats, or (as Strabo says) 150, to every Captain 1000, every Colonel 10000, or (as Strabo and Plutarch have it) a talent, which is but 6000 Drachmes, by which means he was reckoned amongst the friends and confederates of the people of Rome. [Strabo, lib. 11, pag. 530. Plutarch, Appian, Dio.] But the money due to the people of Rome, Pompey, as his custom was, delivered it to the Treasurers for the use of the Publick. [Vellei. Pater. lib. 2, cap. 37.]

Pompey gave Ariobarzanes the whole kingdom of Cappadocia, and Sophena, and Gordana, which he had first assigned to Tigranes the younger, which were afterward thought to be in the Province of Cappadocia; he gave him also Cabala, (or Gabala) a City

C. Julius Caesar, some few days before he entered into the Edilship (was suspected of a conspiracy with Marcus Crassus the Consul, as also Sylla and Antonius after the designation of the Consulship, were condemned for endeavouring in the beginning of the year (the Kalends of January falling out then upon the Julian October, in which Cotta and Torquatus entered the Consulship) to assault the Senate, and killing whom they pleased, Crassus was to invade the Dictatorship, and he should be called the Master of his Horse, and the whole Commonwealth being intrusted according to their pleasure, the Consulship should be restored to Sylla and Antonius; from whence it was that Cicero in an Epistle to Axius reports, that Caesar in his Consulship had settled the kingdom to as he had contrived in his Edilship. [Sueton, in Julio Cesare, cap. 9.]

Pompey, having left Armenia to the defence of Afranius, bends his course against Mithridates thorough those Countries that lie about Caucasus, the Albanians and Iberians (great Countries) gave him passage upon the first overture, as Plutarch speaks; but Livie, [lib. 101.] says, that Pompey fought and overcame them, because they denied it him: which battle, lightly and variously mentioned by Plutarch and Appian, Diodotus more fully explains. Pompey having divided his army into three parts, took his own winter quarters up near the River Cyrus, in the Country about Tanais, where notwithstanding he was not quiet; for Orestes King of the Albanians who inhabit the Country above the River Cyrus (or Cyrus) [Florus, lib. 3, cap. 5. Europ. lib. 6. and Orosius, lib. 6, cap. 4, calls him Orestes.] partly to gratify his friend Tigranes the younger; but especially because he feared the Romans would invade Albania: and hoping that if in the Winter he should assault them unexpectedly, they having not pitched their Camp in one place, he made no question but to perform something worthy of his pains; wherefore he advanced with his army against the Romans in the midst of their Saturnals: he himself marched against Metellus Celer, who had Tigranes with him; others against Pompey, others against the Commander of the third party Lucius Flaccus: that whilst every one of them had their hands full at the same time, neither of them should be able to relieve one the other: So says Dio, [lib. 36.] Appian says, that Orestes the King of the Albanians, and Orestes (or Artocus rather) King of the Iberians with 70000 men, lay in ambush for Pompey near the River Cyrus. Plutarch says no less than 40000 Barbarians past the River against Pompey in the Roman Festivals to Saturne, which Feasts were celebrated in the month of December: but as the year came then about it happened in September, or the Julian October, that is in the beginning of Autumn or Winter, according to those that divide the year into two parts only, Summer and Winter, which we see Thucydides observes, constantly in his History of the Peloponnesian war.

Metellus beat Orestes, Flaccus (the ditch about his Camp being of too great circumference to be defended,) made another within, which the enemy (supposing was done out of fear, advanced presently into the outward ditch; he making an unexpected fall upon them, killed many in the conflict, and many in the chase. Pompey understanding the success of the Barbarians against the other, rises and falls unlooked for upon those which were marching against him; and having defeated them, he beats directly against Orestes himself: but could not find him, for he being beaten himself by Metellus and hearing the misfortune of the rest, betook himself to his heels, and escaped. [Dio.]

Pompey, having layne in their passage of the River Cyrus, at last yielded to their supplication, and gave them peace: it was once in his mind to recompense the mischief they had done, by invading their Country; but by reason of the Winter he could not without great trouble prosecute the war: thus Dio in the 36 book, the later end. Plutarch writes that Pompey routed a great number of them, and brought in their Colours: and afterwards, the King supplicating and sending Embassadors, he made peace with him;

Mithridates wintered in Dioscuriade, [Appian, pag. 240.] where the fifthus between the Euxine and the Caspian Seas begins. [Strabo, lib. 11, pag. 498.]

Antipater importuning Hircanus his eldest that he might fight to Areta King of the Arabians, and promising him his assistance, did notwithstanding hardly prevail, yet he obtained it the easier, in respect that Arabia bus upon Judea. Antipater therefore is dispatched before to the King to receive his promise, that he would not deliver up his supplicant to his enemies, which as soon as he had promised upon his word, Antipater returned with all speed to Hircanus at Jerusalem, and not long after taking him by night along with him, they stole out of the City, and with great journey came unto a City called Petra, in which was Areta's Court. [Joseph, lib. 14, cap. 2.]

Antipater being very dear to Areta, requested that he would restore Judea to Hircanus, which with constant importunity, and presents together, at length he persuaded him to: Hircanus promised it by his means he was brought into his Kingdom again, he would return him a Country with twelve Cities; which his father Alexander Jannæus had taken away from the Arabians. The Cities were these, Medaba, Naballo, Livias, Tharabata, Agalla, Arthone, Zoara, Oronz, Marisa, Rydda, Lufa, Oyba, [ib. ibid.]

Alexander II. King of Egypt, the son of Alexander I. was expelled by the Alexandrians [See, in July, Cæsar.] but Alexander the son being expelled, Ptolemy a natural son was substituted; he was the son of Ptolemy Lathurus, who was called Dionysius the new, or Bacchus, and Auletes, because he most effeminately followed the dalliance of the Dionysii, and having put on the habit of women, he danced to the Cymbals in the celebrations of Bacchus, [Lucian de non tem. cred. calum.] he practised also their piping so much, that he boasted of it; and was not ashamed to celebrate confessions in his Court, in which he himself appeared to confest with others. [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 796.]

Aretas the King of the Arabians, with 50000 men, vanquished Aristobulus, after which battle many ran away to Hircanus, so that Aristobulus being desolate, fled to Jerusalem, but Aretas bringing his army with him besieged him in the temple, the people also assisting Hircanus the clergy only sticking close to Aristobulus. But Aretas having brought the Jewish army, as well as the Arabian did most vigorously press them with his siege. [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 3.]

These things being done about the approach of the feast of unleavened bread, the chief of the Jews forsook their own Country, and fled into Egypt. There was one Onias in Judea, an honest just man, and one that had (in a great drought,) prevailed by the Piety of his Prayers for rains, but then foreseeing the civil war that followed had hid himself, and retired into a hole, but the Jews caught him, and bringing him into their Camp, requested him that as heretofore he had relieved them against the drought, so he would now cure Aristobulus (as many as were of his party) for them. This he refused a great while, till being compelled by the multitude, he stood in the midst of them and prayed, thus: O God, thou that art King of the whole World, for as much as these that are with me are thy people, and those that are besieged are thy People, I beseech thee that thou wouldst neither hear these against them, nor them praying against thee. After this some wicked men of the Jews betset him and killed him with stones: which cruelty God immediately revenged, and punished the slaughter of Onias after this manner [ibid.]

Whilst Aristobulus was with his Priests besieged, the feast of the Passover came about, in which the custom was for them to make many sacrifices to their God, which because the besieged did want, they desired of their Brethren the Jews that besieged them; that they would furnish them with sacrifices at what prize they pleased to: they demanded 1000 groates should be sent them for every ox, which Aristobulus and his Priests, willingly consented to and let down their money from the wall, which they received; but returned no sacrifice but proceeded to that height of impiety, that they did not only break their Faith with men, but rob'd God of his due honour. But the Priests that under pretence of a bargain were thus cozened, prayed to God that he would take vengeance of them, nor was it long before it happened, for a great storme lent from above into those Countries; made so great a vallation amongst their corn, that a bushell of wheat was sold for 15 groates. [ibid.]

Pompey waged war with the Iberians, a people exceedingly desirous to gaine the favour of Mithridates, and to repell Pompey because as yet they had neither bin subject to the Medes, Persians, Alexander, nor the Macedonians: [Plutar.] their King therefore Antioch (whilst Lucius Cotta and Lu. Torquatus were Consuls) fearing lest he should advance against him; sends over Embassadors to Pompey under pretence of treating for peace: but in the mean time Prepared whilst he was busy with them to fall upon him when he suspected no such matters; this Pompey perceiving, before he had sufficiently provided himself for that, and posselt himself of the passes; he falls down into his Country: and before Antioch knew any thing of his coming was got down as farre as the City Acropolis, which being situate in those freights where Caucasus runs along, was fortified for defence of that passe. Antioch having lost the opportunity of strengthening himself, in a great fright passes the river Cyrenus, and burns down the bridge. And they which were in the City seeing him fled and themselves beaten, yielded up the Town: by which means Pompey having got possession of the streights, put a Garrison over them, and marching from thence subdued the whole Country that lay on that side the river. [Dio. iust. lib. 37.]

Pompey being now about to passe Cyrenus, Antioch begged a truce by his Embassadors; promising to make him a bridge, and to furnish him with all necessities besides, both which he performed for the obtaining of peace, but as soon as Pompey had passed passed that river he fled immediately to the river Pelorus: running from him whom he had drawn upon himself, when he might have prevented his passage. Pompey, taking it into consideration, pursued, and (having overtaken him) gives him Battle, and with great ease, before the bow-men came to show their skill, he routed them; things falling out thus, Antioch having passed Pelorus, and burnt that bridge also, flies away; the remainder were cut off, part in the conflict, and part whilst they attempted to passe the river on foot: many betraying themselves to the woods, held out some few dayes, by throwing darts from the high trees; but the rest being cut down, they all perished. [ib. ib.] Plutarch reports there was 6000 slain in the battle, and more than 10000 taken prisoners.

Antioch sent Ambassadors to Pompey, to supplicate peace; they brought presents with them also, as a Bed, a Table, and a Chair, all of Gold: which he beleehed him to accept: Pompey took the presents, (that he, being suspended with hopes of the translation, might not go any further off) and delivered them to the Quæstors, to be inserted in the publick writings, but refused to give him peace, unless Antioch would deliver him his sons as hostages. Antioch was for some time doubtful: but at last, when the Romans had found a Ford in the River, in Summer time, and passed it with much ado, though they had no body to resist them, he sent his sons for hostages, and made his peace with Pompey. [Dio. lib. 37. cum Plutarch. & Flor. lib. 3. cap. 4.] Eusebius says, that Pompey overcame Antioch, King of Iberia, in battle, and received him to favour, upon conditions; Semus Rufus, and Jomades, that both Iberia, and Arthaces their King, surrendered themselves to him: but Orofius [ib. 6. cap. 4.] saith, he beat Antioch, King of the Iberians, in the field, and got all Iberia into his custody.

Mithridates made his way as well through those Countries of the Scythians, that were offended, as those that were otherwise, (some he won to him by fair means, others he constrained by force) and being willingly entertained, he past to the Heniochians: but the Achæans, attempting to withstand him, were overcome: afterwards entering into the Mæotic Counties, and vanquishing many of their Commanders, for the fame of his achievements, he was received kindly, taking many gifts, and presenting many: he drew them also into confederacy with him, by taking their daughters, and so joining the most powerful of them to himself. [Livy, lib. 101. Appian, pag. 240. 241. Dio, lib. 36.] to which that place of Strabo refers. [lib. 11. pag. 496.] The Heniochi at that time that Mithridates fled through their Country into Bosphorus, was in his own, had four Kings. He cast away all hopes of passing by the Zygians, both by reason of the difficulty of the wayes, and the fierceness of the people; and therefore with much ado (being many times forced to take the sea) he marched along the shore, till at last he arrived amongst the Achæans, by whom he was received, (notwithstanding, we have heard Appian say, that they resisted him) and here he finished his journey which began at Phasis, and was from thence almost 4000 furlongs. Thus Strabo, who recounts out of those Authors that writ of the affairs of Mithridates, the Countries in this order: First the Achæans, then the Zygians, Heniochians, Cerecians, Molchians, Colchians, [pag. 497.] through all which unsly Countries, Hypsicrate his Queen, with an indelible mind and body, followed her distressed husband: and that the might with more ease, bare in his labour and pain; shaving her hair, the accustomed her self to ride on Horse back, and bear arms; whole to great fidelity in all distresses, was the greatest and most pleasant consideration to Mithridates, who seemed to himself to wander with his whole fortune and family, whilst his wife bare him company in his banishment. [Valer. Maxim. lib. 4. cap. 6.]

Machares, the son of Mithridates, who reigned then in Bosphorus Cimerius, and favoured the Roman party. When he heard his father, in so short a time had overcome so many fierce and Warlike Nations, and past the very bars of Scythia, which were never penetrable before. He sent Ambassadors to him, to let him know it was necessary had constrained him to that friendship with the Romans: but understanding he was implacable, he fled into Pontica Cheroneus, burning his ships, that he might thereby hinder his father from following him: but when he sent against him another fleet, he laid hands upon himself. Mithridates slew all those friends that he had sent himself with him for companions, when Machares went first into his Kingdom, but sent his servants away safe; so Appian. [pag. 241.] Dio, [ib. 36.] saith, That the father having corrupted his familiar with security and presents, wrought upon them to kill his son, And Orofius tells, That Machares was most parricidiously slain by him. [ib. 6. cap. 5.]

Pompey, ordering his journey into the Northern parts of Scythia by the stars, as it had been at Sea, fell down upon the Colchi; and encamping under Caucasus it self, commanded their King Orodes to come down into the Plains, as Florus hath it, [ib. 3.]

[lib. 2. cap. 5.] who made after says Orodes was King of the Alans (with Eutropius and Orosius.) For Orodes in this place we take the name of Othman, whom Appian shows to be King of the Colchis, and Idris Triumphant by Pompey, [pag. 330.] or Artabarchus, whom the said Appian, [pag. 331.] and Eutropius, [lib. 6. §. 1.] report to be made King of Colchis in his stead.

Plutarch says, that in the River Phasis Servilius met Pompey with the Fleet which was sent for the defence of Pontus; and that the party of Mithridates who had hid himself in the Counties about Bithynia and Macedonia, had brought him into many perplexities: he went after Colchis, that he might view the positions of the Artagonates, and Castor and Pollux, especially desiring to see the place where Prometeus was said to be confined; the sight of which things drew him from the neighbourhood of Colchis, [Apian, pag. 341. 342.] The Colchis also, and the Counties contiguous he wanted his side, partly by land, and partly by fire, and having found there that his journey by land though many starlike and unknown Counties would be difficult, and that by sea it was more inhumane by reason of the inhabitants which were avowed, and the Counties unfurnished with Ports, he commanded his ships to keep their station and to watch Mithridates, that he might not when he believed to break out, not to provisions for him as he was anywhere suffered to come in: he himself turned his count against the Alans, but with a company that which they were sent in their company, he might with the suddenness of his success the more easily destroy them: though Plutarch says, the Alans did at length revolt, and that Pompey stirred up with anger and desire of revenge, marched immediately against them: but he returned into Armenia, and passed the River Cyrus, while the season of the year had rendered it fordable, [Id. lib. 37.]

But with great difficulty it was that he passed this River, the Barbarians having for a great space fortified it by knocking down stakes into it, [Plutarch.] But Pompey, the River being immodest, first put his Horse over, then his Train, and then his Foot, that the Horse might with their bodies break the force of the River, and if any thing of the Train should be carried away with the violence of the stream, it should fall upon them that accompanied it, and be carried no further, [Id.] Here having past a long, dry, and rocky way, he filled 10000 bladders with water, and proceeded in his journey, [Id.]

At length without any impediment from the enemy, he arrived at the River Caucasus, but his whole army previously distressed with heat and thirst, though for the most part they marched in the night, he chose him Guides out of the frontiers, but they flew him not the most commodious way. Moreover the River it felt brought them not small advantage, for the water being exceeding cold, and they drinking too plentifully, it made many extremely sick. But neither did they rest any of them, all they came to the River Abas, all which time they carried nothing with them but water, in all other things being most bountifully supplied by the inhabitants for which cause they marched without any injury to them, [Id.]

Having passed the River, news was brought that Orodes was drawing towards them, [Id.] He had in his army 60000 Foot, and 12000, or (as Strabo will have it 22000) Horse, but for the most part ill armed, and with the skins of wild Beasts, which Cossis the King's brother commanded, [Plut. cum Strabo, lib. 2. §. 1. pag. 302.] Pompey, that he might draw them to a battle before they understood the numbers of the Romans, he first drew up his Horse, giving them directions what they should do; behind them he disposed his Foot, placing them upon their heels, and commanding them to cover themselves with their shields, and lie still without making any noise, by which means Orodes had no knowledge of them till he joined battle: but despising the Horsemen whom he thought alone, he assailed them, and in a moment putting them (as they had order) to flight, he pursued them furiously: When the Foot rising up on the sudden, and making a space that the Horse might securely retreat, they charged the enemy, and incompelling a great number of them, put them to the sword, the rest were destroyed by the Horse, who being drawn about, both on the right hand and the left fell in upon their backs, so that by the Horsemen also there was great slaughter made: and those, escaping both, had fled into the Woods, the Woods being set on fire, were consumed amongst them: the Romans calling out to them the while to remember the Sacrament, for about that time as is said before, the Alans laid an ambush and assailed them ere they were aware, [Id. lib. 37.]

In this battle, Cossis the King's brother charged Pompey himself, and with his dart struck him through the joynt of his arm, but Pompey ran him thorough with his Speare and killed him. In this fight it was reported that certain Amazons inhabiting the Mountains adjacent to the River Thermopodius, came in to the relief of the Barbarians, and some whilst they were taking the plunder of the field, found some Amazonian Targets and Buxkins, but there was no body of a woman found, [Plut.] See Appian

Appian also [lib. 2. cap. 5.] who he speaks of in this and the former engagement, with the Alans, is the same, now while he speaks of his wars with Eutropius, and Scaurus Rufus, delivers the names of the said Scaurus Rufus, King of the Alans, and his Commander, [Id. lib. 2. cap. 5. §. 1. pag. 330.]

Pompey, having destroyed the wintered above, was at length persuaded to accept of Orodes, of Orodes, who was, for a golden price, as also a golden bed, and other rich presents, to be his ally, for which he made peace with them, [Plutarch, lib. 2. cap. 5. §. 1. pag. 330.] The same year, Pompey, who had followed Hercules from the mountain Alabon, and had followed him to the mountain Caucasus, [Id. lib. 2. cap. 34.] was at Pompey make peace only with the Alans, but with all the inhabitants from Mount Caucasus to the Caspian Sea, to furnish themselves with his rise in Europe, for the same year, Pompey was at the same time, [Id. lib. 37.] Strabo says, that Pompey, who had followed the Caspian and the Colchian lake, he was against the Indians and Armenians, [Id. lib. 2. cap. 34.] Pompey then, being directed from that, by the Macedonian, he turned into Armenia the Lesser, as Plutarch says, [Id. lib. 37.]

Pompey, having past Taurus, and the Arabian Mountains, he was at the received him to favour, [Id. lib. 2. cap. 34.] Pompey, who had followed the Caspian and the Colchian lake, he was against the Indians and Armenians, [Id. lib. 2. cap. 34.] Pompey then, being directed from that, by the Macedonian, he turned into Armenia the Lesser, as Plutarch says, [Id. lib. 37.]

Phraates, King of the Parthians, seeing Pompey carry on things with such violence, that Armenia, and that part of Pontus that was next him, was taken by his Commanders; and that Gabinus having past Euphrates, was advanced as far as Tigris. In a great fright he sent Ambassadors to Pompey, for the renovation of that peace with the Romans, which was begun before; but he prevailed little by that Embassy: for Pompey, being elated with his present success, and the hopes he had conceived for the future, esteemed him but little. Amongst other proud demands that he made to his Ambassadors, one was, That he might have Cordones, or Gordyones, (a Country then in controversy between Phraates and Tigranes) delivered into his hands; but the Ambassadors having so much time in commission, and giving no answer, he wrote something to Phraates, [Id. lib. 37.]

In his letters he neglected to give him the Title of King of Kings, (as all other people, yea, the Romans themselves, and as he himself did after in his Triumph) and only gave him the single appellation of King: which Phraates could not bear, he having his Kingdom dejected all. But Pompey, not daring for an answer, sent Afranius immediately with an army into Gordyene, who beat out those Parthians that had invaded it; and pursuing them as far as Arctina, restored the Country to Tigranes, [Id. lib. 2. cap. 34. §. 1. pag. 302.]

That Gabinus was sent out of Armenia, into Syria, by Pompey, are read in Josephus, [lib. 2. Bell. cap. 5. §. 1. pag. 330.] which we conceive to be Armenia the Lesser, into which we have heard by Plutarch, that Pompey, having finished the war with the Albanians did retire: although Josephus, being deceived by the identity of the name, does understand it the Greater, and therefore writes that at the same time, when Pompey was engaged in his war with Tigranes: Gabinus was sent into Syria; which could not be, unless with Appian, he made Tigranes submission, to follow after his expedition against the Albanians: which we with Livy, Volcanus, Florus, Plutarch, Eutropius, and Orosius, do conclude to be before.

As soon as Scaurus came to Damascus, he found it newly taken by Mithridates and Lollius, but having removed them and understood it was something done in Judea, he addressed himself thither, as to a place of advantage. As soon as he had entered the Country, he meets Ambassadors, as well from Mithridates, that had besieged the Temple of Hierusalem, as from his brother, Antiochus, who was besieged there, both of them intreating his assistance: and when Antiochus had made his offer of 400 talents, though Hyrcanus offered him much more, yet he preferred Antiochus his promise, having received thence his army, he sent Ambassadors to Hyrcanus, and Arta the King, (who assisted him with 10000 of the Nabathians, though they were not very much animated for that war) the Ambassadors to the Romans and Pompey's name, if they did not desist from that siege: And to Aereas, being affrighted, withdrew from Judea into Philadelphia, and Scavrus returned to Damascus. But Aristobolus, having gathered all the forces together that he had, pursued Aereas, and Hyrcanus, and encountering them at a place they call Payron, he overcame them, killing about 7000 of the Enemy amongst the rest the brothers of Antipater. Cephalus, was one [Joseph, in supra]

Pompey, returning out of Armenia, he met with certain Kings, and Rulers, (whom Plutarch reports to be Barbarians and twelve in number) bearing their complaints, and giving them his answers, to some he confirmed their Kingdoms, to some he increased them, and others he took away from their Eminence and deprest them. [Xiphilin, in Dione] To which time that History is celebrated by Val. Maximus seems to be referred.

Ariobaranes yielded up his kingdom of Cappadocia to his son in the sight of Cn. Pompey; whose Throne when by his invitation he had ascended, and was set down in the chair of State, when he beheld his son with his Secretary in a place inferior to his dignity and fortune, not able to behold him beneath himself, he arose from his seat, and put the Crown upon his head, exhorting him that he would go up to the place from whence he descended himself; the young man fell a weeping immediately, his body fell a trembling, and the Crown fell to the ground, neither could he be got to the place he was commanded to go: and which even surpasses all belief, he rejoiced that he was to part with the Crown, he was discontented that he was to receive it, nor had this eminent controversy had any end, had not Pompey added his authority to the desires of his fathers for he called his son King, he commanded him to take the Crown, and compelled him to sit in the Ivory Chair, [Valer. Max. lib. 5. cap. 7.]

From thence Pompey went into Cretolysia, and Phenicia, which were lately delivered from their Kings, and disturbed by the Arabians and Tigranes, and there he stayed; though Antiochus adventured to attempt them again, but in vain: but being reduced and joyned into one Province, they received laws from him, which were administered according to the custom of the People of Rome, [Xiphilin, in Dione.]

That this was Antiochus Pius, the son of Antiochus Cyzenicus, Justinus, [lib. 40. cap. 2.] Appian in Mithridatic, [pag. 244.] and Porphyrius, [in Græcis Eusebiius Scaligeri, pag. 227.] reports. But the same Appian more truly in his Syriacis, [pag. 119. & 133.] affirms him Antiochus Afariacus, the son of Antiochus Pius and Selene, who four years before, either by Lucullus's favour or permission, was possessed of the kingdom of Syria which Tigranes had forsaken, and in Pompey's Festival, [as he speaks in pag. 123.] whilst he was employed in other matters, he kept it one whole year: (after Tigranes had most justly delivered up what he had in Syria to the people of Rome) and though in his presence he desired his fathers kingdom, yet Pompey deprived him of it, though he had done nothing prejudicial to the people of Rome. And indeed it was an easy matter for so great an army to oppress a disarmed Prince, although another reason was given (viz.) That it seemed unequal, that after the ancient Kings had been overcome by Tigranes his Forces and beaten out of Syria, it should be now rather given to the Seleucians than were beaten, than to the Romans that overcame them: and Pompey thought it not fit to give Antiochus that which he was not able to defend from being infected by the invasions of the Jews and Arabians, [Justin, & Appian, in locis supra citatis.]

Julius Cæsar when he was Ididus, having gotten the favour of the people, endeavoured by part of the Tribunes to have gotten the Government of Egypt by an order from the people, there being occasion for an extraordinary command, by reason that the Alexandrians had beaten out their Prince an associate and friend of the Romans, and so called by the Senate, which was generally disapproved by the Commons; but he obtained it not, a great faction of the Nobles opposing it, [Suetonius, in Julio, cap. 11.]

But Pompey was called into Egypt (by Alexander the second, that was expelled) to quell some seditions there. He was presented with many gifts, as money and cloths, for his whole army; but he went not thither, either in regard of the envy of his enemies, or of the Oracle of Sybil, (of which hereafter in the beginning of the 3948 year of the World) or for other reasons, [Appian, Mithridatic, pag. 251.]

Pompey came to Damascus, and went about Cretolysia, at which time there came Embassadors to him from all parts of Syria, Egypt, and Judea: at the same time, as it appears, that the twelve Kings came to him that Plutarch mentions; concerning whom Josephus brings that place out of Strabo's History, [Antiq. lib. 14. cap. 5.] There came out of Egypt an Embassie with a Crown of 4000 crowns of gold; and out of Judea, either a Vineyard or a Garden, which piece of workmanship was called the Delights, which present we ourselves saw at Rome dedicated in the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus with this inscription, Of

Of Alexander the King of the Jews, and it was valued at 500 talents. Which present was placed by Alexander Jannæus in the Temple at Jerusalem, and sent to Pompey by his son Aristobolus, which Pliny amongst the Acts of Pompey's Triumphs describes thus. A fourleague Mountain of Gold with Harts and Lions, and all kinds of Apples, with a Vine of Gold incomparable it, [Pliny, lib. 37. cap. 2.]

A while after there came out of Judea to Pompey Embassadors again: Antipater for Hircanus, and Nicomedes for Aristobolus. Aristobolus his Embassador complained of Gabinus, that he had received three hundred talents of money, and afterwards of Scavrus, that he had received four: and making them his enemies, Pompey commanded both parties (Hircanus and Aristobolus) to appear before him, [Joseph, lib. 14. cap. 5.]

Africanus, coming into Syria, against the treaty begun betwixt Pompey and Phraates: lost his way as he went on, and endured much hardship by reason it was winter, and there was a great scarcity of victuals, may he had perished utterly, and those that were with him; had not the Carrenses; formerly as is reported, a Colony of Macedons then inhabiting thereabouts, received them, and brought them back. [Dio, lib. 37.]

Pompey having his winter-quarters at Aspis in Pontus, received to favour all those parts of the Country, which till then had been in hostility against him: which we may gather out of the fragments of the 37 book of Dio, which the reader may by comparing them easily find to be transposed in the consulship of Cæsar and Figulus. But of all Mithridates's Concubines which were brought to him Pompey touched none but sent them back to their parents and kindred, for, for the most part, they were the wives and daughters of Potentates and Commanders. [Plutarch.]

Dio reports, amongst other things, that the Castle Symphori being yielded up by Stratonix was received by Pompey: this Stratonix was the daughter of a Miltian as is said and one of the Kings Wives or Concubines; being enraged that she was forsaken by him whilst Mithridates was rambling about Pontus, having felt most of the Garrison for provisions, she admitted the Romans upon this single condition, That if Pompey should take her sonne Xiphates prisoner, he would keep him in safety for his Mother, and being privy to a great Treasury that was hidden under ground: (which consisted of many brasse vessels, bound about with hoops of iron) he discovered it to Pompey, of which he selected only, such as he conceived would give most ornament to the Temple, and most splendour to his Triumph. And gave Stratonix the rest. [Plutarch, in Antiochus.]

Mithridates, understanding this caused Xiphates her sonne to be slain, his Mother beholding it on the other side of the river, and then threw away his body without buriall: neglecting all Piety, that he might make her but repent of what she had done. [Appian.]

Pompey took also that almost impregnable Castle, called the New, in which Mithridates had laid his most valuable things; which were afterwards by Pompey dedicated to the Capitoll. [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 556. 557.] In it also Pompey took many of Mithridates's most secret records, which he willingly looked over: because that besides other secrets: he might clearly thereby discover his numbers and wealth. [Plutarch.] Amongst them there were also some Physicall inventions of Mithridates which Pompey commanded Lenaxus, a learned Grammarian, to translate into Latine. [Pliny, lib. 25. cap. 2.]

Phraates, sent Embassadors to Pompey, by whom he complained of injuries he had received: That Tigranes the younger was by him kept prisoner, and he desired, being his sonne in law, he might be returned: and as if Euphrates had been the limit of his Empire, he forewarned Pompey of passing it, to which he answered: that Tigranes ought rather to be in his Fathers power, than his Father in laws, and that he would keep his equal bounds. [Plutarch, cum Dio.]

Phraates, in the spring (when Lu. Cæsar and C. Figulus were Consuls) made an expedition against Tigranes, and after he had been foiled in one battle: he afterwards got the mastery of his Enemy. [Dio, lib. 37.]

Pompey, in the beginning of the spring, having drawn his forces out of their winter quarters, marched out into Damalen: and by the way demolished a Castle in Apamia, which Antiochus Cyzenicus had fortified, he fell in also upon the Country of Ptolemy Mennæus: one no less hurtful than Dionysius Tripolitans, who was allied to him, and beheaded: but he paid 1000 talents and redeemed himself, which Pompey bestowed upon his soldiers: he destroyed also the Castle of Lyfias, whose Governour was Silas a Jew; after that marching by Heliopolis, and Chalcis, and passing the middle of the mountain, he comes into Cretolysia, and from Pella, arrives at Damascus. [Joseph, lib. 14. cap. 5.]

There he gave audience to the Jews and to Hyrcanus, and Aristobolus their Princes, Princes, who were at variance betwixt themselves, as the Nation was with them both: the Jews having it in precept from their forefathers, that they should give obedience to the Priests of God, refused to be governed by Kings. These two were indeed of the race of the Priests, but had a designe of altering the Government, and bringing servitude upon this people. Hyrcanus complained, that his brother, though the younger, had gotten the greater part of the Country, having by force invaded and usurped it: That at land he had made violent incursions upon his borders; and that at sea he had harbours and receptracles for his Pirates. There were above 1000 of the chief of the Jews whom Antipater had persuaded to it, confirmed what he said to be true. On the other side, Aristobolus pleaded that Hyrcanus was removed for his sloth, and a general contempt that lay upon him amongst the people of his own Country, that he had taken the government upon him by necessity, least it might have been transferred to some other family, and he called to attest it certain insolent young men, who gave offence to every body by the fineness of their cloths, the exactness of their hair, and their other accoutrements; which had been much more proper, had they come to a Tryumph, then a judgement. [Joseph, lib. 14, cap. 5.]

Pompey having heard their plead, and rebuking the violence of Aristobolus, dismissed them peaceably with this promise, that he would come himself into their Country as soon as he had overlooked the affairs of the Nabatei; in the mean time he enjoined them to be quiet, using Aristobolus with great civility, least he being provoked, his pillage might be stopp'd. Nevertheless, he gained no favour from him, for Aristobolus, who had put himself into the greatest equipage, and splendour was possible, taking distast at their usage, and thinking it intolerable to endure any thing beneath the majesty of a king; he withdrew from Diopolis, and coming to the Town of Delius, he betook himself to Judea, in order to his own affairs. [Id. ibid. & lib. 1, Belli, cap. 5.]

Alexander II. being beaten out of Egypt, departed to Tyre, and there dyed; leaving, as was reported, by his last Will and Testament, his kingdom of Egypt to the people of Rome: of which Cicero in his first Oration that he made the first day of his Consulship, thus, The Decemviri say, that which was often spoken by many, That Alexander the King had by his Will made over his Kingdom to the Romans, as if they would give Alexandria to those upon private request, whom you did oppose openly, fighting in the field: And in his second Oration more fully, What of Alexandria, and all Egypt, how secretly doth it lie? How private is it kept? How obscurely reported to the Decemviri? Which of you are ignorant, that it is said, that Kingdom was by Alexander's last Will conferred upon the Romans. In this case I, though a Roman Consul, am so far from determining any thing, that I forbear my opinion: for it seems to me no small matter, not only to judge, but to speak of this thing. I see him that will assert the making of the Will; and I suppose there be records of the Senate extant, which concerne their possession of their heritage, above the time when Alexander died, and we sent Embassadors to Tyre, for the restitution of the Money was deposited by us. This I remember I have often heard L. Philippus affirm in the Senate. It is granted almost of all sides, That he, who at this time rules, (Ptolemæus Auletes) is neither of the race, nor the honour of a King. On the other side it is said there is no will, and that the people of Rome ought not to appear covetous of every Kingdom: That it was the richness of the soyle, and the plenty of all things that carried over people thither: but of so great an affluence, P. Rullus with the rest of the Decemviri his Collegues will judge.

It is reported also, that M. Crassus being Consul, and endeavouring to make Egypt tributary to the people of Rome, did strongly oppose Lutatius Catulus his Collegue in his Consulship; by which means a diffention growing, they of their own accords laid down their magistracy and power. [Plutarch in Crasso.]

Pompey had a great mind to recover Syria, and so to pass thorough Arabia to the Red Sea; that in like manner as he had in pursuit of the Albani, been almost at the Hyrcanian (or Caspian) sea, and as in the West, the Roman Empire was terminated by the Atlantick, so by his conquest in the East, it might be extended to the Red Sea: he saw also the difficulty of taking Mithridates, finding him more troublesome in his flight, than opposition: promising therefore to leave him hunger, as a more formidable enemy, he disposed his ships for the intercepting of those Merchants that traded into the Bosporus, threatening them with death, if he took them: and then taking with him a great part of his army, he began his journey. [Plutarch in Pompeio.]

He invaded Syria Cælen and Phenicia, and first of all he over-ran the Ituræans, and Arabians, [Appian, pag. 244. Europ. lib. 6, Oras. lib. 6, cap. 6.] who inhabiting the hilly Country about Libanus, infested their neighbours with robberies, their retreats were very well fortified; upon the hills were Sinna, Borrhama, and other forts of that kind, in the bottom Botrys, Gigartus, besides dens by the sea side, and a Castle located upon a Mountain, called Θεῶν ἀγορά, or the face of God, all which Pompey dismantled, and running thorough Babilus or Palæbibilus, a Country of Cinyras, he set her at liberty, by cutting off her Governours head, [Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 755.]

Afranius, having subdued the Arabians near Amman, came down into Syria, which wanting a lawful Prince, he reduced it into a Province, and brought it under the possession of the Romans, [Id. ibid.] and receiving a sum of money of the Antiochians, he called them to no account, but enfranchized their City, and left them to the exercise of their own laws, [Porphyr. in Græciæ Eusebians Scaligeri, pag. 227.] And in many things indulging the Antiochians, he restored the place of their publick confession which was fallen: he had great respect to them because they deduced themselves from the Athenians, [Johan. Malela Antiochenus, in Chronico.]

He gave Seleucia (Pieria) a very strong City, and adjacent to Antioch her liberty, because it had refused to admit Tigranes, [Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 751, Europ. lib. 6.] But to the Antiochians he released their Holiages, and to the Daphnesies, a certain quantity of field for the enlargement of their Grove, being delighted with the pleasantness of the place and the plenty of waters, [Europ. lib. 6.] From whence Strabo notes the circumference of this Grove to watery with Springs was 80 furlongs, [lib. 16, pag. 750.] Sextus Rutilius in Breviario writes, that Pompey consecrated this Grove of the Daphnesies, and added another therunto. Jerom adds in his Commentary upon the 16 Chapter of Ezechiel, that it was by his order fown or planted by the hands of his souldiers: and in his Chronicle, he says it was consecrated to Apollo; which if spoken of the new Wood that was added, might perhaps be true. See the 3704, and 3832 year of the World, concerning the old Grove.

Cato Minor, was then in Syria, called afterwards Uticensis, a Philosopher of the Sect of the Stoicks, a young man then, but of great esteem, who (being for the great friendship betwixt his father and him invited to it by Dejotares King of Tetrarch rather of the Galatari) travelled thorough Asia, observing the manners, customs, and strength of every Province as he passed. He performed his journey alwayes on foot, his friends that accompanied him riding by. He coming to see Antioch in Pompeys absence, and beholding a great throng of people in white before the Gate, the men drawn up on one side of the way, and the children on the other, he disgusted it, supposing it had been done out of Ceremonie to him; wherefore he commanded his friends to alight and walke with him; as they approached he which ordered and commanded the whole Multitude, an ancient man and carrying in his hand a Rod and a Crown, addressed himself first to Cato, and without so much as saluting him, inquired how Demetrius did, and when he would come thither; he had been Pompeys servant, but was made free, and because he could prevail very far with him, he was revered by every body very much. Cato's friends then falling into laughter, Cato cried out, O miserable City I and passed forward without any other answer; afterwards as often as he remembered it, he fell a laughing himself, [Plutarch in Pompeio, & Catoe Minore.]

When Tigranes the Armenian was overcome by Phraates the Parthian, he desired aid of Pompey that was then in Syria: but Phraates piously after sent Embassadors to Pompey, accusing both the Romans and himself to carnality, that they made him both afraid and athamed; insumuch, that he neither gave Tigranes any assistance, nor (though many did excite him) waged war afterwards with Phraates: pleading he had no commands from the people of Rome for that Expedition, and that Mithridates was yet in being, for the present he was contented with what he had done, and would not engage in any new, left with Lucullus attempting too much, he should meet with misfortunes at last. Phraates accusations he did extenuate, not refusing them, but only that he might beget some difference betwixt him and Tigranes about their bounds: which succeeding, he promised to send three Commissioners who might judge of it. And he did send them indeed, who being received as Arbitrators by the Kings, composed all controversies betwixt them: Tigranes was angry he prevailed not for supplies. But Phraates desired Tigranes should be safe; whole assistance, if things came so about, he might expect for the future against the Romans; it being obvious to both of them, that whosoever of them overcame the other, he was sure of contest with the Romans, and was likely with the more ease to fall into their power. These causes therefore considered, they made peace, [Dio. lib. 37, cum Plutarch, & Appian, pag. 244.]

Pompey being thus employed, Mithridates went round about Pontus, and possessed himself of Panticapeum, a Mart Town in Europe at the mouth of the Ponticks; [Appian, ibid.] He sent also Embassadors to Pompey (who was then in Tyria, and knew not that Mithridates was alive) which promised if he would restore him his fathers kingdom again, he would become tributary to the people of Rome; and when he urged that the King should come himself, as Tigranes had done, he refused to do it, as a thing not suitable to the person of Mithridates, but said he would send his sons and other of his friends, [Appian, pag. 245.]

These things, being said, he summoned all people promiscuously, as well servants as free. He forged also great store of arms and darts, and other engines, sparing nothing, not so much as their oxen for the plow, which he killed that he might have their nerves for strings to their bows. He laid a tax also upon all people, which was raised, but without Mithridates knowledge with great injury to many. He himself was at that time troubled with a certain venereal disease in his face, so as no body could see him but the Eunuch that had him in cure, which they finished at last. His army being ready at the same time, consisting of 60 Cohorts, each of them containing six hundred men, and a numerous multitude of slaves, ships, alots, and places of convenience, which his Commanders had fortified whilst he was sick. He carried part of his army to Phanagorium another Town situate in the mouth of the River rox, that on all sides he might secure the passage. Pompey being all this while in Syria, [Id. lib. 1.]

In Bosphorus, whilst Mithridates was celebrating to Ceres, there suddenly happened an Earthquake, the greatest in the memory of man, which destroyed many Cities, and did no small mischief in the fields, [Dio. lib. 37. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 5.] Nor much unlike it, this was not the same, was that Justin ex Trogo mentions, which devoured 170000 men, and many Cities with them: which prodigies the Aulopics did lay pointed great alteration of Affairs, [Justin. lib. 40. cap. 2.]

At the same time, Cassar that was Commander in Chief for Mithridates in Phanagorium, slew Tiphon the Kings Eunuch by whom he had been formerly abused as he was eating in the Town: and when he had done, excited the people to take up arms for their liberty, who although the Castle was held by Artaphernes and the rest of Mithridates children, yet getting wood and things combustible together from all places, they set it on fire, and constrained Artaphernes, Darius, Xoxes, Oxathres, and Eupatras, the children of Mithridates, to deliver up themselves: amongst these, Artaphernes was the only person, was full forty years old, the rest were comely youths: but Cleopatra another Daughter of his, whose generosity delighted her father, he sent a Squadron of Gallies and fetched her away: the rest Cassar (when he had possessed himself of the Castle) sent over to the Romans, [Appian, pag. 245, 246. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 5.]

Those Castles that were near and newly taken by Mithridates, provoked by the bad example of the Phanagorians revolted, a Cheroneusis, Theudolia, Nymphæum, and other places about Pontus, that were convenient in that war, [Appian.]

Mithridates, being very much incensed, did not only execute some of the ruffians that he had taken, but many of his friends also, and Expodias one of his children, [Dio. lib. 37. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 5.] and observing their great defects, and having the fidelity of his whole army in suspicion, by reason they were forced, and under extraordinary taxes, and thinking the adversity of his fortune would always be in the minds of a mutable and constrained people: he sent therefore his Eunuchs to the Princes of Scythia, to treat about marrying his Daughters, desiring they would with all speed come in with their Forces to his relief. They were conducted by 500 Gauls, who were not gone far from Mithridates before they slew the Eunuchs, because that they having great authority with the King, had been always troublesome to them: and when they had done, they carried the Ladies to Pompey, [Appian.]

Pompey, leaving Syria, passed into Asia: where he acted with no little ambition: a thing he had too much reprehended in Lucullus. For whilst Mithridates had yet the command of Bosphorus, and also had gathered together a very considerable army; he, as if he had done all, disposed several provinces, and conferred gifts, [Plutarch.]

Also Livy tells us in his 102 book, how that he brought Pontus into the form of a province in Mithridates's life time. This, being added to Galatia, and divided into eleven Convents, was called by the name of Bithynia, [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 541.]

Pompey, taking Mithridatium from Pontus, bestowed it upon Bogodiorus, [Id. lib. 1.] He created Archelaus, son of that Archelaus who was in honour with Syria and the Senate (as I have noted in the 3919 year of the World) Chief priest of Luna, a goddife of the Comans in Pontus, insatuated with a princely Dynasty, and added to the sacred revenue of that office the quantity of two scami, or 60 stadii of land, and commanded the inhabitants of Comana that they should be obedient to Archelaus. So that he was their Prince, and the chief Lord of all the Priests and Ministers of that Temple, inhabiting in the City which were no less than 6000: only he had not power to sell them, [Id. lib. 12. pag. 558. & lib. 17. pag. 796. cum Appiano, pag. 251.]

Appianus says, Attalus had the Dynastic of Paphlagonia conferred upon him by Pompey, [pag. 251.] Eutropius will have it bestowed upon Attalus and Polémaces; and Sexus Rulus, and Jornandes tell us, that Polémaces upon his death-bed, left the inheritance of Paphlagonia to the people of Rome. Armenia (the Lefte) he gave to Dejotares King of Galatia (or rather Tetrarch) because he was a companion in the Mithridatic war, [Eutrop. lib. 6.] For he thought Dejotares to be the most absolutely true and faithful friend to the Romans, in the whole World, [Cicero in Philippica 11.] Wherefore he gave him Godolomitis his part of Pontus, and all to Pharnacia and Trapezonte; the Colchi even to Armenia (the Lefte) and constituted him King of that Division: when as he had before by inheritance from his father, the Tetrarchy of the Tolitoborgians of Galatia, [Strabo, lib. 7. pag. 547.] For Pompey left Galatia to Tetrarchs of his family, [Id. lib. pag. 541. compared with Appian, pag. 351.] And a little after it came into the hands of three only, then of two, and last of all into the sole power of Dejotares, [Strabo lib. 12. pag. 567.]

Mithridates, being deprived of so many Children, Castles, and indeed his whole Kingdom, did not for all this take to heart the lowliness of his condition, when he had also lost his Dignity, and was past all hope of any help from Scithia; but took his journey to the Eutropean Gauls, whose friendship he had before engaged, to the intent they might help him in such a dead list: and taking his way thorough Scythia and Ister, that with them he might pass the Alps into Italy he hoped, for the dislike they had of the Romans, many Italians would joyne with him, [Flor. lib. 3. cap. 5. Appian, pag. 246. Dio. lib. 37.]

The soldiery disliked these high attempts, being afrighted with the boldness of the enterprise, and the length of the march, as also that they were to go against men, they were not able to deal with, even in their own Country: and they thought Mithridates being in so desperate a condition, was resolved to end his life rather valiantly, than like a slug. But yet they held out a while, and quietly let him go on in his designs, for he was no mean or contemptible Prince, even under the greatest misfortunes, [Appian.]

Arctas, King of Arabia Petra, (or the rocky) even unto the Red sea, who had formerly been often troublesome and vexatious to Syria, and by the Romans (who came in vindication of the Syrians) was overcome in a fight, did notwithstanding still continue the war. Against him and his neighbours (Pharates now lying quiet, and Syria and Phenicia being well settled) Pompeius made an expedition, [Dio. lib. 37.] not altogether to the liking of the Soldiery: for they thought it not well to decline the prosecution of Mithridates: but thought it meet to let the force of the war against him, that was their old enemy, and was now recruiting his forces, and prepared (through Scythia and Panonia) to invade Italy with an army, (as we have said formerly) But Pompeius was the more confirm'd, that it was a more worthy deed to suppress the force of a warring Foe, than to take the body of a conquered and flying enemy, [Plutarch.]

Pompey beginning his voyage, first gave very noble and handsome burial to the dead that fell under Triarius in that unlucky bout they had with Mithridates in Pontus, and which Lucullus left without interment. Arctas, who before contemned the Roman arms, now, being struck with terror, he wrote to Pompey, that he would both observe and performe whatsoever he should command. But Pompey, that he might find the depth of the designe, he set upon Petra; [Plutarch.] where he reduced the King and his Allies without much ado, into his power, and delivered them to custody, [Dio. lib. 37.] having taken their City Petra it fell: [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 6.] although Josephus writes that he omitted them, and bent his forces against Aristobolus. But Plutarch says, that when he was gone a little from Pera, hearing the news of Mithridates his death, he returned out of Arabia, and came to Amilus.

P. Servilius Rullus, Tribune of the people at Rome, in the beginning of his magistrature, published the Agrarian Law, concerning the creating of Decemviri, with chief authority, whose right and office it was to sell or dispose into Colonies, all the publick revenues in Italy and Syria, and what land forever had been gained by Pompey. Which in the Kalends of January (which, as the year then went at Rome, fell even upon the beginning of the Julian October) in the beginning of his Consulship, Cicero opposed in a speech he made against Rullus, and freed all from the general fear they were in of that Law, [Cicero in 12 Agraria, & lib. 2. ad Attic. ep. 1. cum Plin. in Cicero.]

And when by that Law power was given to the Decemviri, to sell all those lands which Mithridates had possessed, in Paphlagonia, Pontus, and Cappadocia, in his second Agrarian oration before the people: Cicero reprehended the injustice of that popular decree in this interrogation, Is it so? without any law made, without the vote of the Emperor, before the war is ended, whilst King Mithridates, having lost his army, and being expelled his Kingdom, yet makes his attempts in the utmost regions, and is defended by the Moenis and those quays, the straightness of the way, and the height of the mountains, from the invincible army of Cn. Pompeius; whilst the Emperor is engaged into the war, and in those very places the name of a war remains: will the Decemviri sell those lands, which by the custom of our ancestors, ought to remain in the power, and as the disposal of Cn. Pompeius?

L. Valerius Flaccus, who had carried the Prætorship at Rome, was sent Prætor into Asia; which Prætorship of his in Asia was annual, into which Quintus Cicero was the fifth that entered, as Marcus Cicero his brother witnesses in his oration, for this very Flaccus, when he was accused of bribery.

Pharnaces, Mithridates his best beloved sonne, whom he had often appointed his heir in the Kingdom, plotted against his father, whether for that he thought his father Italian expedition would put him past all hopes of reconciliation with the Romans, or some other cause, or for covetousness. But those being taken that were guilty in the plot, and put to the rack, yet, by the persuasion of Menophanes; Mithridates pardoned his sonne. [Appian.] Dio (as Sallustius notes) passes over this pardon in silence: and tells us once and again, that Purifiers were sent to take Pharnaces: who were by him persuaded to be of his party, and with them having taken Panticapæum brought his father into his power: with this observation to boot: That Mithridates otherwise a very wise King never considered this, That armies and multitudes of subjects availed nothing without their good will and love: But on the contrary it they are perfidious there is least safety, where the greatest number; which observation also you may find in the following narration of Appian.

Pharnaces, knowing that they were much against the expedition into Italy in their minds, in the night time he went to those Romans, that fled over to Mithridates; and, aggravating the danger of their passing into Italy, which they well knew, and promising them great matters if they would stay, he persuaded them to fall off from his father: and presently, the same night, he sent messengers to other adjacent tents, and persuaded them also to the same opinion; in the morning first the Italian fugitives, and then all the other adjoining camps: cried up the business: and he did the naval forces, with a great shout, and many shouted to give notice of the defection; neither forewarned of the business, nor corrupted thereto: but either induced by the example of so many whom they saw they could not withstand, or taken with the novelty of the old Kings misfortune.

Mithridates, at the shout of the army, sent some to know what they would have. They, nothing dissembling the matter, said, They would have his sonne to be King, a young man instead of an old one, and he addicted to Eunuchs, and that had been the death of many sons, captives and friends. When Mithridates heard this he went out to speak to them himself: whilst many of his guard fled over to the fugitives; who would not receive them unless they would do something that might manifest they were faithful to the King; and withal shewed them Mithridates: whose horse as he was flying away they killed, and now flattered Pharnaces King: as if they had obtained their hearts desire; and some of them took a very large skin of parchment, in length and breadth, what they had brought from the temple: and put it about his head instead of a Diadem.

The old man, seeing this from the upper porch, sent one after another to Pharnaces to desire a safe passage away of him, but, when none of them returned, fearing least he might be given up to the Romans, having praised those pursuivants, and friends of his that yet stood by him sent them to the new King: some of whom the army slew in the way contrary to all expectation. [Appian.] When he had long from the walls imprecated his sonne in vain, and saw him inexorable he is said to have uttered these words, being about to die. O country Gods! if you be any grant that some time or other, he may receive the same words from his children. And presently going to his wives and concubines he gave them poison. [Oros., lib. 6, cap. 5.]

Two virgin daughters that were brought up with him, Mithridatis and Nisira, betrothed to the King of Egypt and Cyprus, earnestly entreated their father, that they might drink their poisoned potion before him, and desired him to forbear till they had done. [Appian.] But neither the poison Mithridates always carried about in his sword, nor the wound he had given himself with the sword, were sufficient to end him, although he walked about most violently, that so the poison, diffusing it self through his veins, might act more powerfully: but all this prevailed nothing, in regard he had to antidoted his body against poison, with daily preservative medicines, which to this day are called Mithridatica; and the wound he gave himself with the sword, what by reason of his age, what by his present perplexities, and the distemper the poison wrought, was but weakly performed. When therefore he had not fully slain himself, but lured; the wall being now broken down, and Bitærus or Bithocus, a Souldier and Gaul roving about, being terrified with the majesty of his countenance, he called him back, and caused the souldiers trembling hand to put an end to his life. [Dio, lib. 37, compared with Livy, lib. 102. Flor. lib. 3, cap. 5. Valer. Max., lib. 9, cap. 2. Plin. lib. 25, cap. 2. Justin, lib. 37, cap. 2. A Gellio, lib. 17, cap. 16. Appian, pag. 248, Arel. Fræ. de Vir. Illust. cap. 76. & Oros. lib. 6, cap. 5.]

This end did Mithridates choose at Panticapæum in Bosphorus Cimærius. A man neither to be passed over in silence, nor to be spoken of without respect, most valiant in wars of singular virtue, greatest, sometimes in fortune, but always in mind; a most discreet General, and an excellent Souldier of his hands, as Velleius Paterculus describes him, [lib. 2, cap. 18.] and last of all, the greatest King after Alexander; as Cicero calls him in his Lucullus: by reason of which Elogies also, I have thought my self engaged to be no less careful in setting down his affairs, than those of Alexander.

Orosius writes thus of the time of the Mithridatic war: in the end of the first Chapter of his sixth book. The Mithridatic war, or rather the destruction of the Mithridatic war which involved many Provinces therein, was protracted for the space of forty years: For it began to break out the 662 year after the foundation of Rome; I said before, [lib. 5, cap. 19.] in which year also the first civil war began there; and in the Consulship of Cicero and Antonius (that I may use the words of that excellent Poet [Lucan].

Barbarico vix consummata veneno)

Scarce ended by the Barbaric poison (of Mithridates.) But in this time there are found but thirty years of that war; and how the most come to write forty, is not easy to be found out.

We read in Justin, [lib. 37, cap. 1.] that Mithridates warred with the Romans forty years. Appian, in the beginning of his Mithridatics, [pag. 170.] allows that Mithridatic war 42; [in Syriac, pag. 118. & Mithridatic, pag. 249.] as Florus that [lib. 3, cap. 5.] and Eutropius [lib. 6.] only 40. In Pliny, [lib. 7, cap. 26.] the alto, [lib. 3, cap. 5.] and Eutropius [lib. 6.] only 40. In Pliny, [lib. 7, cap. 26.] the Title placed by Pompey, in the Temple of Minerva shews this war to last 30 years: and from the beginning of the first Mithridatic war, to the death of Mithridates, is found to be but 26 years; those years of the peace between the two wars reckoned and all; so that that war may be said to last thirty years, only to make up the even number; as Cicero [Orat. in L. Pisonem], for that he had slain Saturninus, defended C. Rabirius, who was guilty of Treason, in his Censulship him, that he by the authority of the Senate, forty years before: which Dio [lib. 37.] by a more exact reckoning, affirms to have been transacted within 36 years, before that time: concerning whom, against that Picoonian Oration, Alconius Pedanius is to be consulted.

At that time Pompey was in Judea; for being angry with Aristobolus, he marched against him: Hyrcanus very much inciting him to do so, with the Roman Legions, and with Auxiliaries that he raised in Damascus, and in other parts of Syria. For having passed by Pella and Scythopolis; and being come to Cores, when, in the beheading of Judea, towards the Mediterranean, he understood that Aristobolus was fled into Alexandria, a goodly Castle, seated upon the top of an hill, but summoned him to come unto him; who being persuaded by many of his friends, not to commence a war against the Romans, came unto Pompey; and after he had debated his nience a war against the Romans, came unto Pompey; and after he had debated his Title with his brother Hyrcanus as touching the kingdom: He by the permission of Pompey, retired into the Castle again. And this he did two or three times, always flattering Pompey, through the hope he had of the kingdom; and making a shew, that he would be obedient unto him in all things: but in the mean while he returned and fortified the Castle, making preparation for war, for fear lest the kingdom should be transferred upon his brother Hyrcanus. [Joseph, lib. Belli, 1. Antiquit., 14, cap. 6.]

Pompey commanding that Aristobolus should deliver over to him the Castles, he wrote to the Governours concerning his business; who would not have obeyed him, unless the letters had been wrote with his own hands. Aristobolus submitted indeed, but in discontent repaired to Jerusalem, with full intent to prepare for war; whom Pompey immediately followed with his army, thinking it not fit to give him any time for preparation. [Id., ib.]

As Pompey was marching near Jericho, there came a messenger that brought him news, that Mithridates was killed by his son Pharnaces. [Ibid.] Which good news, they that brought the message presently shewed by wretching about their Javilins heads with laurel; there was not any high place for him to speak to the Souldiers after the manner of the Camp, which is made with Turf, cut and laid one upon another; but then for very haste, they took their Saddles, and laid them one upon another, and so raised a Mount: which when Pompey had ascended, he told them how how

how that Mithridates had killed himself, and that Pharnaces had kept all things for himself and the Romans, [Phararch in Pompeii]

Whereupon the army, and not without cause, greatly rejoicing, gave themselves over to sacrificing and feasting, as if in Mithridates person alone, there had dyed multitudes of their enemies. Pompey also was very glad, that he had put an end to all his acts and expeditions, easier than he thought he should, [Id. ibid.] For he laid too much weight upon the life of him alone, that although he by conquest already possessed all that he had, yet he did not think the war was ended, as long as he was alive, [Cicero, pro Murena,] and Lucan also brings in Pompey thus bragging of himself.

*Idem per Scythiæ profugum devortia Ponti
Indomitum regem, Romanæque fata morantem,
Ad mortem, Sylla felicio, ire coegi, (i. c.)*

Sculking 'bout Pontus, and whilst watch't to bring Ruine to th' Romans that untam'd King,
With better luck than Sylla, I've made him die.

Pompey first encamping at Jericho, where are most excellent Dates, and Balsome the most precious of all other Oynments: the next morning marched towards Jerusalem. Then Aristobulus being sorry for what he had done, came and met him, and promised him money; and that he would yield both himself and the City up to him, only he desired that setting wars aside, whatsoever he did, he would do it in a peaceable way. Pompey pardoned him, and sent Gabinus with the Soldiers to receive the money, but was fain to returne without without either or City, for Aristobulus his Souldiers would not stand to Aristobulus his promise. Pompey hereupon waxed wroth, and committing Aristobulus into custody, marched in person against the City, which was strongly fortified, except toward the North, which was easily to be battered. [Joseph, lib. 15, cap. 7.]

The Citizens within the City being at dissent among themselves, those that were of Hyrcanus part, were of opinion that the City should be delivered up to Pompey, to whom many joynd, fearing the constancy of the Romans: but Aristobulus his faction commanded the gates should be shut, and preparations for war to be made, because he kept the King prisoner. These preventing the other seized upon the Temple, and cutting down the Bridge, by which they went into the City, stood upon their defence: but Hircanus partly having received the army within the City, delivered over to them; both the City and the Kings Palace; the custody of both which, Pompey committed to his Lieutenant Pilo, who fortified the houses and other buildings that were near the Temple, but first offered to the besieged conditions of peace: which seeing they refused, he prepareth for to give a general assault, and was assisted by Hircanus in all things that were needful, [Id. lib. 1, Bell. cap. 5, & lib. 14, Antiquit. cap. 8.]

On the north side of the City Pompey encamped, which was the easiest to be assaulted: here were also high towers, and a ditch made by hands; besides a deep valley which begett the Temple, and also towards the City all places were very steep down when the Bridge was taken away, especially on that side that Pompey was encamped on. But the Romans daily raised Mounds, cutting down trees round about; and filled up the Trench with materials that the souldiers brought; which work indeed was very difficult, by reason of the vast depth of the Trench; especially considering the resistance that the Jews made from above, [Id. ibid.]

But unless the custom of our Country (saith Josephus) had commanded us to rest on the seventh day, they could not have finished the Mounds, if we had resisted them. For the Law permits us to defend our selves against an assailing enemy, but doth not suffer us to hinder any work that the enemy doth, (but this is no written Law, but given by tradition from their Doctors) which when the Romans observed, they neither did to much as shoot a dart against the Jews, nor came to handy blowes with them; but only erected their Mounds and Towers, and planted their Engines, that they might utter them the next day against us. This Josephus, [lib. 14, Antiquit. cap. 8,] and King Agrippa in the same author, [lib. 2, Bell. cap. 1] saith, that Pompey especially chose those dayes for to carry on the war, on which they that were assailed were to keep the rest of the Sabbath.

Pompeys letters being read in the Senate concerning the death of Mithridates and the finishing of that war; at Cicero the Consuls proposal, there was a procession for twelve dayes decreed for Pompey, [Cicero, de provinciis Consularibus,] And the Romans kept Festival dayes, as being freed from a fore enemy, [Appian, pag. 250.]

Titus Ampius, and Titus Labienus, Tribunes of the people, propounded a law, that Pompey

Pompey should weare a Laurel Crown, and the Triumphant habit in the Circensian plays, and in the Scenical plays, the Purple Gown, and a Laurel Crown: which yet he never did any more than once, [Vellei, Patercul, lib. 2, cap. 40, Dio, lib. 37.]

At Jerusalem the Trench being now filled, and the Tower fitted upon the Mounts, and the Engines that were brought from Tyrus planted, the Romans with shooting huge stones battered the Temple; but yet along while, the Towers being exceeding strong and beautiful, endured the assaults of the besiegers. The Romans being then very much tired, Pompey wondered at the constancy of the Jews, and amongst others, at this especially, that they constantly solemnized the whole service of God amidst all their enemies weapons, as if they had had a firm peace: for all the time of the assault they performed the daily sacrifices: the priests twice every day, namely, in the mornings, and at the ninth hour, offering sacrifices upon the altar, yea, not interrupting their sacrifices in their greatest extremities, [Joseph, lib. 1, Bell. cap. 5, lib. 14, Antiquit. cap. 8.]

When the Latine faries were solemnized at Rome (which were not Feasts that were always upon a set day, but by the appointment of the Magistrates) a Comet appeared; and on the seventh day of the Julian November, two hours after midnight, the Moon was eclipsed: of which Cicero in the second book of his Consulship makes mention in these Verles.

*Tu quoque cum tumulis Albano in monte nivales Lustrasti; & lato matifasti laete Latinas,
Vidisti & claro tremulis ardere cometas,
Multaque miseri nocturnis frage passasti.
Quod ferme in dirum tempus occideret Latina;
Cum claram speciem consero lumine Luna
Abdidi, & subitis stellanti nocte perempta est, (i. c.)*

When Albans snowy heaps thou view'dst, and when
With glad milk the Latine celebrat'st, then Comets of fire did tremble to thy sight,
And thou a conflict phancy'dst in the night,
Which time scarce cap'd I transiently; when
The Moon withdrew her light and light from men,
And on a sudden left a fiery night.

In the third month of the siege of Jerusalem, the greatest Tower being shaken by the many batteries of the Ram fell, and with the fall thereof brake down a great piece of the wall; by which breach multitudes of the enemies brake into the Temple. The first who ventured to ascend the wall, was Cornelius Fastus the son of Sylla, with his band of souldiers, and immediately after the Centurion Furius with his Regiment, and between them both, the Centurion Fabius with a valiant band of his souldiers. These compelling the Temple about, while some sought to hide themselves, and others made some small resistance, slew them all; where many priests, although they saw the enemies rushing in with their drawn words, yet being nothing at all dismayed, continued their sacrifices, and were slain even while they offered and incensed in the Temple, preferring their duty they owed to their Religion before their own lives, [Id. ibid.]

All places were full of slaughters; some of the Jews were slain by the Romans, others by their own Countrymen of the contrary faction: Many threw themselves headlong down the rocks; others setting their houses on fire burnt themselves, not enduring to behold those things that were done by the enemy. There fell here 2000 of the Jews; there were very few of the Romans slain, but many wounded: amongst them that were taken captives was Abolom, the Uncle and Father in law of Aristobulus (he was the son of John Hircanus) whom as Josephus writes in the 13 book and 20 chapter, was honoured by Alexander Jannæus because he was contented to live a private and idle life, [Id. ibid.]

The Temple was taken on the fast day, C. Antonius and M. Tullius Cicero, being Consuls in the CLXXXIX Olympiads, [Joseph, lib. 14, cap. 8.] and the first of that year, [Euseb. Demonstrat. Evangelic, lib. 8, cap. 2.] on the solemn fast of the third month; on which the City was afterwards taken by Sotius, [Joseph, lib. 14, cap. 14.] wherein it is to be taken for the third month of the civil year, beginning from Autumn, according to the Hebrews and other Eastern accounts, (as Josephus shews in the first of his Antiquities, cap. 4. and St. Jerom in the beginning of Ezechiel:) to wit, the third month of the Syrians called by them, the former Canon, and by the Hebrews Cileu: on the 28 day of which month the Jews even to this very day, keep a Fast in memory of the sacred Roll burnt by wicked Jehojakim: [Jeremy, XXXVI, 9, 22, 23.] which which Fast (as is observed at the year of the World 3398.) was appointed for the first taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, when the Jews began first to serve the Babylonians; this event, this Pentecost is worth the observation, That on the same day of the same month, that the Temple should happen to be taken, and thereafter 547 years by Pompey, when the Jews began to serve the Romans; and again after 527 years by Sossus, when they began to serve Herod the Idumzan, and his posterity: and that 8 day of the month Cilleu, answered to the 28 day of the Julian December this year: and (which also is worth observation) it fell also on a Saturday, or the Jewish Sabbath, in which the Temple was won by assault, as Dio notes: and this is reckoned the 79 year, from the 170. of the Grecian Empire, in which it is read, that the yoke of the Heathen was taken away from Israel, [1 Maccab. 13. 41.] from whence, it may be gathered, what a small time they enjoyed their liberty.

Pompey entered into the Temple, and many together with him, and there beheld those things that were not lawful to be seen by any but the High Priest: and whereas there were in the Temple, the Table, the Candlesticks, with the Lamps, and all Vessels for Sacrifice, and the Censers all of Gold, and an huge heap of Spices, and in the Treasuries of Sacred Money, about 2000 talents; yet Pompey meddled not with any of these, but the next day he commanded them that had the charge of the Temple, to purify and cleanse it, and to offer their solemn Sacrifices to God, [Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 5, lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 8.]

Pompey restored the High Priesthood to Hircanus, both because he had shewed himself to forward all the time of the siege, and for that he hindered the Jews that were in the whole Country from joining with Aristobolus, [Id. ibid.] With the Priesthood he also received the Principality; yet Pompey forbade him to wear a Crown, and from thence, besides the former 9 years, in which he was High Priest during the reign of his mother Alexandra, he obtained also the High Priesthood other 24 years, [Id. lib. 20. Antiquit. cap. 8.] for which we take 23 years and an half.

Pompey put to death those that were the chiefest cause of the war, and gave great honours and rewards to Faulsus and others who first had ascended the wall, [Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 5, lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 8.]

Pompey made the Jews tributary to the Romans, [Id. ibid. Euseb. Chron. Sever. Sulpic. Hiflor. Sacr. lib. 2.] and the Cities which they had formerly conquered in Cœlolyria, he took from them, commanding them to obey their own Governors, and the whole Nation formerly advanced through prosperity, he contracted within their ancient bounds; and in favour of Demetrius of Gadara, a libertine of his, (of whose insolence, Plutarch wrote in the life of Pompey) he rebuked Gadara, which the Jews had formerly destroyed: other inland Cities, as Hippon, Scythopolis, Pella, Dion, Samaria, Marissa, Azorus, Jamnia, Arathusa; he restored to the inhabitants, except those that were destroyed in the wars, and likewise the Sea Towns, as Gaza, Joppe, Dora, the Town of Siraton, (which was afterwards magnificently rebuilt by Herod, and called Cæsarea.) Pompey let at liberty, and annexed all of them to the Province of Syria, [Joseph. supra.]

Hircanus and Aristobolus, through their dissensions among themselves, saith Josephus, [lib. 14. cap. 8.] were the cause of this calamity to them of Jerusalem; for then we first began to lose our liberty, being subject to the government of the Romans: besides that, we have been enforced to surrender up to the Syrians, that Country we had lately taken from them in war, and the Romans have also exalted us, more than ten thousand talents in a short time. Which afterwards the same Josephus affirms [in cap. 12.] that Crassus alone took so much out of the Temple, so that he may here be understood to speak of the tributes and pensions laid upon the people.

With these things that are delivered by Josephus their Country Historian, it will not be from the purpose to compare those things we have delivered by foreign Authors (who were contrary to the Jews in their principles) concerning those things were acted by Pompey against the Jews; amongst whom, Cicero is the principal, in whose Consullship these things were transacted; in his Oration for M. Flaccus, we meet with this Testimony of Pompeys abstinence, M. Pompeius, having taken Jerusalem, moved nothing out of that Temple: but, as all things else, so he acted in the first place most wisely in this, That in so spacious and calumnious a City as it was, he allowed no place of bearing the speeches of slanderous detractors; for I think the religion of the Jews was no offence, but a shame to this excellent Emperor. And as much as could be expected from a Heathen, he made a comparison between the Roman and the Jewish religion in this manner. Every City hath its particular religion, and we have ours. Whilst the Hierosolymitans stood, and the Jews were at league with us, yet their religion did abhor the splendor of the sacred rites of our Empire, the majesty of our name, and the institutions of our Ancestors; and now, which is more, that nation (showing their opinion of us by their Arms, it is sufficiently manifest how dear they are to the immortal gods, in that they are conquered, farmed and made service.

Out of Trus Livius, in the 102 Epitome of his book, we have onely these words in effect, Cn. Pompeius subdued the Jews, and took their Temple, which till that time had been inviolate, unless we should think that Eutropius and Orosius (as they did many other parts of their Histories) borrowed this out of him. Thus Eutropius touches upon the businesse in his sixth book, Passing over against the Jews, the third month he took Jerusalem, the head of the Nation: twelve thousand of the Jews being slain, and the rest taken into league. Orosius [lib. 6, cap. 6.] writing that Pompey went from Petra in Arabia against the Jews; over whom Aristobolus having expelled his brother, Hircanus (being the first King of a Priest) reigned: it shews that he took this part of his history not out of Josephus, but some other more unskillful in the Jewish affairs, who notwithstanding relates the transactions of Pompey in this businesse, nothing amiss, thus. He sent Gabinus with an army to Jerusalem, their City; and he presently came after himself, and was received into the City by the chief Elders: but being beaten off the walls of the Temple, by the common people, he set himself to oppose it. The place was not only fortified by the natural situation, but a very great wall, and notwithstanding one Legion after another, night and day, without intermission, attempted the walls: he was three months in taking of it, and took it at length, with much ado. Thirteen thousand (Josephus and Eutropius have 12.) of the Jews were slain there, the rest of the multitude were taken into truce. Pompey commanded the walls of the City to be thrown down, and levelled with the ground: and when he had beheld some Prisoner of the Jews, he restored Hircanus to the High Priesthood, and brought Aristobolus Prisoner to Rome.

Strabo, in the sixth book of his Geography, thus. When Judea was now openly oppressed with tyranny, Alexander was the first had made himself King instead of Priest: whose son, Hircanus and Aristobolus, striving for the government, Pompey came in and deposed, and demolished their bulwark, and took Jerusalem first by force. That fence was all of stone, and well guarded: within well furnished with water, but without altogether droughty. It had a ditch cut in the rock, 60 foot deep, and 250 wide. The walls of the Temple were made of the stone that were cut out of it. Pompey took it, as it is reported, by taking the opportunity of a fast day, in which they abstained from all manner of labours, having filled the ditch, and passed the wall by his scaling ladders. He commanded all the walls to be demolished, and as much as he could, destroyed and abolished all the receptacle of Robbery, and all those things the Tyrants treasures were laid up. Two of them were sited in the entrance unto Jericho, Thraz, and Taurus, the rest were Alexandrium, Hircanum, Macherus, Lysias, and some place about Philadelpia, Scythopolis also next to Galilee; [pag. 799, 703.] and afterwards, Pompey taking away some places, that the Jews had by violence seized upon, preferred Hircanus to the High Priesthood, [pag. 704, 705.]

In Lucan, in the third book of Pharsalia, amongst other Nations that he conquered, reckons up Judea, in these words.

*Me domus cognovit Arabs, me Martia feroces Henichi, notique crepto vellere Colchi,
Cappadoces mea signa vident, & dedita sacris
Incerti Indæ Dei, molisque Sophene: Armenios, Cilicisque feros, Taurisque subegi.*

To th' Arabs and the warlike Heniochi tam'd
And th' fleece-deprived Colchi I am known: my fam'd Ensignes the Cappadocians, and the Jews, wh' adore,
An unknown God and soft Sophene fear full force:
Taurus Armenia and Cilicia I've subdued.

Plutarch in Pompeio, He subdued Indæ, and took their King Aristobolus, Appian in Mithridaticis, concerning the same. He made war upon Ararat, the King of the Arabians of Nabathea, and the Jews also, who had revolted from their King Aristobolus, until he took Jerusalem, a City, in their conceit, most holy. [Pag. 244.] and in Syriae. Only the Country of the Jews remained unconquered, whose King Aristobolus the conquering Pompey sent to Rome, and overthrew the walls of Jerusalem, the greatest and most holy City in all that Country. [pag. 129.]

Cornel. Tacitus, Hiflor. lib. 5. cap. 9. The first that conquered the Jews of all the Romans, was Cn. Pompey, and entered the Temple by right of conquest; there was first published, that their Temple was within, without any image, and an empty seat, and myseries: the walls of Jerusalem were thrown down, but the Temple stood still. L. Cicero, [Hiflor. lib. 3. cap. 1.] concerning the same. Marching through Libanus in Syria, and Damascus, he distributed the Roman Ensignes; he passed through the odoriferous Groves of frankincense and balsams: The Arabians were at his service; the Jews afraid to defend Jerusalem: but this he entered also, and saw openly that grand mystery of that wicked Nation, at under a skye of beaten gold; concerning which, [see Lyptius, Elestor. lib. 2. cap. 5.] The brethren at odds about the Kingdom, he being made King, re-adjudged the Kingdom to Hyrcanus, and claps irons upon Aristobulus, resolving to stand to the award.

And then Dio, [lib. 37.] in the Consulship of M. Tullius Cicero, and C. Antonius. Pompey marched into Syria Palestine, because their inhabitants had invaded Phœnicia: this Country the two brethren, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus governed, and they by chance being at odds at that time for the Priesthood (which is with them all one with the Kingdom) of the God, whomsoever he be, filled the City with seditions: Pompey therefore presently, without any blows, conquered Hyrcanus, for he had no forces able to resist him: and Aristobulus also being besieged in a certain Castle, was forced to accept conditions of peace: and seeing he would neither give him money, nor yield up the Castle, he cast him into Prison, and then easily conquered the rest: but the winning of Jerusalem cost him much pain; indeed he easily obtained the City, being let in by those that favoured Hyrcanus: but the Temple that was seized upon by them of the contrary faction he took not, but with great pains, it was seized on an hill, and fortified with a wall of stone; neither if they had defended it all dayes alike, would it have been conquered; but, because they left off the defence of it on Saturdayes, and because they rested from all work on those dayes, they gave the Romans occasion of overthrowing the wall: for when they observed this custom of the enemies, they did nothing to the purpose on the other dayes; but when the week went about, and Saturday was come, then they fell to work, heartily, and was the Temple by main force. And thus at length the Jews were overcome, nothing at all defending themselves; then were the treasures taken away, and the Kingdom given to Hyrcanus, and Aristobulus carried away prisoner. These things happened at this time in Palestine.

Whilst Pompey made war about Judea, Ptolemæus (Auletes) maintained 8000 horsemen at his own charge, and feasted a thousand guests with so many golden drinking cups, always changing the cups, as they changed the dishes; as Varro relateth. [Plin. lib. 33.] to whom there was to be paid out of Egypt yearly the tribute of 12500 talents, as Cicero in an oration (which is lost) delivered. [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 799.] although Diodorus Siculus related that the revenue of Egypt at this time was but only 6000 talents.

Seleucus in Palestine was built by Pompey. [Appian, pag. 253.]

Pompey, having left the government of Cœcilyria, to Scæurus; from Euphrates as farre as the borders of Egypt, departed into Cilicia with two legions; carrying Aristobulus prisoner with him, with his two sonnes, and as many daughters: [Joseph, lib. 24. cap. 8.] one of which called Alexander in his journey, escaped by flight, but the younger called Antigonus with his sisters was carried to Rome. [Id. lib. bell. cap. 5. fin.]

Appian writes that Pompey left Syria, at his departure thence, to be governed by his Quæstor Scæurus: [in Syriacis, pag. 119. cum lib. 5. bell. civil. pag. 676, 677.] Josephus adds in lib. 1. bel. cap. 8. that he gave the government of Syria, and Judea, also to Scæurus. Ammianus Marcellinus also in lib. 14. affirmeth, that Pompey having conquered the Jews, and taken Hierusalem brought Palestine into the forme of a province, committing the jurisdiction thereof to a Governour. indeed Hyrcanus then retained the name of King, but without a crown: but such was the dullness of his wit, that the governours of Syria took the power to themselves, not only of ordering the tributes, but of disposing of all things at their own pleasure in Palestine, as we shall see hereafter in the government of Gabinius.

Cicero and Antonius being Consuls, on the 9 day before the calends of October was Octavius born, of Octavius and his wife Atia; (the sister of C. Julius Cæsar) [Sueton. in Octavio, cap. 4. 5.] who afterwards was called Cæsar Augustus. In whole reign our Lord Jesus Christ the Saviour of the World was born. [Luc. II. 1. 6, 7.] Julius Marathus reporteth, that a few months before Augustus was born, there happened at Rome a prodigy (or oracle) publicly knownen, whereby was declared that nature was about to bring forth a King over the people of Rome: at which the senate being affrighted made an act, that no mans child that was begotten that year, should be reared, but those whole wives were with child, (for every one was willing to draw this hope to himself, took order that this act should not be brought into the treasury, and then inrolled, [Sueton. ut supra, cap. 94.] concerning his birth day on the 9 of the Kalends of October, Augustus himself agrees with Suetonius in an epistle to his nephew Caius. [Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 7.] the new Kalender [in Scripionibus Græcorum CXXXIII.] and the Nabon bone. [ibid. pag. CXXXIX.] Dion also not dissenting who in the 56 book saith that he was born on the 23 of September: for in the Julian September of 30 daies, the IX of the Kalends of October which is the 23 of September, although in the Pompeian September which hath but 29 daies it is the 22 of the same month; but September, as the year was (before the correction appointed by Julius Cæsar) at Rome, it fell in June of the Julian period 4651.)

Catalinus conspiracy breaking forth at Rome, Q. Martius Rex, and Q. Metellus Creticus both of them were generals in the City, and both of them hindered from triumphing umprying by the false accusation of some few, whose custome it was to set to sale all things both honestly, and dishonestly. [Salust. in conjuration. Catalinæ.]

The Philadelphenses reckon their yeares from the second year of the CLXXIX Olympiade. [Fasti Siculi] this Philadelphia is not farre from Judea: of which Josephus, [lib. 1. bell. cap. 5. and Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 760 & 763.] where he notes that about it the receptacles of the thieves were this year taken away by Pompey, which perhaps was the cause of the first institution of this Epoch.

Pompey, marching about the rest of Cilicia, which did not acknowledge the Roman power, subdued it to the Roman without a blow. [Appian, pag. 244.] except that part that was possessed by the Eleuthero-Cilices, whose town being feared in the mountain Amanus, were afterwards conquered by Cicero the Proconsul of Syria.

Pharnaces sent to Pompey, the body of his father Mithridates done up in brins, yielding up to him both himself and his Kingdom: [Dio, lib. 37.] Appian writes that he sent it to Pompey to Synope in a gally; and also those that had taken Manius (Aquilius) and many hostages both of Grecians, and Barbarians: and that he desired, that he might hold either his fathers Kingdom, or the Bosporan only, which his brother Machan, had received from Mithridates. Plutarch saith that Pompey, when he came to Amilius, that he found many gifts brought from Pharnaces, and many of the royall family, and also the corse of Mithridates, not very well known by his face, but was known by the scars, by them who desired to see that fight, for Pompey would not see it, but sent it to Synope.

For Pompey thinking that all hostility was extinct with his life; wreaked not any malice upon the dead body, but commanded it to be buried in the sepulchre of his fathers. [Dio, lib. 37.] he delivered therefore the body over to them, that should take care of it, and defraying the charges, he commanded it should be royally interred at Synope, and withall commended him for the excellency of his doings, as the most famous King of his age. [Appian, pag. 250.]

Pompey admitted the wonderful rich apparel, and armes he wore: but Publius stole the scabbard of his sword, which cost 4000 talents, and told it to Apollonius, Caius the foster-brother of Mithridates, gave privately Mithridates had of wonderful workmanship, to Faustus the sonne of Sylla who begged it of him, without Pompeys privity but Pharnaces when he afterwards understood of it, punished those that had imbezzled those things. [Plutarch.]

Pompey inrolled Pharnaces and Castor Phanagoneis among the friends and allies of the people of Rome, [Appian, pag. 251. Dio, lib. 37.] and also gave the Kingdom of Bosporus to Pharnaces, because he had freed Italy from many difficulties; except the Phanagorenses to whom he granted liberty because they first of all troubled Mithridates by revolting from him, both as he was gathering up again his Forces, and when he had an army and fleet, and thus by giving example to others, were the cause of his destruction. [Appian, pag. 250.] But after the departure of Pompey, Pharnaces assailed the Phanagorenses and their neighbours, until that thorough famine they were forced to come out and fight with him, and so were overcome; whom without doing any more hurt unto them, he received into friendship with him, only taking hostages of them. [Appian, pag. 253, 254.]

Pompey recovered Castles in Pontus, the delivery up of which those that were in garison thought to defer till his coming before them; fearing, lest the treasure that was committed to their charge, others might take away, and lay the fault upon them. [Dio, lib. 37.] In Talaura, which City Mithridates used as a Wardrobe, were found 2000 cups of Onix stone, made and fastened together with gold, many cups all for hot and cold drinks, beds, chairs, all most splendid; bridles for horses, and trappings for beasts and shoulders, all beset with gold and precious stones: in the receiving and reckoning of which, the Treasurer spent thirty dayes; part of them came from Darius the sonne of Hyllaspes to his successors from hand to hand: part of them Cleopatra had deposited with the Coans and were of the treasure of the Ptolemaean Kings, which Mithridates had carried from thence, they being delivered him by the Cretians; part the King himself had prepared and got together, being extremely desirous of rich household-stuffs. [Appian, pag. 251, 252.]

At Rome at the time of the chusing Consuls, Cicero the Consul spake an oration for Murena, who was chosen Consul for the following year, and was accused for unlawfull bribing for the office, in which he saith that the army of L. Lucullus, which were come to his triumph, came to aid Murena in demanding the Consulship; of which triumph Cicero in his Lucullus thus maketh mention. When returned Conqueror from the Mithridaticke war, he triumphed three years later than he ought to have done, through the false accusations of his enemies: for we that are Consuls, were almost faine to bring in the chariots of that famous man into the city, for C. Mummius had set the people of Rome against him, as if he had imbezzled much of the spoiles, and had protracted the war, and so perwaded the people that they should deny him his Triumph, but the noblemen, and those that were most in authority, intermeddling themselves with the tribes, they intreated so much by fair and persuasion, that at last they brought them to yield unto his Triumph, [Plutarch, in Lucullus.]

He made his Triumphant entry not troublesome for the long shew thereof, nor for the multitude of things that he brought thither, as many Captains had done before him; but he furnished the shew place (called Circus Flaminius) with the enemies weapons, of which there was great store, and with the Kings battering Engines, which was a pleasant sight to behold: and in their Triumph there was a certain company of men bravely armed, ten Chariots with Sithes, and 60 friends and Captains of the two Kings, and 110 long ships armed on, their beaks drawn all after them; a Statue of Mithridates of six foot high all of gold, and a Target set with precious stones: the Crown also of Tigranes was taken, and carried in Triumph: twenty cupboards of silver plate, of golden vessels and armour and coins 32. These were carried upon mens shoulders; eight mules golden beds, 56 carried silver bullion, and 107 that carried silver coins, little less than 2700000 Drachmes. Moreover, there were books of accounts carried, what money he had given to Pompey, and the treasures for the war against the Pirates, besides what he had given to his own Souldiers, which was 950 Drachmes a piece, and then he feasted all the Cities and Villages thereabouts. [Id. ibid.]

After the Triumph, and an account given of the Mithridatick war, he fell to a manner of living far more magnificent, than stood with the ancient temperance, and was the first among the Romans that brought in all manner of delicacies, after he had received the riches of the two Kings, Tigranes and Mithridates. [Nicolaus Damascus, Historiæ lib. 27. apud Athenæum, lib. 6. cap. ult. & lib. 12. cap. 21.] Velleius Paternulus also confirmeth, that he was the first that brought in the profuse luxury in buildings, dyer, and household-stuff. [Id. 2. cap. 33.]

Pompey rebuilt Eupatoria, which Mithridates Eupator had built, and so called from his own name, and destroyed it again, because it enervated the Romans: Pompey gave to it both lands and inhabitants, and called it Magnopolis. [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 556. Appian, pag. 251.] He adorned Cabira in the forme of a City, and called it Diopolis. [Strabo, ibid. pag. 557.] He appointed Laws and Statutes for the Bythinians, and them of Pontus: of which Pliny the Prætor of Bythinia makes mention in his Epistle to Trajan. [Id. 10.]

Pompey marched out of Pontus into Asia (properly so called) and wintered at Ephesus. [Dio, lib. 37.] and when he had finished all both by sea and land, yet he commanded the Cities of Asia to furnish him with a Fleet, equivalent to the price or rate of L. Sylla's imposition which he described. [Cicero pro Flacco.]

L. Valerius Flaccus, who in the former year was Prætor at Rome, was this year Prætor of Asia. [Id. ibid.]

About the end of winter, Pompey distributeth rewards to his conquering army to every one 1500 Attic Drachmes, [Plutarch confirmeth that he that had received least, received so many] and to the Tribunes and Centurions proportionable to their dignity; which sum of money they reckon to be 16000 talents. [Appian, pag. 252.] to the Lieutenants and Questors that defended the sea coast 2000 sesterium, to each of the Souldiers fifty, as we read in Pliny, [lib. 37. cap. 2.] if that place be perfect.

D. Julius Silanus, and L. Murena being Consuls, Metellus triumphed over Crete, [Eutrop, lib. 6.] and indeed upon the Kalends of June, (for as much as can be gathered from the fragments of the triumphal marbles) which fell at that time in the Julian March: but the chief ornament of the Triumph, Pompey drew from him, which was the captive Captains. [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 40.] for he took from him Laithenes and Panares, by the aide of one of the common people, being perwaded therunto, [Dio, lib. 36.] but yet the Triumph of Lucullus and Metellus were much favoured by every good man, both through their own virtue, and especially in envy to Pompey. [Vellei. ut supra, cap. 34.] Appian also makes mention of the Triumph of Metellus Creticus. [Legat. 30.]

When Cato came to Ephesus to salute Pompey, as one that was elder and greater in dignity than he, Pompey seeing him come, would not suffer him to come to him, as he late in his seat, but went to meet him as one of the chiefest noble men, and took him by the hand; embracing and saluting him, commended him in the presence of all men, both before his face, and when he was gone from him: but yet was glad when he was gone, as though he could not command freely in his presence; and also commended to him the care of his wife and children, which he never did to any almost that failed to Rome, though indeed Cato was allied to them. [Plut. in Cato minor.]

Pompey

Pompey, after he had partly by war overcome many Princes and Kings, and partly allied them to him by firm conditions of peace, and had taken not lesse than 900 Cities, and reformed 39 Cities that were either ruined or destroyed in war (as was Mazæa the head City of Cappadocia) and had increased eight Cities and Countries with Colonies, and had instructed the greatest part of the Nations thorough the Continent of Asia that belonged to the Romans in his own laws, and ordained a Commonwealth for them: then at length he set sail from Ephesus, and went towards Italy, in very great pomp, thorough Islands, and Greece, [Dio, lib. 37. Appian, pag. 251. Plutarch, in Pompei.]

When Pompey was come to Lesbos, he released the City of all taxes in favour of Theophanes, [Plutarch, ibid.] for the Mitylenians had delivered Marius Aquilius and others prisoners; to whom liberty was restored by Pompey in favour onely of Theophanes, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 18.] This was Balbus Cornelius Theophanes a Mitylenian, a Writer of Pompeys Acts: whom he esteemed one of his most intimate friends, and made him a Citizen of Rome in the face of the whole army: to whom also the Grecian flattery when he was dead, bestowed divine honours, [Cicero, pro Archia poeta, Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 617. Valerius Maximus, lib. 8. cap. 14. Cornel. Tacitus, lib. 6. Annal. cap. 1. Julius Capitolinus, in Maximo & Balbino.]

At Mitylene Pompey beheld the poets play their prizes, where the only subject was his own acts and deeds: he was much delighted with the theatre, and drew a map and models of it, that he might make the like at Rome; but greater and more magnificent. [Plutarch.]

When he came to Rhodes, he heard the Sophisters dispute, and gave to each of them a talent. Posidonius hath written the disputation he made before Pompey, against Hermagoras the Rhetorician: of the general question. [Id.] but Pompey as he was about to go into Posidonius his house, forbade his Licitor (as the manner was) to knock at the door, and he himself laid down the Licitors rod, at the door, to whom both the cast and the west submitted. [Pliny, lib. 7. cap. 20.] concerning whole meeting Cicero thus relates in the second book of Tusculane questions, out of Pompeys owne mouth. I have often seen Posidonius my self, but I will tell you, what Pompey was wont often to declare unto me: that as he came one of Syria, and was come to Rhodes, he had a mind to hear Posidonius, but when he heard he was very sick, and in great pain with the gout, yet he would needs see that famous Philosopher, who when he had seen him and saluted him, and long given him very great compliments, he told him, that he was very sorry that he could not hear him; but you may saith he, neither will I suffer that the paine of my body, shall frustrate the coming of so great a man to me: So he told me, that the Philosopher disputed very gravely and fully concerning this subject, That there was nothing good, but what was honest; and whereas he was all on fire as it were with paine, as if so many torches had been put to him, he often said in paine, all thou dost is nothing; although thou art troublesome, yet I will never confess thou art evil. Some also say, that Pompey came to Rhodes at what time he went to the Mithridatick War, and being presently to march against Mithridates, then to have discomfited with Posidonius, and in his departure to have asked him if he would command him any thing, and that Posidonius should repeat that Verse in Homer, Αἰὲς ἀεὶ σέθεν, ὅστις ἐχὼρ ἡμεῖς ἀνδρῶν.

Rem gere præclarè, neque alius præstare memento.

Act nobly, and remember to excell.

as it is in Strabo, [lib. 14. pag. 492.]

Valerius Flaccus being Prætor, commanded the Cities of Asia to furnish him with money and Mariners for a Fleet, but fewer ships by half than Pompey used. This Fleet he divided into two Squadrons, that one should sail above Ephesus, and the other beneath; in which Fleet M. Crassus sailed from Æsus, (in Thrace) into Asia, and Placcus out of Asia into Macedonia; and whereas every year Gold was wont to be exported (in the name of the Jews) out of Italy, and all the Roman provinces to Jerusalem: Flaccus commanded by a decree, that none should be exported out of Asia: whereupon there was apprehended at Apamea, and weighed before the Prætor himself in the Court by Sext. Coelius a Roman Knight, not lesse than a 100 pound weight of Gold at Laodicea; more than twenty pound weight by L. Peducius, at Adramum by the Lieutenant Cn. Domitius, at Pergamus not much; and this Gold was laid up in the Treasury. These things are mentioned in his Oration for him, and defended.

Scaurus, who was left President of Syria by Pompey, marched into Arabia, but by the difficulty of the place could not come as far as Petra: but yet he waited the Country country round about: although he himself endured much evil, for his army was afflicted with famine; although Hyrcanus by Antipater's means supplied him with corn, and other necessities out of Judea. Antipater also was sent as Ambassador from Scarus, to Aretas, because he was his very familiar friend, to persuade him that by disbursing a summe of money, he might redeem his country from harralshing; who engaged unto him for 300 talents; and upon this condition the war was ended, notwithstanding the good liking of Scarus, than of Aretas. [Joseph, lib. 1. b. 1. cap. 6. & lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 3.] hereupon Scarus called a silver coin to be stamped in his Adulphus on the one side of which, a King clad in a barbarous habit, kneeled before him, who had on him a loose coat and hose, and presented a crown unto him that was carried on a camel's back; with these letters written about M. SCAVRVS & D. CVR. EX. S. C. M. Scarus Curule Adle by the decree of the Senate; and beneath: REX ARETAS, King Aretas. [Pighius his Annals. Roman. tom. 3. pag. 342. 362.]

When as Pompey had sent his Lieutenant Pilo to demand the Consulship; the Romans both deferred the comitia till his coming, and chose Pilo, who was there present, Consul, with a general content; this commendation of Pilo by Pompey for him, wrought not only upon friends, but also with enemies; for they were all in a general fear of Pompey, before he had dismissed his army. [Dio. lib. 37.]

About the happening of Pilo his Consulship, (in the Julian November) Pompey came into Italy, as may be understood out of Cicero, [lib. 1. ad Atticum. epist. 9. & 12.] and whereas it was feared that he would not come without his army, and that he would regulate the public liberty after his own pleasure, and that he would make himself Lord of all Italy, and all the power of the Romans; as soon as he came to Brundisium, he of his own accord, discharged all his forces, before there came to him any decree either from the Senate, or people; [Valle. Paterni, lib. 2. cap. 40. Plin. Appian. Dio.] Plutarch saith, that Pompey when he thus kindly discharged his soldiers, commanded them to meet him again at his triumph: but Dio affirmeth, that he did not so much as intend to use them at his triumph: [lib. 37.]

In an oration at Rome, Pompey declared that he had made war in the East with 22 Kings, [Orof. lib. 6. cap. 6.] and that when he received Asia, it was the utmost province, but now when he restored it to his Country again it was the middlemost. [Pliny, lib. 7. cap. 26. Florus lib. 3. cap. 5.]

Q. Tullius Cicero, the younger brother of Marcus, was chosen Prætor by lot over Asia, and succeeded L. Valerius Flaccus. [Ad. Cicero, in orat. pro Flacco, & lib. 1. epist. ad Attic.]

When he was to go into his province, he had a great mind that T. Pomponius Atticus his wives brother should go with him as his Lieutenant: but he thought it not becoming him, that would not be Prætor to be a servant of the Prætor, [Cornel. Nepos in vita Attic.] which Quintus took very ill. [M. Cicero, lib. Epist. 14. ad Atticum]

P. Claudius, both for the revolt of Nisibis, and because that in woman's habit, he had entered into a temple, into which it was not lawful for a man to enter, and because he had defiled the wife of Metellus the high præsit, and of C. Cæsar, and had had to do with his own sister, being accused, lay, for these things, was quitted by the Judges who were bribed with money. [Cicero, lib. 1. epist. 13. ad Atticum. Liv. lib. 103. Plin. in Cicero. Dio. lib. 37.]

Cicero, writes to Atticus that he had taken from the Consul Pilo, Syria that was promised unto him, [lib. 1. epist. 13.] wherefore Marcus Philippus who had been Prætor, was sent successor to Scarus; who was left in Syria by Pompey: who skirmished with the Arabians who lived near there and invaded Syria. [Appian. in Syriac. pag. 119. & 120.]

In the ninth year of the preihood and principality of Hyrcanus (to wit, from the death of his mother Alexandra; before Gabinius took the principality from her) in the month Panemus or June, that decree of the Athenians, in the honour of Hyrcanus seemeth to be published, which is extant in the lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 16. of Josephus: although he refers that note of time to a preceding decree of the Roman Senate: which was set forth, both in the time of the former Hyrcanus the sonne of Simon, and upon the Ides of December, as we have shewen, at the year of the Julian period 4587. But this decree made in the honour of Hyrcanus the second sonne of Alexander was written on the XI day of Munychion Attic, (about the 28 day of the Julian April:) by Euclis the sonne of Menander the Almulian, being secretary, and delivered to the governors on the 21 day of the Macedonian Panemus, or the XXVII day, (answering to the XX day of the Julian June) Agathocle being Prætor at Athens: as we have shewen in the first chapter of the book; concerning the solar year of the Macedonians and Athenians.

Q. Cicero, first of all called the cities of Asia, of the charge of providing mariners, and and a Fleet, [M. Tullius, in Orat. pro Flacco.] and restored many Cities that were almost deserted; as Samos for one, a most noble City of Ionia, and another, Halicarnassus, a City of Caria, [Id. lib. 1. epist. 1. & Quintum Fraxum.]

Pompey deferred his Triumph till his birth day, which he did on the third, and the day before the Kalends, of October (which was his birth day, falling then either in July or June of the Julian account.) M. Metella, and M. Pilo, being Consuls; as may be gathered from the Marble Fragments of the Triumphal Records, but more fully out of the Records of the Triumphs of Pompey himself, mentioned by Pliny, [lib. 7. cap. 26. & lib. 37. cap. 2.] and although he had a most magnificent Triumph of 10 many Kings for two days together, [as it is in Valle. Paterni, lib. 2. cap. 40. & Appian. in Asphridanica.] Although this Triumph lasted two whole days, yet was not the greatest of it fully shewed, as Plutarch saith for a great part of the preparation, which would have served to furnish another Triumph was not seen.

They who strive to compare Pompey in all things with Alexander the Great, will needs have him not to be full 34 years old; whereas in truth he was 49, if we believe Plutarch; and indeed Pompey himself, even from his youth, by the talk of his flatterers, believing that himself was like Alexander, he imitated both his actions and counsels, [Salust. Historiar. lib. 3. apud Nonium Marcellum, in voc. Emulus.] But Velleius very elegantly observes, that they were too much biased about the age of that great man, [lib. 2. cap. 56.] who were deceived, in the account full five years: whereas the setting right of these things was so easy from the Consulships of C. Cælius, and Quintus Servilius: Which fault Plutarch fell upon, whilst he corrected others: whilst he now saith, that Pompey was but 40 years old, when as indeed he was 45.

Pompey made his full Triumph over Africa, the second over Europe, the third over Asia, and lo made the three parts of the World, to many Monuments of his Victory, [Valle. Paterni, lib. 2. cap. 40. Plutarch in Pompey.] Whereupon this great Triumph was called The Triumph of the whole World, [Dio. lib. 37.] He was here by the whole Assembly lauded by the surname of Great, [Liv. lib. 103.] with which surname, given long ago by the people he was contented, although by his famous deeds he might have received many new names, [Dio. ut supra.]

The preface of the Triumph (as it is described by Pliny, lib. 7. cap. 26. out of his own Records) was thus. When he had freed the sea coast from Pirates, and had restored the command of the sea to the people of Rome, he triumphed over Asia, Pontus, Armenia, Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Syria, Scythians, Jews, Albanians, Iberia, the Isle of Crete, Bactaria, and above all these, over the Kings, Mithridates and Tigranes: to which Plutarch adds, Media, Colchis, Mesopotamia, and Arabia; and Appian adds, the Heniochi, and Acheans.

Pompey brought 700 ships that were whole: there was a vast number of waggons that carried the armour, and also the beasts of thips: after these went a multitude of captives and pirates, not bound, but clad in their Country habits: Noble-men, and Captains, or sons of the Kings, partly captives, partly hostages, to the number of 324. went before him, who sat on a lofty Chariot, [Appian.]

Amongst these was Tigranes, the son of Tigranes, the King of Armenia, with his wife and daughters, and Zolime the wife of Tigranes himself: Moreover the sister and five sons of Mithridates [Antipater, Cyrus, Oxathres, Darius, Xerxes] and two daughters, Orlabaris, and Euparra: There was also led Oithaces the King of the Colchians, and Aristobolus the King of the Jews, and the Tyrants of the Cilicians: also some women of the Royal Family of the Scythians, three Commanders of the Iberians: two of the Albanians, with Menander of Laodicæ, who was General of Mithridates Horse: also the hostages of the Albanians and Iberians, and of the King of the Commagenians: also many other Trophies were carried, according to the number of battles, that either he or his Lieutenant had won in divers places, [Id. cum Plutarcho.]

The pictures of Tigranes and Mithridates though absent, were carried, and how they fought, how gave ground, how fled. The assailing also of Mithridates was represented, and how he secretly fled away by night: and last of all his death was represented to the eyes of the beholders, the Virgins also that were the companions of his death being likewise set out in pictures: there were carried also tables with the images of his sons and daughters that died before him, and the figures of the Barbarian gods in their own Country habits, [Appian.]

Pompey himself was carried in a Chariot let with precious stones, clad, as is reported, in the Coat of Alexander the great: there followed the Chariots the companions of this expedition, the Colonels both of Horse and Foot. [Id.]

The day before the Kalends of October, which was his birth day; he brought a pair of Tables with the men of two precious stones, three foot broad, and four long, in which was a golden Moon of 30 pound weight; three Parlour Tables, nine Cupboards boards of plate of gold and precious stones: three golden Images of Minerva, Mars, and Apollo: three Crowns set with pearls, a golden Mount square, portayed with Stags and Lions and fruits of all kinds, compassing about a golden Vine, (of which formerly, at the end of the year of the World 3939.) A Bower of pearls, upon the top of which was a Sun-dial. Pompey's own image of pearl. [Pliny, lib. 37. cap. 2.] Pompey also writes, that he carried trees in Triumph, namely the Elme tree, and the Balfome tree, which only groweth in Judea, [Id. lib. 12. cap. 4. & 25.]

There were also Carts, and other Vessels laden with gold, and diverse other Ornaments, among which was the bed of Darius the son of Hytaspes, and the Throne and Scepter of Mithridates Eupator, and a golden image of him, eight cubits to the breast, [Appian.] a silver Statue of Pharmaces, who first reigned in Pontus; and gold and silver Chariots, [Pliny, lib. 37. cap. 12.] and of silver coins 7000 Myriades, and 510 Drachmes, [Appian.] Moreover it was shewn in Tables, that all the tribute of the people of Rome was before but 5000 Myriades, but with these that he had gotten for the people of Rome, they now amounted to 8500 Myriades, [Plutarch.]

There was also carried a Table, containing a breviary of those things that Pompey had done in the East, inscribed with this Title: 860 ships with prows were taken: eight Cities built in Cappadocia, in Cilicia, and Cœlysyria 20, in Palestine Seleucus: Kings conquered, Tigranes the Armenian, Artoces the Iberian, Orozes the Albanian, Thus the Title, [Appian.] the like to which Pliny makes mention of, [lib. 7. cap. 26.] placed in the Temple of Minerva, and dedicated to the Epiles. Cn. Pompeius Magnus, Captain General, having finished a war of thirty years, having overthrown, routed, killed, and having badly yielded unto him, twenty one hundred eighty three thousand men, sunk and taken 846 ships, having had yielded unto him 1530 Towns and Castles, having conquered from the lake of Manis to the Red Sea, deservingly offers this vow to Minerva.

He brought into the publick treasury in plate, and in gold and silver coins 3000 talents, [Plutarch.] among other gifts that were dedicated by him in the Capitol, was the Cabinet of King Mithridates; as Varro and other Authors of that time confirm, which first of all inclined the Romans towards pearls and Jewels, [Pliny, lib. 37. cap. 1.] There also was dedicated all the most precious things of Mithridates, that were found in the new Cattle, [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 560, 557.] and that golden Vine that was brought out of Judea: [Id. in Josephus, lib. 14. cap. 5.] also six cups of the stone of Murtha, then first brought to Rome, which presently were commonly used, they being desirous to have plates and dishes of the same, [Pliny, lib. 37. cap. 2.]

When Pompey came triumphing into the Capitol, he put none of the captives to death, as those that had triumphed before him used to do; but paying their charges out of the publick money, sent every one home into his own Country, except those that were of royal extraction, [Appian.] For that which Appian adds, that Aristobolus was put to death, and after him Tigranes, appears to be false from this, that Aristobolus afterwards returned into his Country, Josephus and Dio confirm, and that Tigranes was kept in chains with Flavius a Senator, by the command of Pompey, and taken out of his custody by Clodius the Tribune of the people, which Africanus Pedianus confirms in his Commentary upon the Milonian Oration.

The Gazenes (being now freed from the command of the Jews) begin the account of their times from hence, [Fasii Siculi, anno. 4. Olymp. 179.] That the Gazenes began their year about the 27 day of the Julian October, we gather out of Marcus a Deacon of Gaza, in the life of Porphyry, a Bishop of Gaza;

That none should succeed Quintus Cicero in the Prætorship of Asia, his brother Marcus was the cause; as he himself in an Epistle to him shews: in which, among other things that were well done by him in the Province, he reckons this: That the thieves of the Mysians were taken away, and murders in many places suppressed, and that peace was settled through the whole Province, and not only the robberies and thieves of passengers, in the Countries, but more and greater in the Towns, [lib. 1. epist. 1. ad Quint. Fratr.]

When M. Cicero had sent a Commentary of his Consulship, written in Greek, to Rhodes to Posidonius (the Apamean) both a Philosopher and an Historian, that he should write concerning the same things in a better stile which when he had read, he wrote back to him, that he was not by this at all provoked to write, but that he was clearly afraid, [lib. 2. epist. 1. ad Atticum.]

Ptolemæus Auleus had a son born, he being grown old, which son succeeded him in his kingdom: so that he was not above 13 years old, when after the battle of Pharsalia, Pompey fled to him, as Dio observes in his 43 book.

Pompey demanded of the Senate, that all things that he had granted to Kings, Governours, and Cities, that the fathers would confirm, [Appian, Bell. Civil. lib. 2. pag. 432.]

Lucullus had at this time given himself over to enjoy his pleasure and riots: but being stirred up by the Senate, that he should use his authority to deal in matters of State, he presently set upon Pompey: [Plutarch in Pompeio.] therefore he and Metellus Creticus, having in mind the injury he had done them, and with them part also of the Nobility resented him, that those things that were either promised to Cities, or the rewards to them that had deserved evil of him, should not be disposed of after his own pleasure, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 40.] and Lucullus appointed, that Pompey should propose to the Senate particularly concerning all his acts; and not demand that they should be all approved in a lump, for otherwise he said it would be unjust, to approve all his acts simply, before they knew what they were; as if they had been done by some Lord. And whereas he had disannulled some of Lucullus's acts: he demanded, That both their acts should be proposed in the Senate, that it might confirm either of them that were worthy of approbation, Cato, and Metellus Celer the Consul, and others that were of the same opinion, earnestly defended Lucullus, [Dio, lib. 37.] He bragging also, that the victory over Mithridates belonged to him, drew Crassus also to his party, [Appian, Bell. Civil. lib. 2. pag. 432, 433.] and thereupon obtained a confirmation of his decrees, which Pompey had disannulled, [Plutarch in Pompeio.] but overthrew all the constitutions that Pompey had made after he had overcome the Kings, and whereas he had demanded that lands might be divided among his Souldiers, Lucullus hindered it by the assistance of Cato, [Id. in Lucullo.]

Pompey being thus turmoiled in the Senate, was compelled to fly unto the Tribunes of the people, [Plutarch in Pompeio.] and seeing that L. Flavius the Tribune, who had demanded that grounds might be divided to Pompey's Souldiers: also added this to it, That all the Citizens might give their voices, that by this means this might be the easier granted; and also that all Pompey's acts might be confirmed: but Metellus the Consul so eagerly withstood it, that he was carried to prison by the Tribune. Notwithstanding, the Consul resolutely persisted in his opinion, as also did others, so that Pompey was fain at length to give over his demand; now too late repenting, that he had discharged his Souldiers, and expelled himself to the injuries of his enemies, [Dio, lib. 37.]

In the mean while, C. Julius Cæsar came to Rome to demand the Consulship: him Pompey joyned with him as a companion, (wearing unto him, that he would do his endeavour, that he should be made Consul: for by this means he hoped that now at length his acts, which he had made in the provinces beyond the seas, which so many withstood, should be confirmed by Cæsar being now Consul, and whereas Pompey and Crassus were at great odds ever since the Consulship that they had borne together with very great dissention; he not only reconciled them among themselves, but entered into a Society with them both, upon this contract, That nothing should be done in the common wealth, which displeased either of the three, which conspiracy was destructive to the City, and all the world besides, and at length to themselves also, [Liv. lib. 103. Vellei Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 44. Sueton. in Julio Cæsar, cap. 19. Plutarch. in Lucul. Cæsar. Pomp. Cæsar. Appian, bell. civil. lib. 2. Dio, lib. 37.]

This conspiracy of the three principal men of the city, Varro the most noble writer of this time, comprised in one book, and called it triacus vno, or three headed, [Appian, pag. 433.] Africanus Pollio also began to write his history of the civil war, from the same, which was made in the Consulship of Metellus Celer, as Horace [in lib. 2. carm. ode. 1.] and his interpreters Acron and Porphyrio confirm, for neither (as many thought) the dissention of Cæsar, and Pompey brought in the civil wars, but their agreement rather conspiring together to root out the nobility first, and then falling at odds among themselves, [Plin. in C. Cæsar.]

In this very year, in which the CLXXX Olympiads was solemnized, and Herodes, (another besides that Herod of Athens, of whom Pausanias and A. Gellius mention as the famousst man of his time) was Prætor in Athens, Diodorus Siculus begins the history of Cæsar's affairs who also in that year sheweth that he travelled over Egypt, in the reign of Ptolemæus, who was called Πτολεμαῖος, or new Bacchus, [Bibliothec. historiar. lib. 1. part. 1. & 2.]

There was a third year added to the Prætorship of Quintus Cicero in Asia; although Suetonius saith, that he governed the proconulate of Asia little to his credit: [In Octavio Augusto, cap. 3.] whereupon in this year there was written an excellent epistle by Marcus Cicero concerning the well governing of a common wealth, which is read in the first place among those that were written to his brother Quintus.

The Senate lent Lentulus Marcellinus one that had been Prætor to succeed Marcus Philippus in the government of Syria, to 3000 talents, τακτα δυνάμις ἀποδοῖν ἀποδοῖ, 700000000 ἡλικίας ἑξήκοντα ἔτος ἀποκρίνεται, faith Appian in Syriaci, by each of them (to wit, severally not jointly) there was spent two years space, in fighting with the Arabians, who bordered upon them in those their Country.

Julius Cæsar the Consul, confirmed all Pompey's Acts as he had promised him, without any gaiting of Lucullus or any one else. [Appian, Bell. civil. lib. 2. pag. 435. D. o. lib. 38.]

Pompey also obtained, that the Senate should not confirm those honours that Lucullus had promised to some of Pontus; laying, it was unjust, that another having finished the war, the distribution of Rewards and Honours should be put in the power of another. [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 558.] and having filled the City with arms and soldiers, he expelled Cato and Lucullus out of the Market-place, and also confirmed his Acts by violence and force. [Plutarch, in Pomp. & Lucullus.]

Suetonius writes, that Cæsar in his first Consulship, let to sale societies and kingdoms, [cap. 54.] as who, for example, took from Ptolemei alone, 6000 talents in the name of himself and Pompey: and Dio relates, [lib. 39.] that Ptolemei (Auletes) spent vast sums of money upon certain Romans, both of his own and what he borrowed, that by them the kingdom of Egypt might be confirmed upon him, and that he might be called their friend and ally. And Plutarch in the life of Cæsar relates, that Auletes owed to Cæsar 1750 Myriads, a thousand whereof, when he came into Egypt, after Pompey was killed, he exacted, and the rest he had forgiven to Auletes his children.

And in this year, in which Cæsar was first time Consul, Cæsar himself, in the third Commentary of the Civil War, sheweth, that Auletes by a law and a decree of the Senate, was taken into the alliance of the people of Rome; and that he obtained this honour from the Senate, before the proscription of his brother Ptolemei Cyrius, (which was the year following) Cicero confirmeth in the Section Oration, who also is to be consulted with, [in lib. 2. ad Atticum, epist. 16.]

C. Antonius, was condemned, Cicero in vain (who was his Collogue in the Consulship) defending him, [Dio, lib. 38.] who living a banished man in Cephalonia, and having all the Island under his command as his own possession, began to build a City, but did not finish it, [Strabo, lib. 10. pag. 455.]

It is decreed that P. Clodius should go Embassador to Tigranes the King of Armenia; which when he contemned, he was made of a Patrician a Plebeian by adoption; that by that means he might be chosen Tribune of the people, [Cicero, lib. 2. ad Attic. epist. 7. & Orat. pro domo sua, Dio, lib. 38.]

Brithagoras a man of great authority among the Hæcælenes of Pontus, with his son Propylus went unto Julius Cæsar: and having insinuated himself into his friendship, followed him up and down thorough all lands for 12 years together, only that he might do good to his fellow Citizens. [Memnon, cap. 26.]

P. Clodius, being now made Tribune of the people, that he might draw the new Consuls to his party, he decreed unto them large provinces: To Gabinus, Syria with Babylon and Persia; to Piso, Achaia, Thracia, Macedonia, and all Bœotia, [Cicero, pro Sextio, pro domo sua, de provinciis consularibus, Plutarch, in Cicrone.]

Q. Cicero, when he had governed Asia three years, departed out of the province, as in his Epistles [lib. 2. ad familiar. epist. 15. & lib. 6. ad Attic. epist. 6.] his brother Marcus confirmeth; who being then in exile in Thessalonica, thus writeth to Atticus concerning his brother's voyage, [lib. 3. ep. 9.] My brother Quintus when he had departed out of Asia, before the Kalends of May, (about the end of the Julian February) and was come to Athens on the Ides, he was forced to make haste, lest that there might happen some more calamity in his absence, if perchance any one should not be content with the ill we suffer already; wherefore I had rather he should make haste to Rome, than come to me.

By a tribunial law of P. Clodius, the priest of Cybele in Pessinusa City of Phrygia is dispossessed of his priesthood; and Brogitarus a Gallogæzian (who is thought to be that Bogodiatrus, to whom, as Strabo writes, Pompey gave Mitridatium, having taken it away from Pontus, [lib. 12. pag. 567.] a wicked man, was desirous of it, not for the reverence to the Temple, but for violence sake, he having bought it with a great sum of money by his Embassadors of Clodius, was substituted in his room: and whereas the priests of Pessinus in ancient time had been petty kings, (as Strabo shews in the same place) by the same tribunial law, not only Dejotarus, was often thought worthy of that name by the Senate; but also his son in law Brogitarus, who had never demanded it of the Senate, but only had agreed with Clodius for so much money to be paid him by bond, was ordained to be called King: but Dejotarus received that part of the law that agreed with the Senate, that he should be a King, without giving any money to Clodius; and preserved Pessinus in their ancient Religion: and had rather that his son in law should enjoy the title by the gift of Clodius, than that that the Temple should want her ancient religion. [Cicero de Aruspiciis respons. & pro Sextio.]

The lame Clodius also, that he might be revenged of Ptolemæus the King of Cyprus, the brother of Auletes, the King of Alexandria (and it we believe Velleius Paternulus, most like him in all his vicious courses of life) because he had formerly neglected him when he was taken by Pirates even when he lived quietly, and enjoyed his ease, and without shewing any cause or mentioning any wrong he had done, preferred a law, for reducing of his kingdom into the form of a province; and for the confiscation of his money and goods, and sent M. Cato out of the Commonwealth, under a Title of most honourable charge: and preferred a law also, that he, though against his will, should be sent into Cyprus, to command there with pretorian power, and had a Quæstor also allowed him. [Cicero, pro Sextio, & pro domo sua, Livy, lib. 104. Florus, lib. 3. cap. 9. Plutarch in Cætone minore, Strabo, lib. 24. pag. 684. Vellei. Paternuli, lib. 2. cap. 45. Appian, Bell. civil. lib. 2. pag. 541. Dio, lib. 38.] concerning whom, Cicero in his Oration for Publius Sextius, speaks thus, That miserable Cyrius, who was always an ally, was always a friend, concerning whom there was never so much as the least suspicion brought against him, either to the Senate, or our Generals, (as they say) lives to see himself, his very men and cloaths confiscated. Behold, why should other Kings think their fortune stable, seeing by this wicked example of that lamentable year, they may see themselves as one Tribune, and six hundred Artificers, strip of all their fortunes and all their kingdom. Whereupon also Ammianus Marcellinus [lib. 14.] is not ashamed to say, That the people of Rome invaded that Island, rather through covetousness (by reason of the want of money in their Treasury) than justice. And Sextus Rufus in his breviary, That the poverty of the people of Rome, and scarcity of money in the Treasury, provoked them to seize upon that Island that was so famous for its riches, so that they got the command of it more covetously than justly.

Tigranes, the son of Tigranes, a King and an enemy, was as yet kept prisoner by Pompey's command, at L. Flavius his house, who was Prætor, Clodius, the Tribune of the people, being bribed with money, desired of Flavius, that he would give him leave to sup with them, that he might see him; who being brought, he feasted him, and taking him out of prison, let him go free: neither would render him again at Pompey's demand. And when he had taken shipping and was fled, he was driven back by a tempest. Clodius the Tribune sent Sextus Clodius, to bring him unto him. Flavius also, as soon as he heard of it, went to apprehend him; within four mile of the City they fell to scuffling, many are slain on both sides, but more on Flavius party: amongst whom was Papirius a Roman Knight, a Politician, and very familiar friend of Pompey's. Flavius, without any companion, hardly escaped to Rome. Clodius the Tribune, contumeliously used Pompey and Gabinus that took this outrageous ill, and beat and wounded their fellows, and brake Gabinus, the Consul's bundle of rods; and confiscated his goods. [Cicero, pro domo sua, Ascon. Pedian, in Orat. Milonianum, Plutarch in Pompeio, & Dio, lib. 38.]

Piso and Gabinus, the Consuls, expelled Syrius and Isis and Harpocrates, with Cynoccephalus, forbidding them the Capitol, and overthrow their Altars, restraining the vices of their filthy and idle superstitions. [Terullian, in Apologetico.]

Ptolemæus Auletes, being commanded by the Egyptians, to demand of the Romans, the Island of Cyprus, or else to renounce their alliance, did not consent; and indeed he incurred their hatred, both for this cause, and for the great taxes he laid upon the Egyptians, that he might pay the debt; that he had contracted for the purchasing of the Romans alliance. Wherefore, when he neither could persuade them to be quiet, nor could compell them by force; (for he had no hired Soldiers) he fled out of Egypt, and sailed to Rome. [Livy, lib. 104. Dio, lib. 39.] that Cæsar and Pompey might with their army restore him again. [Plutarch in Cætone minore.] But Timagenes (who under Augustus his reign, wrote some Histories out of whom Seneca, [lib. 3. de ira. cap. 23.] affirmeth, that Ptolemæus departed the kingdom without any good cause, or that he was compelled by any necessity; and that he left Egypt by the persuasion of Theophrastus, because he would give Pompey occasion to get money, and of making new wars. [Id. in Pomp.]

Cato going to the expedition of Cyprus, Clodius the Tribune allowed him neither ships, nor soldiers, nor servants, to go with him, only two Secretaries, whereof one was an arrant thief, and the other a client of Clodius; and as if the business of Cyprus had been but a light matter, he commanded him to restore the exiles of Byzantium, endeavouring to keep him from Rome as long as possibly he could. [Id. in Cætone minore.]

Cato by his friend Canidius, whom he sent before him into Cyprus, tampered with Ptolemæus, that he should yield, without any fighting: putting him in hope, that he should should neither live poorly, nor in contempt, and that the people would give him the pre-eminence of Paphian Venus, Cato in the mean while staid at Rhodes, both for making preparation, and to tarry for an answer. [Id. ibid.] but Ptolemy, when he perceived what was decreed against him, and neither durst take up arms against the Romans, neither did he think he could live, if he were outed out of his Kingdom: he therefore put all his treasure into shipping, and took sea, that by his Kingdome: but seeing he could not endure to sink his gold and silver, he carried home again the reward of his own death, and by drinking poison, ended his life: by his Title King of the Island, but in his mind a miserable slave to his money. [Id. ibid. Florus, lib. 3. cap. 9. Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 684. Pellerin, lib. 2. cap. 45. Valer. Maxim. lib. 9. cap. 14. Appian, Bell. Civil. lib. 2. pag. 441. Dio. lib. 39. Antonian. Marcellin. lib. 14. Sexius Rufus, in Breviario.]

Ptolemy Auletes failing to Rome, when he had arrived at Rhodes, and then had a mind to meet Cato: he sent unto him, hoping that he would come unto him: but he sent to Ptolemy, and told him, That if he had a mind to see him, he should come unto him. After he was come, he neither went to meet him, nor rode from his seat, but saluted him as one of the common people, and bad him sit down. At first it amazed him, and he wondered to see such a superciliousness and severity in one that had so simple and mean a train. When they began to talk of his business, Cato accused him of folly; that leaving his own felicity, he had subjected himself to such dishonour, such great pains, and all to satisfy the covetousness of the chief men of Rome, which he could never do, if all the Kingdom of Egypt were coined into silver. Wherefore he counselled him to return with his Navy, and to reconcile himself to his subjects: offering himself also to go along with him, and to help him to be reconciled. The King being as it were recovered from his madness and folly, by this speech, when he perceived the truth, and Cato's wisdom, intended to follow his advice. But being again turned from this by his friends, as soon as he came to Rome, and was tain to wait at the Magistrates gates, he began to bewail his inconsiderate enterprise, and that he had scorned the divine oracles of such a great man, [Plutarch in Catoe minore.] but his coming on the other side, wrought to much trouble to the Romans afterwards, that Crassus (as Cicero saith in his oration for Caelius) used that speech of the Tragedian: Utinam ne in monte Pelo.

The Alexandrians, seeing they knew not of Ptolemy his voyage into Italy, supposed he was dead, they set over the Kingdom to his daughter Berenice, which was legitimate, together with her elder sister Tryphæna (which was elder than Cleopatra) [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 796. Dio, lib. 39. Porphyrius in Græc. Eusebian. Scaligeri pag. 216.] and sent Menelaus Lampon, and Callimachus, to Antiochus Pius, (or Asiaticus rather his spouse, whom Pompey had disposed of his Kingdom) that he would receive together with the women, but he being taken with a sickness, died. [Porphyrius ibid. pag. 217.]

Both the Consuls in their souldiers coats, went into the provinces, Piso into Macedonia, and Gabinus into Syria: the people following them with their curies, [Cicero pro Sextio, & in L. Pison.] and when Gabinus was about to set saile in Syria, he invited Antonius (who was afterwards Triumvir) to go along with him to the wars which he refused to do as a private souldier, whereupon he gave him a command of horse, and he went with him to the wars. [Plutarch in Antonio.]

T. Ampius, by the means of P. Clodius the Tribune, obtained the Province of Cilicia, contrary to the customes, [Cicero, pro domo sua, cum, lib. 1. ad Famil. epist. 3.]

Of the things concerning his voyage of Gabinus into Syria, and of his first coming thither. M. Cicero thus makes mention in his Oration of Consular Provinces. His voyage into the Province, was after this manner. That King Ariobarzanes hired your Consul, to commit murders, as if he had been a Thracian: Then as his first coming into Syria, he lost many of his Horse, and afterwards his best Foot were cut off. The which lotte of his Horse and Foot, he also mentions in his Oration for Sexius.

Although it was said that the King of Cyprus left a vast sum of money behind him, yet he determined to go first unto Byzantium. M. Brutus, his sisters son, (the murderer of Julius Caesar afterwards) was in Pamphilia, where he then lived for the recovery of his health. Cato wrote to him, that he should immediately come to him from thence into Cyprus, because he suspected that Canidius, in meddling with money, would be light fingered: which voyage Brutus undertook much against his will, both for Canidius his flames whom he thought Cato slandered, and also because he thought this office too mean, and unfit for him, being a young man, and given to his study: yet notwithstanding, he behaved himself so carefully, that Cato commended him, [Plutarch, in Catoe, & Bruto.]

Alexander

Alexander the son of Aristobolus, who in the way escaped from Pompey, troubled Judea with incursions. Hircanus at that time being not able to resist him, being in determination about building the walls of Jerusalem, that Pompey had thrown down, from the doing of which he was hindered by the Romans who were there: But Alexander travelling thorough the Country, armed many Jews; so that in short time having gotten together 10000 Foot, and 1500 Horse, he strongly fortified Alexandria, a Castle seated near Cores, and Hyrcanium, and Machæron, not far from the Mountains of Arabia, [Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 6. lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 10.]

Against him A. Gabinus the Governour of Syria undertook an Expedition, having sent before him M. Antonius with some Commanders. Thence joined with some Jews, who were under their command, whose Captains were Pitholus and Marichus, taking also some Auxiliaries of Antipater: Thence met with Alexander, Gabinus following with the rest of the army. Alexander drew near Jerusalem, where joining battle, the Romans killed of the enemy about 3000 men, and not fewer prisoners taken: but Gabinus when he was come to the Castle of Alexandria, offered the besieged conditions of peace, and promised them pardon for all that was past. And whereas many of the enemies had encamped themselves without the Fort, the Romans set upon them, where M. Antonius behaved himself very valiantly, having slain many of his enemies, [Id. ibid.] who being curiously entertained by Antipater, when being Triumvir, he came 16 years after into Syria, he shewed towards his sons Phatales and Herod, that he was not unmindful of this curetie, [Id. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 10. lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 23.]

Gabinus, having left part of the army at the siege of Alexandria, he went to visit the rest of Judea; and commanded, that what Cities he found destroyed, that they should be rebuilt: and by this means, were Samaria, Azotus, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Apollonia, Jamnia, Raphia, Dora, Marissa, Gaza, and many others rebuilt. So that they afterwards were quietly inhabited, whereas they had laine a long time before desert.

Having thus ordered these things in the Country, Gabinus returned to Alexandria: and whereas they intended to assault it, Alexander by his Embassadors demanded pardon, offering him the Castles of Hyrcanium, and Machæron, and last Alexandria: all which Gabinus, by the advice of the mother of Alexander, levelled with the ground, lest they should be an occasion of new wars; for the woman being solicitous for her husband and children, who were carried captive to Rome, favoured the Romans; and using all obsequiousness towards Gabinus, obtained of him whatsoever she desired, [Id. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 6. lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 10.]

After this, Gabinus having disposed of his affairs, carried Hircanus to Jerusalem, and committing the care of the Temple and Priesthood to his charge, he made others of the Nobility Rulers of the Common-wealth, and having appointed five seats of Judicature, he divided the whole province into so many equal parts. So that some were to demand Justice at Jerusalem, some at Gadara, (otherwise Dora) some at Amathus, some at Jericho, and some at Sephora. And thus the Jews being freed from the single command of one alone, they were willingly governed by an Aristocracy, [Id. ibid.]

Philippus Euergetes, the son of Gryphus, and Tryphæna the daughter of Ptolemy the eighth King of the Egyptians, (who 35 years before was King of Syria) being sent by the Alexandrians to take upon him the kingdom of Egypt, was hindered by Gabinus the Governour of Syria, [Porphyrius in Græc. Eusebian. Scaligeri pag. 217.]

Pompey at Rome undertook Ptolemy Auletes his cause, and commended it to the Senate, and moved for his restoring [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 796.] but Ptolemy demanded that he might be restored by Cornelius Lentulus Spinther the Consul, to whom the province of Cilicia was given in charge, [Dio, lib. 39.] Spinther also himself propounding, that he might be brought back into his kingdom again by him: when was a decree of the Senate made to that purpose, [Cicero, lib. 1. ad Famil. epist. 1. cum Orat. in L. Pison. & pro Rabirio Posthumo.]

And it was said, that this advice was given by the same Consul, that a greater authority of providing corn thorough all the Roman Empire, both by sea and land, might be given to Pompey; so that Pompey being busied in a greater command, he himself might be sent to aide King Ptolemy, [Plutarch, in Pompeio.]

The Alexandrians sent an hundred men to Rome, that they might defend their cause against the accusations of Ptolemy, and might also accuse him of the injuries he had done unto them: the chief of which Embassie, was Dio an Academicus, [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 796. Dio, lib. 39.]

Ptolemy, sending out certain men into all parts, laid ambushes for the Embassadors, and killed most of them in their voyage; some of them he slew in the very City, and the rest, partly by fearing them, and partly by bribing them, he brought the matter matter to that passe, that they did not so much as dare to agitate before the magistrates their cause from whom they were sent, or once make any mention of them that were killed. [Dio. ibid.] to which belongeth that, that Cicero hath concerning the murd'ring of the Alexandrian Embassadors against all law and honesty. (in the oration, de Aruspicium respons.) and concerning the beating of the Alexandrians at Puteoli [in orat. pro Caelio.]

This builness was so vulgarly talked of, that the Senate was very angry, especially Marcus Favonius egging them on particularly: both because many Embassadors of their allies being sent to Rome, were violently bereaved of their lives. (one whereof Cicero, in orat. de Aruspicium responsis, makes mention of, namely one Theodorus that was sent Embassador from a free City, was stabbed by the means of P. Clodius, and Hermachus a Chian:) and because there were a great number of Romans at that time, who had suffered themselves to be corrupted with bribes: wherefore they called Dio the chief of the Embassy unto them, that they might be certified by him, concerning the truth of the builness, but Ptolemys money had so much prevailed, that neither Dio came into the Senate, neither was any mention made of those that were killed, all the while that he was at Rome. [Dio. ut supra.]

And at length also Dio himself, a very learned man, who lodged with Luccius (who also was a most learned man, of whom Cicero begged [in lib. 5. ad familiar. epist. 12.] that he would write the story of his Consulship) with whom he was acquainted at Alexandria, was treacherously murdered: but for this murder neither P. Afcilius, who was accused as being guilty, nor Ptolemy suffered any punishment, for Afcilius was quit in his tryall: and Pompey entertained Ptolemy at his house, and helped him all he could; and although many, because they had taken bribes, were in after times accused before the Judges, yet very few were condemned: because seeing there were many that were guilty of the same fault, very one in fear to himself helped the other: men did commit those villanies then for the love of money. [Cicero, in Orat. pro Caelio, Dio, lib. 39.]

M. Cato having reconciled the banished men with the rest of the citizens, and settled a firm concord in Byzantium, sailed into Cyprus: whom the Cypriots willingly received, hoping that in the place of servants as they had been, they should now become friends, and allies of the people of Rome: Cato found there great and royall preparation in plate, tables, jewels, and purple: all which was to be sold, and to be turned into ready money: so that he gathered little less than 7000 talents of silver. [Plutarch, in Catone minore, & Bruto, Strabo, fin. lib. 14. Dio, lib. 39.]

Here he himself was very careful in searching out all things, and to set the highest price, and to be at all bargains himself, and cast it up to the last penny: neither would he trust to the custome of the market place, but suspected all apparitions, cryers, praefers and freinds; he also talked apart with them that set the prizes, and forced many to buy, and to sold many things by this means, and whereas he offended many of his freinds as distrusting them, but especially his most intimate freind Munatius he provoked almost to an impaceable offence: so that this gave occasion to Julius Cæsar of accusing him, in the book that he wrote called Anticato: for this Munatius (whom Valerius Maximus; lib. 4. cap. 3. sumeth Rufus) set forth a commentary, concerning Cato, and his expedition into Cyprus: whom Thrafas chiefly followed, in which commentary Munatius doth not write that this difference grew between them out of any distrust of Catoes: but that when he was come late into Cyprus, Cato did not entertaine him, and preferred before him Canidius, who was with him before, and had given good proof of his fidelity, and abstinence to him. [Plutarch, in Caton. min.]

In the last month of his Consulship (then falling upon the Julian September) when the new Tribunes of the people entered upon their office, P. Cornelius Spintner prepared to take his voyage into his province of Cilicia, and Ptolemy Auletes departed from Rome, as that place out of the [22. lib. Annal. of Fensetella] quoted by Nonius Marcellus heareth. As soon as the tribunes entered upon their office, C. Cato a turbulent and bold young man, and one that could speak indifferently well, began with the favourable rumour of the people to raise hatred by his continuall speeches to the people, against both Ptolemy who was now departed from the city, and also against P. Lentulus Spintner, who was now preparing for his voyage, but Ptolemys cause was defended by Cicero, as he himself seems to shew in his orat. on for Cælius, and Fortunatianus doth more clearly confirm, quoting by name that very oration of his for King Ptolemy.

In the beginning of the Consulship of L. Marcus Philippus, and Cn. Lentulus Marcellinus, the statue of Jupiter Capitolinus being strook with lightning, gave some stop to the restitution of Ptolemy, for when the Sybils books were consulted, they were reported to have foretold, that a King of Egypt with crafty counsels (as it is in Cicero, in the oration pro Rabinio Posthumo) should come to Rome, and concerning the suspicion of him (as it is in Dio) thus to have declared her then sentence, If a

King

King of Egypt wanting your help shall come hither, ye shall not deny him friendship, but ye shall aide him with no forces; for if ye shall do otherwise ye will raise labours and dangers. Which Oracle was divulged among the people, by the means of C. Cato the Tribune of the people: for it was not lawful to reveal any prophetic of the Sybills to the people, unless the Senate had so decreed it: and it seemed to be the least lawful, seeing the people took it so heavily. Wherefore Cato fearing that the Sentence of the Oracle should be suppressed, he compelled the priests to translate it into Latine, and to declare it to the people, before the Senate had decreed anything concerning it. [Dio, lib. 39.] Notwithstanding this was the opinion of the people of Rome, that this name of a pretended Religion was brought in by the ill willers of Lentulus Spintner (the proconsul of Cilicia) and yet not so much to hinder him, as that none should have a mind to go to Alexandria for the desire of an army, (which amongst the rest, Pompey did most of all seek to have.) [Cicero, lib. 2. ad familiar. epist. 4.]

Ammonius Ptolemys Embassador, did openly with money oppose the reduction of the King by Spintner: those few that withed well to the Kings cause, would have the matter to be committed to Pompey. The Senate approved the forgery of Religion, not for Religion, but for ill will, and for hatred of the Kings great riches. [Id. ibid. epist. 1.] and because they could not tell how to contradict the matter of Religion, there was a decree of the Senate made, that it seemed dangerous for the Common wealth, that the King should be brought back into his kingdom without a multitude. [Id. ibid. epist. 2. & lib. 2. ad Quint. fratrem, epist. 2. Appian. in Syriacis, pag. 120. & Partheis, pag. 134.]

When Pompey understood of the Oracle, that he demanded that Pompey might come to aide him in Spintners stead, and there were little wickets found that were thrown about, both in the Market-place, and the Senate-house, that signified so much: whereupon the Kings letter concerning this builness being publicly read by Anulus Plautius the Tribune of the people, his Colleague Caninius (falsely by Plutarch called Canidius) propounded a law, that Pompey without an army, and onely accompanied with two Lictors, should bring the King in favour again with the Alexandrians: which law, although it did not seem to displease Pompey, yet it was decreed by the Senators, partly under colour of the charge of the corn, that was already committed unto him, and partly as for colour of the safety of Ptolemys person (as they pretended to be afraid for him.) [Plutarch, in Pompeio, Dio, lib. 39.]

But in the Senate concerning this builness, there were divers opinions; Bibulus was of opinion, that Ptolemy should be settled in his kingdom without an army, by three Embassadors, and those to be private men: Cælius, that by three Embassadors, and those either private men, or men in office. Volcatius, at the propoal of Lupus the Tribune of the people (with whom Afranius, Libo, Hypleus, and all the familiar friends of Pompey concurred) that by Pompey: Horatius, Cicero, and Lucullus, that it should be done by Lentulus Spintner; but Servilius denied that he ought to be settled at all. [Cicero, lib. 1. ad familiar. epist. 1. & 2.]

In the month of February (or the Julian November) C. Cato published a law for the depriving of Lentulus of command; which gave his son occasion to change his garment; as Cicero in lib. 2. ad Quintum fratrem, epist. 5. makes mention: which must be meant of the command of settling of Ptolemy in his kingdom again according to the decree of the Senate granted unto him in his Consulship; for it is manifest out of the Epistles of Cicero written unto him (lib. 1. epist. 7. and those that follow) that he retained after the promulgation of this law, the Proconsulship of Cilicia, with the addition also of Cyprus (Cato being now departed from thence) and now made tributary and reduced into the form of a province by the Romans, as Strabo shewes at the end of the 14 book.

Ptolemy, seeing he could neither be settled in his kingdom again by Pompey (as he most desired) nor by Lentulus, now departing of his residence, went to Ephesus, and tarried there in the Temple of Diana, [Dio, lib. 39.]

Antiochus, with his son Antigonus escaping from Rome, returned to Jerusalem: a multitude of Jews coming to him again, partly of such as desired a change, and partly for the old love they bare him, he determined to rebuild the Castle of Alexandria that was dismantled. [Jeseph, lib. 2. Bell. cap. 6. & lib. 14. Antiqui, cap. 11.]

Against him contriving these things, Gabinus, the President of Syria, sent Souldiers, with their Captains, Sisima (his son) Ammanus and Servilius, to keep him from seizing upon Alexandria, and to take him if they could, for many other Jews rejoiced unto him for the reputation that he had, and Pitholaus also, the Governour of Jerusalem, left the Roman party, and came to him with a thousand men well armed: and whereas many of that company were not well armed, Antiochus dismissed them, as unfit for execution. He took onely eight thousand armed men

(among whom those that Pitholus brought): and marched to Machærus. The Romans pursued them, and fought with them; where Aristobolus's party valiantly held out a good while: but having lost 5000 men, they were forced to fly. Near 2000 fled into a certain Mountain, from whence they got away, and provided for their own safety as well as they could. Another thousand with Aristobolus brake through the ranks of the Romans, and fled to Machærus, and began to fortify the Castle: but not being able to hold out the siege above two days, having received many wounds, he was taken prisoner with his son Antigonus, and brought to Gabinus. [Id. ibid.]

Plutarch thus amplifieth the action, giving the whole victory to the honour of Antiochus. Being sent against Aristobolus, who made the Jews to rebel, he was the first man that got up the walls of a most strong Castle of his, and so drove him out of all his holds: then joining battle with a few men of his, he overthrew a great army, and put them all to the sword, except a few. Aristobolus also, with his son, was taken prisoner. [Dio. lib. 39.] not very rightly writes, how Gabinus went into Palestine, how he took Aristobolus, (who was fled from Rome, and made some commotions) and that he sent him to Pompey: and that having laid a tax upon the Jews, how he went from thence into Egypt, to settle Ptolemy again in his kingdom.

Tyrannio, teaching in Cicero's house, orderly disposed his Library, using the help of Dionysius and Menophilus, two Book-binders, sent him by Atticus; [Cicero, lib. 2. ad Quintum Fratr. epist. 4. & lib. 4. ad Atticum, epist. 4. & 8.] namely Tyrannio Amilenus, who (fourteen years before) was taken by Lucullus, who became rich and famous at Rome, and got together about 30000 books. [Suidas in Voc. Tyrannio.] who caused the books of Aristotle to be transcribed out of the Library of Sylla; from whom it is reported that Andronicus Rhodius received the Copies; and that he published these summaries that we have. [Suidas, lib. 13. pag. 608. Plutarch in Sylla.]

Valerius produceth witnesses of the assistance of M. Cato, in the administration of the business of Cyprus, [lib. 4. cap. 3.] Epirus, Achæia, the Islands Cyclades, the sea coasts of Asia, the Province of Cyprus: for when he undertook the charge of bringing away the money, he kept his mind free from venery or bribes, having matter sufficient to be intemperate in both, for the Kings riches were in his own power, and the necessary places of lodging in all his voyage, were the Cities of grace, which were most abounding with delight: And thus Mennatus Rufus his faithful companion in that expedition signifieth in his writings.

Cato tearing a tedious voyage, prepared divers Coffers; each of which held two talents, and five hundred drachms: to each of these he tyed a long rope, and fastened at the end a great piece of cork: so that if the ship should miscarry, the cork should shew the place: And thus was all the money, laying a little, brought very safe. But Cato had provided two books, wherein he had cast up the accounts of all things that he had gotten: one of the which a free man of his called Philargyros carried with him, who taking ship at Cenchrea, was drowned, and all his baggage; the other he himself kept till he came to Coreyra: where, lying in the market place in his Tents, the Souldiers making many fires, by reason of the frost, set the Tents a fire, and so lost that book also: and although the Kings Stewards might easily silence his enemies, and detractors; yet it vexed Cato, because he had not so much kept these accounts for the approbation of his fidelity; but that he might give example to others of being diligent. [Plutarch in Catone minore.]

This Cato with great diligence, carried up the river of Tiber, in light boats, the riches of Cyprus, as if they had been spoils taken from an enemy, and carryed in a flûete. [Florus, lib. 3. cap. 4. Valerius Maximus, lib. 4. cap. 11. Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 14.] which brought more treasure to the treasury of the people of Rome, than any triumph, as Florus affirmeth, [in supra.]

The news of Cato's coming being told, presently all the Magistrates and Priests, together with the Consuls (one of which was L. Marcus Philippus, the father of Marcia, Cato's wife) the whole Senate, & many of the people went to the river side to meet him; so that this bringing of him in, differed little from the shew and splendour of a triumph. Notwithstanding, his insolence was observed in this, that he did not come a shore to the Consuls and Prætors that came to meet him, nor stayed his course, but sailed by the shoar, in one of the Kings Gallies, with six oars on a bank, neither did he come a shore, untill he came with his fleet, to the place where the money was to be landed. [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 45. Plutarch in Catone minore.] but when he landed, the Consuls, and the rest of the Magistrates, were ready to receive with him all civilities; not rejoicing so much for the vast summe of gold and silver; as that the fleet had brought Cato late home again. [Valer. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. ult.]

The money being carried thorough the Market-place, the people wondered at the treasure, far greater than they hoped for. [Plutarch.] he became, having gathered together many slaves, and much money out of the Kings riches, and could not be accounted by any one, but had delivered up all things; Cato received not less honour than if he had returned a Conquerour from the Wars: for many men having suffered themselves to be corrupted with bribes, he caused it to be accounted a rare virtue: to despise money, that to conquer an enemy. [Dio. lib. 39.]

Pliny relates, that Cato brought back with him from this Cyprian Expedition, 900 talents. [lib. 7. cap. 30.] Cato obtained of the Senate liberty for Nicias the Kings Steward, giving good testimony of his fidelity and diligence. [Plutarch, in Catone.] Clodius intended that those slaves that were brought from Cyprus, should be called Clodian, because he had sent Cato thither: but because Cato withstood it, he could not obtain it: wherefore they were called Cyprian; for Cato would not suffer them to be called Porcian, though some were of that opinion. [Dio. lib. 39.]

Clodius being angry with Cato, because he had opposed him, calumniated the service that he had done, and demanded an account of his deeds: not because he thought he could accuse him of any unjust act, but because he thought it would make some thing for him, that all the Records almost were lost in the shipwreck. Cæsar helped Clodius also in this business, although he was absent, and (as some report) sent accusations against Cato to him by letters. [Dio. ibid.] but Cato told them that he had brought as much money out of Cyprus, although he had not received so much as one hortor, or souldier, as Pompey had brought from to many Wars and Triumphs, wherein all the World was in combustion. [Plutarch, in Catone.]

Cato opposed himself against Cicero, who was very urgent that none of those things that Clodius had done in his Tribunell, should be confirmed in the Senate, not so much in favour of Clodius, but because that among other acts that should be revoked, his commission also for Cyprus should be one, because the Tribune that sent him was unlawfully chosen. [Plutarch, in Catone, & in Cicero.]

Phraates the second, being wickedly put to death by his sons, Orodes succeeded him in the kingdom of the Parthians, his brother Mithridates being expelled out of Media, over which he commanded. Thus [Dio. lib. 39.] but the sons continued for the kingdom, it seems Orodes was first banished, and after him Mithridates also: But Surenas a rich man, and one among the Parthians next the King in blood and authority, brought Orodes back again from banishment: whole prerogative by birth it was, that he should always crown the new King of the Parthians. He reduced Seleucia the Great under the Kings power; and was the first man that scaled the walls, and overthrew with his own hands them that defended it: and although he was not as yet thirty years old, yet had he gotten a very great opinion for his advice in council, and his wisdom: for they report these things of him; as Plutarch in Cræsus, and Appian in Parthicus; [pag. 140. 141.] but yet the same Appian, both in Parthicus, [pag. 144.] and in Syriacus, [pag. 120.] acknowledgeth at another time, that Mithridates was driven out of his kingdom by his brother Orodes: although Justin notes in [lib. 42. cap. 4.] that Mithridates was depoted from his kingdom for his cruelty by the Parthian Nobility, and that his brother Orodes seized upon the kingdom, the Royal Seat being vacant: although very falsely he there makes this Mithridates the same with Mithridates the King of the Parthians, to whom his famous acts gave the surname of Great: seeing that between this Mithridates the Great, and he that was the brother of Orodes, there was a various succession of many Kings among the Parthians: as appeared out of the very prologue of the 42 book of Trogus Pompeius, an epitome whereof Justin hath given us.

Mithridates being driven out of his kingdom, either by the Parthian Nobility, or his brother Orodes, came to Gabinus the Proconsul of Syria, as he was preparing for an Expedition against the Arabians, and wrought so with him, that he should let the Arabians alone, and go against the Parthians, and help to restore him to his kingdom. [Appian, in Syriacus, pag. 120. & Parthicus, pag. 134. Dio. lib. 39.]

Upon the Ides of May (falling upon the Julian February) the letters of Gabinus were read in full Senate concerning the war that he had had with the greatest Nation: and Tyrants of Syria, (under which name, the Princes of Judea, Commagena, Chalcis, Emela, Thracanitis, Batanea, and Abilene, are wont to be called) but they were not believed: and the procession, that under that notion he desired might be granted him at Rome, was denied him. [Cicero, lib. 1. ad Quintum, fratr. epist. 7. Orat. de provinciis Consulibus, & in L. Pilone.]

When Gabinus had sent Aristobolus the King and his sons to Rome, the Senate indeed kept him prisoner, but sent his sons immediately back again into Judea, because that they understood by Gabinus's letters, that he had promised his mother so much for the delivery of the Castles: thus Josephus, [lib. 1. Bell. cap. 6. & lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 10.]

cap. 11.] where he further adds, That Aristobolus held the Kingdom and Priesthood three years and six months: which the Arabian Collectour of the Jewish History, (let forth by the same man at the end of the Parisian Bibles of many languages) [cap. 40.] understands it of the space of the former principality; until he was taken prisoner the first time: whereas it seems rather to be understood of that former, and this later, both taken together: so that he reigned three years and three months, before the former captivity, (as Josephus confirmeth in lib. 20. Antiquit. cap. 8.) and before his second captivity three months also.

M. Cicero, in the Oration that he spake in the Senate, de Provincis Consularibus, counselled that L. Pilo and A. Gabinus (in whose Consilship he was banished) might be recalled; and their Provinces, Macedonia and Syria, might be assigned to the future Consuls; objecting these things among other against Gabinus. He being General in Syria, there is nothing done, but some trucking for money with the Tyrants, compositions, plunderings, thieveries, murders. Being the General of the people of Rome, his army being in battle array, stretching out his right hand, exhorted not his Soldiers to gain honour, but cried that all things were by him already bought, or to be bought: but now he hath delivered the wretched Publicans into slavery, to Jews and Syrians, Nations that are themselves born to slavery. And he hath continued in this, That he will not do justice to a Publican, he hath revoked all agreements made between them, without any wrong done by them. He hath taken away all watches, he hath freed them that paid tribute, and many Pensioners; in what Town soever he was, or whither soever he was to come, he forbade any Publican, or Publicans servants, to be there.

Gabinus, when he had afflicted Syria with many mischiefs, and had done more wrong to the Province than the Thieves, who were very stout at that time; yet he accounted all this gain that he had gotten, but little, and therefore he let his mind upon the expedition against the Parthians, and made preparation for that voyage. [Dio. lib. 39.]

Archelaus, the friend of Gabinus, being made High Priest of the Comani in Pontus, by Pompey: (as is said at the year of the World 3940.) he there living with Gabinus, he hoped that he should be his companion in the Parthian wars, that he was preparing for; but the Senate would not permit it. [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 398. & lib. 17. pag. 796.]

When Gabinus, leading his army against the Parthians, had passed the Euphrates, Ptolemy came with letters from Pompey, and promised that he would give a huge sum of money to Gabinus and his army, part to be paid in hand, and part when he was restored to his kingdom. That it was 10000 talents that was promised by him to Gabinus, not only Plutarch, but also Cicero confirmeth, in his Oration for Gabinus Posthumus; where he reckoneth it up to be 2160000 Sestercentums, Most of the Commanders were against it, and Gabinus himself was in doubt to undertake it, although he would very fain have been fingering those 10000 talents. But Antonius, who was covetous of doing great matters, and desirous to gratify Ptolemys requests, was very ready to egge on, and perwade Gabinus to undertake this war: and although the Law forbade that any Governours of Provinces should go out of the bounds of their own Government, nor undertake any war upon their own head; and also the people of Rome had forbid, being induced thereto by the religion of the Sibylls verbe, that Ptolemaeus should be restored at all; yet by how much the more it was forbidden, by so much the more the more gain: wherefore leaving off the Parthian affairs, he undertook the expedition against the Alexandrians. [Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 6. & lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 11. Plutarch in Anton. Aprian, in Syriac. pag. 120. & Parthie. pag. 134. Dio. lib. 39.]

Bernice, the daughter of Auletes, held at that time the Kingdom of Egypt, who having sent for one Seleucus out of Syria, who as he said himself, was of the looke of the Syrian Kings, and called him husband, and made him partner in the command of the Kingdom, and of the war: He was a most fardid man, (as Suetonius describes him in Vespasiano, cap. 19.) furnished in contempt, Ptolemaeus Coere and Cybistates, Πασιπάρης, or Changling he brake open the golden Coffin, that the body of Alexander the Great was buried in, but got no profit by that thievery, for the Queen seeing him to bafe a man, strangled him within few dayes, seeing the could no longer endure his fardidnesse and nigardlinesse. And whereas there was a husband sought out for her, that should be of royal extraction, that Archelaus the High Priest of the Comani, then being in Syria, and faining that he was the son of Michtridates: (under whom his father Archelaus had waged war against Sylla and the Romans) was brought to the Queen by some friends: by whom being entertained as an husband, that was fit to govern a Common-wealth, upon the same conditions that Seleucus was, he enjoyed the Kingdom six moneths, together with her. [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 794, 796. & lib. 12. pag. 558. Dio. lib. 39.]

C. Clodius

C. Clodius, the brother of P. Clodius by his praisour-ship (which Dio. lib. 39. bare faith he this year) obtained the province of Asia, (Cicero. ad Attic. lib. 4. epist. 14.) whose Quæstor in that province C. Scribonius Cutilo was: to whom there be many letters of Cicero's extant, [in lib. 2. ad familiar.]

By a law made by C. Trebonius the Tribune of the people; there were provinces appointed to the new Consuls: to Cn. Pompey Spain, and Africa; to M. Licinius Crassus Syria with the adjacent countreys: and moreover power was given to both of them, to take as many souldiers out of Italy, and from their allies, as they would themselves, and to make peace or war with whom they would likewise. [Dio. lib. 105. Plutarch. Crasso, Pompeio. Cuneo minore. Appian. lib. civil. lib. 2. pag. 457. 438. Dio. lib. 39.]

Crassus, as soon as he had by lot obtained his province, could not dissemble his joy, supposing that nothing could ever have happened more luckily for him, among his familiar freinds he would talk to vainly and childishly, as did not become his age, and wilddome: deligting to himself not only the conquest of Syria, and Parthia, but carrying on his vain hopes even to the Bactrians, Indians, and the western ocean, though in the decree made by the people concerning his government, there was no mention made of the Parthians, yet all men knew that Crassus gaped upon that prey, and Cæsar writing to him out of Gallia, commended his resolution, and advised him to go on, [Plutarch in Crasso.]

A. Gabinus leaving his sounne Sisenia, who was very young, with very few souldiers, and the province also over which he was governour, more excoled to the injuries ofneives, went through Palestine into Egypt [Dio. lib. 39.] against Archelaus whom the Egyptians had chosen to be their King. [Liv. lib. 105.] in which expedition he made use of his freinds Hyrcanus, and Antipator, for all things that were necessary for the war, for Antipator helped him, with money, and arm, and corns and mery, [Lef. lib. 2. bel. cap. 6. lib. 14. cap. 10.]

Whereas they were to passe thorough deep, dry, sandy places, about the fenns and marishes of Solonis, which the Egyptians call the exhalations of Tryphon. M. Antonius being sent before with the horse (whom Gabinus had made commander of the Cavalry he being as yet very young, [as Appian notes, lib. 5. bell. civil. pag. 676.] did not only win the passe, but took also the city of Pelusium, a very large city. [Plutarch in Antonio.] the Jews also who inhabited Pelusium, and were as keepers of the passage into Egypt, being drawn unto his party. [Lef. lib. 2. supra.]

The garrison of Pelusium being thus reduced, Antonius made the way safe for the army, and feuled in a fair way the victory for the generall: but Ptolemy as soon as he was entred into Pelusium, was so inflamed with anger and hatred, that he would have put all the Egyptians to the sword. Antonius interceded and would not suffer him, [Plutarch in Antonio.]

Gabinus having marshalled his army in two battalions, marched from Pelusium, and the same day discomfited the Egyptians that opposed him. [Dio. lib. 39.]

Cicero, in an oration that he made at Rome; not only extorted from the ignoble King of the Commagenians, the little town Zeugma that is seated upon the Euphrates but also speaking many things against him, he exposed to the laughter of all men the purple gown, that he had gotten when Cæsar was Consul. [Cicero. lib. 2. ad Quintum Fratri. epist. 11.]

Upon the Ides of February (falling upon the Julian November the Tyrians were admitted into the Senate, and against them many of the Syrians, Publicans, Gabinus was extremely vexed: notwithstanding the Publicans were chidden by Domitius because they followed him post. [Id. ibid. epist. 12.]

About the Kalends of May (falling upon the Julian February) there was a great rumour at Puteoli, that Ptolemy was in his Kingdom, as Cicero writes, [ad Attic. lib. 4. epist. 9.] and indeed he was in Egypt, and Gabinus had taken Archelaus, who came out against him sooner then was thought he would, for that there was no more businesse to be done, but Gabinus fearing, lest having done nothing he should receive little money from Ptolemy, than was agreed upon, and hoping moreover, that because Archelaus was a man both stout, and of good reputation; he should receive more money, and also having received a great summe of money of Archelaus, he let him go, as if he had fled from him. [Dio. lib. 39.]

M. Antonius after he had done many noble acts, in fights and battles, whereby he shewed himself a yaliant and wise commander, but especially in one, where he compassed and circumvented the enemy behind, and by that means gave the victory to them that were in the front, for which he was honoured with many excellent gifts. [Plutarch in Antonio.]

The people of Egypt marched out of the walls of the city, under the conduct of Archelaus against Gabinus, and had given command that the camp should be fortified

Gabinius having therefore conquered them, and slain among others in fight Archelaus, he presently was Master of all Egypt, which he delivered over to Ptolemei, [Dio. lib. 59. Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 558. & lib. 17. pag. 796.] all which befel Cicero toucheth in few words, in his Oration against Pilo, speaking of the madness of Gabinius. That vast prey being now spent, that he had drawn from the fortunes of the Publicans, from the Countries and Cities of the Allies, part of which prey his insatiable lusts devoured, part his new and unheard of luxury, part the purchases that he had made in those places that he had wholly plundered, part bartering, and for building up this mountain of Tisuloni: but when the intolerable building was left off for a time, he sold to the Egyptian King himself, his bundle of rods, the army of the people of Rome, the power, and the threatening of the immortal gods, the answers of the Priests, the authority of the Senate, the commands of the people; the revenues and dignity of the Empire: whereas the bounds of his Province, were as great as he would himself, as great as he could desire, as great as he could buy with the price of my life, yet could he not contain himself within them. He brought his army out of Syria, how durst he carry it out of the Province? He made himself a mercenary soldier to the King of Alexandria, what more vile than this? He came into Egypt, he joyed battle with the Alexandrians: When had either the Senate or the people undertaken this war? He took Alexandria: What could he expect more from his fury, but that he should send letters to the Senate, of all the famous acts that he had done? But that he sent none, Dio observed, lest he himself might be the accuser of his own villanies.

M. Antonius fought for the body of dead Archelaus (with whom he had great familiarity and friendship) and gave it royal burial: for which he left a great fame among the Alexandrians, [Plutarch in Antonio.] but in Pontus the son of Archelaus received the Priesthood of the Communi after his father, [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 558.]

Gabinius left at Alexandria some of his soldiers for a Guard with Ptolemei: who afterward came to live after the fallion of the Alexandrian life and licentiousness, and unlearned the name and discipline of the people of Rome, and married wives, by whom they had many children, [Caspar, Commentar. de Bell. civil. lib. 3.] to whom belong those of Lucan, lib. 10.

Ptolemei being restored to his kingdom, put to death his daughter the Queen Berenice, [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 796. Dio, lib. 39. Porphy. in Grac. Eusebian. Scaliger, pag. 226.] He also killed many of the rich Noblemen, because he had much need of money, [Dio, lib. 39.]

C. Rabirius Posthumus, a Roman Knight, who being absent had rashly trusted Ptolemei both when he was in his kingdom, and coming to Rome also, and being present when he departed with money both of his own and his friends: that he might recover it, was forced to change the Roman Gown, for the Grecian Coat at Alexandria, and to undertake there the Proctordship and Stewardship for the King: being made the Kings Oversee by Auletes notwithstanding he was afterwards put in prison, law many of his familiar friends in bonds, and death awaited before his eyes: and at last was faine to flee out of the kingdom naked and poor, [Cicero, pro C. Rabirio.]

Whilst Gabinius tarried in Egypt, Alexander the son of Aristobulus seizing again by

by force upon the Government, made many of the Jews to revolt: and having gathered together a great army, and foraging the Country, put to death all the Romans he could meet with, and belleged all those that fled to Mount Garizim: but Gabinius being returned, put Antipater, knowing his great wisdom, to the assibolions, who reduced many of them to obedience, but Alexander having with him 10000 Jews, ventured to meet Gabinius, and fought with him near the mountain of Irbay, in which fight the Jews lost 10000 men. Then Gabinius having ordered the affairs of the City of Jerusalem by Antipators advice, went against the Nabateans, whom he overcame in one battle, [Joseph, lib. 14. cap. 11.]

King Mithridates (the son of Phraates the second) being forsaken by Gabinius, did not recover the Parthian Kingdom by the help of the Arabians, (as it is commonly believed from the false interpretation of the words of Appian, in Syria, pag. 120.) but retired rather to Babylon, as is gathered out of Justin: which when his brother Orodes had long besieged, and at length, by reason of famine, had forced the Townsmen to yield it up, and Mithridates, relying upon the necessities of kindred, willingly yielded himself into him. But Orodes taking him rather for an enemy, than a brother, commanded him to be slain before his face, [Justin, lib. 47. cap. 4.]

Gabinius privately sent back Mithridates and Orlantes, men of account among the Parthians, who had fled unto him, causing a battle to be spread among the Soldiers, that they were fled, [Joseph, lib. 1. Bell. cap. 6. lib. 14. cap. 11.]

Whereas the Syrians complained much of Gabinius, both for other things, and also, because that through his absence, they were grievously infected with Thieves: And whereas the Publicans also complained, That by reason of them, they could not gather the tribute, and so were run much in debt. The Romans angry hereat, determined to have the matter judged, and were prepared to condemn him, and Cicero also vehemently accused Gabinius: and was of opinion, that the Sybil's Oracles should be read again: perswading himself, that there was some punishment laid down for him, that had violated them. But Pompey, one of the Consuls, of his own accord favoured Gabinius, as did also Crassus, the other Consul, both that he might gratifie his Colleague, and also for the monies sake that Gabinius had lent: and whereas both of them openly defended him, they suffered nothing to be decreed against him, upbraiding Cicero, among other things, with his banishment, [Dio, lib. 39.]

Pompey, in his second Consulship, dedicated his Theatre, by exhibiting most magnificent games and shows, [Cicero, lib. 2. de Officiis, & lib. 9. ad familiar. epist. 1. Alcon. Pedan. in Orat. Pisonianam.] although it was reported, that this Theatre was not built by Pompey himself, but by his freed man Demetrius, (a Gadarene) out of the money that he had gotten, when he was a Soldier under him: who gave the honour of this work to Pompey, lest he should be spoked of, that a freed man of his should get to much money, that he could spend so much, [Dio, lib. 39.]

Gabinius did not admit the Lieutenant that was sent by Crassus to succeed him in the Province of Syria, but kept it, as if he had received a perpetual magistracy, [Dio, lib. 39.]

Whereas the Tribunes of the people hindered Crassus, the Consul, from raising any Soldiers, and endeavoured to make void the expedition that was decreed him, Crassus runs to arms; the Tribunes of the people, because they saw that their liberty, wanting arms, was but lawine to withstand his actions, left off their ginslayings, but cursed him to the pit of hell: and as Crassus went into the Capitol, to make his accustomed prayers, for a prosperous voyage, they told him what unlucky signes and prodigies had happened, [Id. ibid.]

When as Ateius, the Tribune of the people, was prepared to hinder Crassus his departure, and many also of the same mind were offended, that he should make war against men that were at peace with them, and confederates, Crassus, leaving this, defied Pompey that he would go with him out of the City, for he was of great authority with the common people: for although many were ready prepared to decry and hinder Crassus; yet when they saw Pompey go before him with a pleasant and smiling countenance, they held their peace, and made a lane for him, [Plutarch in Crasso.]

But Ateius, the Tribune, meeting Crassus, at first by word of mouth withheld him: bidding him go no further: then he commanded a Sergeant to lay hold on him, and carry him to prison: but the rest of the Tribunes not permitting it, Crassus got without the walls, [Id. ibid. cum Dio, lib. 39.] Notwithstanding, Ateius ran to the gate, and there kindled a fire, and as Crassus passed by, he cast in perfumes, and made sprinklings over it, pronouncing horrible curses, calling upon terrible and strange names of gods. The Romans thought these secret and ancient execrations to be of such such force, that he that was cursed; could not escape thence, nor he that doth curse any one shall ever thrive. [Plutarch.]

That Metellus, the Tribune of the people, poured hostile curses upon Cæsar at his setting out, Florus writes, [lib. 2, cap. 17.] and Velletius Paternulus, that all the Tribunes of the people generally cursed him. [lib. 2, cap. 20.] Appian, [lib. 2, Bell. Civ. p. 438.] and Dio, [lib. 39.] do more.

Crassumque in bella vocat
Sæva Tribunitia moverens prælia dira. (1, 6.)

The Tribunes to ill befriended
Craslus, with curses he his march attended.

As Lucan speaks in his third book, but that especially P. Aenus pronounced those curses, and setting a token before him, warned him of what would happen, unless he took heed. Cicero confirms it [in lib. 1, de divinatione] from whose hostile almost he went into the Province, for he had supped with him, in the Garden of his son-in-law Crassipes, [id. lib. 1, ad familiar. epist. 9.] from whence Cicero went unto Tuluclanum about the middle of November, (telling at that time upon the Julian August) and Crassus went his voy aged in his coat of arms. [Id. lib. 2, ad Attic. epist. 12.] and at Brundisium shipped his army. [Id. lib. 2, de Morte.]

Craslus looting from Brundisium, when at the tempests had not yet left the fear, lost many of his ships. Having landed his army out of them that were left, he marched by land through Galatia, where he found King Deiotarus, a very old man, building a new City, and jeering him, said, Do you begin to build in the afternoon, in whom the King smilingly answered: Truly he thinks, O General, you are not against the Parthians in the morning for Craslus was above 60, and he became a man seem older than he was. [Plutarch.]

Cicero very earnestly defended the cause of Craslus in his absence against the new Consuls, and many that had been Consuls. [Id. ad familiar. lib. 5, epist. 8.]

Seeing Craslus had not much to do in Syria, (for the Syrians were quiet, and those that had troubled Syria, being frightened with the power of Craslus, did not stir) he undertakes an expedition against the Parthians, without any cause for making war upon them, only he heard they were rich; and he was in hopes that Orodes, who now reigned, would easily be overcome. [Dion. lib. 40.]

But hearing of the riches of the Temple of Jerusalem, which Pompey had left untouched, he turned aside into Palestine, came to Jerusalem, and took away the riches. [Oros. lib. 6, cap. 13.]

There was in the Temple a wedge of solid gold, weighing 3000 Hebrew pounds, or 750 common pounds, inclosed in an hollow beam of wood, on which they hung the Hangings of the Temple: which were admirable for their beauty and esteem, Eleazer a Priest, who was the keeper of the sacred treasure, only knew of this: who seeing Craslus so greedy in gathering up the gold, and fearing he should take away all the ornaments of the Temple, delivered him the golden beam as a ransom for all the rest, having first bound him by an oath, that he should not stir any thing else. Notwithstanding, Craslus took this, and immediately breaking his oath, not only took from the Temple 2000 talents, which Pompey had not meddled with, but all the rest of the gold, the sum of which came to 8000 Attick talents: which vast riches (whereas Josephus was persuaded that it would scarce be believed among people of other Nations) he endeavours to prove out of the Historical writings of Strabo of Cappadocia, which are not now extant, and others, that they were heaped up there in long time, from the Jews that lived in Europe, Asia, and Cyriaciaca. [lib. 14, Antiquit. cap. 12.]

Craslus having built a bridge over Euphrates, easily and safely passed his army over the river, and was master of many Towns, that of their own accord yielded unto him; [Plutarch in Craslo.] for Craslus his coming was beyond all expectation, so that there was scarce any select Garrison in all Mesopotamia. [Dion. lib. 40.]

Talymentus Ilaces (or Syllaces) the Governour of that Country, with a few Horse, fought with Craslus, and was overcome, and wounded, and retired to the King, and certified him of the expedition of Craslus. [Dion. ibid.]

In the mean time Craslus recovered many Cities, especially those that belonged to the Greeks, and among them Nicopolis; for many inhabitants of the Macedonians and Grecians, who served in the wars under the Macedonians, fearing the tyranny of the Parthians, and putting much hope in the Romans, of whom he knew the Grecians were beloved, very willingly revolted unto them. [Dion. ibid.]

Only the Citizens of Zenodotia, wherof Apollonius was Tyrant, killed an hundred Roman Souldiers, whom they had received within their walls, as if they meant to yield unto them. Whereupon Craslus brought thither his whole army, won it, and sacked it, and sold the inhabitants at an outcry. And whereas, besides this one thing, Craslus had neither done against, nor suffered any thing from the enemy, yet he suffered himself to be called Imperator, or Captain General, which turned to his disgrace, and to be thought of a low spirit, as if he did not hope for any great matters, seeing he was puffed up with so small a success. [Id. ibid. Plutarch in Craslo.]

Gabinus returned into Italy, Domitius and Appius being Consuls, [Idem. Pedian. in int. orat. Pisonian.] and the same being Consuls, there was again judgment given against Gabinus, and that in his absence, for all Pompey stood very carefully for him, and the opinion of many of the Judges were against him, for both Domitius was an enemy to Pompey, by reason of the contention about the demanding of the Consulship, because he had taken that magistracy against his good will, and Appius, although he was a kin to Pompey, yet because he was led on by a design of flattering the people, and hoped that if he made any stir, he should be bribed with money by Gabinus; and so that end he directed all his actions; wherefore it was decreed, that the Sybils verses should be read over again, although Pompey was much against it; but in the mean time the money that was lent by Gabinus came to Rome, and the money wrought so much, that Gabinus was sure not to suffer any great matter either being absent or present: for there was then such confusion at Rome, that where Gabinus had but given part of that money to the Magistrates, and to some of the Judges, with which he had been bribed; they did not only not make any account of thence, but others also being taught for moneys sake to do wickedly, because they could easily ransom themselves from punishment with money. [Dion. lib. 39.]

On the XII Kalends of October, (about the Julian July) Gabinus came into the city: the IV Kalends of October he entered the city by night. [Cicero. lib. 3, ad Quint. Fratr. epist. 1.] for he was so tormented in conscience for his ugly actions, that it was late ere he came into Italy, and came by night into the city, and durst not go out of his own house for many daies together. [Dion. lib. 39.]

There were those factions that accused Gabinus; L. Lentulus the sonne of the Flamen, who accused him of treason; T. Nero with divers good men that joyned in the accusation, and C. Mummius the Tribune of the people with Lucius Capito: and whereas being accused of treason he appeared by the edict of C. Allius the prætor; he was almost trodden under foot by the great concourse and hatred of all the people. [Cicero. lib. 3, ad Quintum, Fratr. epist. 1.]

On the tenth day after he came into the city, on which he ought to have given an account of the number of the enemies, and his souldiers, he was wonderfully astonished in the midst of a great multitude, Appius the Consul accused him of treason, and the names being called he answered not a word: when he would go out he was retented by the Consuls, and the Publicans were brought in: he is accused of all sides, and when he was most of all wounded by Cicero, he could not endure it, but with a trembling voice called him banished man, all the Senate rose against him with a shout, so that they came unto him where he stood, as likewise did the Publicans, with the like shout and violence: the VI Ides of October, Memmius manifestly put Gabinus in an hear before the people; so that Calpurnius could not speak for him the next day, there was a divination of Cato the prætors house, for the appointing of an accuser against Gabinus, as whether Memmius, or T. Nero, or C. and L. Anonius the sonnes of Marcus [Id. ibid. epist. 1.]

There were many accusations against Gabinus, and not a few accusers: the first thing that was debated was concerning the crime of the relieving of Ptolemy: in this plea, almost all the people flocked to the Tribunal, and they had often a mind to pull him in pieces, especially because Pompey was not there, and Cicero had most thrily accused him. [Dion. lib. 39.] but Cicero himself in 2. and 4. epist. ad Quintum Fratr. denies that he accused him either, nor fear, that he was loath to have any quarrels with Pompey, or because he did not doubt but the business would be done, either without him, or something for his sake, or because he thought it would be an eternal disgrace to him if such an infamous guilty person should escape, if he pleaded against him. I was much delighted (saith he in ep. 4.) with this moderation, and this also pleased me, that, when I had sharply spoken both according to conscience and religion, the defendant said, that if he might be in the city, that he would give me satisfaction; neither did he say any thing, and in the ninth epistle All that I did, I did with much gravity, and unity, as all were of opinion. I neither urged it, nor any thing qualified it, I was a vehement witness.

witneſſe, I did nothing elſe. In this judgment of the treaſon, Gabinus had very flow answers, but was haſty by all manner of men : Alſius was a ſharp and ſure enſormer ; Pompey was very earneſt to beg the Judges to favour him, [Cicero, lib. 3. ad Quintum Fratr. epiſt. 3.] Gabinus ſaid that he reſected Ptolemei for the good of the common-wealth, becauſe he was afraid of the fleet of Archelaus, becauſe he thought the ſea would abound with Pyrates ; he ſaid alſo that he might do it by law. [Id. in orat. pro Rabirio, Poſthumo.] the friends of Cæſar and Pompey, were very ready to help him : ſaying that the Sybils meant another King, and other times : and upon this they ſtood moſt, becauſe in the oracle there was no certain puniſhment mentioned, [Dio, lib. 39.] the youth of L. Lentulus was incredible for to be an accuſer, whom all ſaid was brought in on purpoſe that Gabinus might overcome, but notwithstanding ſtill there had been great contention, and intreaties of Pompey, and a rumour of a diſturbance which cauſed much feare, Gabinus had not answered to Lucius Lentulus, but when the Judges gave their ſentence, there were 32 condemned him, and 38 abſolved him, [Cicero, lib. 4. epiſt. 1. and lib. 3. ad Quintum Fratr. epiſt. 4.]

Dio delivers in the 39. book of his hiſtorie, that Gabinus, when he ſtood the trial for ſo high crimes, that he gave great ſummes of money, and when he was abſolved, there wanted but little, but that the people had killed the Judges : but that Gabinus was brought to the judgement of the people by Memmius, and exempted by the interceſſion of Lælius the Tribune of the people, Valerius Maximus [in l. b. 8. cap. 1.] relateth after this manner. A. Gabinus in the great heat of his inſlami being ſubjected to the ſuffrages of the people by C. Memmius his accuſer, ſeemed as if all his hopes were broken : becauſe the accuſation was fully proved, and his defence had but a weak foundation ; and thoſe that judged him, through a raſh anger, were very deſirous to puniſh him : the Liſtor and priſon were alwaies before his eyes, whenas in the mean time they were daſht by the intervention of a propitious fortune : for Siffenna the ſonne of Gabi- nius through the meer impulſion of amazement fell humbly proſtrate before Memmius from thence hoping for ſome aſwaging of the ſtorm, from whence the violence of the tempeſt brake out : whom the inſolent conſort rejected with a ſtern countenance, and having ſtruck him from his finger let it lye on the ground a great while, which ſpectacle was the cauſe, that Lælius the Tribune of the people, commanded Gabinus to be diſmiſſed, that we may learn by this example, neither inſolently to abuſe the ſucceſſe of proſperity, neither that any one ought to be too much caſt down by adverſity.

Yet notwithstanding did Gabinus eſcape ſo ; for being quitted of hiſtreacon, he was again brought into judgement, both for other cauſes, and alſo becauſe he had wrongfully extorted 100000 (either drachmes or pence) from the Province, and ſo was condemned of extortion. Pompey who was gone from the City to provide corn, (for much corn was ſpoiled by the overflowing of Tiber) and was then in Italy, made all the halfe he could to be preſent at the judgement ; but ſeeing he came too late, he departed not out of the Suburbs, till the buſineſſe was finiſhed. He then called the people together without the walls of the City, (becauſe it was not lawful for him to come into the City, he having at that time the dignity of Proconſul) and ſpoke unto them in the behalf of Gabinus, and rehearſed unto them the letters that he had received from Cæſar for the ſafety of Gabinus ; and uſed much intreaties with the Judges : and he averred Cicero not onely from accuſing Gabinus, but ſo wrought him, that he pleaded his cauſe : but yet all theſe things did Gabinus no good ; for the Judges, partly for the feare they had of the people, and partly becauſe they had not received any great bribes from Gabinus, (who being accuſed for light faults, did not beſtow much coſts, and thought ſurely he ſhould come off free,) condemned him to baniſhment : from which he was afterwards brought back by Cæſar, [Dio, lib. 39.]

Cicero in the Oration for Rabirius Poſthumus acknowledgeth, that he did very earneſtly defend Gabinus after that they were made friends, wheretas they were great enemies before : in which although his curſeſe be commended by Valerius Maximus, [lib. 4. cap. 2.] yet Dio confirmeth, that Cicero was branded with the name and crime of a Runnagado : and truly Marcus quite forgot what he had formerly written to his brother Quintus, [lib. 3. epiſt. 5.] I had been undone if I had defended Gabinus, as Panſa thought I ought to have done : although in the Oration for Rabirius, he giveth this account of his doing it. The renewing of our friendſhip was the cauſe that I defended Gabinus, neither doth it ever repent me to have enmity mortal, and friendſhip immortal.

Timagenes the Alexandrian (or as ſome will the Egyptian) the ſon of the Kings Banker, who being taken in the war, was brought to Rome by Gabinus, and was redeemed by Fauſtus the ſon of Sylla, taught Rhetoric at Rome, under Pompey, Julius Cæſar, and the Triumvirs, and ſet forth many books : [Suidas in Timagenis.]

Publius Cornelius Lentulus Spinther the Proconſul of Cilicia, when he had behaved himſelf well in the war, was by the army ſaluted Captain General, [Cicero, lib. 1. ad familiar. epiſt. 8. 9.]

Appian Claudius Pulcher, about the end of his Conſulſhip, being by the decree of the Senate deſigned ſucceſſour to P. Cornelius Lentulus, without a law propoſed to the Tribes, went into Cilicia at his own charges, [Id. ibid. epiſt. 9. & lib. 3. ad Quintum Fratr. epiſt. 2. & lib. 4. ad Attic. epiſt. 16.] whom Lentulus went to meet when he came into the Province, [Id. lib. 3. ad familiar. epiſt. 7.] after whom Appian undertaking the command, moſt miſerably ſubdued the Province, and almoſt deſtroyed it, [Id. ad Attic. lib. 5. epiſt. 16. & lib. 6. epiſt. 1.]

Whereas Craſſus ought to have proceeded with the ſame force, and making uſe of the feare the Barbarians were in, with which he had taken the fiſt places of Meſopotamia, to have attempted Babylon and Seleucia, Cities that were alwaies enemies to the Parthians : he was wearied with ſlaying in Meſopotamia ; and longing after eaſe and idleneſſe in Syria, he gave the Parthians time to provide themſelves for the war, and occaſions of diſtreſſing thoſe Roman ſouldiers that were left in Meſopotamia, [Plutarch, in Craſſo, Dio, lib. 40.]

He having diſpoſed Garrisons in thoſe Cities that had yeilded unto him, which were 7000 Foot, and a 1000 Horſe, he returned into Syria to winter there. Thither came his ſon P. Craſſus to him from Julius Cæſar out of Gallia, who had beſtowed upon him ſuch gifts as Generals uſe to do, and brought with him a 1000 choice horſe [Plutarch.]

Craſſus ſpending his time in Syria, was more like to a Publican than a General ; for he did not ſpend his time in providing of armes, nor training of his ſouldiers ; but did reckon up the Revenues of the Cities, and for many dayes was weighing and meaſuring the treaſures of the Goddeſſe of Hierapolis. He alſo demanded ſouldiers from divers people, and then for a ſum of money diſcharged them : and theſe things brought him into contempt. As they were going out of the Temple of the Goddeſſe of Hierapolis the young Craſſus fell upon the threshold, and preſently his father fell upon him, [Plutarch.] Hierapolis is that City which ſome call Bambyce, others Edeſſa, and the Syrians Magog : where the Syrian Goddeſſe Atargatis, called by the Grecians Deceeto, was worſhipped, [Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 748. Pliny, lib. 5. cap. 23.]

Rabirius Poſthumus, was accuſed before the Judges of treaſon becauſe he followed Ptolemei to Alexandria, for the money that he owed him, [Sueton, in Claudius, cap. 16.] for now Gabinus being condemned of extortion, and gone into baniſhment, C. Memmius accuſed Rabirius becauſe he was the cauſe that Gabinus went to Alexandria ; becauſe being made the King Decetes or overſeer, he had taken the coat of Alexandria, and had gathered money out of the tributes impoſed by Gabinus and himſelf. Cicero defended when it was pitifull cold weather, as may be gathered out of his oration, which is yet extant.

M. Craſſus, his ſonne Publius being killed and the army being diſcomfited, periſhed with ſhame and diſgrace, beyond the river Euphrates. [Cicero, lib. 2. de divinatione.] this diſcomfiture Dio declares in lib. 40. but Plutarch more fully in the life of Craſſus, out of whom all that age read in Appian, de Parthicis, are taken as it were word for word, wherefore it will be worth the labour to ſet down the principall parts of this moſt famous hiſtory, taken from thence, as Saluſtus hath done.

Orodes the King of the Parthians, ſent Embaſſadors into Syria unto Craſſus : who ſhould expoſtulate with him concerning the invaſion of Meſopotamia, and demand the reaſons why he made war, he ſent moreover Surana with an army to recover thoſe places that had been taken, or revolted : he himſelf took an expedition into Armenia, leaſt Artabazes the ſonne of Tigranes, who reigned there, and was afraid of his own Kingdom, ſhould ſend any aid to the Romans, [Dio.]

The Embaſſadors of Orodes came to Craſſus in Syria, as he was drawing his forces out of their winter quarters (although Florus relates that this was done in Meſopotamia, whenas Craſſus was encamped at Nicephorium) putting him in mind of the leagues that they had made with Pompey and Sylla : and withall declaring unto him ; that if his army was ſent againſt the Parthians by the people of Rome, that then they would have no peace with the Romans ; but if Craſſus had brought this war againſt the Parthians for his own private gain, and had ſeized upon his cities, that their King would uſe him more favourably, in conſideration of Craſſus his old age, and that he would ſend back his ſouldiers to the people of Rome : to which Craſſus, gaping after the Kings treaſures, answered nothing, nor pretending any imaginary cauſe of war but that he would answer them at Seleucia : [Florus lib. 3. cap. 11. Plutarch Dio.] then Vageſes the chief of the Embaſſadors ſmilng, and triking the palm of his right hand with the fingers of his left, ſaid, That hautes ſhould ſooner grow there, than that he ſhould ſee Seleucia, and ſo the Embaſſadors returned, telling King Orodes that he muſt prepare for war.

In the mean while certain ſouldiers who had been left in garrison in Meſopotamia, hardly hardly escaped with great danger, brought him news of the formidable multitude of the Parthians, what kind of arms they use, and their manner of fight, as they had learned by experience : which so much discouraged the Romans, that some of the Captains were of opinion that Crassus should stay and deliberate in council, concerning the whole business : among which was Cassius the Treasurer of Crassus, the Sooth-sayers also sought to deter him : but Crassus gave no ear to any of them.

He that chiefly encouraged Crassus was Artabazes the King of the Armenians, who came into his Camp with 6000 Horle, which were laid to be the Kings Guard. He promised him also other 10000 men at arms, and 30000 Foot, whom he would pay. He also persuaded Crassus that he should invade Parthia thorough Armenia, and that he would abundantly furnish his army, and that the march that way would be safer, by reason of the unevenness of the country, and so not so much in danger of the Horle, in which the Parthians did abound. But Crassus neglected this most wise counsel, and thanking the Armenian, sent him back, telling him that he would march thorough Mesopotamia where he had left many good soldiers of the Romans.

Whereupon he came to Zeugma, at the bank of Euphrates ; where he neglected the threatenings of many prodigies, which Plutarch and Dio mention. The chief of which was this, as it is noted in Julius Obsequens, in his book of prodigies. How a sudden tempest snatched the Standards from the Standard-bearer, and sunk it in the water : and how by a sudden darkness of the sky that fell, they were hindered from passing over, yet Crassus would on : and by Florus, [lib. 3. cap. 11.] thus, When the army had passed Zeugma, sudden, whirl-winds threw the Standards into Euphrates, where they sunk, Crassus also neglected the counsel of Cassius, who advised him, That he should refresh his army in some of the Cities, in which he had a Garrison, until he heard some certain news of the Parthians ; or else that he would march along the river to Seleucia, and so the ships would supply him with victual, and would follow the Camp, and that the river would keep the enemy from environing him.

As Crassus was considering on these things, Augarus, or Abgarus Ofoenus withdrew him from this whollom advice : for he is rightly filled by Dio ; who by Florus [lib. 3. cap. 11.] is called Mazares the Syrian, and the copies of the Breviary of Sextus Rufus varying, he is called Mazarus, Marachus, Macorus, and also Abgarus in Plutarch, he is called Ariamnes, a Captain of the Arabians : although in some Copies of Plutarch, and in those, out of which the Parthica of Appian are taken, he is found to be called Acbarus : this man was formerly in league with the Romans in Pompey's time, but now followed the Barbarians party. And whereas he was of the Parthians side, he made as though he was a great friend to Crassus, and liberally bestowing much money upon him, sought out all his counsels, and declared them to the Parthians : and when as Crassus had determined to march to Seleucia, and from thence to go to the City of Ctesiphon ; he persuaded him, that he should not take that counsel, because it would take up too much time, but that he should lead his army directly against Sillax and Surena, two of Orodes his Captains (leaving Euphrates behind him, which only could furnish him with victual, and be for a fortification to him.)

He then led his army through a vast Plain, both sandy and wanting water, where also was neither root nor green herb. And now Crassus began to suspect treason, especially when Artabazes sent Embassadors to him, that he could send him no forces, because he had a great war that lay upon him, for Orodes now wasted the Country of the Armenians ; but yet very earnestly advised Crassus to come into Armenia, and to join forces with him, that they both together might fight with Orodes : but if he were not pleased to do this, that he should be sure to find those places that were most convenient for Horle. Crassus angrily rejected this advice, and not vouchsafing to write to the King, told them, That he had no leisure to think upon Armenia, but that in his return he would punish the Armenian for his treachery : but immediately Abgarus, before his treachery was discovered, withdrew himself, when he had persuaded Crassus, that he might compass the enemies in, and route them.

They had not gone far, but that some few Scots came in (for the rest were killed by the enemy) telling them, That there were huge forces, who courageously marched on towards them : at this Crassus was astonished, and all the army was strooken with fear ; and Crassus at the first following Cassius his advice, set his battle wide, but presently changing his mind, he contracted his forces, and made it square and deep. He gave the leading of one wing to Cassius, the other to his son C. Publius, and he himself led the battle in the midst. As soon as they came to the river Balisus, most of the Commanders persuaded him to encamp, and to lodge there all night ; and in the mean time, to send to see what forces the enemy had, and how they were armed. This advice also Crassus rejected, because his son, and some of his Horle men, much desired desired to fight : and so he commanded them that would eat and drink, should do it standing, keeping their ranks : which before it could be done by all, he marched on with a disorderly march, not fair and softly, until the enemies were in view.

Surena shewed not his whole body at the first, neither the brightness of their arms, but let them in a convenient place for a terror to the Romans, whom they encountered with their lances to make break their ranks : but as soon as they saw the depth of the battle, and that the soldiers kept their ranks, they retired : and when as they seemed to be in disorder, before the Romans perceived it, they had on every side environed them. But when Crassus commanded his light Horle men to assail them, they had not marched far, but they were ill entertained with a shower of darts, and were driven to retire to the force of the armed men ; which gave the first beginning of fear and tumult, especially they seeing the force of the weapons that brake through all, and the greatness of the wounds.

The Parthians being thus hindered from them, began to shoot with their darts on every side upon the whole body of the army, that no dart fell in vain ; and with so great force, that it made either an horrible wound, or most commonly death ; and with so great constancy, that they did not cease from shooting even when they fled : and indeed the Romans were in hope, that when these darts were spent, that then they should come to handy-blows : but when they knew that there were many Camels laden with darts, from which they that had first spent their darts took a compass and fetched others ; then Crassus began to faint, perceiving that there would be no end of their shooting, until they were all killed with their darts : whereupon he commanded his son to endeavour by all means to joyne battle with the enemy, before they were wholly compassed about.

Young Crassus therefore taking with him 1300 Horle, (a 1000 whereof he had received from Caesar) and 500 Archers, and eight Ensigns of the next footmen who had Bucklers, gave a charge upon the Parthians ; who fleeing on purpose, withdrew him a good way off from his father : then turning about, they thrust them thorough with their darts on every side. Publius himself (whom Orodes commends as a most choice young man, [lib. 6. cap. 13. and Entropius, in lib. 6.] as a most famous and excellent young man) because he could not use his hand that was pierced thorough, commanded a gentleman to thrust him thorough the side. Centurius a Senator and Orator is said to have died in the like manner. Megabacchus a man valiant both in body and mind, thrust himself thorough, as did the rest of the Nobility : the rest getting to an Hill, were killed in fight by the Spears of the Parthians. There are but 500 laid to be taken prisoners.

They, having cut off Publius his head, marched towards Crassus, who expected the return of his son, during which time the enemy did not press to hard : but when as messenger came upon messenger, that Publius was clean lost, unless he were immediately succoured with a very strong party ; he intended to march with the whole army ; when as the enemies came upon him, with a terrible noise, being grown more fierce by reason of the victory, bringing the head of his son upon a Spear. That spectacle brake the hearts of the Romans, notwithstanding Crassus endeavours to hearten on his men, to extort from the enemy the joy they had received, and to revenge their cruelty : the battle is renewed, but seeing the Romans were on every side again wounded with their darts, many of whom died miserably ; for those who desperately, that they might escape the darts, came upon the enemy, were with great Lances forced into a narrow compass, with which at one thrust they strook thorough two bodies : until the night approaching, the Parthians retired, bragging that they would allow Crassus one night to bemoane his son.

That same night Octavius and Crassus called together the Centurions and Soldiers ; for Crassus being overwhelmed with sorrow for the publick and his own private loss, kept himself in the dark with his head covered : whereas the fear of what was to come forced the rest of the army to advise about flying, the army in all places began to dislodge without any sound of Trumpet : but whereas those that were weak perceived themselves to be forsaken, there was great tumult and confusion, and all the Camp was filled with howling and lamentation : the fear and astonishment seized upon those that marched, because they thought the enemy would be raised by this noise, and come and set upon them : and indeed the enemy did know that they were removing, but neglected to pursue them ; three hundred light-horlemen, under their Captain Egnatius late in the night came to Carræ, and calling to the watch, commanded them to tell Coponius the Governour, that Crassus had had a great fight with the Parthians ; but said not a word more, and marched hastily to the Zeugma. Coponius by the confusion of the speech (supposing that no good news was told him, presently armed his men, and meeting Crassus who marched slowly by reason of his wounded men, he received him with his army into the City.

As soon as it was day, the Parthians go to the Romans Camp, and there put to death 4000 that were left there. Many also their Horse men took up as they were wandering in the plain: among these there were four cohorts, whom in the same night Vargunteus a Lieutenant lead, and had lost their way by night: these getting to an hill, the Parthians compassing them in, killed them all in fight, except twenty Souldiers: who breaking through the middle of the enemy, came safe to Carræ. Orofius also mentions this slaughter of Vargunteus, [lib. 6. cap. 13.]

Surenas being uncertain whether Crassus and Cassius were at Carræ, or fled to some other place, sends certain men to Carræ, that he might know the truth, under a colour of making a league with the Romans, if they would yield up Mesopotamia: which when the Romans approved of, because all things were in a desperate condition with them, and demanded time and place for the meeting of Crassus and Surenas. Surenas understanding that the enemy was shut up in Carræ, the next day he came before it with his whole army, and exceedingly fraintaining the Town, commanded the Romans, That if they would have any truce, that they should deliver Crassus and Cassius prisoners. Hereupon the Romans exceedingly lamented, that they were to be cheated, and casting off all hopes of any aide from the Armenians, they thought how they might escape by flight.

This counsel was to be kept secret from any of the Carrenians, yet Crassus declared it to Andromachus, the most perfidious of all men, whom also he took to be his guide in his march. Whereupon the Parthians knew all their counsels, by the treachery of Andromachus, and because it is neither the custome, nor safe, for the Parthians to fight by night: but Crassus went out by night; and least the enemy should be too much behind them that fled. Andromachus led them, some one way, some another, and at last brought them into deep bogs, and places that were full of ditches: there were some who suspected Andromachus his often turnings, and would not follow him; for Crassus retired to Carræ, and from thence with 500 men, took his way into Syria. Others having gotten faithfull guides, took the way of the mountains, which they call Synaca, and before day, were retired into a safe place, and those were almost five thousand men, over whom Octavius, a valiant man, was Commander.

But the day overtook Crassus, who was intangled in those difficult places and bogs, by the treachery of Andromachus, he with four cohorts of legionary Souldiers, and a few Horse men, and five Lieutors, having gotten out of those fastnesses with great pains, the enemy even now approaching, he fled to another hill, within twelve furlongs from Octavius, not so fortified, nor so steep for Horses: but being under the Synaca, and joynted to it with a long neck that stretched through the middle of the whole plain, so that Octavius could not but see the danger that Crassus was in: and therefore he first, with a few others came to his aide, and the rest chiding one the other followed him, and beating the enemy from the hill, received Crassus into the middle of them, and covering him with their Targets, spake nobly, That no weapon of the Parthians could touch the body of their General, till they had killed them that defended him to the last man.

Wherefore Surenas seeing the Parthians not so courageous as they were wont to be, and that it was a dangerous thing to fight with desperate men, especially they fighting from an higher place; and if perchance night should overtake them, that then the Romans could not be taken, they keeping the mountains, but that they would go to the Armenians, and so might be a means of renewing the war, (as Dio saith) he plor'd another treachery and falsehood: he let some prisoners go free, who had heard some Barbarians say on purpose, That their King was not altogether averse from making peace with the Romans, that he would use Crassus with all the civility that might be, if it could be effected by his means. In the mean while, the Barbarians forbore to fight: and Surenas with some noble men, came near the hill with his bow unbent; and holding forth his right hand, invited Crassus to make a league with him: and told him, That he had had experience of the force of the Parthians; yet now, if he would, he should have experience of his humanity. Crassus did not assent unto him, whom for good cause he had reason to be afraid of, as who saw no reason of this sudden change.

But the Souldiers demanded peace even with reproaches to Crassus; he endeavoured by entreaties and reason to persuade them, that they would hold out but the rest of the day, and that at night they should march through mountainous places, and that they would not break off the hopes of a safety that was to near them: but when they began to mutiny, and beating of their harness, began to threaten him: being affrighted, he went towards the enemy, but turning about to his own men, he said, Ten, if Octavius and Petronius, and all you Roman Commanders that are here with me, see, what violence is upon me, yet, if ever any of you shall come off safely, tell, that Crassus was deceived by his enemies, and not delivered up by his own citizens. Which he might seem to have said, as it were saying by this friendly speech if he could alluage their obstinate minds, w^hilft he provides for their honour, but Octavius and the rest staid not on the hill but went down with him: the Lieutors that would follow him for his honours sake, Crassus himself forbade.

The first who came from the Barbarians were two mungrell Grecians, who dismounting from their horses worshipped him, and saluted him, in Greek, desiring him that he would send some before to see if Surenas and the rest that came to parly, whether they came unarmed, he presently sent two Rosci that were brothers, whom Surenas staid, and coming on horseback, whereas Crassus was a foot, he commanded an horse to be brought to him, and that he should go to the rivers side to write the articles of the peace, because the Romans were not very mindfull of their covenants, and withall gave him his right hand, and when Crassus sent for an horse, he told him there was no great need, for the King, saith he, giveth you this, presently there was brought him an horse with a golden bridle, upon which the grooms mounted Crassus: and following him behind lashed him, then Octavius first took hold of the bridle, and after him Petronius one of the Colonels, and then the rest of the Romans came about him to stay the horse, and to take him from them that pressed upon Crassus on every side.

And whereas at first they were jostling and thrusting one the other, at last they came to blows. Octavius drew his sword and killed a groom one of the Barbarians, another kills Octavius, striking him behind: Petronius had no weapon, but being strook upon his coat of mail lighted from his horse, and had no hurt, but Promantheiros or Manthes by name a Parthian killed Crassus, or as others will have it, cut off his head and right hand, as he lay dead. Dio leaves it in doubt, whether he were killed by his own men, least he should come alive into the enemies hands, or whether he was slain by the enemies. Livy relateth lib. 106. that he was taken, and making resistance, least he should suffer any thing being alive, was killed: himself being allowed to parly, had upon a sign given by the enemy, come quick into their hands; if the resistance of the tribunes, had not moved the Barbarians to prevent the fight of the general: as Florus saith in lib. 3. cap. 11. and Sextus Rufus following him, in his brevity to Valentinian the Emperour, Crassus himself being allowed to a parly, might have been taken alive, but by the resistance of the tribunes he escaped, and whilst he sought to fly was killed.

This Surenas the General of the Parthians took Crassus by treachery, and killed him at Sinnaca a city of Mesopotamia [Strabo lib. 16. pag. 747.] although he had rather have taken him alive. [Orofius lib. 6. cap. 13.] Velleius Paterculus saith that he was killed with most part of the Roman army. [lib. 2. cap. 46.] Pliny saith, that all the Lucanian Souldiers were killed with him, of which there were many in the army. [lib. 2. cap. 56.] Jornandes writes, that they lost eleven legions almost, and their General also. [de regno. succession.] it is said that the number of those that were slain were 20000: and of those that were taken alive by the enemy 10000: as it is in Plutarch. Appian affirms, that of an 100000 scarce 10000 fled into Syria. [lib. 2. bell. civil. pag. 438.] that these things were done in the month of June, Ovid shews in lib. 6. Fastorum, in the middle of Summer (aurifera res siquæ) saith Dio in lib. 40. of his histories: where also he addeth, that the Parthians at this time recovered all their country again that lay within the river Euphrates.

The remains of the Roman army shunning each man for himself, being scattered by flight into Armenia, Cilicia, and Syria: did scarce afford a man alive to bring the news of the overthrow. [Florus lib. 3. cap. 18.] as soon as this overthrow was known, many provinces of the East had revolted from the alliance and protection of the people of Rome, unless Crassus gathering together a few souldiers of them that fled, had quitted Syria that began to grow proud with great vertue and moderation. [Orof. lib. 6. cap. 13.] this is that Crassus who would not accept of the command that the souldiers offered him at Carræ in meer hate to Crassus, and Crassus also himself willingly yielded to it considering the greatness of his losse: yet now being compelled by necessity, took upon him the government of Syria. [Dio lib. 40.] he was also the treasurer of Crassus who kept Syria within the command of the people of Rome, and was also the same C. Crassus, who together with Brutus, afterwards killed Julius Cæsar. [Velleius Paterculus lib. 2. cap. 46. together with 56. & 58.]

Surenas sent the head and right hand of Crassus to Orodes, into Armenia: and he pread a report by messengers of his own, at Seleucia, that he brought Crassus alive having dressed up one Caius a captive who was very like him, and so made a ridiculous shew, which in disgrace they called a triumph. [Plutarch.]

In the mean time Orodes was reconciled wth Artabazes, or Artarates the Armenian, having betrothed his sister to his sonne Pacoras: and there they made feasts feasts and revels, in which were many Greek verses (sung: for Orodes understood the Greek tongue, and was a Scholar: and Artavagdas also had written Tragedies, and Orations, and Histories: there as Jason the Tragedian of Trallis was singing some verses out of the Bacchis of Euripides, concerning Agave, Syllaxes came into the dining room, and threw the head of Craesus before them, which Pomaxathres, or Maxathres, rising from supper, took to himself, as though it did more belong to him than the other. [Id.]

Among other indignities, some report, that the Parthians poured melted gold into the mouth of Craesus, insulking also over him in words; amongst whom is Florus; whose words concerning this matter are these, [lib. 3. cap. 11.] The head and right hand of Craesus was brought to the King, and made sport for him, nor that unsiftly; for they poured melted gold in at his open mouth, that he whose mind was on fire with the desire of gold, while he was alive, his dead and bloodless carcase might be burnt with gold: like to which both Sextus Rufus hath in his Breviary, and Jorandus who follows him.

Surenas not long after, suffered a punishment worthy of his perjury, being killed by Orodes who envied his honour, [Plutarch, in Craesus.]

At Rome M. Cicero was made Augur in the room of young Craesus, who was killed in the Parthian war, [Id. in Cicero.]

Craesus the father being dead at that time, one head of Varro his three-headed faction is cut off, and a foundation laid of the civil wars between Pompey and Caesar: for Craesus being killed who was above them both, it remained to Caesar, that he might become the greatest, to dispatch him that was above him, [Plutarch, in Craesus & Pompeius.]

Nec ququam jam ferre potest, Caesaris priorem, Pompeium parem. [Lucan, lib. 1.]

Caesar would no superiour fear,
Nor Pompey any equal bear.

3952. During an interregnum there was a decree of the Senate made, that neither any Consul nor any Praetor should have by lot any foreign province till after the fifth year of his Magistracy: which also a little after was confirmed by Pompey, [Dio, lib. 40.] who by the Interrex Servius Sulpicius on the V. Kalend of March in an intercalary month (about the beginning, namely of the Julian December) was created Consul, [Alcon, Pedian, in orat. Milonian.]

The Parthians invaded Syria, but with no great army, because they thought the Romans had there neither Souldiers nor General; wherefore Cassius easily repulled them, [Dio, lib. 40.]

Cassius coming to Tyrus, arrived also in Judea, when at his first entrance he took Tarichaea, and led from thence about 3000 Jews prisoners. He put to death also Pitholaus, because he had entertained Aristobolus his faction, which he did at the persuasion of Antipater, who could do very much with him: for Antipater, seeing he was in great credit with the Idumaeans, fought by curtesies and familiarity the friendship of others who were in power: especially he joyined in affinity to him, the King of the Arabians, to whose custody he committed his children during the war that he had with Aristobolus: but Cassius having forced Aristobolus the son of Alexander to be quiet by conditions, removed his camp to Euphrates, to keep the Parthians from passing over, [Joseph, lib. 1. Bell, cap. 6. lib. 14. Antiquit, cap. 12.]

3953. M. Marcellus, and C. Sulpitius, being Consuls, the league is renewed with the Rhodians: in which it is provided, that one people shall not make war on the other, but send mutual aides one to the other. The Rhodians also swore, that they would have the same enemies that the Senate and the people of Rome should have, [P. Lentulus apud Cicero, lib. 12. ad familiar, epist. 15. cum Appian, lib. 4. Bell, civil, pag. 627, 630.] and by this means Ptolemaeus Apamensis, who had a Schoole at Rhodes, seems to have come to Rome, M. Marcellus being Consul, as we read in Suidas [in voc. noroddin@] a very noble Philosopher, Mathematician, and Historian: a Sphere of whose making Cicero in lib. 2. of his divination, maketh mention of. If any body should carry this Globe into Scythia or Britain, which of late our familiar friend made, whose each turning performs the same in the Sun and Moon and the other five Planets, as it does in the heaven each day and night: who in that barbarity would doubt, but that this was a most exact Sphere?

Whereas by the decree of the Senate, and by the law Pompey made the year before, none could obtain any either Consular or Praetorian province, unless he had been Consul or Praetor five years before. M. Calpurnius Bibulus, who had been Consul seven years before, and M. Tullius Cicero who had been Consul eleven years before, and and yet had never been sent into any province, had by lot, Bibulus Syria, and Cicero Cilicia: concerning Syria, Dio is witness, lib. 40. and of Cilicia, Cicero himself, lib. 3. ad familiar, epist. 2. which he wrote being now designed Proconsul to Appius Pulcher, the Captain General, whom he was to succeed (for the army had given him the title of Captain General, because he had commanded well in the wars in Cilicia) in which he signifieth that it happened both against his will, and beyond any thought of his, that he should necessarily go to command in his Province by the decree of the Senate. But Cicero had for his Lieutenant, his brother Quintus Tullius, C. Pomponius, L. Tullius, and M. Annius: his Quaestors were L. Messius and Cn. Volusius. Plutarch relates in the life of Cicero, that he had in his army 12000 Foot, and 2600 Horse. He himself saith, That he had the name only of two Legions, and those very thin, [lib. 5. ad Attic, epist. 15.] which army was scarce able to defend one Town, as M. Caelius wrote to him, [Ibid, lib. 8. epist. 5.]

On the XI. Kalend of June (which as the year was then accounted at Rome, fell upon the sixth day of the Julian March,) Cicero, going into his Province, came to Brundisium, thence he met with Q. Fabius, the Lieutenant of Appian Claudius Pulcher, whom he was to succeed: who told him, that he needed a greater force to command that Province: and almost all were of opinion, that the Legions of Cicero and Bibulus should be supplied out of Italy: which the Consul Servius Sulpicius positively denied to yield to: but yet there was such a general consent of the Senate, that Cicero and Bibulus should suddenly be dispatched, that he was fain at last to yield, and so it was done, [Ibid, lib. 3. epist. 3.]

Before the civil war of Caesar and Pompey on the seventh of the Julian March, a little after noon, there happened an horrible eclipse of the Sun, of ten parts and an half, concerning which Dio saith, [lib. 40.] ἡ δὲ ὥρα πλεονεκτήσθη, the whole Sun was eclipsed, and Lucan, [lib. 1.]

Cicero loosing from Brundisium, came to Actium, the XVII. Kalend of July, (the 29 day of the Julian March) and then taking his journey by land, came to Ancon on the VII. of the Kalends of July, (the eight day of April) [lib. 5. ad Attic, epist. 9, & 10.] whereas the day before he came thither, Memmius (who was condemned, for unlawful bribery for an office, and was then in banishment) was gone to Mytilene, [Ibid, epist. 21.]

In the month of the Julian April, Ptolemaeus Auletes died, concerning whom M. Caelius in an Epistle to M. Cicero, written from Rome on the Kalends of August (the 15. day of the Julian May) [lib. 8. ad familiar, epist. 4.] whereas C. Marcellus was chosen Consul for the next year. News was brought, and it is accounted for certain, that the King of Alexandria is dead. He left his heirs, of his two sons the eldest, and of two daughters, the also that was the eldest: and that this might be so, Ptolemy in the same Will, did humbly beseech the people of Rome by all the gods, and by the league that he had made with them at Rome. The copy of his Will, (one whereof was sent to Rome by his Embassadors, that it might be laid up in the Treasury, and another, after the same example) was left and kept sealed up at Alexandria, [Cesar, lib. 3. Commentar, Bell, civil.]

Wherefore in this Testament it was commanded, that his eldest son Ptolemy, after the ancient custom of the Egyptians, should be married to Cleopatra his eldest daughter, and that both of them should possess the Kingdom, but so notwithstanding that they should be under the tuition of the people of Rome. [Dio, lib. 10.] concerning which Cleopatra speaks to Caesar, [in Lucan, lib. 10.]

*— non urbes prima tenebo

Et thalami cum fratre dedi.*

I am not the first woman that have sway'd
The Pharian Scepter: Egypt has obey'd
A Queen; not Sex excepted: I desire
Thine read the will of my deceased Sire
Who left me there a partner to enjoy
My brothers Crown and marriage-bed —

The copy of this will being brought to Rome, seeing because of publick employments it could not be put in the Treasury, it was deposited with Pompey, Calane, lib. 3. Bell. civil. who as Eutropius relates, was made Tutor to the new King by reason of his young years. [lib. 6.]

M. Cicero having stayed those ten days at Athens, the day before the Nones of July (the 19 of the Julian Month) departed from thence; [lib. 2, ad familiar. epist. 8], to which day, according to the Haven Piræum, was carried by a certain wind to Zoster, which kept him there till the Nones. The VIII of the Ides (the 25 day of April) he came to the Village of Cios, from thence to Gyarus, from thence to Scyros, from thence to Delos; [lib. 5, ad Attic. epist. 12]; The XI, Kalend of August (the 5 day of the Julian May) he came to Ephesus: failing the flower by reason of the weakness of the Rhodian barks. Thither came to him an incredible multitude; and the Grecians very willingly offered themselves unto him, as if he had been the Prætor of Ephesus. [Id. epist. 13]; but the Prætor of the Asiatic Governments (which were separated from the province of Cilicia) was Q. Thermus who was then at Ephesus: with whom Cicero conferred concerning a business of his Lieutenant M. Amicus, who had a controvertise with the Sardinians, and unto whom, both for him and for others, he afterwards writ many Epistles; [lib. 13, ad familiar. epist. 53, 54, 55, 56, 57]; & lib. 5, ad Attic. epist. 20]; but that P. Silius was Prætor of Bithynia at that time, is gathered out of the 13 Books; [ad familiar. epist. 61].

P. Nigidius expected Cicero at Ephesus, returning to Rome from his Embassage, a very learned man; Cratippus also came thither from Mitylene to see and salute Cicero, who was at that time the chiefest of all the Peripateticks: as Cicero himself witnesseth in the preface to Plato his Timæus, translated into Latine by himself.

Leaving Ephesus, Cicero went to Tralli, in a very dry and dusty way, lib. 5. ap. Attic. epist. 14.] The VI. kalend of August (the 30 day of the Julian May) he came to Tralli, where there met him L. Lucilius with letters from Appian Pulcher, lib. 3. ad familiar. epist. 5.] by which he understood among other things, that a mutiny of the soldiers was appeased by Appius, and that they were all payed even to the Ides of July, lib. 3. ad. Attic. epist. 14.]

July 13, 34, before the Kalends of August (the 14 day of the Julian May) Sulpitius and Marcellus being Confuls, Cicero came to Laodicea, into a province (undone and even overthrow'n Ap' Appius) from which day the yearly Magistracy, committed to him by the Senate, began to be reckoned. (Lib. 5, ad Attic. epist. 5, 16, 80, 31, cum lib. 3, ad familiar. epist. 6, & lib. 15, epist. 12, & 4.) But whereas Cicero understood by the Cypriot Embassadors, who came to meet him at Ephesus, that Scæpius the Governour of Appius in Cyprus befieged the Senate in their Senate-house in Salamine with some Troops of Horie, that he might famish some of the Senators: what day he first entered the province he sent letters, that the Horfmen should immediately depart the Island. (Lib. 5, ad Attic. epist. 21, & lib. 6, epist. 1.)

When as he (law by reason of the time of the year, he most presently go to the army, having stayed three days at Laodicea, (whilst the money was received which was owed him from the publick exchange) the III. Nonc of August (the 17 of the Julian May) he made a journey to Apamea: and there tarried four or five days, three at Synnada, and five at Philomelium : in which Town when as there was a great concourse of people, he freed many Cities from most grievous tributes, and heavy usuries and great debts, [lib. 3. ad familiar. epist. 5. & lib. 15. epist. 4. cum lib. 5. ad Asiac. epist. 15. & 20. &c.]

Appius Claudius, whereas by the law Cornelia (of Cornelius Sylla the Dictator) there were thirty dayes granted for one to depart the province after the coming of a Succellour: in those dayes far in judgement at Tarlus, in which Cicero did the like at Apamea, Synnada, and Philomelium, [lib. 3. ad familiar. epist. 6. & 8. cum lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 16. 17.]

M. Bibulus the Proconsul, about the Ides of August (the 25 of the Julian May) departed from Ephesus by shipping with a very prosperous gale into Syria his province, [lib. 15. ad familiar. epist. 3.] whom when the Senate had permitted to raise soldiers in Asia, he would make no murther, [ibid. epist. 1.] for the Auxiliaries of the Allies were were through the sharpness and injuries of the government of the Romans, either so weakened, that they could help them but little; or so alienated from them, that there was little to be expected from them, neither did any thing seem fit to be committed unto them. Ibid.

Whereas before the coming of Cicero into the Province, the army was scattered through a sedition, five Cohorts, without any Lieutenants, without any Colonel, yet without any Centurion, stayed at Philomelium, the rest of the army was in Lycania. Cicero commanded his Lieutenants, M. Annius, that he should conduct those five Cohorts to the rest of the army : and having rallied the whole army in one place, that he should encamp at Iconium in Lycia : which when he had exactly done : Cicero came into the Camp the VII. Kalends of September. (the seventh day of the Julian June.) Seeing that in some days before, according to the decree of the Senate, he had got together a good band of Souldiers newly raised, and good store of Horses, and Voluntary Auxiliaries of free people, and of Kings their Allies, [libid. capit. 4.]

Dejotarus the son, who was declared King by the Senate, took with him into his Kingdom Cicero's sons, whilst M. Cicero made war in the Summer quarters. (lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 17, 18.) Plutarch delivers, (in lib. de Stoicorum repugnantiis.) That Dejotarus the father, that he might settle the Kingdom upon this one son, put to death all his other sons: but of both the Dejotari, father and son, who both reigned together; Cicero makes mention in the XI. Philippicho, with great commendation of them both.

Pacorus, the son of Orodes, King of the Parthians, with whom was married the sister of the King of the Armenians; with great forces of the Parthians, and a great band of other Nations besides: passing over the Euphrates, made war in the Province of Syria. [lib. 15. ad familiar. epist. 122, 34. & lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 18.] but indeed
 Orodes was General, Pacorus only bearing the name of General, for he was not yet past 15 years of age. [Dio lib. 40.]

15 years of age, and being thus gone into Syria, and having reduced under their power all places that lay in their way, came as far as to Antioch, with an hope of winning also the rest: for neither did the Romans keep that Province with a full army and a people hardly enduring the domineering of the Romans, did incline to the Parthians, as to their neighbours and familiar friends. [Idem, lib. 1.] Also Lucius Vibulus was not yet come into that Province, for that Province was appointed to him, when he was sent to Cicero, it was reported, that for this cause he came far into the Province, that it might be late ere he departed it. [Cicero, lib. 5. ad Atticum, lib. 6. et 18.]

Cicero, in the III. Kalends of September, (the II. of the Julian June) mustered his army at Iconium; [lib. 3, ad Attic. epist. 19.] The Kalends or III. of the Nones of September, came to the Camp at Iconium; who first brought Cicero news, That great forces of the Parthians began to pass the Euphrates: and that it was said, That the Armenian King would make an invasion upon Cappadocia. Which news when it was brought him, although there were some that thought, that there was not much credit to be given to that King; yet Cicero was much troubled, both for Syria, and for his own Province, and indeed for all Asia. Wherefore he thought it fit that the army should be conducted through Lycania, and the Country of the Iaurians, and through that part of Cappadocia, which joyned to Cilicia; [lib. 15, ad familiar. epist. 1, 2, 3, 4.]

Wherefore after he had stayed ten dayes at Iconium, he diflodged his army, and incamped at the Town Cybistra, in the farthest part of Cappadocia, not far from Mount Taurus. That Artavases the Armenian King, whatsoever he intended, should know that the army of the people of Rome was not far from their borders, and that he and the Parthians might supple themselves thus out of Cappadocia, and so he should defend Cilicia that bordered upon them, and keeping Cappadocia, might hinder any new deviles of the neighbouring Kings; who though they were friends of the people of Rome, yet durst not be openly enemies to the Parthians. [lib. 5. ad. Attic. epist. 20. & lib. 5. ad familiar. epist. 2. & 4.]

Cicero sent his Horse from Cybistra into Cilicia, that the news of his coming being declared to the Cities in that part, the minds of men might be the more confirmed to him : and that he might quickly hinder what was done in Syria. [lib. 15. ad familiar. epist. 2.]

There he took special care for the service that was enjoined him by the Senate. That he should defend Ariobarzanes, the King of the Cappadocians; and provide that both he and his Kingdom might be in safety: and whereas the King himself, with his brother Ariarathes, and some of his fathers ancient friends came to the Camp to the Proconsul (where he staid three or four daies, as is gathered out of lib. 6. ad Attic. epist. 2.) and complained of treasours that were laid for his life, and desired that some horse and foot of the Roman army, might be a guard for him: Cicero exhorted his friends that they should defend with all care and diligence, the life of their King being taught by the lamentable example of his father; and exhorted the King, that he should learn to reign by preferring his own life, from whom he was certainly assured that treason was plotted against him, then he might use at his pleasure: that he might punish those that there was necessity to punish, and free the rest from fear, that he should use the guard of the Roman army more for terror to those that were in fault, then for contention: and that it would come to passe, that all, when they shall know the decree of the Senate, should understand, that he would be a guard to the King, wherefore there shall be any need, concerning whom in the end (of that second epistle) to the Consuls and Senate, Cicero saith that he was more careful to certify them, because that in King Ariobarzanes there were such tokens of virtue, wit, fidelity, and good will towards them: that they did not seem without good cause to give him such a charge of his preservation.

Cicero settled in great favour and authority Mithras and Athenaus whom Ariobarzanes had banished through the importunity of Athenaus, and whereas there would great war be raised in Cappadocia, if the priest of the Comanians; whom as Hierus confirmeth in his book [de bell. Alexandrin.] was accounted the next after the King in majesty, command and power, by the content of that nation (should defend himself by arms, as was thought he would do; he being a young man, and provided with horse and foot, and money, and allies also who would faine see some innovations, Cicero brought it to passe, that he departed the Kingdom; and so the King obtained the Kingdom: with honour, without any tumult, or war, the authority of his court being more confirmed unto him, [Ibid. epist. 4.] although he in another epistle thought, that there was nothing more pilled than that Kingdom, nothing more poor than that King. [lib. 6. ad Attic. epist. 1.]

And after this manner was the Kingdom of Ariobarzanes preserved with the King himself. [Cato. in epist. 5. lib. 15. ad familiar.] and Cappadocia is reconciled to his obedience without arms, and with much good liking. [Plutarch. in Ciceron.] concerning whom this Cicero brags of himself to Atticus [lib. 5. epist. 20.] Ariobarzanes lives and reigns by my means, in modo, by the by, by my advice and authority: and because I kept my self & yours free from access to them, that lay in wait for him and not only so but also for his brother, free from bribes I preserved both King and Kingdom.

In the mean time Cicero knew by many letters and messages, that Cassius (Bibulus being yet absent out of Syria) was with an army at Antioch, and great forces both of the Parthians, and Arabians, were come to Antioch; and there that a great body of horse, which had passed into Cilicia, were all killed, by those troupes of horse he himself had sent thither, and by a Praetorian cohort, which was in garrison at Epiphania: and that the Parthians were in Cynhestica a part of Syria, that was next to Cilicia: when therefore he saw that the forces of the Parthians were turned from Cappadocia, not far from the borders of Cilicia; he left Cylistra of Cappadocia, (when he had encamped five daies) and conducted the army into Cilicia; and in the borders of Lycania, and Cappadocia, the XIII of the Kalends of October (the 30 day of the Julian June) he received letters both from Tarcondimous and from Jamblichus a governor of the Arabians, who were accounted friends of the Roman commonwealth, declaring that Pacorus with a great body of Parthian horse was passed Euphrates, and encamped at Tyba: concerning which he presently wrote to the Consuls, and Senate. [lib. 15. ad familiar. ep. 12. & 4. com lib. 5. ad Attic. ep. 18. & 20.]

A rumour of the coming of Cicero, both encouraged Cassius, who was in a manner besieged in Antioch, and cast a fear upon the Parthians, they departed therefore from Antioch before the coming of Bibulus being happily driven back by Cassius: who also pursued them in their retreat from the town, and did execution upon them. [lib. 5. ad Attic. ep. 20. 21. & lib. 2. ad familiar. ep. 20.] which history Dio thus declares more fully.

When the Parthians were put by the hopes of taking Antioch, Cassius stoutly repelling them, (for they are very awkward at the forming of places) they marched towards Antigonia: the suburbs of which city are planted with trees, and so they neither durst, nor could come near it: they intended to cut down the trees, and to clear the place of the wood, that they might more boldly fer upon the city on that side: but when this would not succeed neither, both because it was a business of great labour; and time was trifled away in vain, and Cassius also licked up any stragglers, they retreated from Antigonia, intending to let upon another place: in the mean time Cassius having placed ambushes in the way they were to passe, flew himself to them with a few, to draw them to pursue him, then he turned upon them. [Dio. lib. 40.] where Oracles the great commander of the Parthians received a wound, whereof he died a few daies after. [Cicero, lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 20.]

In Julius, [lib. 40. cap. 4.] this story is not so truly written, Pacorus being sent to pursue the remnants of the Roman army, after he had achieved many enterprises of Syria, he was called home again, as mistrustfully his father: in which absence, the army of the Parthians that was left in Syria, was with all the captives thereof slain by Cassius the treasurer of Crassus.

Livy declares that C. Cassius the treasurer of M. Crassus slew the Parthians, who had marched into Syria. [lib. 108.] Velleius, that he with great success routed and overthrew the Parthians, that came over into Syria. [lib. 2. cap. 45.] Sexus Ruitus in breviario, that he with great admiration fought against the Parthians, (for he calls the Parthians) who made an irruption into Syria, and utterly destroyed them being driven beyond Euphrates: [Eutropius in lib. 6.] that with singular valour, and great virtue, he restored the state when it was even lost, so that he overcame the Persians in divers battles; to which may be added that of Orofius [lib. 6. cap. 13.] concerning this same Cassius. He overcame in battle, and slew Antiochus, and his great forces: and by way drove out the Parthians that were sent into Syria, by Orodes: and were entered as far as Antioch, and killed also their general Oracles, and that of Cicero, in the 11. Philippick, he did many gallant things, before the coming of Bibulus the chief commander; whereas he utterly routed the greatest commander's and great forces of the Parthians, and freed Syria, from an horrible invasion of the Parthians: for it deserves no credit, that which is added concerning Cassius in the 14. Chapot of the Jewish History, which being set forth in Arabic, carries the title of the second book of the Maccabees, he passing over Euphrates, conquered the Persians, and brought them under the obedience of the Romans: he also reduced to their obedience, those 22. Kings that Pompey had subdued: and brought under their obedience whatsoever was in the countries of the East, for we have already heard-out of Orofius [lib. 6. cap. 6.] how Pompey bragged that he had made war with twenty two Kings.

The day before the Kalends of Apollo made a decree, that into Cilicia and into eight other provinces should henceforward be sent Proprætors, who formerly had been Prætors at Rome; but yet never had any command in any province. [lib. 8. ad familiar. ep. 8.]

Cicero marching with his army by the freights of Taurus into Cilicia, came the III Nones of October (the 16 day of the Julian July) to Taurus. [lib. 5. ad Attic. ep. 20.]

On the Nones of October, (the 15. day of the Julian July) on the same day were read in the Senate, the letters of Cassius declaring his victory; wherein he wrote, that of himself he had finished the Parthian war: as also the letters of Cicero, declaring the Parthian tumult, whereupon there was little credit given to Cassius his letters. [lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 22.] and the same day Cicero went from Taurus towards Amanus: [lib. 5. ad familiar. epist. 8.] which mountain belonged both to him and Bibulus, and it divides Syria from Cilicia, by the separation of the waters, and full of everlasting enemies. [Ibid. lib. 1. epist. 10. & lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 20.]

The next day (the 19. of the Julian July) he encamped in the plain of Moplectia: from whence he wrote the eighth epistle [lib. 3. ad familiar.] to Appius Pulcher, (whom he succeeded in the Proconsulship) in which may be read this, If you ask concerning the Parthians, I think there were none; those Arabians that were, who were habited like Parthians, are said to be all returned, they deny that there was any enemy in Syria: for when Cicero was come to Amanus, he knew that the enemy was returned from Antioch; and that Bibulus was at Antioch; and from thence he certified Deiotarus who was in all haste coming unto him with a great army of horse, and foot, and all his forces: that he saw no cause why he should come out of his Kingdom: and that he would immediately send letters and messengers to him, if by chance any extraordinary matter should fall out. [lib. 15. ad familiar. epist. 4.]

But when Cicero considered that it did extremely concern both provinces, to settle Amanus, and to take away a perpetual enemy from that mountain, and go to some other parts of Cilicia, and when he was gone about a daies journey from Amanus, and had encamped at Epiphania: the III Ides of October (the 23 of the Julian July) when it began to grow towards evening, he marched with his army in all haste: to that at the III. Ides of October, as soon as it was day, he went up the Amanus. [Ibid.]

Having marshalled his cohorts and auxiliaries, over which he himself with his brother Quintus his Lievetenant commanded some, others his Lievetenant, C. Pomptinus, and the rest M. Anneius and L. Tullius commanded; and came suddenly upon them before they were aware: many were killed, many taken, and the rest were scattered. Egerana (or rather Erana) which was not like a village but a city, because it was the principal town of Amanus: and also Sepyra, and Cerninoris (or Commori) which both stoutly and a long time made resistance, Pomptinus keeping that part of Amanus, from break of day till ten of the clock, were taken, and a great multitude of the enemy slain; six Castles well fortified were taken by their sudden coming; and more burnt; when they had done this Cicero encamped at the foot of the Amanus, at the altars of Alexander, by the river Iliuwin, which place Darius was overcome by Alexander, there he spent four days, in destroying the reliques of Amanus, that belonged to his Province, and in waiting the Country: and for the obtaining of so just a victory, he was called by the army Imperator, or Captain General: and so having spoiled and wasted Amanus on the sixth day he departed from Amanus: [Ibid. cum lib. 2. epist. 20. lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 20. Plutarch in Cicero.]

In the mean time Bibulus coming to Amanus, he began to look for a lawrel in a mustard tree, and gape after the vain name of Captain General; but he had a great loss, for he wholly lost his prime Cohort, and a Centurion of the Vanguard, a Noble man, one Atilius Dentus, a kinsman of his own, and all the rest of the same Cohort: and Sextus Lucilius, a Colonel (the son of T. Gravius Cæpio, a rich and renowned man) [lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 20.]

Cicero brought his army to the most dangerous part of Cilicia, which was inhabited by the Eleuthero-ciles, cruel and fierce men, and who were provided of all things for defence; who seeing they never had obeyed their Kings, entertained at this time fugitives, and were daily in expectation of the coming of the Parthians: he set upon Pindenissa, a Town of theirs; that was seated in a steep and well fortified place, the 57. day before the Saturnalia, (the XII. Kalend. of November, or the first of the Julian July) he compassed it about with a Rampart and a Trench; and kept them in with six Castles, and very great Brigades: he assailed it with a Mount, Engines and a most high Tower: he made use of many archers, and great force of Engines for battery: as Cicero himself signifieth in an epistle to M. Cælius Rufus chorien Edile, which was written on the 25. day of the siege (the 25. of August) [lib. 2. ad familiar. epist. 10.] and also in his letters to M. Cato, [lib. 1. epist. 4.] and to Pomponius Atticus, [lib. 5. epist. 20.] all written after the taking of the City.

With great pains and preparation, but without any nouble or charge of the Allies, many of his men being wounded, but the army safe, Cicero made an end of this business. Upon the very day of the Saturnalia (the XIII. Kalend. of January, or the 26. day of the Julian September) the Pindenissenses by main force were at his mercy: all the City being either beaten down, or burnt: he granted the whole spoile of it to his Souldiers, except the Horses; the slaves were sold on the third day of the Saturnalia. He took hostages from the Tibareni, who were next neighbours to the Pindenissenses, and alike wicked and audacious as they. After this he sent his army to their winter quarters; over which he set his brother Quintus, that the army should be quartered in those places that were taken from the enemy, or that were not well guarded. [Ibid.] And so he having settled his affairs for the Summer, appointed his brother Quintus to command in the Winter Quarters, and over Cilicia, [lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 21.] and as he intended the Summer months to prosecute the war, so the winter months to sit in judgement. [Ibid. epist. 14.]

Publius Lentulus Spinther triumphed at Rome for Cilicia, as is gathered out of the Epist. [ad Attic. lib. 5. epist. 21. compared with lib. 1. ad familiar. epist. 9.]

The son of Orodes the King of the Parthians, came into Cyrrhestica, a Country of Cilicia, in which also the Parthians wintered. [lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 21. & lib. 6. epist. 11.]

Cicero sent Q. Volusius, a trusty man and wonderful free from bribery, into Cyprus, to carry there a few dayes; that those few Roman Citizens, which had business to do there, should not say they had not right done them: for it was not fit that the Cypriots should be called to judgement out of their own Island. [lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 21.]

Cicero being entertained in the Cities of Cilicia with great admiration, on the Nones of January (or the 13. day of the Julian October) went from Tarsus into Asia: Wherefore passing over Tarsus, in the sixth month of his command, which way forever he went, he brought it to pass, that without any violence, without any reproch, but only by his authority and advice, the Grecian and Roman Citizens, who had kept in their corn, did promise great store to the people, for the easing of the famine, (which raged much in that part of Asia, seeing there was no harvest.) [Ibid.]

Dejotarus, whose daughter was betrothed to the son of Artavaldes (the King of Armenia) whose aids Cicero had made great use of, came to Laodicea, to live with the young Cicero's; and brought him news, that Orodes intended to come into those parts, with all the Parthian forces at the beginning of Summer. [lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 20. 21. cum lib. 6. epist. 11.]

At Laodicea, from the Ides of February, (the 29 day of the Julian November) to the Kalends of May (the 26 day of the Julian February) Cicero kept Court for that part of Asia that belonged to him, from the Ides of February, for Cibara, and Apamea: from the Ides of March, for Synnada and Pamphilia. Many Cities were freed from from their debts, and many were very much eased, all of them using their own laws and judgments, having obtained liberty to do so, were greatly revived. [lib. 5. ad Attic. epist. 21. lib. 6. epist. 11.]

At Rome there were processions decreed by the Senate, for Cicero, because he had conquered in Cilicia: L. Emilius Paulus, and Q. Claudius Marcellus being Consuls. [lib. 2. ad familiar. epist. 11. lib. 8. epist. 11. lib. 23. epist. 5, 6, 12. & lib. 7. ad Attic. epist. 11.]

C. Cælius, who had been M. Crassus his Treasurer, being about to depart, after the Parthian war out of Syria, commended M. Fabius to Cicero, then being at Laodicea, [lib. 9. ad familiar. epist. 25. & lib. 13. epist. 14.] to whom Cicero wrote back, congratulating him both for the greatness of the actions that he had done, and also for the opportunity of the time, because that he was to depart out of the Province with great favour, and commendation of the Province: he advised him to make halt to Rome, where by reason of his late great victory, he tells him that his coming will be very famous.

Cicero commended to Quintus Thermus, the Prætor of Asia, his Lieutenant M. Annius, whole wisdom, virtues, and fidelity he had tried in the war against the Cilices, who was to go for the deciding of a controversie he had with the Sardinians; and desired him that he might be sent back before the Kalends of May, at which time he intended to go into Cilicia. [lib. 13. ad familiar. epist. 55. 57.]

P. Cornelius Dolabella, who a little after was married to Tullia, the daughter of Cicero, accused both of treason and bribery for his office, Appius Claudius Pulcher, when he was demanding a Triumph at Rome, for the good service he had done in Cilicia; and as soon as Dolabella came before the Tribunal, Appius stood into the City, but laid aside the demand of a Triumph: at length Q. Hortensius, and M. Brutus defending him, he was acquitted from each crime. [lib. 8. ad familiar. epist. 13. 26. lib. 3. epist. 10. 11. 12. lib. 6. ad Attic. epist. 6. & lib. de claris Oratoribus.]

The Horsemen that were left by Gabinus in Italy, killed two sons of M. Bibulus, the Proconul of great towardness. [Cæsar. lib. 3. de Bell. Civil. Valer. Maxim. lib. 4. cap. 1.] Cleopatra the Queen sent the murderers in bonds to Bibulus, that he might punish the murderers at his own pleasure: but he presently sent them back to Cleopatra, without any hurt done them; saying, That the authority of punishing them belonged to the Senate, and not to him. [Valer. ibid. Seneca ad Marcian.]

Cicero thought of going into Cilicia, on the Nones of May, [lib. 2. ad familiar. epist. 13. & lib. 6. ad Attic. epist. 21.] but he came not to Tarsus before the Nones of June, (the second day of the Julian April.) There many things troubled him: a great War in Syria, and great robberies in Cilicia. [lib. 6. ad Attic. epist. 4.]

Going from thence, when he was incamped by the river Pyramus, Q. Servilius sent him letters from Tarsus, which were written from Appius Claudius Pulcher, dated at Rome the Nones of April (the first day of the Julian February) in which he signified that he was quit of Treason. [lib. 3. ad familiar. epist. 11.]

When Syria was in a flame with the Parthian war, and there was great fear at Antioch, and Bibulus, for all his great sorrow, (for the murder of his sons) took all the care of the war; although there was great hopes in Cicero and in his army: yet it is reported that Bibulus should say, That he had rather suffer any thing, than seem to have need of the help of Cicero: and whereas he wrote to Thermus, the Prætor of Asia, concerning the Parthian war; yet he never wrote to Cicero: although he knew that the greatest part of the danger of the war belonged to him. Notwithstanding, his Lieutenants sent letters to Cicero, that he should come to their aid. [lib. 2. ad familiar. epist. 17. & lib. 6. ad Attic. epist. 5.]

And indeed Cicero had but a weak army of his own, yet he had good Auxiliaries of the Galatians, Pisidians and Lycians: yet he thought it his duty, to have his army, as near as he could to the enemy, as long as he should command in that Province according to the decree of the Senate: and whereas the term of his charge that lasted but a year, was almost out; he agreed with Dejotarus, that the King should be in his Camp with all his forces, [lib. 6. ad Attic. epist. 1. & 5.] concerning whom Cicero saith, in the XL. Philippick, I and Bibulus were both Captains General, in war and neighbour Provinces: we were both of us helped by that King, with Horse and Foot.

The Parthians kept Bibulus besieged, [Cæsar. in Bell. Civil. lib. 2.] who kept himself within a Town extremely well fortified, and full of men, as long as the Parthians were in the Province, [Cicero, lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 19.] and never let foot out of the the Town, as long as the Parthians were on this side the Euphrates. [lib. 6, ad Attic. epist. 8. & lib. 7, epist. 2.]

But the Parthians left Bibulus but half alive. [lib. 7, ad Attic. epist. 2.] by an incredible felicity departing out of Syria. [lib. 6, ad Attic. epist. 2. lib. 7, epist. 1. & lib. 8, ad familiar. epist. 17.] For Bibulus had sent the Parthians against another; for having entered into friendship with Orodobantes, a Noble man, who was an enemy to Orodes, he persuaded him by messengers that he went between them, that he should make Pacorus King, and that by his side he should make war upon Orodes. [lib. 6, ad Attic. epist. 2.]

Bibulus in his letter he wrote to the Senate, concerning the things that he had done, that that he and Cicero had done together, he attributed to himself alone; that that Cicero had done alone, that he ascribed unto himself; but that that he himself had done alone, that he makes common between them; as Cicero complains in an epistle that he wrote to Salustius his Treasurer. [lib. 2, ad familiar. epist. 9.] where also he notes as a mark of a poor, malicious, jejune, and vain spirit, that he filed not Ariobarzanes King, but the son of King Ariobarzanes, (whom the Senate itself called King, and commended him to Cicero) and when as he that had done no great matter, endeavourd to obtain a Triumph. Cicero also thought it would be a disgrace to him, not to obtain the same; seeing Bibulus his army had their hopes in Cicero's army; he also by the advice of his friends, began to think of a Triumph. [lib. 6, ad Attic. epist. 7, lib. 7, epist. 2.]

The fear of the Parthians being now removed, Cicero withdrew all Garrisons, which were good and strong, that he had provided for Apamea and other places. [lib. 2, ad familiar. epist. 17.]

Whereas about the III. Kalend. of August (the 26. day of the Julian May) the term of his office, which was to last but a year, was almost at an end, and some body was to be left by him at his departure, who should command according to the decree of the Senate; Cicero preferred to the government of the Province, which was now freed from the fear of the Parthian war, C. Caelius Calpurnius, who was newly sent to him from Rome to be his Treasurer, (in the room of Cn. Volusius) a Noble young Gentleman indeed, but one that wanted both gravity and continence. [lib. 2, ad familiar. epist. 15. & 19, cum lib. 6, ad Attic. epist. 4. & 6.]

The III. Nones of August, (the 29. day of the Julian May) his annual commands being now ended, he went by ship to Sida, a City of Pamphilia. [lib. 3, ad familiar. epist. 12.] From thence he went to Laodice, the utmost bound of the Province; and there he commended his Treasurer Messinius to stay for him, that he might leave his accounts according to the Julian Law, in the Province, in the two Cities of Laodicea and Apamea. [lib. 6, ad Attic. epist. 7, cum lib. 2, ad familiar. epist. 7. & lib. 5, epist. 20.] but of the prey (of the Mount Amanus) he touched not a penny, but left it wholly, as selfertia (his Cohort grumbling at it, who thought it ought to be distributed among them) to the Treasury; taking security also of all the publick money at Laodice; that it might be safely returned to him and the people, without any danger of carriage. [lib. 7, ad Attic. epist. 1. lib. 2, ad familiar. epist. 17.]

The Senate decreed a very large procession of 30. days, by the perswasion of Cato, to M. Bibulus, as soon as they had received his letters. [lib. 7, ad Attic. epist. 2. & 3.] But the Legions which the Senate had decreed, should be sent into Syria, by Marius (who was to succeed Salustius in the Treasurers office there) were detained: the Province being now freed from the fear of the Parthian war. [lib. 2, ad familiar. epist. 17.] But there was a Decree of the Senate made, that there should be sent to Bibulus for the Parthian war, one Legion from Cn. Pompey, and another from Julius Caesar. Pompey, of those Legions that he had with him, granted none; but yet he commanded them that were Commissioners in that business, that they should demand that Legion from Caesar, that he had lent Caesar. Caesar, although he made no doubt but that his adversaries intended that he should be left without any Legions, sent back to Pompey his Legion: and also gave another out of his own number, that he might satisfy the Decree of the Senate: therefore these two Legions were furnished, as though they were to be sent against the Parthians; but seeing there was no use of them for that war, the Consul Marcellus fearing they should be again restored to Caesar, kept them in Italy, and gave them to Pompey. To what purpose these things tended, although Caesar knew well enough, yet he determined to suffer all things, because he saw here was offered him no absurd pretence of keeping those Legions by him that he had already, and of raising more. [Cesar commentariis, de Bell. civil. lib. 1. Hirtius, de Bell. Gallic. lib. 8, Plutarch in Pompeio, & Dio, sub fine, lib. 40.]

Cicero persuaded Q. Thermus the Praetor, who was to depart out of Asia, that he would leave a noble young Gentleman, his Treasurer, Governour of that Province, (which

(which was C. Antonius; as Pighius shews in his Annals, Tom. 3. pag. 431.) [lib. 2, ad familiar. epist. 18.]

Cicero laid up with the Publicans at Ephesus, all the money which lawfully came to his share, which was, 20000 Sesteritiums. [lib. 5, ad familiar. epist. 20.] and being very much hindered by the Easterly winds, on the Kalends of October (the 25 of the Julian July) he sailed from Ephesus, [lib. 6, ad Attic. epist. 8.] and landed at Rhodes, [Plutarch in Cicero,] for the young Cicero's sake, [lib. 6, ad Attic. epist. 7, cum lib. 2, ad familiar. epist. 17.] and there he heard of Hortensius his death. [Cicero Bruti, fore, de claris oratoribus.]

Cicero, the winds being against him, the day before the Ides of October, (the seventh day of the Julian August) came to Athens. [lib. 14, ad familiar. epist. 5. lib. 6, ad Attic. epist. 9.]

The motions of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey approaching, the Sun, a little after his rising, on the 21 day of the Julian August, was eclipsed almost two parts, to which it may seem that that of Petronius, concerning the Prognosticks of this war is to be referred.

Deformis Titan unius calcine textit, Civiles acies jam tum spirare putares.*

For bloody Sol appear'd with visage like to death,
Thou'dst think th' civils wars just then began to breath.

Bibulus departed out of Asia, as Cicero shews in the eighth epistle of the seventh book to Atticus, dated the V. Ides of December; or the first day of the Julian October.

On the Kalends of January, (falling on the 22 day of October) on which C. Claudius Marcellus, and L. Cornelius entered upon the Consulship: there was a Decree of the Senate made, that Caesar should dismise his army before a certain day, and if he did not, that he should seem to do it against the Common-wealth, against which Decree, when as M. Antonius, and Q. Caelius, the Tribunes of the people, had in vain interceded; it was made the beginning of the civil war between Caesar and Pompey [Cesar commentariis, lib. 1, de Bell. civil. Cicero, in Philippic. 2. Valer. Paternul. lib. 2, cap. 9. Dio, lib. 41, init.]

The day before the Nones of January, (the 25 of October) Cicero came to the City; where was given him such a mutiny, that nothing could be more honourable; but it fell upon the very flame of the civil discord, or war rather. [lib. 16, ad familiar. epist. 11.] but he entered not the City. A full Senate amid these troubles, earnestly demanding a Triumph for him; which Lentulus the Consul, that he might make his court, seemed the greater, deferred. [lib. cum lib. 7, epist. 1, ad Attic.] And whereas the Senate decreed a Triumph for him; he said, he had rather, if there were a peace concluded, follow Caesars Chariot. [Plutarch in Cicero.] but the discord increasing, not only deferred, but clean took away both his and Bibulus his Triumph also. [lib. 16, ad Attic. epist. 2. & 6. & lib. 11, epist. 6.]

On the VII. Ides of January, (the 28 day of October) there was a Decree of the Senate made, That the Consuls, Praetors, Tribunes of the people, and all Proconsuls that were in the City, (amongst whom Cicero was one) should do their endeavour, that the Common-wealth should receive no damage; and immediately the Tribunes of the people, who had interceded against that decree of the Senate, fled out of the City, and went unto Caesar. [Cesar commentariis, de Bell. civil. Cicero, ad familiar. lib. 1, de Bell. civil. 41.]

In the next day, the Senate being called without the City, Pompey also being present, Provinces were decreed for private men: two of them were for the Consul, the rest the Praetors had. Syria fell to Scipio thare. [Cesar, as supra.] This was Metellus Scipio, who had married his daughter Cornelia, the widow of Publius Crassus, who was slain by the Parthians, to Pompey this year, (that is two years before he was put to death) and had been his Colleague three years before in the Consulship: [Plutarch in Pompeio, Dio, lib. 40.] but that Sextus, or Sestius, succeeded Cicero in the Province of Cilicia, is gathered out of lib. 5, ad familiar. epist. 20, compared with lib. 11, ad Attic. epist. 7, and that Sexilius Rufus was sent the first Questor, with praetorian authority into Cyprus, which was henceforward separated from Cilicia, is gathered out of lib. 13, ad familiar. epist. 48, and that the three governments of Asia (Cibyra, Synnada and Apamea) were taken from the Province of Cilicia, and were given to the new Proconsul of Asia: P. Servilius Sigionius gathers out of the 67. epistle of the same book. [de antiquis iure provinciarum lib. 1, cap. 11.]

On the same day, the VIII. Kalend. of March, (the 11. of the Julian December)

On which the Feralia were celebrated, (as we may see in the inscriptions of Gruterus, pag. CXXXIII.) Caesar came from Cornitum to Brundisium after noon, and Pompey from Canulium in the morning, [lib. 8, ad Attic. epist. 22, & lib. 9, epist. 2.] when Autumnus was already past. [Dio, lib. 41.]

Pompey sent his father in law Scipio, and his son Cneus, from Brundisium into Syria, to provide a fleet. [Plutarch in Pomp.] concerning whom Cicero, in the first epistle of the ninth book, [ad Atticum] written the day before the Nones of March, (the 23. of the Julian December) Scipio goeth into Syria, either according as his lot fell, or for the honour of his son in law, or by an angry Caesar.

The VII Ides of March (the 26 of December) Caesar came to Brundisium, and encamped before the walls: as himself shews in an epistle to Oppius, and Cornelius Balbus. [lib. 9, ad Attic. epist. 16.]

On the XVI Kalends of April, (as it is in the 10 epistle of the 9 book ad Atticum: not the IIII Kalends of March: as it is in Lipius in the 31 epistle of the century to the Germans and Frenchmen) on which the Liberalia were celebrated, (as appears in the marble records in Gruter's inscriptions, pag. CXXXIII) which there fell upon the 3 day of the Julian January, Pompey went from Brundisium with all the forces that he had, to Epirus, on which very day of the Liberalia, or Dionysia, his sonnes were overcome in Spain at the battle of Munda, four years after that their father was said to go to the war, [Plutarch, in Cesare,] to wit, on the same day on which Pompey the father, leaving Italy, made the feat of the war in Greece; not on which he fled from the city to make war, as by a mistake it is written by Orofius, lib. 6, cap. 16.]

The next day Caesar entered Brundisium: and there made an oration, and so marched towards Rome; being willing to be at the city before the Kalends, [lib. 9, ad Attic. epist. 18.]

From thence Caesar dismissed Aristobulus into his own country of Palestine; that he might do something against Pompey. [Dio, lib. 41.] Josephus relates that he sent Aristobulus having freed him from prison into Syria: giving him also two legions, that he might the more easily keep the province in order, yet both of them were frustrated of their hopes, Aristobulus being poisoned by the Pompeians, and buried by the Cæsarians. [Joseph. lib. 1, bell. cap. 7, & lib. 14, Antiquit. cap. 13.]

Alexander also the son of Aristobulus, was beheaded at Antioch by Scipio, according to Pompey's letters, being first publicly accused of what he had done against the Romans: but Ptolemei Mennæus the governour of Chalcis, which is seated in mount Libanus, having sent his son Philippio to Alcon to the wife of Aristobulus, sent for her son Antigonus and her two daughters; the youngest of which named Alexandra Philippio fell in love with and married. [Id. ibid.] Pompey having gotten a years time to provide forces in (which free from war, and at idleness from any enemy) gathered together a great fleet out of Asia, and the Islands Cyclades, Coryra, Athens, Pontus, Bithynia, Syria, Cilicia, Phœnice, and Egypt: and took care that a great navy should be built in all places, he exacted also great sums of moneys from Asia, Syria, and all Kings, Governours, Tetrarchs and the free people of Achaia, he compelled also the societies of those provinces which fell to his share, to pay unto him great sums of money. [Cesar, bell. civil. lib. 3.] It is reported that 60 ships sent him out of Egypt from Cleopatra, and Ptolemei who was then but a child King and Queen of Egypt, he had also auxiliaries out of Ionia, archers out of Crete, darters out of Pontus, and horsemen out of Galatia: Commagenians were sent from Antiochus, Cilicians and Cappadocians, and some from Armenia the less, Pamphilians also and Pisidians, came to him, [Appian, bell. civil. lib. 2, pag. 458, & 472.]

M. Cato being sent into Asia by Pompey, to be an help to them that gathered the fleet and souldier together, carried along with him his sister Servilia, and a son that Lucullus had by her: where whereas he had made the Rhodians to be of Pompey's party, he left Servilia and her son with them, and returned to Pompey, who was well furnished, very strongly both with land and sea forces. [Plutarch in Catone minore.] and he had an intention to let the whole world in an uprose both by sea and land, to stir up barbarous Kings, and to bring cruell nations being armed into Italy. [Cicero, ad Attic. lib. 8, epist. 11.]

Pompey also went about to draw to his party, Orodes himself the King of the Parthians, although after the death of the Craffi, he was accounted amongst the enemies, Orodes promised him his assistance, if Syria might be granted unto him; but he not obtaining Syria, he brought no forces. [Dio, lib. 41.] although otherwise the Parthians were of Pompey's party: both by reason of the friendship they had contracted in the Mithridatic war, and also for the death of Crassus whose son they heard was of Cæsars side; whom they doubted not, would revenge his fathers death if Caesar got the conquest. [Justin, lib. 42, cap. 4.]

Pompey made use of a great fleet which he had provided from Alexandria, Colchis

Colchis, Tyre, Sidon, Andros, (or rather Arados) Cyprus, Pamphilia, Lycia, Rhodes, Byzantium, Lesbos, Smyrna, Miletum, Cos, to intercept provisions from Italy, and to seize upon the provinces from whence the corn came. [Cicero, ad Attic. lib. 9, epist. 11.]

Pompey's son was Admiral of the Egyptian fleet: of the Asiatick, D. Læbius and C. Triarius; of the Syriack C. Cassius; of the Rhodian, C. Marcellus; with C. Pomponius, of the light ships, and the Achian fleet, Scribonius Libo, and M. Octavius, but over the whole business at sea, M. Bibulus was set and commanded all, for he was chief Admiral. [Cesar, bell. civil. lib. 3.]

Julius Cesar being created Dictator after eleven dayes, himself and Servilius, Iavricus being declared Consuls, resigned up his Dictatorship. [Cesar in his commentaries, lib. 3, bell. civil. Plutarch in Cesar, & Appian, lib. 2, bell. civil. pag. 457.]

From this first Dictatorship of Cesar, the Macedonians of Syria began their account of the time of the Cæsars, (of which there is mention made in an old stone, in the inscrip. of Gruter, pag. CCLXXVII, 1.) deduced from the 24 day of the Julian September, (on which we have shewed in another place, that the Solar year of the Macedonians began,) from which day, not only the Macedonian, but also the Roman Emperours began their Inditions, or the title of 15 years: and the Antiochians their account, (which being divided by 15, always sheweth the Inditions of the Emperours) although the form of the year being afterwards changed, and the Macedonian month conformed to the Italian, the Antiochians refer the beginning of their account, and the rest of the Eastern people, the beginning of their Inditions, to the beginning of their new year, and have brought it from the 24 of September, to the Kalends of September: but whatsoever is said concerning the original of the Inditions, (which they commonly refer to the times of Constantine) it ought to be without controversy, that the head of the Antiochian account is to be fetched from the September of the year of the Julian Period, 4669.

In the end of the year in which Marcellus and Lentulus were Consuls, Pompey being made General of the Romans, and the Senate which were in Epheus with Pompey, bestowed honours on Kings, and people that had deserved well of them, as Lucan speaks in his fifth book.

—pelagique potens Phœbeia donis
Exornata Rhodus, gelidæque inculta juventus
Tægetis: fama veteres laudantur Athenæ;
Mæssilique sua donatur libera Phœcis.
Tunc Sadalen fortisque Coryn, fidumque per arma
Dejorum, & gelidæ dominum Rhapholis ore
Collaudant: Libyamque jubent auctore Senatus Sceptifero parere Juba.

Phœbeia sea-powerful Rhodes rewarded was,
And Spartans rough, prais'd were th' Athenians
Phœcis made free whither Mæssilians:
Faithfull Dejorum, young Sadalis,
The valiant Coryn and Rhapholis
Of Macedon were prais'd: Juba to thee
The Senate gives all Libya by decree.

And after the same manner he avers, that the kingdom of Egypt was at this time confirmed upon Ptolemy, being but then a lad: whither are to be referred those words of Pothinus the Governour of Ptolemy, concerning Pompey, in the same Author in the eighth book.

—quod nobis sceptra Senatus
Te suadente dedit.

—The Senate gave to mee
The Scepter, when perswaded to't by thee.

About the Winter Solstice, Cesar sent messengers to the army, that they should meet him at Brundisium: he himself departed from Rome; in the month of December, not expecting the next Kalends of the beginning year, in respect of his office: thus Appian, [lib. 2, pag. 458, bell. civil.] supposing that at that time there was the same account of the Roman year, as was in his own time. Whereas the Kalends of January, on which Cesar was to begin his second Consulship, answered to the 11 day of the Julian October. With the like error Florus affirms, [lib. 4. cap. 2.] that Cæsar took shipping to go to the war, although it were in the middle of Winter : and likewife Plutarch in Pompeio writes, that Cæsar came to Brundisium, in ἡ γὰρ αὖτε τοῦ χειμῶνος ὥστε, and in Cæsar, that he departed from thence, in the time of the Winter Solstice, in the beginning of the month January, which he saith answereth to the Athenian Ῥοιδεὼν : and indeed Cæsar himself in the third book of his Commentaries of the civil war, confirmeth, That he set sail on the day before the Nones of January with seven Legions, and the day after landed at the Cæstania; but that was not the Julian January, on which in the time of Plutarch the Athenian Ῥοιδεὼν fell, but which the late account of the Roman year did then use : whereas the Nones of that month (on which Cæsar landed at the Cæstania) answered to the 15 day of the Julian October: and that Winter was approaching, and that thereupon Pompey marched out of Epirus into his winter quarters to Apollonia and Dyrrachium, Cæsar himself shewes also afterwards : but by no means that it was Winter, that is, the height of Winter.

Pompey, having provided great store of corn out of Thessalia, Asia, Egypt, Crete, Cyrenia, and other Countries, he intended to winter in Dyrrachium, Apollonia, and in all the Sea Towns, that he might hinder Cæsar from passing the sea (although it was all in vain.) [Cæsar. Bell. civil. lib. 3.]

Scipio, Governor of Syria, the father in law of Pompey, having received some loss about the Mountain Amanus, declared himself Captain General : which having done, he laid great sums of money upon the Cities and the Tyrants, and also from the Publicans of the province he exacted the tribute of two years ; and borrowed of them also the money of the following year, and commanded the whole province to provide him Horsemen. All which Forces being gathered together, having left the Parthians who were bordering enemies behind him, he with his Legions and Horsemen marched out of Syria : and when as there was heard some murmurings of the souldiers, that they would go against an enemy, but not against the Consul, and their fellow Citizens, he brought the Legions to their winter quarters into the richest Cities, as Pergamus, and gave huge bribes, and to confirm the souldiers to him, he gave them the plundering of the Cities, [id. ibid.]

In the mean time, the money that was laid upon the Cities, was most cruelly exacted :
 and moreover many things were generally for covetousness, pole-money was laid both upon bond and free : money was also demanded for making of pillars and doors, for souldiers and mariners, for armes and engines, and carriages : and if any thing could be found out that had a name, this was sufficient for the gathering of money. There were Governors with command appointed, not over Cities and Castles, but also Villages ; and he that did any thing most outrageously and cruelly, he was accounted the Man, and the best Citizen. The province was full of Lictors and Commanders, and was filled with petty Governors and Exactors : who besides the monies that were commanded, served also their own private gain : they laid, That they were expelled from their own houses and country, and that they wanted all things necessary, that they might cover their business with some honest pretence. To these exactions were added also great usuries, (which for the most part happen in war) in which things they laid, that the prolonging of a day was giving them as much : whereupon the debt of all the province was much multiplied in their two years ; and no less were monies exacted for this cause upon the Roman Citizens of the province, but upon all guilds, and every and every city was certain monies exacted : and they told them that they borrowed these monies by the decree of the Senate, [ibid.]

Moreover at Ephesus, Scipio commanded the money that of a long time had been laid up there, to be taken from the Temple of Diana : but when he came into the Temple, having also many of the Senators with him whom he had called together for that purpose, he received letters from Pompey, that Cæsar had crossed the sea with the Legions ; and he should with all speed make haste to him with the army, and set all things else aside. As soon as he had received these letters, he dismissed them that he had called unto him, and begins himself to prepare for his march into Macedonia, and a few days after he went ; and this business saved the money at Ephesus, [ibid.]

In the mean time, Pompey had in his army besides the Roman and Italian Legions, and two which Lentulus the Consul had caused to be raised, and archers out of Crete, Lacedæmon, Pontus, Syria, and other cities, to the number of 3000 of slingers, six cohorts, two of mercenaries, 7000 horsemen, of which horsemen Deiotarus brought 500 Galatians, Ariobarzanes 500 out of Cappadocia ; 500 French and Germans, which Gabinus had left at Alexandria for a guard for King Ptolemei ; and the son Pompey had brought with the Fleet. Tarcundarius, Cæsar, and Donlaus, sent out of Gallogrecia 300. one of them came along himself, the other sent his son, An-tiochus

tiochus the Commagenean on whom Pompey had bestowed great rewards, sent 200.
 among which were many archers on horseback, and with Scipio were expected two Legions that should come out of Syria, [id. ibid.]

After the coming of Cæsar into Epirus, there were many months passed, and winter came on apace ; neither were the ships nor Legions that were left at Brundisium, come unto Cæsar : but there M. Antonius, and Julius Cæsius, having gotten a fair South wind, hoisted sail, and brought with them three Legions of old souldiers, and one newly raised, and also 800 horsemen unto Cæsar : whose passage, whenas Q. Coponius, who commanded the Rhodian Fleet at Dyrrachium, strived to hinder, a tempest arising troubled the Fleet, that all of them to the number of 16 except one, were beaten one against another and perished by shipwreck ; and a great part of the marines and souldiers were dashed against the rocks and killed ; part were dispersed by the Cæsarians, whom Cæsar saved and sent home again, [id. ibid.]

In Egypt, the lad Ptolemei by his kindred and friends, expelled out of the kingdom Cleopatra, his wife and sister, [Cæsar. lib. 3. Bell. civil. Liby. lib. 111.]

habens sub jure Pothini
 Affectum ensque suos :

But all his power will and affections be Under Pothinus Girdle

as it is in Lucan, [lib. 10.] where we read Cleopatra complaining : for as Strabo declares how she was ejected by the friends of the lad, who had raised a sedition : So particularly this business is attributed by Plutarch in Cæsar, to Pothinus : there was then in the Prætorship of the kingdom, an Eunuch that was his governor, by name Pothinus, (as it is read in Cæsar) the which also is called by the Greek Writers Po-theinus by a truer name. Cleopatra being thus ejected, departed into Syria with her sister, [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 796.] that the might there provide her self of an army, [Appian, lib. 2. bell. civil. pag. 480.]

Pharnaces, the son of Mitridates King of Pontus, and King of Bosphorus Cim-merius, when he heard that this civil war was begun amongst the Romans (which he hoped would continue long) and that Cæsar was not near at hand, out of a desire of regaining all his fathers former possessions, revolted from the Romans ; and having committed the government and defence of Bosphorus to Afandrus, he reduced into his power without any resistance considerable, Colchis, and all Armenia, together with the kingdom of Molchis (in which Strabo notes that he spoiled the Temple of Leucothea in lib. 11. pag. 498.) and Dejotarus being absent, he laid to these some Cities of Cappadocia and Pontus, which belonged to the jurisdiction of Bithynia, [*Dio.
 lib. 42.*] and having also taken Sinope, he made for Amisus ; but at that time failed of it, [Appian, in Mitridatis, pag. 254.]

Pompey sent his wife Cornelia privily into the Isle of Lesbos, that she should live quietly at Mitylene free from all troubles of the wars, [Lucan, lib. 5. ins.] with whom also Plutarch in Pompeio, and Dio lib. 42. relate, that her son in law Sextus, the younger son of Pompey, was sent thither also : when Lucan saith notwithstanding that he tarried in the camp with his father, [lib. 6. fin.]

L. Hirrius (otherwise Hirrius) being sent Embassador to the Parthians (as is understood out of the Commentaries of Cæsar, lib. 3. bell. civil.) not only obtained not any aid from Orodes, but was cast into prison by him, against the law of Nations, [*Dio.
 lib. 42.*] namely because Syria was denied him : as hath been above laid out of the same [Dio. lib. 41.]

Pompey having been besieged four months together with huge Works, at Dyrrhachium, was at last utterly overthrowen in the battle of Pharsalia, [Sueton in Julia Cæsar, cap. 35.]

At what time Cæsar came into Thessaly, (when the battle was fought at Pharsaphalum) and a few days after Pompey came likewise, when the corn was even ripe, as Cæsar himself witnesseth, [lib. 3. bell. civil.] Appian also confirmeth, that at the instant that the fight was, it was the Cæsarians Ἐσθρῶν, [Bell. civil. lib. 2.] that it was full Summer, and very hot weather, if we believe Plutarch, [in M. Bruto.]

On the same day that the Pharsalian fight was, there was twice at Antiochia heard such a shouting of an army, such sounding of alarms, such rattling of armes, that the whole city run up to the wall in their armes ; the same thing happened at Ptolemais, from the vestry of the temple of Bacchus at Pergamus, whither it was lawful for the Priests only to go, there was a great noise of drums and cymbals first began, and went through all the city ; also at Tralles, in the Temple of victory, where they had confe-rated

erated a statue of Cæsar, a green palm tree was shewn in the root, which sprung out of the pavement between the joining together of the stones, to the Syrians also appeared two young men that declared the errand of the battle, and were never seen after. [Cæsar. bell. civil. lib. 3. Julius Obsequens. de prodigiis. Plutarch. in Cæsar. Dio. lib. 2.]

In the army of Pompey there were almost all Nations that inhabit round about the sea towards the East, Thracians, Hellepontians, Bithynians, Phrygians, Ionians, Lydians, Pamphilians, Pifidians, Paphlagonians, Cilicians, Syrians, Phœnicians, Hebrews, and their neighbours the Arabian, Cypriots, Rhodians, Cretian flingers, and other Islanders, there were also Kings, and Governours, Deiotarus the Tetrarch of the Gallogracians, and Ariarathes the King of the Cappadocians, Taxiles led those Armenians on this side of Euphrates; Megabates the Lieutenant of King Artabasis those beyond Euphrates, other lesser Princes helped also according to their power. [App. bell. civil. lib. 2. pag. 472.] and seeing the greatest part of his army consisted of Asiatics, who were not used to the wars, he was overcome. [Dio. lib. 41.] as Petronius also saith.

*Ille tremor Ponti, seu quoque terror Hydaspis,
Et pirarum scopulus; modo quem ter evanescens
Jupiter horruerat, quem fracto gurgite Pontus,
Et veneratus erat submissa Bosphorus unda, (Proh pudor!) Imperii deserto nomine fugit.*

He who made Pontus and Hydaspes quake,
Did quell the Pirates, by his triumph shake
Three times great Jove, & whom Pontus submissive wave
And likewise Bosphors their submission gave:
To's shame! has fled and left th' name Emperor.

Cæsar, having taken Pompeys cabinet, neither read, nor copied out the Pirates letters, which betrayed the good will of some towards him, or their rancour of minds against Cæsar, but in good deed presently burnt them all, least out of the letters he should be compelled to be too severe against any man. [Pliny lib. 6, 7. cap. 25. fin. Dio. lib. 41. fin.] he also afterward pardoned the Kings, and people, who had assisted Pompey, not imposing any punishment upon them, but only a pecuniary mulct: for he considered, that indeed he either had none or very small acquaintance with any of them; whereas Pompey had deserved very much at their hands, and much more commended them, than those, that had received favours from Pompey, and yet had forsaken him in his greatest dangers. [Dio. in supra.]

Pompey leaving the camp, fled to Larissa, with very few accompanying him, but entered not the city, although he was invited to it by the citizens: least the Larissians should be punished for receiving him, but after he had bid them to seek the victorious friendship, he having received necessities from them, went towards the sea. [Dio. lib. 42.]

Caius Cassius came into Cilicia, with a fleet of Syrians, Phœnicians, and Cilicians: and having burnt Cæsar's ships, after he had heard of the battle that was fought in Thessalia, he departed with his fleet. [id. ibid.]

The Rhodian fleet, over which C. Coponius commanded as Prætor, after the battle of Pharsalia, deserted the Pompeians and returned home. [Cicero. lib. 1. de divinatione.]

L. Lentulus (Cris) who was Consul the former year, and P. Lentulus (Spinther) who had been Consul, and others who had followed Pompey from the flight, coming to Rhodes, were not received either in the town or port; and sending messengers unto them, were commanded against their will to disanchor, and to depart from those places. [Cæsar. bell. civil. lib. 3.]

Cæcilius Bassus a man of the order of Knighthood, and of Pompeys party, retired to Tyre; and he hid himself in that place, wherein Merchants used to trade. [Dio. lib. 47. & Libo. apud Appian. lib. 3. bell. civil. pag. 576.]

M. Claudius Marcellus, being afraid of Cæsar went to Mitylene: and there lived most happily in the study of good arts, (as Seneca relates out of Bruus, in his consolation to Albina:) Cicero in vain perswading him, that he would return from thence to Rome, and demand pardon of Cæsar. [lib. 4. ad familiar. epist. 7. & 8.]

Labienus coming from the Pharsalian flight, brought news of the overthrow of the Pompeian army at Dyrrachium, when M. Cato was left with 15. Cohorts, and 300. Gallies: whereupon both he and Cicero, and others with them, being suddenly affrighted, took shipping: and looking back to the Town, saw all their ships burden burden on a flame, which the Souldiers had burned, because they would not follow them: but Cato passing into Corcyra, (an Island seated under Epirus, in the confines of the Ionian and Adriatick sea) where the fleet was, with those that were of the same opinion: there he took unto him the rest that had fled from the battle of Pharsalia, or otherwise followed that party. From the fight came L. Scipio, the father in law of Pompey, Labienus, Afranius, and many other renowned men: and a little after Octavius also, who keeping the Ionian sea, had taken C. Antonius, joynd himself unto them: also Cneus Pompey, (the eldest son of Pompey the Great) who sailing in the Egyptian fleet, had made insurrections upon Epirus, his father being overcome, whereas the Egyptians went home, went himself also to Corcyra. This fact of his C. Cassius also, who had vexed Sicily, and others with him imitated, and fled unto Cato, whom they observed to excell others in virtue. [Cicero. de Divinat. lib. 1. Plutarch in Cæsar. Appian de Bell. Civil. lib. 2. pag. 482. Dio. lib. 42.]

There Cato resigned the command to Cicero, seeing he was but Prætor, and the other had been Consul; which when Cicero (a man as Livy notes in his third book, not bound for the wars) refused, and would needs leave the wars, he wanted but little of being killed; for young Pompey, and his friends, calling him traitour, drew their swords at him: but Cato withstood them, and kept him from being slain, and withdrew him from the Camp. [Plutarch in Cæsar & Cicero.]

After this the fleet was divided among Pompeys chiefest friends, and Cassius sailed into Pontus to Pharnaces, with an intent to stir him up against Cæsar: and Scipio into Africa, having Varus and his forces with him, and the auxiliaries of Juba the Moor. [Appian. Bell. Civil. lib. 2. pag. 482.]

Cato himself, conjecturing that Pompey was fled either into Africa, or Egypt, making hast after him, took shipping, and set sail: but yet before he went, he gave leave to all that were not ready to follow him, either of leaving him, or staying with him. [Plutarch in Cæsar.] Lucan in his ninth book, thus describeth his voyage by sea.

*Corcyra secreta petit, ac mille carinis
Abfultis Emathia secum fragmenta ruinae,
Quis ratibus tantis ingentia crederet ire
Aginas? quis pelagus vias arctasse carinas?
Dorida tunc Mælan, & aptum Ténaron umbræ,
Inde Cythera petit, Broæque urgente carinas
Creta fugit: Diitæa legit, cedentibus undis,
Lixera tunc ausum classi percludere portus
Impulsi, ac secas meritis Phycuntæ rapinas Sparsit.*

He sailes unto Corcyra's shore,
And in a thousand ships carries away
The conquer'd remant of Pharsalia.
Who would have thought to great a fleet had held
All fleeing men? That conquer'd ships had fill'd
The straitned seas? from thence they saild away
To Ghost-field Ténarus, and long Mæla,
Thence to Cytherus: Boreas blowing faire,
Crete flies: and getting a good sea they clear
The Cretan coast; Phycus, that durst deny
Their men to land, they lack detervely,

This Phycus is a promontory of the Country of Cyrenæ, and a Town, which, as the Poet notes, Cato gave the plunder thereof to his Souldiers; but leaving here any further discourse of Cato his navigation, let us turn our speech to the way that Pompey the Great took, and of Julius Cæsar pursuing him.

4. Cæsar having tarried two dayes at Pharsalam, to offer sacrifices for the victory he had gotten, and to refresh his Souldiers that were tired with the fight, the third day he pursued Pompey, [Appian. Bell. Civil. lib. 2. pag. 482.] for he thought it was his best way, setting all other things aside, to pursue Pompey, unto whatsoever part of the World he had retired himself from the fight, least he should be forced again to raise new forces, and to renew the war again: wherefore he went every day as far with his Horse as possibly he could, and commanded one Legion to follow after him, by lesser marches. [Cæsar. lib. 3.]

Pompey coming to the sea, rested all night in a fishermans cottage; and about break break of day, he went into a wherry, and taking with him all the freemen, and commanding all the slaves to go to Cæsar without any fear, he departed from land, [Plutarch, in Pompey.] concerning whom Lucan in lib. 8,

*Litora contigerat, per quæ Peneus amnis
Emathia jam clade rubens exibat in aquor.
Inde rates trepidum, veniens & fluctibus impar
Flumineis vix sua vadis, exivit in altum.*

Now to the shore he came where Peneus ran Red with Pharfalias slaughter to the main;
There a small Barque unfit for seas, and winds, Scarce safe in shallow it rivers Pompey finds
And goes aboard

But as he went in this boat along the shoar, he saw a ship of great burden under sail; the Master of it was Peticius a Roman citizen: who knowing Pompey, took him out of the boat into the ship: together with the two Lentuli (who had been Consuls, whom as we have declared out of Cæsar, were excluded from Rhodes) and Favonius, (who had been Prætor; out of Velleius, lib. 1, cap. 53.) and all other, as he would himself: and presently after King Dejotarus (who trusting to the flight of birds, which he thought portended happy success to him, came to Pompey, as Cicero shews in lib. 1, de Divinat.) whom they saw posting towards them from land, him they took in also, [Plutarch, in Pompey.]

There Pompey stood at anchor one night: and calling unto him his friends at Amphipolis, and having received money of them for his necessary expenses, and knowing that Cæsar was coming after him, he departed from that place, [Cæsar, lib. 3.]

Sailing thus by Amphipolis, within a few dayes he came to shoar at the Isle of Lesbos, [Cæsar, & Plutarch, ut supra. Dio, lib. 42.]

He sent for his wife from Mitylene to sea, where they bewailed together their hard fortune: then he commanded her to be brought out of the Town, and called her maid-servants to come to her: but Pompey refused to come into the Town of the Mitylenians although they came to salute him and invited him into it; but advised them to obey the Conquerour, and to be afraid, for Cæsar was merciful, and bountiful: then turning to Cratippus the Philosopher (for he came out of the Town to visit him) he bewailed his misfortune, and disputed with him some things concerning providence; the Philosopher affirming, that δὲ τὸ κακὸν ἀνίσταται, by reason of the ill government of the Common-wealth, there was need of a Monarchy: and demanding of Pompey, How and by what token can we believe that you would have used your good fortune if you had overcome Cæsar better than he? [Plutarch.]

Being detained there two dayes by tempest, and taking unto him other light ships, he put all his stuffe into four Gallies, which came from Rhodes and Tyre: and sailing along the coast, even to Cilicia with his wife and friends, kept along the havens that he might take in fresh water and things necessary, [Cæsar, lib. 3. cum Plutarcho, in Pomp. & Appian, pag. 479, 480. & Dio, lib. 42.]

To these we may add what Lucan saith, lib. 8.

*Sparsus ab Emathia fugit quicunque procella,
Aſsequitur Magnus: primique a litore Lesbii
Ocurrunt natus, procerum mox turba fidelis.
Nam neque deſſito fatiſ, acieque fugato
Abſtulit: Magnos reges Fortuna miniferos:
Terrarum dominos & ſceptra Eoa tenentes
Exul habet comites, jubet ire in devia mundi
Dejotarum, qui ſparſa ducis veſtigia legit.*

Sol hid the Stars, and land diſcovered
When thoſe that from Pharfalias battle fled
To Pompey came, and fiſt from Lesbos ſhores
He met his ſon; then Kings and Senators:
For Pompey yet (although at that ſad time Vanquiſh and fled) had Kings to wait on him;
Proud ſceptered Kings that on the Eaſt did reign Attended there in baniſh Pompey's Train.
Then Pompey, King Dejotarus commands,
To go for aids to further Eaſtern Lands.

There declaring the instructions, with which Dejotarus was sent to demand aid of the Parthians, (which notwithstanding he never performed) the Poet goes on thus describing the navigation of Pompey.

dimiſſo in litore rege;

The King took leave at ſhoar
And by the Icarian rocks great Pompey gone
Leaves Ephesus and ſea-calm Colophon,
Shaving ſmall Samos foamy rocks he goes;
A gentle gale blows from the ſhore of Cos:
Gnidon and Phœbus-honoured Rhodes he leaves
And ſailing ſtraight in the mid-ocean faves
Telmeſſus long and winding circuits. Fiſt
Pamphylia greets their eyes: but Pompey durſt
Commit his perſon to no Town but thee
Little Phæſis: thy ſmall company
And few inhabitants could not caſe fear
More in thy ſhips than in thy walls there were.

The fiſt Town that Pompey entered, was Atalia of Piſidia: thither ſome ſhips came to him out of Cilicia, and ſome ſouldiers alſo, and about 60 of the order of Senators: and when he heard news, that his Navy was ſafe, and that Cæſar was paſſed into Africa with a ſtrong party of ſouldiers that he had gathered together out of the flight: then he began to repent that he had joyed battle with Cæſar ſo far from the aſſiſtance of his Fleet, but it was too late, [Plutarch, in Pomp.] But Lucan relates, that at ſeious in Cilicia, Pompey began to adviſe with Lentulus who was Conſul the year before, and with the reſt of the Senators, about ſome ſafe place, whither he might make his retreat, [lib. 8.]

Out of Cilicia Pompey came into Cyprus, [Cæſar, lib. 3.] where they who came to offer their ſervice to him at Paphos, confirmed unto him, that Cicero had made a very honourable mention of him, [Cicero, in Philippica, 2.] Here he knew that, by the general conſent of all the Antiochians and Roman Citizens that traded there, the Caſtle of Antiochia was already taken, merely to keep him out, and it was alſo reported of them, that they had ſent meſſengers to all the neighbour Cities whither any had retired from the flight, that they ſhould not come to Antioch, and if they did, it ſhould be upon perill of their lives: and now there was a report ſpread about the Cities of Cæſars coming; which when Pompey knew, he let aſide his intention of going into Syria, and taking away the money that belonged to the guilds, and alſo from private perſons, and ſhipping great ſtores of money to defray the charges of the army, and 2000 ſouldiers well armed (part whereof he took out of the families of the guilds, and part he forced from the Merchants, and whomſoever any one thought fit for this purpoſe) he failed to Peluſium, [Cæſar, lib. 3.]

For Theophanes a Leſbian, and other his friends, perſwaded him, that ſetting alſo other places aſide, he ſhould go into Egypt, accounting it not only near within three days journey, but alſo rich and powerful, where he might expect aid from the King his pupil; eſpecially ſeeing Pompey had reſtored his father to his kingdom by the aid of Gabinus: and that the ſon was not ungrateful but had ſent ſhips to Pompey againſt Cæſar, [Vellei, Patercul, lib. 2, cap. 53. Plutarch, in Pompey. Appian, pag. 480. Dio, lib. 42.] As ſoon as that opinion prevailed, Pompey and his wife went into a ſhip of Seleucus, an ſet ſail from Cyprus; ſome in long ſhips, and others in ſhips of burden accompanied him, [Plutarch.] to which navigation belongs that of Lucan, [lib. 8.]

*Hæc ubi deseruit Pompeius littora, totos
Emensæ Cyprî scopulos quibus exit in austrum,
Inde mari vasti transiit vertitur aëth :
Nec tenuis Casium nocturno lumine montem,
Infimæque Egypti pugnae littora velo
Vix tegit, quæ dividit pars maxima Nilî
In vada decurrit Pelusî septimus annis.*

Pompey departing thence, his course gan bend,
Round all the Cyprian Rocks that Southward tend,
And got into the interposed main ;
Nor by the nights weak light could he attain
Mount Casius, but with struggling sails and strength,
A lower port of Egypt reacht at length,
Where parted Nilus greatest channel flows,
And to the Ocean at Pelusium goes.

Cæsar (that we may returne to what he did in the pursuit of Pompey) for want of Gallies, passed the Hellespont in small ships, whom being in a ferry boat, Cassius bearing to Pharnaces with ten beaked ships, met in the midst of the passage : neither did Cæsar avoide him, but making towards him, advised his adversary to yield, who being astonished at the admirable fortune of Cæsar, and supposing that he failed against him on purpose ; holding his hand to him out of the Gally, humbly demanded pardon of him : and immediately delivered up the fleet to him; which consisted of 70 ships, (if we believe Appian) [Sueton, in Julio, Cæsar, cap. 63. Appian, pag. 482, 483, Dio, lib. 42.]

As soon as Cæsar came into Asia, he granted the Cnidians liberty, in favour of Theopompus, who had collected the fables. [Plutarch in Cæsar,] He received into favour the Ionians and Eolians, and other nations, who inhabit the lesser Asia, who demanded pardon of him by their Embassadors; [Appian, pag. 483.] only demanding money of them ; which yet he recompensed with another benefit, for he freed Asia from Publicans, which grievously vexed it, and converted part of the customs into a convenient payment of Tribute, [Dio, lib. 42.] and remitted the third part of the Tribute to all the inhabitants of Asia. [Plutarch ut supra.]

T. Ampius having an intent to take away the money out of the Temple at Ephesus, called the Senators of that province, that they might be witnesses of what money he took, but he was fain to fly, being hindered by the coming of Cæsar : thus by Cæsar's means was the money at Ephesus twice saved. [Cæsar, lib. 3.]

Seeing no body had any thing of certainty to say concerning whither Pompey intended to fly. Cæsar taking some part of his voyage alone with M. Bruus, (who being returned unto him from Pompey's party, he esteemed among his chiefest friends) he demanded his opinion : and because they could make no certain conjecture of Pompey's flight, they thought to take the most probable, and setting all others aside, directed their course for Egypt, [Plutarch in M. Bruto,] tearing least he being possessed of that Kingdom, should again rally his forces. [Dio, lib. 42.] Wherefore he passed to Rhodes, neither did he stay till all his army was come together, but going aboard the Cassian and Rhodian Gallies, with those forces that he had with him, never telling any one whither he would bend his course, he set sail about evening, giving order to all the Captains of ships, that they by night, should follow the light of the Admirall's Gally, and his own flag by day : but being now far from land, he commanded his Captain of his ship, to direct his course for Alexandria, and by sea they were carried thither on the third day. [Appian, pag. 483.]

Lucan in his ninth book describes this voyage of Cæsar, more like a Poet than an Historiann, tells how he loitered at Ilum, and places thereabouts, and that looting from thence, he came into Egypt on the fourth night.

*Sic satis, repetit classes, & tota secunda
Vela dedit Coris ; avidisque urgere potella
Iliacæ pressare moras ; Asiæque potentem
Prævehitur, pelagique Rhodoni spumante relinquit, Septima nox Zephyro nunquam laxante rudentes
Offendit Phariæ Egyptiæ littora flammis,
Sed prius orta dies nocturnans lampada texit,
Quam tutas intraret aquas.*

— This said, to thore
He hafts, takes shipping, and to Coreus lends
His full-spread sailes with haft, to make amends
For these delays ; and with a prosperous wind,
Leaves wealthy Asia and fair Rhodes behind :
The west wind blowing still, the seventh night
Discovers Egypt's shore by Pharian light ;
But ere they reach the harbour, day appears,
And dims the night by fires, —

But none openeth the whole business more certainly than Cæsar himself, thus writing of himself in the third Commentary of the civil war.

“ Cæsar having tarried a few days in Asia, when he heard that Pompey was seen at Cyprus, conjecturing that he had taken his voyage into Egypt, by reason of the “ eyes he had upon that kingdom, and other opportunities of that place, came to “ Alexandria, with the Legions, one whereof he commanded to follow him out of “ Thessaly, and another which he had commanded to come to him out of Achaia, “ by his Lieutenant Fufius, and 800 Horse, and the ten Rhodian ships, and a few out “ of Asia. In these Legions were 3200 men, the rest being to weakened with their “ wounds in fights, and with labour and greatness of the voyage, could not overtake “ him : but Cæsar, trusting in the fame of what he had done, made no doubt of going “ on, for all his forces were to weak, supposing that each place would be secure enough “ for him.

The time of the year that Pompey came into Egypt before Cæsar, Lucan thus describeth in lib. 8.

*Tempus erat, quo Libra pares examinat horas
Non uno plas aqua die ; noctique pendit
Lux minor hybernæ verni solaria damni.*

That time was come wherein just Libra weighs
The hours, and makes the nights equal with dayes ;
Then paces the winter nights hours, which the Spring
Had tane away. —

Namely in the end of September, as the year was then accounted, he had read that Pompey came into Egypt ; and he knew that in the end of the same month of the Julian year, which was in use in his time, the Sun was wont to enter into Libra ; and thereupon, not considering the diverse account of the times, he wrote that Pompey came into Egypt, about the autumnal Solstice ; when indeed the Sun began to enter into Leo, when as about the beginning of the Dog-days, Nilus began to swell : not into Libra, when the river was wont to retire within his banks.

Not far from Pelusium, one of the mouths of Nilus, about the Mountain Cassius, which is sited between the borders of Egypt and Arabia, was King Ptolomy by chance at that time, with great forces, waging war with his sister Cleopatra, whom a few months before he had expelled the Kingdom, and not far from his Camp was Cleopatra encamped, [Cæsar, lib. 4, cum Pompeio, Appian, pag. 480, & Dio, lib. 42.] Cæsar saith that he was but a boy in age, that he was but a boy of middle age, saith Mirtius, [de bell. Alexandro,] puerum, a very young boy saith Strabo, [lib. 17, pag. 796.] and a very young man, Dio, [lib. 40.] a young man, Orosius, [lib. 6, cap. 15.] a very young man, Plutarch, [in Pompeio,] neerer a boy then a man, Velleius, [lib. 2, cap. 53.] Appian [pag. 480.] writes, that he was at the most but thirteen years old.

Wherefore Pompey seeing to great an army upon the shore, must not go to land, unless he might do it safely.

Comperit ut regem Cassio se monte tenere, Flexit iter.

Finding the King to keep within the Cassian Mount,
He turned aside.

(as Lucan hath it in lib. 8.) and sent some of his followers to the King, which should humbly declare unto him his coming thither ; and intreat him, for the familiarity and friendship with his father, and the benefits confirmed upon himself, that he might be received into Alexandria, and be protected by his strength in this his calamity, [Cæsar, lib. 3. Plutarch in Pompey, Appian, pag. 480, Dio, lib. 42.] but those that went from him, when they had done their message, began to talk more freely with the Kings Souldiers, and that they should perform their duty to Pompey, and not to depile his ill fortune. In this number were many of Pompey's Souldiers, whom Gabinius received out of his army in Syria, &c. had had him to Alexandria, and the war being ended, had left with Ptolemy the father of the lad. [Cæsar, in supra.]

The King himself answered nothing: but his friends who had the administration of the Kingdom, Achilles an Egyptian, who was Lord General, and Pothinus an Eunuch, who was Lord Treasurer, began to consult about Pompey: taking into council with them other officers, among whom was Theodorus, either a Chian, or a Samian, a mercenary teacher of Rhetorick, but yet one that was in great authority with the King, as being his Schole-matter. [Livy, lib. 112. Plutarch, and Appian, in supra.]

In this Council, some were of opinion, that Pompey was to be received, and others, that he should be kept from entering into Egypt: but Theodorus, bragging of his eloquence and skill in declaiming, declared that both of them were mistaken: for that there was but one expedient, that they should receive and put him to death: adding wrath in the close of his speech, that the dead bite not. [Plutarch in Pompey, & in Bruto.]

His opinion the rest followed induced thereunto through fear, as they afterwards said, least by tampering with the Kings army, Pompey should seize: upon Alexandria and Egypt, or condemning his misfortune, as commonly in calamity many of his friends became enemies, publicly answered kindly to them, that were sent unto them from Pompey, and bid him that he should come to the King: but privately they sent Achilles the Kings generally, a man of a singular audacity, and L. Septimius a Colonel, who in the wars against the Pyrates had a command under Pompey, to kill him. [Cæsar, lib. 3.]

These with Salvius another Centurion and three or four such ministers more went aboard a little ship, and came to Pompey: in the mean while, the whole army stood in battalia along the shoar, as it were in honour of his entertainment, the King being in the head of them clad in his robes, also there were (spied many of the Kings ships, full of men, that they should be sure not to escape, if they should change their minds: the little ship approaching, Septimius first arose and in Latine saluted Pompey by the name of Imperator: Achilles having saluted him in Greek, wished him to come into that little ship, for that his ship through the greatness thereof, and because the sea was full of shells, neither could the gally by reason of the sands in any possibility be brought to land, and that the King desired to see him as soon as he could, all the chief men of those who accompanied Pompey, and all who sailed with him, came unto him, and advised him, that whilst they were out of danger of their weapons, he should let fall back again towards the sea: and he himself considering the army in battalia, and the sleight ship that was sent unto him, and that the King did not come to meet him, nor any of the chief noble men, began to suspect much, nevertheless having saluted Cornelia, which now already had bewailed his death, he commanded two Centurions, and of his free men Philip, and a servant named Scynus, to go aboard the little ship before him, then Achilles helping him with his hand, he himself also entered the ship, and just before turning to his wife and sons, spake those Iambicks of Sophocles.

Ὅστι γὰρ πρὸς τὴν ἡμετέραν ἐλπίδα
Κίρην, εἰ δὴ οὐκ ἔστι, καὶ ἐνταῦθα μὴ ἴδω.

Nam cum tyranno siculi negotium esset,
Fuit servus ejus, liber estis veniet.

Who deale with Tyrants they shall surely be Inslaved, though before they are ne're to free.

As they sailed there was a dead silence, whereby the suspicion was encreased; and holding a book in his hand, wherein he had written the Oration, that he intended to speak to Ptolemy, he began to read it, when they came near the shoar: they determined to kill Pompey, before they came to land, fearing least meeting with Ptolemy, he should be fairly delivered either by the King himself, or by the Romans, who he had with him, or the Egyptians, (who bare him great good will.) Cornelia with his friends out of the ship, stood in great suspense, beholding the errand: and Pompey began to be in good hopes, because at his landing he saw many of the Kings friends come running to entertain him with honour: but as Philip lent him his hand to help help him up, Septimius thrust him behind him and run him through, and after him, Salvius, and Achilles thrust him through with their swords: he, when he was there, being in no way either of defending himself, or escaping, with both his hands hid his face with his gown: neither spake he or did any thing unworthy of himself, only giving a groan, patiently received all their thrusts. [Id. ibid. Plutarch, and Appian, Dio.]

His wife and friends which were in the ships, when they saw this, gave a great shriek, which was heard even to the shoar, and holding up their hands to heaven, implored the gods that were the revengers of covenant breaking, and in all half weighing anchor fled. [Plutarch, & Appian.] Some of these were taken by the Egyptians that pursued them, and some escaped by flight. [Dio.] having first failed as far as Tyre, for they were entertained by the Tyrrians as Dio shews in lib. 42. Of those that escaped his wife Cornelia, and his son Sextus Pompeius fled to Cyprus. [Livy lib. 112.] the rest of the Pompeian fleet was taken, and they who were in it most cruelly murdered: and then Pompey the Bythinian (of whom Cicero makes mention in Buto, or, de claris oratoribus, as one of his own time) was killed, but Lentulus one that had been Consul, was killed at Pelusium. [Oros. lib. 6, cap. 15.] namely L. Lentulus the (Consul of the former year;) whom Cæsar writes was taken, by the King, and killed in prison. [bell. civil. lib. 3.] but Plutarch in Pompeio notes, that he together with Pompey went to Cyprus, and that he came not out of Cyprus into Egypt, till a long time after the buriall of Pompey, and a little after that going out was taken at sea, and killed.

Caius Cæsar, and Publius Servilius, being Consuls, Pompey was killed in the 58 year of his age, (complete) the day before his birth-day, [Vellei, Paterul, lib. 2, cap. 53.] on that very day on which he Triumphed in former time over Mithridates and the Pirates: [Dio, lib. 42.] but that he triumphed for two dayes together, the III. and the day before the Kalends of October, we have shewed out of Pliny, [lib. 7, cap. 29. & lib. 37, cap. 2.] in his proper place: so that Plutarch wrote not so accurately in saying that Pompey lived 59 years, and that he died the day after his birth day: but that last of September, which was the last of Pompey, this year, as the times were then falsely reckoned at Rome, fell upon the 25 day of the Julian July, according to our account.

The head of Pompey being cut off by Septimius, (as Lucan saith) was kept till the coming of Cæsar, in expectation of a great reward: but the body was thrown naked out of the ship, to be gazed upon by all that would. Philip, his freed man, staved by it till all had satisfied their eyes; then he washed it with sea water, and wrapped it in a coat of his own. When he had nothing present, looking about the shore, he found the broken planks of a siber boat, but which was enough to burn the naked carcase, and that not whole neither. As he was gathering the planks together, and laying them in order, a grave old Citizen of Rome, who had served under Pompey in his young dayes, came and helped him to perform the funeral Rites. [Plutarch in Pompey.] That a certain man buried him on the shore, and made a little Monument for him: Appian writes, [pag. 481.] and that another added this inscription, Τὸ πᾶσι θεοῖσι πᾶσι σῶμα ἐκταπὲν τὸ μῦθος.

Vix caperet templum, quæ parva recordis arena.

— Scarce could the Temple hold,
That which is cover'd over with a little mold.

We read in Aurelius Victor, [de viris illustribus, cap. 77.] that the Trunk of his body was cast into Nilus, and burnt, and buried by Servius Codrus, who wrote this on his Tomb, HERE LIETH POMPEY THE GREAT, of whom Lucan

E laetibus pavidae decurrit ad æquora Codrus,
Quæstor ab Idalio Cynthiae litoris Cypro
Insuper Magni fuerat comes: ille per umbras
Ausus ferre gradum, victum pietate iuvencem
Compulsi, ut mœditi quæstus corpus in undis Duceret ad terram, traheretque ad litora Magnum.

— Toth' shore did fearful Codrus come Out of his lurking hole that was before,
Great Pompey's Questor, and from Cyprus shore
Had follow'd him; he by the shades of night
Durst go true love had unquitt' terror quite
To find his slaughter'd Lord, along the sand,
And through the waves to bring the trunk to land.

For the Poet more rightly seeketh his body in the sea, than Aurelius Victor, in Niles : Seeing that it is manifest out of others, and Strabo also, [lib. 16. pag. 760.] and Pliny, [lib. 5. cap. 12.] that Pompey was killed and buried not far from the Cassian Mountain.

This was the end of great Pompeys life, who was accounted the most potent among the Romans, so that he was surnamed Agamemnon, because he also had had the command of 1000 ships, but then died near Egypt in a little ship, like one of the basest Egyptians : and whereas he from an Oracle a long while before suspected all the Citizens of the Cassian family, he was killed and buried near Mount Cassius, [Dio. lib. 42.] which mountain is seated not far from the confines of Judea, which he first subjected under the Roman yoke.

They who were with Cato, coming into Cyrene, heard of the death of Pompey, [Dio. lib. 42.] Cornelia with her son in law Sextus Pompey, being driven thither out of Cyprus : as that of Lucan shews in lib. 9.

*Prima ratem Cypros spumantibus accipit undis :
Inde tenens pelagus, sed jam moderatior, Euris
In Libycas egit sedes, & castra Catonis.*

They first arriv'd on Cyprus foamy shore,
From thence a mild East wind commanding bore
Their ships to Cato's Lybian Camp

He adds moreover, that the son of Pompey (Quintus the elder) who was with Cato, there, learned from his younger brother Sextus, who was with Cornelia, the death of his father, that Cornelia on the shore burnt the reliques of Pompey, and by her example the rest of the army making Funeral piles, performed Funeral Rites to the ghosts of them that died in Pharsalia, and that Cato made a Funeral Oration in memory of Pompey.

After this, there being different opinions, those who had no hopes of obtaining pardon from Caesar, remained with Cato : others departing from him, went whithersoever their chance carried them : others went directly to Caesar and obtained pardon, [Dio. lib. 42.] also Cornelia, a pardon being published, returned safe to Rome, [Id. ibid.] and there in the Mount Albanus laid the Reliques of her husband that were brought unto her, [Lucan. lib. 8. cum Plutarcho, in fine Pompei.]

The Souldiers of Cato, who were chiefly mariners of Cilicia, whose Captain was Tarcho, being ready to depart from him, being moved with the words he spake unto them, returned to their duty, [Lucan. lib. 9.]

Cato is admitted by the citizens into Cyrene, whereas a few days before, they had shut their gate against Labienus, [Plutarch, in Catone.] Lucan, lib. 9.

*Proximus in muros & mania Cyreniarum
Est labor : exclusus nulla se vindicat ira ;
Penaeque de vitiis sola est, vicisse, Catoni.
Inde peti placuit Lybici contermina Mauris Regna Jube.*

— Their second labour is
To scale Cyrenes lofty walls on whom,
Cato no vengeance took when overcome
(Though they against him shut their gates) to him
Revenge sufficient did their conquest seem,
He hence to Lybian Jubaes kingdom goes.

when Cato had understood that Scipio the father in law of Pompey was entertained by King Juba, and that Appius Varus, to whom the Province of Africa was given by Pompey, had joyned himself unto them with his army, [Plutarch, ut supra.]

Caesar after three dayes being in his pursuit, (for as much as can be gathered out of the epitome of Lucan) came to Alexandria, King Ptolemei being still about the mountain Cassius, [Appian, pag. 483.] and found there that the Alexandrians were in a rutiny about the death of Pompey, he durst not immediately go ashore ; but leaving the shore, stood off some time, as Dio hath it, lib. 42, and Lucan, lib. 9.

Accipit : ac dubiis veritum se credere regnis

— where when he saw the shoar
With giddy tumult all confold o're

To bring his ship to land

Then having knowledge of Pompeys death, Caesar went first out of his ship, and heard the shout of the Souldiers, whom Ptolemei had left for a garrison in the town ; and saw them come running out unto him, because his bundles of rods were carried before him ; for in this all the multitude said that the royal majesty was disgraced, [Caesar, lib. 3.] concerning which thing also both [Dio, lib. 42.] and Lucan, lib. 9, make mention thus.

*Sed fremu vulgi sacces, & iura querentis
Inferri Romana iura, discordia sensit
Pellora, & ancipites animos,*

But perceiving that the throng
Of people murmur'd that in Egypt he Bare th' ensignes up of Romes authority
He finds their wavering faiths

Notwithstanding Caesar entred Alexandria being in a mutiny without any danger : [Livy lib. 112.] retiring himself by sight into the palace, but their arms were taken from some of his souldiers, and the rest, as all the ships were coming to shoar, went back again. [Dio. 42.]

Caesar was very angry when Theodorus offered to him the head and seale ring of Pompey : and taking the ring, fell a weeping. [Livy, lib. 112. Plutarch, in Cesare.] We read in Aurelius Victor, [de viris illust. cap. 77.] that the head of Pompey with the ring was presented unto Caesar, by Achilles the captain of Ptolemys guard, being wrapped up in an Egyptian covering ; and he caused it to be burned with many and moltiprecious odours, neither did he refrain from weeping, and concerning the head that was offered him by the captain of the guard, thus Lucan, lib. 9.

but of the teares, that he, and Dio will have to be but differing ones thus

*Non primo Caesar danti vultu muera visu, Avertitque oculos : vultus, dum crederet, haesit :
Utque fidem vidit sceleris, cuiusquam paravit
Jam bonas esse foci, lacrymas non sponte cadentes

Caesar at his first gift would not refuse
Nor turn his cies away but fix'd views
Till he perceiv'd it was true, and plainly saw,
T'was safe to be a pious father in law :
Then shed forced teares & from a joyfull breast Drew sighs and groans as thinking tears would best and of the buriall of the head he thus brings in Caesar commanding :

— Vos condite busto
Tanti colla ducia: sed non, ut crimina tantum
Vestra tegat tellus, iusto date thura sepulchro,
Et placate caput, cineresque in littore fuso
Colligite, atque unam sparsis date manibus urnam.

— But do you interre
This worthies head, not that the earth may bear
And hide your guilt; bring fumes and odours store,
T'appeale his head; and gather from the shore
His scatter'd limbs; compose them in one Tomb.

But he commanded the head to be buried in the Suburbs, and there dedicated a Temple of Nemesis. [Appian. pag. 484.]

And that he might the more shew his good affection towards Pompey, he kindly entertained his friends and familiars, who were taken as they wandered in that Country by the King, and bound them unto himself by favours that he did them: and he wrote to his friends at Rome, that the greatest and most pleasant fruit that he took of his victory was, that he daily saved some Citizens that had opposed him. [Plut. in Cæsar.]

Cæsar, before his army came unto him, for want of his own company, gave himselfe to idleness; & curiously entertaining all he met: and walking about to see the City, admired the beauty thereof, and stood to hear many of the professors of wisdom, which his leisure got him favour and good account with the people of Alexandria, [Appian. Bell. civi. pag. 483. fin. pag. 484. init.] Thus Lucan tells that he visited the Temples, and the Cave wherein the body of Alexander the Great lay.

Then with a look still hiding fear goes he,
The stately Temple of the old god to see ;
Which speaks the ancient Macedonian greatness.
But there delighted with no objects sweeten'd,
Nor with their gold nor gods majestic dress'd,

Cæſar delivered over to Cn. Domicius Calvinus the government of Aſia, and the neighbour Provinces, [Hirtius, in lib. de bello, Alexandrino.] and commanded him, that taking the armies that were in Aſia into him, he ſhould make war upon King Pharnaces. [Ido, lib. 42.] But when Cæſar obſerved that there were many ſeditious daily raiſed at Alexandria, by reaſon of the great concourſe of the multitude, and that many ſouldiers were killed in diſſerſe places of the City, he commanded the Legions to be brought to him out of Aſia; which he had gathered together out of Pompey's ſouldiers; for he himſelf was neceſſarily kept there by the eaſtern winds, which are moſt contrary to them that ſaile from Alexandria, [Cæſar, lib. 3.] for thoſe are northern winds, which ceaſe blowing about the end of the Julian Auguſt; as we may ſee both in the Ephemerides of Geminus and Ptolemy, and alſo in Pliny, [lib. 2, cap. 47.] and Columella, [lib. 2, de re ruſtica.] from whence the error of Lucan is diſcovered, who delivered in lib. 8, that Pompey came into Egypt in the time of the autumnal equinoctial: and in his ninth book he referred, that tollow march of Cato with the Legions, through Africa the deſert, (concerning which Livy, lib. 112.) after he heard of the death of Pompey, to be undertaken by him, to the winter that followed this equinoctial.

For when departing from Cyrenæ, he assayed to cross the Syrts with his fleet, he, by a tempest, was cast upon the marshes of Tritonis: Sextus Pompeius being left with with part of the forces in the more fruitfull places of Africa, that Cato intended to march by land, the sea being now impassable by reason of stormes, to seek the King of Mauritania, as he thus declares :

*Hic igitur depulsa locis, ejusque classis
Syrtybus, haud ultra Garamanidas attigit undas:
Sed dux Pompeio Libyes melioris in oris Mauri: ac impudens virtus herere Caion is Audet in ignotis agmen committere gentes,

Hæc eadem fœdabat byems, que clauserat æquor.*

Part of the fleet got off from hence again,
And from the Syrtis driven, d'd remain

On this life Garamantis in rich land :
But Cato's virtue brooking no delay,
Through unknown regions led his troops away,
T' in compass round the Syrtis by land, for now
The stormy seas unnavigable grow .
In winter time——

Which also Plutarch in the life of Cato affirmeth, writing that κατὰ χειμῶνα in winter time this march by land was undertaken by him.

But his army was miserably afflicted in the country of the Nílám yacs, which is near the Syrts, with the winds driving the fands, and sometimes with vehement theft, and a multitude of serpents of divers kinds that they met with : and Cato coming to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, being advised by the perswasion of Labio to consult with the oracle concerning his future fortune, refused to do it : and at length, having wandered two months through the sandy deserts of Africa, he came to Leptis : and there spent the winter. [Lucan, lib. 9.] [Plutarch, in Cato.] were not much less than 10000 men. [Plutarch, in Calpurn.]

 Cæsar, [that he may return to him, being detained at Alexandria, by the easterly winds] spent his time in Egypt, in getting of money, and deciding the controversy between Ptolemy and Cleopatra. [Id. lib. 42.] for of that vast sum of money that was owed unto him by Ptolemy Auletes the father of the young King, he there exacted some part for the defraying of the charge of his army. [Plutarch, in Cæsar.] which exactions the Egyptians, who above all other nations are most superstitious worshippers of a multitude of gods, took to much the worse, because Cæsar did not hold his fingers from those things that were dedicated to their gods. [Id. lib. 42.] although in this he was cozened by the Kings unsons; that he received but little moiety, they themselves craftily robbing their own temples: that they might by this shew that the Kings exchequer was empty, and that they might stir up the people unto an hatred of Cæsar. [Oros. lib. 6, cap. 15.] for the increasing of which, the Eunuch Pothinus, a man who was in greatest authority, did both speak and act many things in publick: for he gave the soldiers old and musty corn, telling them, that they should be content, because they were fed at another bodies cost: and commanded also that his own supper should be served up in wooden and earthen dishes, reporting that Cæsar had taken away all the gold and silver plate, for the payment of the debt. [Plutarch, in supra.]
 The King and Queen did belong to the

But Caesar supposed that the controversies of the King and Queen did belong to the people of Rome, and to him because he was Consul; and the rather to belong to his officer, because in his former Consulship, there was a league made with Ptolemy the father of them both, wherefore he declares unto them, that it was his pleasure, that both King Ptolemy, and his sister Cleopatra should dismisse their armies; and rather than try their controversies by law before him, than between themselves by arms. [Caesar trye 32.]

The death of Pompey was not believed at Rome, until that afterwards his seal ring was sent thither; on which three trophies were engraven, (as at Plutarch will, a Lion holding a word); but then the Romans strove who should powre most honour upon Caesar: giving him power to do with the Pompeians as he would himself, that he should have authority to make war and peace with whomsoever he would, although he had not reported it to the people; that he should be Consul for five yeares together, that he should not be Dictator for six months (page only, as it was wont to be, but for an whole yeare time, that he should have triutian authority all his life time, that he should sit with the tribunes, and determine of any thing to be done together with them: which was never granted to any formerly. [Dis. lib. 42.]

Cæsar

Cæsar having accepted of these honours, although he was out of Italy, yet immediately entered upon the Dictatorship, [i. d. ibid.] So that Josephus rightly begins his principality from hence; assigning unto it three years and an half, [i. lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 17.] and in Syria, as the Antiochians seem to reckon the times of the Cæsars from his first Dictatorship, to the Lacedæmonians from this second Dictatorship; for Eusebius in his Chronicle at the second year of the Empire of Probus shews, that the Lacedæmonian account was later than the Antiochian, but only one year.

Velleius Paternulus saith, that the King, and those by whom he was governed, attempted Treason against Cæsar, [i. lib. 2. cap. 54.] which Suetonius affirms of King Ptolemei himself, [i. in Julio, cap. 35.] and Eutropius, [i. lib. 6.] and Plutarch, of the Eunuch Pothinus; by reason of which treasons that were privily laid for him, he began to fast whole nights in his own defence: and whenas Pothinus would tell him, that now it was time to leave off, and to follow his great affairs, & that afterwards he might return again: He answered him, that he did require no advice of any of the Egyptians: he sent for Cleopatra privately out of the country, [i. Plutarch, in Cæsare.]

For Cleopatra, having hitherto pleaded her cause before Cæsar by the mediation of other men, as soon as she knew his nature, that he was given to the love of women; by private messengers complained unto Cæsar, that she was betrayed by her friends; and that she desired that she herself might plead her own cause before him, [i. Dio, lib. 42.] which being granted, she only took one of her friends with her, one Apollodorus Siculus, and going aboard a light ship she failed to the Palace as soon as it was dark, and seeing she could by no other means hide her self, she laid her self along in a mattress that was folded up, which Apollodorus tied up with a cord and carried up through the gate to Cæsar, [i. Plutarch.] Lucian thus describes her bringing in to Cæsar, in lib. 10.

*Jam Pelusiaci veniens è gurgite Nilis,
Rex puer imbellis populi sedaverat iras,
Obfide quo pacis Pellæa tuta in aula
Cæsar erat: cum se parva Cleopatra birem,
Corrupto custode Phari laxare catenas,
Insulsi Ematibus ignaro Cæsare telluris;
Dedecus Egypti, Latio feralis Erinyis,
Romano non casta malo.*

Now the young King come from Pelusium
Had pacified the peoples wrath: in whom
As Hostage of his peace in Egypt Court
Cæsar was safe; when, lo, from Pharos port,
Beibing the Keeper to unchain the flame,
In a small Gally Cleopatra came,
Unknown to Cæsar entering the house
The stain of Egypt, Romes pernicious
Fury, unchast to Italies disgrace.

Cleopatra falling at Cæsars feet, demanded her part of the kingdom; the woman was exceeding beautiful, and her beauty was much increased by this, that such an one did seem to suffer no great an injury, as also the hatred of the King himself, who had murdered Pompey, not for Cæsars sake, and would have done the like to him if he could have found the means, [i. Florus, lib. 4. cap. 2.] but when Cæsar saw Cleopatra, and heard her speak, he was immediately to become her slave, that as soon as it was day, he sent for Ptolemei to come to him, and mediated a pacification: there becoming Cleopatra advocate, whose judge he was before: which thing, and because he saw his sister within with him before he was aware of it, lo inflamed the lad with anger; that he ran out to the people, crying out that he was betrayed, and took his Crown and threw it to the ground, [i. Dio, lib. 42.]

Hereupon arose a great tumult, Cæsars souldiers took Ptolemei and carried him in: but the Egyptians were all in commotions, and unless Cæsar being trooken with fear had gone out unto them, and from a safe place promised them, that he would do whatsoever they would themselves, they at the first onler, had seized upon the Palace, which they indroed both by sea and land: for the Romans, who thought they had been amongst their friends, had no means to make resistance, [i. Dio, lib. 42.]

After these things, Cæsar together with Ptolemei and Cleopatra, going out unto the people, rehearsed in a writing the testament of their father: in which it was commanded, that after the ancient custom of the Egyptians, that they two should be married together, and should hold the kingdom in common: but so, that they should be under the protection of the people of Rome: Cæsar added moreover, that it was his part, who now was Dictator, and had all the power of the people of Rome, both to have a care of the children, and to see their fathers will executed. Wherefore he gave the kingdom of Egypt to Ptolemy and Cleopatra; and gave Cyprus to Archæus, and Ptolemy the younger, for he was in such a fear at this time, that he would willingly have given any thing of his own, rather then have taken any away that belonged to the Egyptians: and after this manner was this tumult appeased. [i. ibid. cum Cæsare, lib. 3. Livy, lib. 112. & Plutarch in Cæsare.]

King Dejotarus coming to Cn. Domitius Calvinus, Cæsars Lieutenant in Asia, desired him, that he would not suffer Armenia the less, his own kingdom, nor Cappadocia, the kingdom of Ariobarzanes, to be possessed and spoiled by Pharnaces: which unless they were freed from, they could neither do as they were commanded, nor pay the money that they had promised to Cæsar. Domitius immediately sent messengers to Pharnaces, that he should depart out of Armenia and Cappadocia; which denatiation, he thought would be of greater power, if he came neerer those Countreys with his army; wherefore he went to the Legions, and of the three that he had with him, he took the XXXVI, and the other two he sent into Egypt, unto Cæsar, who had written to him for them: to this XXXVI Legion, he added two more that he had received from Dejotarus, many of whom he had disciplined and armed after the Roman fashion, and an hundred horse, also he took as many of Ariobarzanes. He sent also P. Sextius to C. Platorius his Questor, to bring to him a Legion that he had gathered together of Souldiers raised on a sudden: and Q. Patiscus, into Cilicia, to bring more aids, all which forces, by the command of Domitius, with all speed met at Comana. [i. Hirius, de bell. Alexandrino.]

In the mean the Embassadors return an answer from Pharnaces, that he was departed from Cappadocia, that he had recovered Armenia the less, which he ought to keep as belonging to his father, and furthermore, that the whole business of that King should be referred to Cæsar himself, for he would do whatsoever he should appoint: but yet he departed out of Cappadocia, because he could more easily defend Armenia, that was near his own kingdom, then Cappadocia, that lay further off: which when Domitius knew, he still continued in that mind, that he should depart from that kingdom also, for he had no more right to Armenia than to Cappadocia, neither was his demand just, that the whole business should remain intire until Cæsars coming, for that was, to be intire, to be as it had been before. Having given him this answer, he marched with the foresaid forces into Armenia: in the mean time, Pharnaces sent many Embassies unto Domitius, to treat of a peace, and offered him great presents: but Domitius constantly refused them all, and answered the Embassadors, that he did not account any thing more deer unto him, then to recover the dignity of the people of Rome, and the kingdom of their allies. [i. ibid.]

Cæsar carrying on the war of Alexandria, Dejotarus did what he could for Cæsars profit, and furnished Cn. Domitius his army, both with lodgings, and strengthened him with his own forces; as Cicero confirmeth in an oration that he made in his behalf.

In Egypt, the Eunuch Pothinus, who had the oversight of all the Kings treasure, and of the whole kingdom, fearing least he should be punished for the former sedition of the Egyptians, of which he was the chief ringleader, was the beginner of a new and difficult war. He first complained amongst his own friends, that the King was called to plead his cause: and then to others whom he had an intention to draw to his party, he cast a suspicion, that Cæsar indeed, for the appeasing of the tumult, had given the kingdom to both, but that in process of time, he would give it to Cleopatra alone; and solicited Achilles by letters and messengers, who was Commander in chief of all the Kings forces, having provoked him by his own, and putted up with, promises from the King, that he should in privacy lead all the Kings army, both Horse and Foot from Pelusium to Alexandria. [i. Cæsar. lib. 3. Bell. Civil. Dio, lib. 42.]

Cæsars forces were in no wise to great, that if he must be forced to fight without the Town, he durst trust to them: the only thing that he was to do, was, to keep himself in his fastness within the Town, and to know what Achilles intended to do. He wished the King to send some of his most confident friends, as Embassadors to Achilles, and of chiefest authority about, that he should declare his intention. Diocorides and Serapion, who had been Embassadors at Rome, and had been in great authority with his father, were sent from the King, and came to Achilles: whom he, as soon as they came within sight, before he knew what they came for, commanded to be taken and killed: one of whom having received a wound, was taken away by his own men for dead, and the other was killed. Which being done, Cæsar brought things so to pass, that he got the King within his own power; supposing that the name of the King would be of great authority among his own Country men : and that this war might seem to be undertaken rather by the outrage of a few private men and thieves, there by the advice of the King. [Cæsar. ibid.]

The forces that Achilles had with him, seemed not to be contemned, neither for their number, nor for the nation they were of, nor for their want of skill in Souldiery, for he had 20000, in arms : these consisted of the Souldiers of Gabinus, who now were accustomed to the life and licentiousness of the Alexandrians, and had unlearned the name and discipline of the people of Rome. Hither came also a company of Thieves and Robbers that were gathered together out of the Province of Syria and Cilicia, and the neighbour Provinces. Moreover, there met here many that were condemned persons, and banished men, and all Roman fugitives were sure of life and entertainment at Alexandria : so that but giving in their name, they were lifted away again by a concourse of Souldiers : who did defend the violence of their companions, because they were in the same fault, for fear of their own danger : these went according to the old fashion of the Alexandrian army, to demand the Kings friends to be put to death, and to plunder rich mens goods, for to increase their pay, and to besiege the Kings Palace, to banish some, and to recall others from banishment : there were also 2000 Horse, many of whom had served a long time in the wars of Alexandria. [Id. ibid.]

Achillas trusting to these forces, and despising the fewness of Cæsars souldiers, having seized upon Alexandria, attempted by an onset to break into Cæsar's house : but Cæsar, having disposed his Cohorts in the passes, sustained the assault. They fought at the same time at the Haven, and indeed there was the greatest fight of all : for at the same time, the enemy brought their forces about, and fought in many passes, and endeavoured also with a great multitude to seize upon the long ships : fifty whereof being sent to help Pompey, when the battle in Thessalia was ended, returned home : they were all Gallies with either three or five oars on a bank, well rigged and furnished with all tackling for sailing : besides these, XXII, there were which were away wont to be at Alexandria, for a guard to it, all covered (or rather beaked) which if the enemy had seized upon, Cæsar's fleet being gone away, they had had the Haven, and the whole sea at their command, and had kept Cæsar from all provisions, and any aides coming unto him. Wherefore this business was acted with the greatest contention that might be, seeing that Cæsar saw that his chief business consisted in the dispatch of this business, and they their safety : but Cæsar got the better, and burnt those ships, and the rest that were in the arsenal, because he could not defend them with so few a party as he had. [Id. ib.]

as Lucan hath it in his tenth book,

When this fire had seized upon part of the City, it burnt 400000 books that were laid up in the houses adjoining, a singular monument of the care and industry of their ancestors, who had gathered together so many and so great works of famous wits. [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 15.] Livy said, that there was a famous work of the glory and care of those Kings : as it is in Seneca, (in lib. de Tranquillitate animi, cap. 9.) where the same number of books is said to be burned : yet A. Gellius [lib. 5. cap. 17.] out of the agreeing (as he speaks) credit of old monuments, and Ammianus Marcellinus [lib. 22.] relate, that there were 700000 burned : and indeed when at the end of the Alexandrian war, the City was plundered by the Souldiers : but Plutarch in Cæsar, saith, that in the beginning of this war, the flame increasing by the arsenal, that the Library was burned : and Dio in lib. 42. confirmeth, that the store houses, and granaries, and library, were burned together with the arsenal.

After

After the firing of the fleet, Cæsar presently at the Island Pharos (which with a narrow neck of land of 900 paces long, and a bridge being joynted to the city makes the haven) the enemy being employed in the fight, landed his souldiers out of the ships, and placed a garrison there, by which he brought it to passe, that corn and aides might be brought unto him by shipping. [Cæsar lib. 3.] whereupon Lucan (speaking of Pharos taken by him, lib. 10.

*Illa duci geminos bellorum prestitit usus,
Absit excursus & fauces æquoris hosti:
Cæsaris auxilium adiutus & libera ponti
Officia permittit.*

Two helps on Cæsar doth that fort bestow :
Commands the Seas, the Eyes incursions staid,
And made a passage safe for Cæsars aids.

In other parts of the town they fought so, that neither of them had the better : neither of them giving ground by reason of the straitness of the places, and but few killed on either side : Cæsar having taken the most necessary places, fortified them by night in that side of the town, there was a little part of the palace, into which they at the first brought him to dwell, and a theatre that joynted to the house, which was in manner of a citadell, and had a way to the haven and arsenal, these fortifications he daily increased, that they might be to him in stead of a wall, and that he might not be forced to fight but when he would himself. [Cæsar. lib. 3.]

Whereas the Egyptians fearing least Cæsar being now Conquerour in the fight at sea should seize upon the haven of the city, they with a rampart cast up barred his entrance, only leaving a little space : he himself also stopped that space tinking ships of burden filled with stones : and shut up all power from the enemies ships, of going out of the haven ; whereby it came to passe, that with little trouble he could fetch all things necessary for himself, and water also (for Achilles, had taken all water from him, by cutting up the conduits.) [Dio. lib. 42.]

Cæsar sent into all the neighbour countries, and called for aids from thence. [Cæsar. lib. 3.] and sent for the whole fleet out of Rhodes, and Syria and Cilicia : and bid them bring archers out of Crete, and horsemen from Malcus, the King of the Nabathians : and commanded that there should be engines for battery, and corn, and supplies brought unto him. [A. Hirtius de bell. Alexandrin.] he certified Domitius Calvinus of his danger, and desired him by all means, to send supplies to him as soon as possibly he could, and that he would come nearer Alexandria through Syria. [Id. ibid.] but Mithridates of Pergamus a man of great nobility, in his own country, and of knowledge, and valour in the wars, and in great esteem, credit, and trust with Cæsar, was sent into Syria and Cilicia, to hasten on the supplies. [Id. ibid. Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 14. & Dio. lib. 42.]

In the mean while Ganmedes an Eunuch, steals away Artinoc who was but carelessly kept, and carried her to the Egyptians : who making her Queen, they tell more heartily to the war, than before, because they had gotten one of the race of the Ptolemies, to be the commander. [Dio. lib. 42.] concerning whom Lucan, lib. 10.

and Cæsar himself about the end of the commentaries of the civil war. The young daughter of King Ptolemy, hoping after the vacant possession of the Kingdom, conveyed her self out of the palace to Achilles, and commanded in the war together with him : but immediately there began a controversy to arise between them concerning the chief commands, which thing increased much bribes among the souldiers : every one striving to get their good wills by damages to themselves.

Whilst these things are done among the enemies, Pothinus the Kings governor, and administrator of the Kingdom in the behalf of Cæsar, whereas he sent messengers to Achilles, and advised him, that he should follow the business and not delist, the messengers were apprehended and apprehended, and he himself put to death by Cæsar. [Cæsar. lib. 10.] ibid.] who from henceforward kept the young King openly in strict custody, and by this did the more exasperate the minds of the Egyptians, [Dio. lib. 42.]

Whilst these things were done in Egypt, Domitius Calvinus marched against Pharnaces, with great and continual marches, encamped not far from Nicopolis, (a city of Armenia the lesser built by Pompey; in which Pharnaces having already seized upon it dwelt himself) about seven miles distant, where when as in vain Pharnaces had laid ambushments for him: the next day Domitius moves nearer, and brought his camp even to the town: and Pharnaces fell his men in battle, after his own custom and fashion, the next night Pharnaces, having intercepted the messengers who brought the letters to Domitius, concerning the Alexandrian affairs, whereby he knew of the danger of Caesar, and the recalling of Domitius, he accounted it as good as a victory, if he could but linger out the time: but Domitius, whenas he should have been more moved with the danger of Caesar than his own, brings his souldiers out of the camp, and prepares to fight, having placed the XXXVI Legion in the right wing, the Pontick in the left, and the Legions of Dejotarus in middle battle, and when both armies being in battle came to fight, the Pontick Legion was almost wholly lost, and a great part of Dejotarus's souldiers killed, and the XXXVI Legion retreated into the mountains, having not lost above 250 men, notwithstanding Domitius rallied up the reliques of his scattered army, and by safe journeys through Cappadocia, winter now approaching, returned into Asia. [Hirtius cum Appian, lib. 2. de bell. civil. pag. 484. & Dion. lib. 42.]

The Cæsarians and Alexandrians, strove earnestly one against the other, with fortifications and works, Caesar endeavoured most of all that that part of the city which a fen had made the narrowest, he might shut it from the other part of the city: by works, and rampires, hoping that, first, the city being divided into two parts, his army might be commanded by the same council, and same command: and also, that if they were in any danger, assistance might be brought him from the other part of the city: but especially, that he might be abundantly furnished with provision and water, both of which the plentifully afforded, the Alexandrians sent messengers into all parts of Egypt to press men, and brought into the town all sorts of engines, and weapons: and did many other things, that are reckoned up by Hirtius in his commentaries of the Alexandrian war.

Seeing that the number of the enemy increased, Caesar began to take advice concerning an agreement between them: and commanded that Ptolemei being placed where he might be heard of the Egyptians, to tell them, that there was no wrong done unto him, and that there was no need of war: and that they should compose a peace, and that he would take care, that the conditions should be kept, but they suspecting that he was made to do this on purpose by Caesar, went on still with their war, [Dio. lib. 42.] and said that Caesar must in all haste be expelled, who being now shut up by tempests by reason of the time of the year, could not receive any helps from beyond the seas. [Hirtius.]

In the interim the dissension between Achilles the general of the old army, and Arfinoe the younger daughter of Ptolemei (Auletes) increasing, and both plotting, and counterplotting against each other: whilst Achilles aimed at the Empire, Arfinoe, by the means, and assistance of Ganymedes the Eunuch her foster father; prevented his design: by her own possessing it, and put to death Achilles: pretending he would have betrayed the fleet. And when he was sent out of the world and out of the way, he alone enjoyed the whole Empire, Ganymedes being constituted General of the army. He, when he had undertaken the charge, augmented the souldiers pay, and acted in all things with the like care and discretion. [Hirtius & Dio.]

Whereas Alexandria was almost all digged under ground, and had vaults that reached to the river Nile, by which water is brought into private houses, that it might sink by little and little and become potable: Ganymedes having stopped those vaults, and all the parts of the city, in which the Cæsarians were besieged: so that by reason of the saltness of the water in the neighbour houses, they all seemed to be brought to the last cast, and began to think of flying: but that advice being not liked, Caesar commanded that wells should be digged in the night, and great flocks of fresh water being found: all the laborious engines of the Alexandrians became of no use. [Hirtius.]

In that two daies the XXXVII Legion, of those souldiers of Pompey that yielded themselves, being shipped by Domitius Calvinus with corn, arms, weapons, and engines, came to the shoeres of Atrica a little above Alexandria: for the other legion which was sent by him through Syria by land, came not to Caesar: but those ships, the East wind continually blowing, stood at anchor, and could not come into the haven, of which when Caesar was certified, he took shipping and commanded his fleet to follow, but took no souldiers with him, lest he should leave the forts void of men, to defend defend them: and when he was come to a steep place called Cheroneus, and had set some Martiners ashore for fresh water, some of them were intercepted, who certified them, that indeed Caesar was in the fleet, but yet that he had no souldiers in the ships: wherefore they rigged their whole navy, and met with Caesar returning with the Legion of Domitius: and although Caesar would not fight that day, yet a Rhodian ship, which was placed in the right wing, far from the rest, was set upon by four covered ships of the enemy, and some open ones, which Caesar being forced to assist, happily got the victory, and if the night had not broken off the fight, he had been master of the whole fleet of the enemy. [Dio. lib. 42.]

Although the Egyptians had received this loss, yet they were again confirmed by Ganymedes, so that although they had lost an 110 long ship: in the haven and Arternals yet they fell earnestly to work to repair their fleet: and to that end having gathered together all the ship, from all the mouths of Nilus, and from the private Arternals that belonged to the King, in few daies beyond the opinion of all men, they made a fleet of 22 Gallies, with four banks of oars, and five with five banks, besides many lesser and open ones: and having furnished them with Souldiers, fitted them for fight, [Id.] and having opened the entrance of the Haven, and placed their ships in the road, very much troubled the Romans. [Dio. lib. 42.]

Caesar had nine Rhodian ships, (for of ten that were sent, one was lost in the voyage on the Egyptian shore) eight Pontick, five Lycian, twelve out of Asia: of these five were with five oars on a bank, and ten with four: the rest were under this burden, and many were open. With these Caesar sailed about Pharo: and stood over against the enemies ships: there were selves between the two fleets with a very narrow passage, and they both a good while expected which should first cross the passage, because they who first crossed, might easily be oppressed by the whole multitude of the enemies, before the rest could pass: and come to the fight: but the Rhodian ships demanded that they might have the first passage, and by singular skill, so sustained the whole fleet of the enemy, never turning their sides to them, that they made a free passage for the rest to pass, and to come to the fight. [Hirtius.]

The Cæsarians got the victory, having lost never a ship: there was of the Alexandrians one Gally with five oars on a bank taken, and one with two on a bank, with all the souldiers and martiners, and three sunk: the rest fled to the Town of Pharos that was near them, which the Citizens defended from the forts and buildings which were over them, and kept the Cæsarians from coming near. But from thence immediately they were outed by the industry of the Romans, and lost both the Town and Island, and many of their men: but whenas the Island was joynted to the continent by a double bridge, one of the which being forsaken by the enemy, the Romans easily became masters of: whereas on the other, through the rashness of some they were distressed, and being put to rout, fled to their ships, part of them having gotten to the next ships, were sunk by the multitude and weight of the men, part making resistance, and doubting what to do, were killed by the Alexandrians: and some having gotten to the ships that were at anchor, escaped safe a few swam to the next ships. Caesar retired into his own ship, whither when a multitude that followed would have broken in upon him, he (suspecting what would happen, cast himself out of the ship, and swam to those ships which were farther off: and from thence sending boats to help them who were in danger, saved some of them: but his own ship being overloaded with the multitude of souldiers, perished together with all the men, [Id.]

But here is not to be passed over in silence, that which is pretermitted by Hirtius, but remembered by Suetonius, [in Julius, cap. 64.] and by Orosius who follows him, [lib. 6, cap. 15.] concerning Caesar: that by swimming he escaped to the next ship, holding up his left hand, that the commentaries should not be wetted: which very thing concerning the commentaries being preserved, is also related by Plutarch [in Cæsar.] and by Dio, [lib. 42.] But Appian, [lib. 2. de bell. civil. pag. 523.] tells the story thus. That he being inclosed alone upon the bridge by the enemy that pressed upon him, he cast off his purple coat, and leaped into the sea: and the Kings souldiers pursuing him, he swam a long time under the water, only lifting up his head by his, until swimming to an onely ship, and by holding up his hands unto them, is known and saved. And although Suetonius writes, that he held his souldiers coat in his mouth, drawing it after him, that the enemy should not get it, yet Florus, [lib. 4, cap. 2.] together with Plutarch saith, that he let it in the waves, either by chance, or of purpose, that the enemies pursuing him, they might shoot at that which their darts and stones: and that the Egyptians having gotten the coat, fixed it to a Trophy, which they had set up for their putting the enemy to flight, as if they had taken the General himself: and this is delivered by Appian, [lib. 2. de bell. civil. pag. 484.] and Dio, [lib. 42.]

In this fight there were lost of the Legionary souldiers, about 400. and few more of the the fouldiers that belonged to the Fleet and mariners. The Alexandrians in that place built a Castle, and strengthened it with forts and many engines of war; and, taking the stones out of the sea, they made use of it more freely for the fending out of their ships, [Hirtius.]

In the mean while, the Multitudes of Pergames gathered in all haste, great Forces out of Syria and Cilicia, both by the exream good will of the Cities, and his own diligence, [1d.] but at the first, he coming alone to Alcaion, from thence sent for Antipater the Governour of Iudaea to come unto him; who brought with him 3000 Ioudiers, and brought it to passe by his perswasion, that Hyrcanus the High Priest, and other Governours joynd their Forces together: as Strabo relates out of Hyspericars, (an Historiour of the Phoenicians) [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 15.] for he agreed with the Princes of the Arabians, that they also should come to his aid: and by his means especially, with great earnestnesse, there came to Cæsars assistance Amblichus the Governour, and Ptolemei his son, and Tholomey the son of Sohemus, who inhabited in Mount Libanus, and almost all the Cities of Syria, [Joseph. ibid. cap. 14.]

Whenas the Alexandrins saw that the Romans were the more provoked by the losse they lately received, and that they were confirmed as well by lootes as by prosperous succelles; they sent Embassadors to Cæsar, that he would let their King go free, and come to them, for that the multitude were ready thorough the lingering of the war, to do whatsoever the King would have them to do: and it by his means, they should become Cæsars friends, they would easily yield. Cæsar although he knew that the fidelity both of the King, and Alexandrians was to be suspected, yet he would let him go; and but because by his coming, the enemies strength would not be increased, and the war against him would be more glorious: so withal he advised him, to look to his kingdom, and to perform the fidelity that he owed to himself, and the people of Rome: he dissembling his joy by his tears, desired that he might not be let go; but being dissuimed by Cæsar, he eagerly pursued the war against him, [Hirtius, & Dion.]

Whereas the Alexandrians, having received this General's found themselves no more strong, or the Romans the weaker, and the soldiers daily mocking at the age and weakness of the King, were greatly grieved, neither saw how they could help themselves ; and there were reports that there were great aids coming to Caesar by land out of Syria and Cilicia (which yet Caesar heard nothing of) they determined to intercept the provisions which were brought to the Romans by sea : wherefore having rigged their shipping, and disposed them in convenient places about Canopus in the channel, they lay to watch for the provisions, [Hirini,] and because the soldiers that Caesar had sent for out of Syria were now approaching, they guarded all the shores, and did much damage to those forces of them ; they indeed which happened upon Africa side, brought some help unto Caesar, but at the mouths of Nilus; he Egyptian, having made many fires, as it they had been Romans, took many by this deceit ; so that the rest durst not come thither, [Dia,]

Whereupon Cæsar commanded his fleet to be rigged, over which Tiberius Nero was Commander: there went in this fleet, the Rhodian ships, and in them Euphratos, but his wretched happiness in fight here forsook him: for when they came to Canopus, and both fleets stood facing one the other, and Euphratos, according to his custom, had begun the fight, and had bilged and sunk one of the enemies ships, and following the chase of the next too far; his own side coming but slowly after him, he was compassed about by the Alexandrians: and thus he alone, who had done valiantly in this fight, perished alone with his conquering Gally: but yet the enemies being overcome in fight, Tiberius Nero caused, that his own party might safely sail to land.

[Hortius cum Dionæ.]

L About the same time Midrachides of Pergamus coming out of Syria, by land, when Egypt rejoyned to Syria, brought great forces to Pelusium, [Hircini] but endeavouring to go into the mouth of Nilus, which is at Pelusium, against the stream, seeing the Egyptians had stopp'd by night the entrance with their shippings, was carried into the ditch ; and having transported his ships thither, (for it doth not reach so far as to the sea) he went into Nilus with his ships : and on a sudden, setting upon them, who guarded the mouths of Nilus, both from sea, and from the river, both at one time, he freed the mouths themselves, and set upon Pelusium, both with his fleet and land forces, [Dis.] For this Town being seized upon by Acnillas with a strong Garrison, by reason of the convenience of the place, (for all Egypt is thought sufficiently fortified from any access by sea to it by Pharos, and by land to Pelusium by two bars) being compassed about on a sudden with great forces, they within stoutly defending it with a strong Garrison of men, but through the greatness of those forces, which he supplied with found men, in the places of them that were wounded and weary, and the constancy and perseverance of the opposition, he reduced it within his power, power, the same day that he assaulted it; and then placed a Garrison of his own. [Hutcheson.] There Antipater did notable service; for having broken down a pane of the wall, he was the first that gave entrance to the rest to break in. [Joseph. l. b. 14. cap. 14.]

The Egyptian Jew, which inhabited that Country called Ouis, would not suffer Mithridates and Antipater to march unto Celsus, but forbade them passage. Thelc Antipater perswaded to be of his party, as being his Countrymen; especially when he had shewed them the letters of Hyrcanus the High Priest, in which they were invited to be friends unto Celsus, and to provide him victual and necessaries for his army.

Joseph lib. 14. cap. 4. But Antiochus (to wit, Trallianus, a writer of the civil war) writeth, that Hyrcanus himself, the High Priest, [ibid. cap. 15.] for which also those words of Celsus concerning Hyrcanus seem to make, inscribed on a brazen table by him in favour of Hyrcanus, [ibid. cap. 17.] Ἐπεὶ τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Ἀλέξανδρου πολεῖται μετὰ Ἰσχυρίῳ ὑποκόμῳ τῶν Σατταπείων, οὗ ἀρχιερέως, ὁ Ἰσχυρὸς ἐπὶ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐστὶν ἐπὶ τοῦ Σατταπείου. In the last Alexandrian war, he came to our aid with 1500 footsouldiers, and being sent by me to Mithridates, he surmounted all those of his company in valour.

The Jews, the inhabitants of the country of Onias; through the authority of Antipater, and Hyrcanus willingly submitted, which when they that inhabited about Memphis heard, they also sent for Michtridates unto them; and he going thither, joynted these also to his party. [Ioseph, lib. 14. cap. 14.]

When King Perseus had notice that Mithridates approached near the place which is called Delta, from the likeness of the Greek letter, which also was not far from Alexandria, and knew that he must pass the river Nilus; he sent great forces against him, with which he might either be overcome, or to keep back, that he should not joyne himself with Celarus: those forces which could first get over the river at Delta, and meet with Mithridates began the fight, making all haste to prevent them that followed that they should share in the victory, whole charge Mithridates with great prudence sustained, having intrenched his camp after the Roman manner, but when he saw them carefully and proudly to come up even to his fortifications, he made a general fall, and killed a great number of them, in such a way, as unless the rest had hid themselves by the knowledge of the places, and partly had retired themselves into the ships, by which they passed the river, they had been totally overthrowen, who after they were a little recovered from their fear, joyne themselves with them that followed, and began to set upon Mithridates again. [Herim]

The battle was fought about the place, that is called the Jews tents, Mithridates commanded the right wing, and Antipater the left; Mithridates his wing began to waver and likely to be routed, but that Antipater in very good time marching along the river side with his forces, who had already discomfited his enemy, came to his rescue, and forced the Egyptians who had even gotten the victory to fly, who he hotly pursued them that fled, that he became master of the enemies tents, he allowed Mithridates to parake with him of the booty, whom in pursuit of the enemy he had left much behind him, Mithridates lost 800 of his men: Antipater but 50 (or 80, as it is in Josephus lib. 1. bell. cap. 7.) but Mithridates certified Caesar of these things: ingenuously confessing that Antipater was the cause of the victory and their preservation. [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 15.]

The King had feigned himself with his army, upon the higher ground, in a place that was naturally fortified. Cæsar was about seven miles distant from him, and there was a river between, in passing of which the Alexandrians, that strive to hinder his passage being vain, Cæsar camped but a small distance from the Kings camp, the next day Cæsar set to get a village, with all his forces for upon and won a Castle, when the King had fortified in the next village, not far from his camp, and had joined it to his camp by two works: his soldiers pushed the Alexandrians that fled from thence, even to their camp, and came up to their fortifications: and I began to fight stoutly at a distance.

distance, but they were wounded with darts from diverse places, they b: hind them fought from the river, in which were many ships that were well stored with flingers and darters. [Hirt.]

Cæsar when he perceived that his men could not fight more fiercely, and yet could do no good by reason of the difficulty of the places; he observed that the highest place of the Camp was left by the Alexandrians, because it was naturally well fortified, and that they had come down into the place where the battle was, partly to see, and partly to fight; he therefore commanded his cohorts to fetch a compass about the Camp, and to seize upon that highest ground: he gave Cæsius the command of these, an excellent man both for valour, and knowledge of military affairs: whither as soon as they were come, there being but a few to defend the Fort, and Cæsar's soldiers fighting stoutly, the Alexandrians being frightened both with the shouting and fighting of their adversaries, began to be in a general rout; with whose disorder the minds of the Romans were encouraged, that almost on all sides they had take, the whole Camp; but yet they first took the highest place of the Camp: from which running down, they slew a great multitude in the Camp: which danger the Alexandrians flying, by heaps cast themselves over the Rampire, on that side that joined unto the river, the former of whom being overwhelmed with great violence, the rest had the easier escape. [Hirt.]

It is certain that the King himself fled out of the Camp, and that he was received into a ship, and that he perished there, the ship being sunk with the multitude of them, who swam to the ships that were nearest. [Idem Livy, 112. Dion, lib. 43. Oros, lib. 6. cap. 16.] his body wallowed in the mud, and rolled to the bank of Nilus, was known by the golden cuirass which he wear, (such as the Ptolemies used to wear, as Julius Capitolinus in Maximianus the younger confirmeth) [Florus, lib. 4. cap. 2. Europ. lib. 5. Oros, lib. 6. cap. 16.] after the death of his father Auletes he lived 3 years, and 8 months: whereupon there is attributed to his reign by Porphyrius four years, [in Grec. Enclib. Scaliger, pag. 226.]

There were in this battle 20000 men killed, 12000 yielded themselves with 70 long ships; and 500 of the Conquerors side reported to be slain, [Oros, lib. 6. cap. 16.] In this battle Antipater was also wounded: whose valiant service Cæsar had made use of in his most dangerous adventures, [Joseph, lib. 14. cap. 15.]

Cæsar in consequence of this great Victory, marched the next way by land to Alexandria with his Horse: and entered that part of the Town as Conqueror, which was held by a Garrison of the enemies: but the whole multitude of the Townsmen, casting away their arms, and leaving the Forts, took that garment in which they were wont to supplicate their Governours, and bringing forth all their sacred things with the religion with which they accustomed to appeale the offended and enraged minds of their Kings, they came and met Cæsar, and yielded themselves unto him. Cæsar taking them into his protection, comforted them, and came thorough the enemies fortifications into his own part of the Town with great shouting of his own soldiers; who did not only rejoice that the battle was successful, but also that his coming was so happy. [Hirtius.]

In the Marble Kalender records, [Inscript. Græc. pag. CXXXIII.] at the VI Kalends of April, it is thus noted. HOC DIE CÆSAR ALEXAND. RECEPIT. This day Cæsar recovered Alexandria: but yet as the year was then reckoned at Rome, that day fell on the 14 of the Julian January: then therefore was the Alexandrian war ended; which was managed by Cæsar, neither in place, nor time convenient, but in the very winter seasons, as Suetonius relates, [in Julio, cap. 35.]

Cæsar having conquered Egypt, did not subject it to the dominion of the Romans, but granted it to Cleopatra, for whose sake he had carried on the war: but yet leaving left the Egyptians being delivered over to the command of a Woman, and left also he should incite the minds of the Roman against him, both for this thing, and for his too much familiarity with Cleopatra: he gave command that she should be the wife of her brother that was alive, and that they should hold the kingdom in common to them both. This he did, but for colours sake; for indeed the whole kingdom was committed to Cleopatra, for her husband was but a very child, (being but eleven years old: whereupon Strabo saith he was νῦν νῆστος, a very youth, [lib. 17. pag. 796.] but he could do any thing with Cæsar; therefore under the pretence of marriage with her brother, &c. of enjoying the kingdom equally with him, the alone commanded all, and used too much familiarity with Cæsar also. These things Dio hath related more truly, [lib. 42.] which Hirtius hath related more mildly in favour of Cæsar, thus: Cæsar having conquered Egypt, he made those Kings, whom Ptolemæus appointed by his will and earnestly sought the people of Rome that they would not alter it; for the King, the elder of the two lads being left, he delivered over the kingdom to the younger, and to Cleopatra the elder of two daughters, who had remained under his protection and quarters: and Suetonius [in Julio, cap. 35.] having gotten the victory, he granted the kingdom of Egypt to Cleopatra and her younger brother, fearing to make it a Province, lest some time or other having gotten a preflight of a stirring spirit, it might give an occasion of a new rebellion.

With Cleopatra Cæsar many times feasted and (ate up till break of day, and falling with her upon the Nilus with 400 ships, he being in the same Gally with her called Thalamæos, had passed into Egypt as far as Æthiopia, but that his army refused to follow him, [Sueton, ibid, cap. 52. Appian, lib. 2. bell, civil, pag. 484.]

Cæsar at Alexandria, set up a brazen pillar, which contained the liberties that he had granted to the Jews. [Joseph, lib. 14. cap. 17. & lib. 2. contra Appian, pag. 1063.]

Pharnaces being become famous by reason of his successes, whereas he hoped all things would happen to Cæsar, as he wished they should, seizing upon Pontus with all his forces, and there being conqueror, and a most cruel King, seeing he thought he should have better fortune than his father had, he conquered many Towns, and plundered the goods of the Citizens of Rome and of Pontus, and ordained for those that were commendable, either for beauty or age, punishments that were worse than death it self, and got Pontus, when there were none to defend it, bragging, that he had recovered his fathers kingdom. [Hirt.]

But he chiefly exercised his cruelty upon Amisus, a City of Pontus, which after it had a long time resisted, he won by storm, and put to death all the men that were of age, and gelded all that were under age. [Appian, lib. 2. Bell, Civil, pag. 484. Dio, lib. 42.]

Alander, to whom Pharnaces had committed the Government of Bithynia, to curry favour with the Romans, and in hopes to get the Kingdom of Bosphorus for himself, made an insurrection against his master. [Dio, ibid.]

Cæsar sent letters out of Egypt to M. Cicero, that he should remain as he was, and that he should retain the name of Imperator, (for the victory that he had gotten in Cilicia) and C. Panfa carrying these letters; Cicero returned his bundle of rods, adorned with Bayes, as long as he thought fit himself, [Cicero, pro Ligario.] For after his return out of the Province of Cilicia, he had not as yet entered Rome, but had carried his Lictours every where about with him, gaping in vain after a Triumph. [lib. 11. ad Attic, epist. 6.] Cæsar's letters to Cicero, were delivered the day before the Ides of August, [lib. 14. ad familiar, epist. ult.] or the last day of the Julian May.

Pharnaces having seized upon Bithynia and Cappadocia, had a great mind also to win Armenia the Lelle, and incited all the Kings and Tetrarchs of that Country to Rebellion. [Plutarch in Cæsar.] He marched also into Asia, in hope of the same success that his father Mithridates had there. [Dio, lib. 42.]

Appian shews, that Cæsar spent nine months in Egypt, [lib. 2. Bell, Civil, pag. 484.] and Cleopatra had either kept him longer there, or accompanied him in his voyage to Rome: but that Pharnaces both drew him out of Egypt against his will, and hindered his speedy marching into Italy. [Dio, lib. 42.] But Cleopatra was in short time after delivered of a son by him, whom the Alexandrians named Cæsarion, [Plutarch in Cæsar.] That name being imposed on the son by the mother, at the permission of Cæsar himself. [Sueton. in Julio, cap. 52.] Plutarch in his Antonius seems to intimate, that notwithstanding, the, after Cæsar's death, had too much familiarity with his enemy Cneus Pompeius, the eldest sonne of Pompey the Great.

Cæsar brought out of the kingdom Arsinoe, the younger sister of Cleopatra, in the name of whom Ganimedes had a long time most tyrannically reigned, least some new dispensation should arise through seditious men, until time had confirmed the authority of the King: and taking away with him the six veterane Legions, he left three others there; that by so much the more, the Kings authority might be confirmed, who could not keep the love of their own Subjects, because they had constantly persevered in Cæsar's friendship, neither could they claim any preterition for their authority, being but newly made Kings. [Hirtius, cum Sueton, cap. 76.]

Thus, having finished and settled all things, Cæsar marched by land into Syria, as Hirtius saith, [cum Sueton, cap. 35. in Julio, Plutarch in Cæsar. Appian, lib. 2. Bell, Civil, pag. 484. & Oros, lib. 6. cap. 16.] or by shipping, as Josephus writeth, [lib. 14. cap. 15.] and Hirtius himself afterward confirmeth.

The news of Cæsar's departure from Alexandria, came into Italy the III. Nones of July, (the 23. day of the Julian April, [Cicero ad Attic, lib. 11. epist. 19.] C. Trebonius left Cæsar at Antioch, who went from Seleucia Pieria, and in 28. days journey, on the XVI. Kalends of September, (the third day of the Julian June) was in Italy,

Q. q. q.

Italy. [Id. Ibid. epist. 11.] Whence it is gathered, that Cæsar was at Antioch, on the XV. Kalends of August, or the sixth day of the Julian May.

Johannes Malela Autiochenus, in the ninth book of his Chronicle, not let forth, noeths, that on the twelv day of the moneth, Artemisium, or May, there was an edict publicly propos'd in the City of Antioch, concerning the Empire of Julius Caesar, and on the 20th of the same moneth, another edict was sent thither from Julius Caesar, concerning the liberty of the same City; beginning thus, 'Εἰς Ἀρμενίαν καὶ συρρίαν, ἱερὸς καὶ ὁσιος, ἐλευθερίας, καὶ ἰσχυρὸς ὁμοῦ καὶ ἀνδραγαθίας, ἡμεῖς ἰσχυρὸς καὶ ἡμεῖς, &c. Julius Caesar to the Metropolis of Antiochia, the holy and privileged Asylum, and refuge against the vigour of the Law; and that at length on the 23, day Caesar the Dictator entered Antioch; whereas that he was at Antioch on the 20 day, that edict publicly let forth, doth clearly signify; and that it should be said, that he rather departed from the City on the 23 day, the rather he came thither.

Antigonus, the son of Aristobolus, coming unto Caesar, complained unto him of his father's misfortune, because for taking his part, he was poisoned by the Pompeians, and his brother beheaded by Scipio: and desired him that he would have pity on him, he being cast out from his father's Kingdom. He likewise accused Hyrcanus and Antipater, that they by force had got the Government, neither did they forbear to offer injuries to himself: and accused them also, that they lent aides into Egypt to Caesar, not so much for good will, but for fear of the ancient enmity, and that they might be freed from punishment for their love to Pompey. But Antipater pleaded his own cause, wiping off his crimes objected against him; and recomitented Antigonus. He reckoned up also what pains he had taken for Caesar's service in the last wars: and shewing the multitude of his wounds, made them the witness of the truth of his words: which when Caesar heard, he declared Hyrcanus High Priest, and offered Antipater what government he himself would demand, and made him Governour of Iudæa. [Joseph. lib. 1. bell. cap. 8. & lib. 14. Antigoni, cap. 15.]

Cæsar also appointed that Hyrcanus and his children should perpetually retain the principality and High Priesthood of the Jews, according to the custom of the Country, and be taken into the number of his friends and allies : and that if there arose any controversy concerning the discipline of the Jews, that the determination should belong to him : Moreover, that he should not be forced to quarter Soldiers in winter, nor taxes to be exacted of him : and that there should be a Brazen Table, containing theethings, let up in the Capitol, and at Tyre, Sidon, and Afulon, in the Temples, engraven in Latin and Greek letters, and that their decrees should be sent into all places. [ib. 24. cap. 17.]

Cæſar having tarried almoſt in all the Cities of Syria, that were of any worth, diſtributed both publickly and privately rewards, to them that deſerved well; and took knowledge of, and determined of old controverſies, Kings alſo and Tyrants Governours of the Provinces, and Borderers, (who alſo came unto him) taking them into his protection, upon conditions impoſed upon them, for the keeping and defending of the Province, he diſmiſſed; friends, both to himſelf, and the people of Rome.

[Hirtius.]

Cæsar took away at Tyre all things that were dedicated to Hercules, because they had entertained Pompey and his wife in their flight. [Dio, lib. 42.]

Some few days being spent in the Province of Syria, he gave the command of the Legions, and Syria to Sexus Cæsar his friend and kinsman, as Hirtius saith: I do writeth, that he committed all things to the charge of Sexus his Treasurer and Confidant. [lib. 47.] Appian declares, that there was a Legion left in Syria by him, even when he was thinking of the Parthian war, and the dignity of a president-ship, granted to his kinsman Sexus Iulius, a young man. [lib. 3, Bell. civi. p. 573. & lib. 4, pag. 921.]

Cæsar having ordered the affairs in Syria, went into Cilicia, in the same fleet that he came in, [Hirinus, Joseph, lib. 13, cap. 16.] All the Cities of which Province he called unto him to Tarsus: and there, having given order for all things concerning the Province, and the neighbour Cities, he did not stay long there, through a desire he had to go to the carrying on of the Pontick war, [Hirt.]

Here he pardoned Tarcondimotus (of whom mention is made formerly, out of the first Epistle of Ciceros fifteenth book, ad familiar.) who had a part of Cilicia subject unto him, and had much helped Pompey by sea. [Dis. lib. 41.]

Antipater, when he had followed Caesar out of Syria, returned into Judea; and finding his circuit about the Provinces; he repressed them that were desirous of innovations, both by the burning of the councils: telling them, that if they would be content with the Prince Herodians, they might live happily in their own possessions; but if they promised themselves new hopes, and thought that they should gain much by innovations, they should have him a Master instead of a Governour, and Hyrcanus a Tyrant instead of a King, and Caesar and the Romans most bitter enemies instead of Princes:

Princes; for that they would not at all suffer anything to be changed, from what they had settled: But whenas Antipater perceived that Hircanus was dull and idle, he served the state of the Province as himself pleased, and truly made Phasaelus his elder son Governour of Jerusalem, and the Countries adjoining: and to Herod his second son, a very young man, he committed the care of Galilee, [Joseph. lib. 1. bell. cap. 8. & lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 16, 17.]

We read in Josephus that Herod was then but 15 years old, [Lib. 1.8, cap. 17.] Rufinus in his Translation, Photius in his Bibliotheca, [Cod. 258.] Pseudo-gregories the Hebrew, [Lib. 5, cap. 3,] and Nicephorus Callistus, [Lib. 1, Ecclesiast. Hiftor. cap. 6.] retaining the fame number; but yet the first defcribers of Herods doings; Ptolemy and N. cholas Damascenus, out of whom Josephus took his, seem to have written not 15, but 5, and that it arose from hence, of the note of ⁴⁴ for ⁴⁵ ⁴⁶, by the easie mistake of the Translcribers: for from this time to the death of Herod, are reckoned 43 years and almost an half: to which 25 years being added, would make 68. and half a year: the other half of which year, if he had lived, he had been 70 years old: Seeing also that Josephus himself acknowledgeth, that when he was sick of his last sickness, that he was ⁴⁷ ⁴⁸ ⁴⁹ ⁵⁰ ⁵¹ ⁵² ⁵³ ⁵⁴ ⁵⁵ ⁵⁶ ⁵⁷ ⁵⁸ ⁵⁹ ⁶⁰ ⁶¹ ⁶² ⁶³ ⁶⁴ ⁶⁵ ⁶⁶ ⁶⁷ ⁶⁸ ⁶⁹ ⁷⁰ ⁷¹ ⁷² ⁷³ ⁷⁴ ⁷⁵ ⁷⁶ ⁷⁷ ⁷⁸ ⁷⁹ ⁸⁰ ⁸¹ ⁸² ⁸³ ⁸⁴ ⁸⁵ ⁸⁶ ⁸⁷ ⁸⁸ ⁸⁹ ⁹⁰ ⁹¹ ⁹² ⁹³ ⁹⁴ ⁹⁵ ⁹⁶ ⁹⁷ ⁹⁸ ⁹⁹ ¹⁰⁰ ¹⁰¹ ¹⁰² ¹⁰³ ¹⁰⁴ ¹⁰⁵ ¹⁰⁶ ¹⁰⁷ ¹⁰⁸ ¹⁰⁹ ¹¹⁰ ¹¹¹ ¹¹² ¹¹³ ¹¹⁴ ¹¹⁵ ¹¹⁶ ¹¹⁷ ¹¹⁸ ¹¹⁹ ¹²⁰ ¹²¹ ¹²² ¹²³ ¹²⁴ ¹²⁵ ¹²⁶ ¹²⁷ ¹²⁸ ¹²⁹ ¹³⁰ ¹³¹ ¹³² ¹³³ ¹³⁴ ¹³⁵ ¹³⁶ ¹³⁷ ¹³⁸ ¹³⁹ ¹⁴⁰ ¹⁴¹ ¹⁴² ¹⁴³ ¹⁴⁴ ¹⁴⁵ ¹⁴⁶ ¹⁴⁷ ¹⁴⁸ ¹⁴⁹ ¹⁵⁰ ¹⁵¹ ¹⁵² ¹⁵³ ¹⁵⁴ ¹⁵⁵ ¹⁵⁶ ¹⁵⁷ ¹⁵⁸ ¹⁵⁹ ¹⁶⁰ ¹⁶¹ ¹⁶² ¹⁶³ ¹⁶⁴ ¹⁶⁵ ¹⁶⁶ ¹⁶⁷ ¹⁶⁸ ¹⁶⁹ ¹⁷⁰ ¹⁷¹ ¹⁷² ¹⁷³ ¹⁷⁴ ¹⁷⁵ ¹⁷⁶ ¹⁷⁷ ¹⁷⁸ ¹⁷⁹ ¹⁸⁰ ¹⁸¹ ¹⁸² ¹⁸³ ¹⁸⁴ ¹⁸⁵ ¹⁸⁶ ¹⁸⁷ ¹⁸⁸ ¹⁸⁹ ¹⁹⁰ ¹⁹¹ ¹⁹² ¹⁹³ ¹⁹⁴ ¹⁹⁵ ¹⁹⁶ ¹⁹⁷ ¹⁹⁸ ¹⁹⁹ ²⁰⁰ ²⁰¹ ²⁰² ²⁰³ ²⁰⁴ ²⁰⁵ ²⁰⁶ ²⁰⁷ ²⁰⁸ ²⁰⁹ ²¹⁰ ²¹¹ ²¹² ²¹³ ²¹⁴ ²¹⁵ ²¹⁶ ²¹⁷ ²¹⁸ ²¹⁹ ²²⁰ ²²¹ ²²² ²²³ ²²⁴ ²²⁵ ²²⁶ ²²⁷ ²²⁸ ²²⁹ ²³⁰ ²³¹ ²³² ²³³ ²³⁴ ²³⁵ ²³⁶ ²³⁷ ²³⁸ ²³⁹ ²⁴⁰ ²⁴¹ ²⁴² ²⁴³ ²⁴⁴ ²⁴⁵ ²⁴⁶ ²⁴⁷ ²⁴⁸ ²⁴⁹ ²⁵⁰ ²⁵¹ ²⁵² ²⁵³ ²⁵⁴ ²⁵⁵ ²⁵⁶ ²⁵⁷ ²⁵⁸ ²⁵⁹ ²⁶⁰ ²⁶¹ ²⁶² ²⁶³ ²⁶⁴ ²⁶⁵ ²⁶⁶ ²⁶⁷ ²⁶⁸ ²⁶⁹ ²⁷⁰ ²⁷¹ ²⁷² ²⁷³ ²⁷⁴ ²⁷⁵ ²⁷⁶ ²⁷⁷ ²⁷⁸ ²⁷⁹ ²⁸⁰ ²⁸¹ ²⁸² ²⁸³ ²⁸⁴ ²⁸⁵ ²⁸⁶ ²⁸⁷ ²⁸⁸ ²⁸⁹ ²⁹⁰ ²⁹¹ ²⁹² ²⁹³ ²⁹⁴ ²⁹⁵ ²⁹⁶ ²⁹⁷ ²⁹⁸ ²⁹⁹ ³⁰⁰ ³⁰¹ ³⁰² ³⁰³ ³⁰⁴ ³⁰⁵ ³⁰⁶ ³⁰⁷ ³⁰⁸ ³⁰⁹ ³¹⁰ ³¹¹ ³¹² ³¹³ ³¹⁴ ³¹⁵ ³¹⁶ ³¹⁷ ³¹⁸ ³¹⁹ ³²⁰ ³²¹ ³²² ³²³ ³²⁴ ³²⁵ ³²⁶ ³²⁷ ³²⁸ ³²⁹ ³³⁰ ³³¹ ³³² ³³³ ³³⁴ ³³⁵ ³³⁶ ³³⁷ ³³⁸ ³³⁹ ³⁴⁰ ³⁴¹ ³⁴² ³⁴³ ³⁴⁴ ³⁴⁵ ³⁴⁶ ³⁴⁷ ³⁴⁸ ³⁴⁹ ³⁵⁰ ³⁵¹ ³⁵² ³⁵³ ³⁵⁴ ³⁵⁵ ³⁵⁶ ³⁵⁷ ³⁵⁸ ³⁵⁹ ³⁶⁰ ³⁶¹ ³⁶² ³⁶³ ³⁶⁴ ³⁶⁵ ³⁶⁶ ³⁶⁷ ³⁶⁸ ³⁶⁹ ³⁷⁰ ³⁷¹ ³⁷² ³⁷³ ³⁷⁴ ³⁷⁵ ³⁷⁶ ³⁷⁷ ³⁷⁸ ³⁷⁹ ³⁸⁰ ³⁸¹ ³⁸² ³⁸³ ³⁸⁴ ³⁸⁵ ³⁸⁶ ³⁸⁷ ³⁸⁸ ³⁸⁹ ³⁹⁰ ³⁹¹ ³⁹² ³⁹³ ³⁹⁴ ³⁹⁵ ³⁹⁶ ³⁹⁷ ³⁹⁸ ³⁹⁹ ⁴⁰⁰ ⁴⁰¹ ⁴⁰² ⁴⁰³ ⁴⁰⁴ ⁴⁰⁵ ⁴⁰⁶ ⁴⁰⁷ ⁴⁰⁸ ⁴⁰⁹ ⁴¹⁰ ⁴¹¹ ⁴¹² ⁴¹³ ⁴¹⁴ ⁴¹⁵ ⁴¹⁶ ⁴¹⁷ ⁴¹⁸ ⁴¹⁹ ⁴²⁰ ⁴²¹ ⁴²² ⁴²³ ⁴²⁴ ⁴²⁵ ⁴²⁶ ⁴²⁷ ⁴²⁸ ⁴²⁹ ⁴³⁰ ⁴³¹ ⁴³² ⁴³³ ⁴³⁴ ⁴³⁵ ⁴³⁶ ⁴³⁷ ⁴³⁸ ⁴³⁹ ⁴⁴⁰ ⁴⁴¹ ⁴⁴² ⁴⁴³ ⁴⁴⁴ ⁴⁴⁵ ⁴⁴⁶ ⁴⁴⁷ ⁴⁴⁸ ⁴⁴⁹ ⁴⁵⁰ ⁴⁵¹ ⁴⁵² ⁴⁵³ ⁴⁵⁴ ⁴⁵⁵ ⁴⁵⁶ ⁴⁵⁷ ⁴⁵⁸ ⁴⁵⁹ ⁴⁶⁰ ⁴⁶¹ ⁴⁶² ⁴⁶³ ⁴⁶⁴ ⁴⁶⁵ ⁴⁶⁶ ⁴⁶⁷ ⁴⁶⁸ ⁴⁶⁹ ⁴⁷⁰ ⁴⁷¹ ⁴⁷² ⁴⁷³ ⁴⁷⁴ ⁴⁷⁵

Phafacius had a son born called alio Phafaleus, to whom Salamphio the daughter of Herod and Mariame was married, [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 7.] he being then but 7 years old when his father died, [Id. lib. 14. cap. 25.]

Pharnaces intended an Expedition against Afander, who had revolted from him in Bithynia: but when he heard that Cæsar was on his march and hastening into Armenia, being terrified, and more afraid because he invaded himself, than of his army; he sent many Embassadors to treat of peace, before he was marched too near him, if by any means he might avoid this present danger. He made this his chiefest colour, that he had never helped Pompey: he hoped also that he might induce Cæsar to some terms of pacification, because he was hastening into Italy and Africa; and that then after his departure, he might renew his intended war: which thing Cæsar himself suspecting, curiously entertained his first and second Embassadors, that he might the rather take him at unawares by reason of his hopes of peace, [Dio, lib. 42.]

Cæsar having made long marches thorough Cappadocia, tarried two dayes at Mazace, and then came to Comana, the ancientest Temple of Bellona in Cappadocia, who was worshipped with fo great religion, that her Preist was accounted by the consent of the whole Nation in majesty, command, and power; next to the King (concerning whom, Strabo is to be consulted, lib. 12. pag. 535.) this Priesthood Cæsar adjudged to Nicomedes of Bithynia, a most noble man, who was of the race of the Cappadocian Kings, and did but recover his own by an undoubted right, though it was long interrupted, [Hirr.] for although he confirmed the possession of the commands which they had received from Pompey to others who had taken part with Pompey against him; yet he transfer'd the Priesthood of the Comanians from Archelaus upon Nicomedes, [Appian, in Mithridaticis, pag. 254.] which Pompey had given to his father Archelaus, the husband of Cleopatra's elder sister, who was slain in Egypt by Gabinius, [Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 558.]

When Cæsar came into Pontus and the borders of Gallogrecia De-jotarus the Tetrarch of Gallogrecia, and at that time truly of almost all, which the rest of the Tetrarchs did strive to prove was never granted to him, neither by law nor custom; yet without doubt he was by the Senate declared King of Armenia the Lesser, laying aside his Royal Robes, and not so much as in the habit of a private man, but of a guilty person, came unto Cæsar, and being prostrate at his feet, begged of him, that he would pardon him, that he had served in Cn. Pompey's army, and brought for his excise, that he did it thorough his not knowing of the state of Italy, and that he was forced thorough the necessity of Pompey's armies, with which he was environed, Cæsar rejected his excuse; yet he said he would grant him his request, for his former benefits, and for his old acquaintance and friendships sake, and for the dignity and age of the man, and at the intreaty of many of De-jotarus's friends and acquaintance, of whom many came to supplicate in his behalf: He told him also, that he would hereafter determine concerning the controversies of the Tetrarchs, and restored unto him his Royal Robes: But yet he commanded the Legion that De-jotarus had of his own men who were trained up in the Roman discipline, and all his horse, to be brought unto him to serve him in the Pontic war; [idem] also Cæsar fined his old acquaintance De-jotarus in a sum of money; and gave Armenia the Lesser, that was given him by the Senate, but then possessed by Pharnaces, to Ariobarzanes the King of Cappadocia. [Cicero, in Orat. Philippic. 2, de divinacione, lib. 1. 2. 2. Dio, lib. 48.]

Cicero declares in an oration for that King, that Domitius gave the money that was laid upon him, by twice or thrice selling his own private goods at open port sale, that Cæsar might make use of it in the war, when also to gain his favour, he thus speaks Cæsar concerning this matter. What he keeps by your means, he keeps in memory, not what he lost: neither doth he think, that he was punished by thee, but whereas he thought, that many things were to be given by thee to many men, he refused not but that you might take some from him, who was on the other side, &c. O Cæsar thou hast given all things to Dejotarus; seeing thou hast granted the name of King even to his son: for as long as he retains and keeps this name, he thinks that no favour of the people of Rome, nor any sentence of the Senate made in his favour is diminished.

When Cæsar was come into Pontus, he made a rendezvous of all his forces into one place: who were but indifferent in number, or in martial discipline except the VI Legion, which being a vetane he had brought with him from Alexandria, (but through the labours and hazards they had undergone, so diminished of soldiers partly by difficulties both by sea and land, and partly by often skirmishes, that they were under a thousand men,) the rest were three legions: one was Dejotarus his, and two that were in the battle, that Cnidius Domitius made with Pharnaces. [Hirtius.]

Pharnaces being affrighted at the approaching of Cæsar, sent Embassadors to treat of peace: bringing a golden crown to him 200 furlongs off, and very foolishly offering him their Kings daughter in marriage. [Appian, bell. civil. lib. 2, pag. 484.] but first of all they begged, that his coming might not be as of an enemy: for Pharnaces would do whatsoever he would command him, but they especially put him in mind, that Pharnaces would send no forces to Pompey against Cæsar, whereas Dejotarus who had lent, yet had given him satisfaction. Cæsar answered, that he would be very favourable to Pharnaces, if he would doakings as he promised, but he advised, as he was wont, the Embassadors in mild terms, that they neither should object Dejotarus to him, or too much brag of this favour that they had not lent aid to Pompey. [Hirt.] and also accused Pharnaces for this very thing, that he had been wicked and ungrate towards his benefactor. [Dio, lib. 43, 42.] in conclusion he commanded him, that he should depart out of Pontus; and that he should send back the families of the Publicans, and should restore to him the allies and citizens of Rome, which were in his possession: which if he would, do he said he would then receive those presents, which the generals were wont to receive of their friends after a war was happily ended. [Hirtius.]

Pharnaces liberally promised all things; and whereas he hoped that Cæsar having a mind to hasten to the city (Rome) that he would more willingly believe his promises, he began to go more slowly about his business, to demand longer time for his departure, to interpolate new conditions, and in fine to disappoint him. Cæsar knowing his craft hastened his business so much the more, so that he would come to fight with him sooner than any one would think. [idem.]

As soon as he was come to Pharnaces camp, uttering this speech, Shall not now this Parricide be punished? hee mounted his horse, and at the first shout that was given, he put the enemy to flight, and made a great slaughter, being aided with about a thousand horse that followed him, when he first rushed into the battle: thus [Appian, in bell. civil. lib. 2, pag. 485.] and likewise Dio in the 42 book of his history: the same day that he came to the enemy, from his march he went to fight with the enemy, and being sometime troubled with the enemies horse and their chariots, that were armed at length he obtained the victory. Julius Frontinus [Strategemata, lib. 2, cap. 2.] notes, that Cæsar marshalled his army upon an hill, and that that thing made the victory more easie to him was; because the darts that were thrown from above upon the Barbarians who were below, made them presently fly, and that Dejotarus was in the battle with Cæsar against Pharnaces, and that he put his life in danger, Cicero confirmeth in his oration for that King.

This battle was fought about the mountain Scotium, which is not above three miles distant from the City Zela; near which Mithridates the father of Pharnaces overthrew Triarius and the Roman army with a great slaughter. [Hirtius, Plutarch in Cæsar, Appian, in Mithridaticæ, pag. 254, Dion, lib. 42.] This mountain Pharnaces (that we may represent the story of this fight more accurately out of Hirtius) having repaired the old Works of his fathers Camp, seized upon it with all his Forces. Cæsar, who had pitched his Camp five miles from the enemy, that he might possess the valleys that were next the Kings Camp; the next night, in the fourth watch, with all his Legions but without any baggage which he left in his Camp, took that very place, in which Mithridates had fought against Triarius.

Pharnaces, as soon as it was day having observed this, drew out all his Forces before his Camp; and either being carried on by the former happiness of that place, or being induced by tokens and ceremonies (which we afterwards heard he did obey, saith Hirtius) or thorough contempt of the fewness of the Roman Forces, a great part of which he had already overthrown under Domitius, he of his own accord in an uneven place invaded the Romans as they were fortifying their Camp, which put a terror in to

to them, being suddenly called from their Works, and not set in battle array: the Kings Chariots that were armed with Siches did disorder the soldiers that were got in among them; which yet by the multitude of darts were quickly overwhelmed: the main body of the enemy followed these Chariots; and then coming to handy strokes, in the right wing, where the VI old veteran Legion was placed, the beginning of the victory was on that part; and then in the left wing and the main body were the whole Forces of the King routed: and to many of the soldiers being partly killed, and partly troden under foot by their own men, they who might escape by their swiftness, yet having thrown away their arms, and being to pass the valley, could do no good, unarmed and coming from an higher place. But the Romans being encouraged by this Victory, made no scruple to climb up that steep place, and to serupon their Works, and were suddenly Masters of the enemies Camp, those cohorts defending it which Pharnaces had left to guard it, [Id.]

Thus Cæsar ground as it were to dust Pharnaces in one (and as I may say) not a whole battle, after the manner of lightning, which in one and the same moment, came, hit, and departed: Neither was it a vain brag of Cæsar, that he had overcome the enemy, before he set eye upon him, [Florus, lib. 4, cap. 2.] He bragged also that the same day, he came to the enemy, and saw him, and overcame him, [Dio, lib. 42.] which in his letters sent to Rome to his friend Ammianus or Anicius, was expressed in those three words: VENI, VIDI, VICI, I came, I saw, I overcame, [Plutarch, in Cæsar, Appian, lib. 2, bell. civil. pag. 485.] Within five days after his arrival, and within four hours after he came in sight of him, he vanquished Pharnaces in one only battle, [Sueton, Julius Cæsar, cap. 35.] often recounting the felicity of Pompey, whose hap it was to gain his principal honour in the Mithridatic Wars of so cowardly a kind of enemies, [Id. ibid. Appian, lib. 2, bell. civil. pag. 485.]

Pharnaces, the whole multitude of his army being either killed or taken, fled with a few Horse; and unless the invasion of the Camp had given him means of elapsing, he had been brought alive into Cæsar's hands. [Hirt.] But he fled to Sinope with a thousand Horse, [Appian, Mithridaticæ, pag. 254.]

Cæsar was over-joyed, that he had ended to great a war in so short a time: and the remembrance of the sudden danger, was the more joyous, because the Victory came to him out of so many difficulties, [Hirt.] Cæsar gave the soldiers, all the Kings baggage, and the spoils, although they were very much, [Id. & Dio.] and whereas Mithridates had in that place set up a Trophy for the Victory over Triarius, which because it was consecrated to the gods, it was not lawful for him to pull down; he set up one against it for his Victory over Pharnaces, and to obscure, and in a manner threw down that that Mithridates set up. After this, having recovered all things that Pharnaces had taken from the Romans or their Allies, he restored to every one the things they had lost: except a part of Armenia, which he gave to Ariobarzanes, and requited the calamity that the Amilens suffered, by giving them their liberty, [Dio.] He commanded the sixth Legion to go into Italy to receive the rewards and honours due to them. He sent home the supplies that Dejotarus brought; and left the two other Legions in Pontus with Cælius Vinicianus: and to passing thorough Gallagracia and Bithynia, into Asia. He took cognizance and determined all the controversies of all those Provinces, and gave laws to Tetrarchs, Kings and Cities, [Hirtius.]

As he passed thorough Asia, he collected monies there, which raised great grudging against the Publicans, who secretly exacted it amongst all the people, [Appian, bell. civil. lib. 2, pag. 485.] (P. Servilius Iauricus the Coleague of Cæsar and Cicero in the Augurship, was Proconsul there; as is gathered out of the 13 book ad familiar, epist. 68.)

Brithagoras, a man of great authority among the Heralcleses in Pontus, who had followed Cæsar whithersoever he went, even to this place again, for a business that concerned his countrymen, as Cæsar was providing to return to Rome, being worn out with old ages, and continual labours, died: to the great sorrow of his country, [Memnon, in excerptis Photii, cap. 62.]

Cæsar made Mithridates Pergamene King of Bosphorus, (who had carried on the war in Egypt happily, and with great dispatch) who was of the race of the Kings, and had royall education, for him had Mithridates the King of all Asia, taken away from Pergamus when he was but a child, and carried him into his camp, and kept him many yeares: and so fortified the provinces of the people of Rome, against the Barbarians and Kings that were enemies; by putting in a King that was most friendly unto them. [Hirt.] concerning whom see [Strabo, lib. 13, pag. 625.] with Cæulabons notes, and [Appian in Mithridaticæ, pag. 254.]

He commanded him also to make war upon Afander; that, being become master of Bosphorus, he might revenge his treachery against his friend, [Dio, lib. 42.] He also also adjudged unto him the Tetrarchy of the Trochmans, in Gallogræcia, who bordered upon Pontus and Cappadocia, as belonging unto him by his mothers right; but was seized upon, and in the possession some years before of Dejotarus. [Cicero in Philip. 2. & lib. de divin. 2. Hirtius, de bell. Alexand. Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 567. & lib. 13. pag. 625. Dio, lib. 42.]

Then Cæsar failed into Græcia and Italy, having raised great sums of money upon any colour whatsoever, as he had done formerly: for he exacted that money partly, that had been aforesaid promised to Pompey; and partly pretending other excuses, he commanded other sums. He received also from the Princes and Kings, many golden Crowns, as it were in honour of the victories he had gotten; he declared that there were two things, by which Empires were gotten, preterred and increased, fouldiers and monies, and that one did help the other, and that if one of them failed, the other must also fail. [Dio, lib. 42.]

It seems not that he was at Athens on the Kalends of September, (which fell on the 17. day of the Julian June) for many things are reported to stay him in Asia, especially Pharnaces, saith Cicero ad Atticum. [Lib. 11. epist. 24.] But Pharnaces being so suddenly conquered, (as it is in the Epitome of the 115. book of Livy) and all things so quickly dispatched, he came into Italy sooner than any one could imagine, as Hirtius observes in the end of his book of the Alexandrian war.

But Cæsar came to Rome, just at the end of the year, in which he was designed Dictator, (which office had never before been annual) and was declared Consul for the next year. [Plutarch in Cæsar.]

Pharnaces delivered over Synope to Domitius (Calvinus) who was left by Cæsar to prosecute the war against him; and having accepted of peace, and dismissed him with his 1000 Horsemen, he killed their Horses; which their masters took much to heart: and then taking shipping, we read in Appian in Mithridaticks [pag. 254.] that he fled into Pontus, whereas it should have been laid out of Pontus; for Synope it fell was in Pontus: and the same Appian in lib. 2. Bell. Civil. [pag. 485.] that Pharnaces fled back into the Kingdom of Bosphorus, that was delivered unto him by Pompey.

Herod the Prefect of Galilee, having taken Ezechias, a Jew, with many complices of his thievery, who had went to make incursions into Syria in troupes, and put him to death: which fact of his got him much favour with the Syrians, he then governed the Province of Syria. [Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 8. & lib. Antiquit. cap. 17.]

Phalælus, being stirred up in emulation of his brothers glory, got to himself the favour of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, by doing all publick busineses in his own person, and yet not abusing his power to the hurt of any: by which it came to passe that Antipater his father was revered by the whole Nation, as if he had been King; yet was his fidelity and good will nevertheless to Hyrcanus. [Id. idem.]

Cæsar undertaking an expedition against P. Scipio, the father in law of Pompey the Great, M. Cato, and Julia, the King of Mauritania, upon the XIV. Kalends of January, came into Lilybæum; and from thence on the VI. Kalends of January, taking shipping after four dayes, came within sight of Africa. [Hirt. in lib. de Bell. African.] Now the XIV. Kalends of January, fell at that time upon the 30. and last day of September, of the Julian account, the year before the institution, as the reckoning backwards of the long following year of 445. dayes, made in the Kalends of January, of the first Julian year will make manifest: which Plutarch and Dio not observing: he indeed hath related that Cæsar crossed into Sicilia, πρὸς τοῖς χειμῶνι, about the winter Solstice, [in Cæsar.] and the other that he went into Africa, χειμῶνι, in the middle of winter, [lib. 43.] but that he went into Africa before winter, even those words of Cicero [in lib. 2. de divinatio.] do sufficiently declare. Cæsar, when he was advised that he should not go into Africa before winter, did he not go? nay, if he had not gone, all the forces of his adversaries had made their rendezvous in one place.

Upon the Kalends of January, (falling on the 13. day of the Julian October) Cæsar incamped at a Town called Ruspina the day before the Nones of January, (October 16.) after the third day that he landed in Africa, in a most sharp fight which lasted from five of the clock in the morning till sun set: he overcame Labienus and Petreus: and the VI. Kalends of February, the sixth of the Julian November, he again beat the enemies army, under the command of Labienus and Scipio. [Hirtius.]

Dio in his 42. book notes, that Pharnaces, striving by force to enter into Bosphorus, was cast into prison, and put to death by Alander, which is more fully explained by Appian in his Mithridaticks, [pag. 254.] Thus Pharnaces having gathered together a band band of Scythians and Sarmatians, seized upon Theudocia and Panticapeum: and when as he was made war upon by Alander, his Horsemen, being destitute of Horses, and not used to fight on foot, were overcome; only Pharnaces fighting valiantly, being now 50. years old, and wounded, and killed, after he had reigned fifteen years in Bosphorus, as Appian hath it, or rather seventeen years, which are the time that is reckoned from the murder of his father Mithridates.

Cæcilius Bassus, of the order of Knighthood, who, flying from the battle of Pharsalia, after Pompey was overcome, kept himself private at Tyrus, whither also some of his own faction came unto him; and getting the favour to himself, both of these and them of Sextus, the Governour of Syria, his fouldiers that came at diverse time for a guard of the City. Seeing there was much news brought of Cæsar all fortune in Africa: he, not being content with his present condition, began to make some innovations: but being apprehended for this by Sextus, before he was thoroughly provided, he said that he only raised forces to help Mithridates Pergamenus, to win Bosphorus, and so was dismissed upon the belief of this. [Dio, lib. 47.]

The noble men of the Jews seeing Antipater and his sons so highly advanced, both by the favour of the Nation, and by the monies of Hyrcanus, and by the revenues that they received out of Judea, began to stomach him: for now he had contracted friendship with the Roman Generals, and by persuading Hyrcanus to lend money unto them, he got to himself the credit of this present; as if he had lent it of his own treasure, and had not received it of Hyrcanus: which when Hyrcanus heard of, yet was he not moved therewith, but rather contented. But the violence and bold nature of Herod, who was desirous of the tyranny, did most of all terrifie the Princes of the Jews. For this cause therefore they addressed themselves to Hyrcanus, and now openly accused Antipater: but complaining most of all on Herod, because he had put to death Ezechias, with many others, without any commission received from Hyrcanus; in contempt of the laws, by which no man suffers, though never so wicked, unless he be first condemned by the Judges. The mothers also of them that were killed, every day did not cease to weary in the Temple with their continual exclamations, both the King and the people, desiring that Herod might be made to give an account of this his doing before the Sanhedrim. Wherefore Hyrcanus moved with these women, commanded Herod to be called before the Council, and to plead his own cause. [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 17.]

Herod, having ordered the affairs of Galilee as he thought best for himself, being forewarned of his father, that he should not come into the Council as a private person, he took with him a moderate, but yet a sufficient guard, least he should terrifie Hyrcanus, if he brought too many, nor leave himself unsecured from any danger from the judgement. When Herod therefore presented himself before the Sanhedrim in his royal robes, with his guard in arms, they were all astonished: neither durst any one of them that accused him being absent, speak a word against him, but all of them kept silence, not knowing what to do: then one of the council called Sameas, a just man, and for this cause, not distracted with fear, (yet that old proverb of the Hebrews sheweth that he was no hot spirited man, Be thou humble as Hillel, and not [too] angry as Samai) rising up, not only accused Herod of presumption and violence, but laid the fault upon the Judges, and the King himself, who had granted him to treat a liberty: whom he pronounced should afterward, by the just judgement of God, be punished by Herod himself: which the event of the thing proved true, the Judges of that Council, and Hyrcanus, being put to death by Herod, put off the punishment by Herod himself: which the Judges were inclined to shift for himself: and to be busynesse till the next day: and privately advised him to shift for himself: and to he departed to Damascus, as though he fled from the King: and presenting himself before Sextus Cæsar, having secured his own affairs, he protested openly, That if he were again cited before the Judges, he would not appear: which they took in great disdain, and endeavoured to persuade Hyrcanus, that all these things tended to his destruction. [Id. ibid.]

Cæsar being in Africa, on the XII. Kalends of April, (the 21. day of the Julian October) having mustered his army, the next day he brought out all his forces, and set them in battel array: but after he had even long enough invited his enemies to battle, and perceived they were not willing to fight, he brought his forces into their Camp again. [Hirt. de bell. Afric.]

Cæcilius Bassus related out of the letters that he signified, that he had received from Scipio, that Cæsar was overcome, and dead in Africa, and that the government of Syria was committed to his charge: wherefore with those fouldiers he had made for that purpose he seized upon Tyrus, and from thence marched towards Sextus his forces, by whom he was met and overcome, where he received a wound; wherefore he never after attempted any thing against him by main force. [Dio. lib. 47.]

Cæsar

Cæsar the day before the Nones of April (the fourth day of the Julian February) in the third watch of the night, went out of the Town Agar, and marching 16 miles that night, began to fortifie Thapsus that day: Where he in a memorable fight overcame Juba and Scipio; after which battle Cæsar laid violent hands on himself at Utica, [Hirt. de bell. Afric.]

Sexus Cæsar, having received money, made Herod Governour of Cælofryia: Herod, taking it impatiently that he was called before the Council, he led an army against Hyrcanus; but by the meeting and intercessions of his father Antipater, and brother Phælaeus, he was withheld from the invading of Jerusalem, who strived to appease him, and desired him, that being content to have alighted, when he should indeed do hurt to none, nor that he should attempt any further against him that had raised him to that dignity: whose advice he obeyed, supposing he had done sufficient for his future hopes, that he had shewed to that Nation what power he was of, [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 17.]

In Africa, Cæsar is reported to have seen in his sleep, a great army calling him and weeping: and being moved with this dream, that he immediately put it into his books of Remembrances concerning the building of Carthage and Corinth, [Appian. in Lybica. pag. 85.]

Hyrcanus by his Embassadors desired of Julius Cæsar, that he would confirm the alliance and friendship that was between them, [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 17.]

Cæcilius Bassus, sending some of his party to Sexus Cæsar's souldiers, who should propound certain legions to them: so associated them to himself, that having put Sexus to death, his own Legion came over to his side, [Id. ibid. Livy. lib. 114. Libo. apud Appian. lib. 3. de bell. civil. pag. 576. Dio. lib. 47.] although this story be reported by others after this manner: Sexus being a young man given to his pleasure, very unhandsonly carried about with him the Legion that Julius Cæsar had left in Syria. Bassus to whom the care of the Legion was committed reprehending him for this, he sometimes reproachfully rejected: and one afterwards when at his call he but slowly obeyed, he commanded him to be brought by head and shoulders: in this tumult, they came to blows, and whenas the army could not endure this insolence, they killed Sexus with their darts: but presently being sorry for what they had done, and afraid of Cæsar, they made a conspiracy, that if there was not pardon granted them, and good assurance of it, they would fight it out to the last man; forcing also Bassus to become one of the conspiracy. After this they raised a new company, and accustomed them to the same exercises that they themselves used, [Appian. bell. civil. lib. 3. pag. 575, 576. & lib. 4. pag. 623.]

Bassus drew unto himself all the army, except a few who had wintered at Apamea, who having gone from thence into Cilicia before his coming, he in vain followed thither: and being returned into Syria, he is nominated Prætor, and fortified Apamea, that he might make that the seat of the war: all who were of full age, not only freemen, but servants also, he lifted for the war: he coyned money, and made armies, [Dio. lib. 47.]

Cæsar having finished the African War on the Ides of June, (the 14 day of the Julian April) took shipping at Utica, and after the third day came to Carles into Sardinia: from thence on the III Kalends of July (the 29 of the Julian April) going by shipping near the shore, on the 8 day after (the 26 of the Julian May) because he was hindered by storms, he came to the City of Rome, [Hirt. in fin. lib. bell. Afric.]

Cæsar Triumphed at Rome four times in the same month, but some dayes between: every one with diverse furniture and provision, [Sueton. in Julio. cap. 37.] The furniture of the Chariot for Gauls, was of Citron tree, for Pontus, of Brazell, for Alexandria, of Tortoyshell, and for Africa of Ivory, [Vellei. Patencul. lib. 2. cap. 56.] In the Pontick Triumph amongst the Pageants and Shewes, he carried before him the Title of these three words, VENI, VIDI, VICI. I came, I saw, I overcame. Signifying not the acts atcheived by him, as other Conquerours, but the quick dispatch of this war, [Suetonius. ut supra.] In this, the flight of Pharnaces made the people laugh. The Alexandrian Triumph for Egypt was inserted in the middle between the Gallick and the Pontick: and in it the chance of Achilles and Photinus, was very plausible, [Appian. bell. civil. lib. 2. pag. 491.] But the chance of Antioch the Egyptian being a woman, and at that time accounted for a Queen, who was led among the captives, (which had never happened at Rome before) raised much pity in the people; who yet after the Triumph, in favour of her kindred, was dismissed, [Dio. lib. 43.]

And her kindred, to wit, her elder sister Cleopatra, and younger brother Ptolemæus, the husband of Cleopatra, came to Rome this year, being called thither by Cæsar. Cæsar appointed Cleopatra her lodging in his own house, and sent her away not without without great honours and rewards, and cared not at all, although he were reported of for it, [Id. ibid. Sueton. in Julio. cap. 52.] moreover all in the temple of Venus Genetrix, which he built upon a vow he made, as the battle of Phædalus was fighting, (which Dio confirmeth was this year dedicated by him) and even by Venus next year, Cæsar set up the image of Cleopatra, [Appian. bell. civil. lib. 2. pag. 492.]

In Syria C. Anullius (Vetus) and others of Cæsar's captains, coming against Cæcilius Bassus with both horse and foot forces, shut him up in Apamea: to tie the borders that favoured Cæsar's party joined themselves, amongst whom also Antipater as well for the sake of that Cæsar that was killed, as of him that was alive, because he was a friend to both: by his sons sent them aid, and seeing they had a long time fought it out with equal advantage, and neither party could get the better of the other, by a truce confirmed by no articles of covenants, they suspended the war, for the providing of other auxiliaries, [Joseph. lib. 1. bell. cap. 8. fin. lib. 14. Antiqui. cap. 17. fin. Dion. lib. 47.]

Mithridates Pergamenus again spoiled the temple of Laocœthea (in the country of the Molchi about the river Phæles) which was formerly plundered by Pharnaces: [Strabo. lib. 11. pag. 498.] but as Pharnaces believed, to now he endeavouring to set upon Bosphorus, Alander, (sally by Strabo called Calander and Lyfander) overcame him: and to having removed both of them, he quietly enjoyed the Kingdom of Bosphorus, [Id. ibid. pag. 495 & lib. 13. pag. 685.]

C. Julius Cæsar being high Priest, in his third year and in the Consulship of M. Æmilius Lepidus, ordered the amendment of the Roman year, using therein the help of Soligenes in Astronomical matters, and of Flavius a Scribe mordering the Kalendar, and whereas now there were 23 daies intercalated in the month of February; he moreover interposed between November and December, two other intercalary months of 67 daies. So that this present year had 15 months, and 445 daies, [Conferimus de deo. natali. cap. 8. Sueton. in Julio. cap. 40. Pliny lib. 18. cap. 25. Dion. lib. 43. Macrobi. lib. 1. Saturnali. cap. 14.]

The day before the former intercalary Kalends (the 26 day of the Julian September) Cicero made an oration before Cæsar for Q. Ligarius, [lib. 5. ad familiari. epist. 14.]

From the Kalends of January, on which Cæsar took upon him the fourth Consulship, the year is reckoned of the first Julian ordering, for from thence he appointed the beginning of the year ordained by him, [Conferimus ut supra.]

Cæsar making war in Spain with Pompey's sons, on the XI Kalends of March won the town Aregna, and was called Emperor, when the Liberales (called by Διογενες the Puntarch in Cæsar) were celebrated (on the XVI Kalends of April) as it manifest cuted the old Kalendar, he got that memorable victory at the city Munda, in which battle there fell of the Pompeians about 30000 men, with the two generals Labienus and Titus Varus, and almost 3000 that were of the order of Knights-brood: of the Cæsarians about a 1000 men, and about 500 wounded, after this young Cn. Pompeius being killed who had taken to himself the ensignes of the Consul and the government, his head was presented unto Cæsar as he was marching to Hispania, the day before the Ides of April, and openly shewed to the people, [Autor commentariis de bell. Hispaniæ.]

The day before the Palilia, (on the XII Kalends of May) about evening the news of this victory was brought to Rome, [Dio. lib. 43.] and the day before the Kalends of May Cæsar wrote a consolatory letter from Hispania to M. Cicero, [Cicero. ad Attic. lib. 13. epist. 20.] for the death of his daughter Tullia: who after the divorce of her mother Terentia, at P. Lentulus his house died in childbed, [Afcon. Pedian. in orat. Flavian. Plutarch. in Cicero.] whenas her husband P. Corn. Dolabella was in Spain with Cæsar, as is perceived out of the second Philippick, and the 13 book of the epistles to Atticus.

Caius Octavius the grandchild of his sister Julia accompanied Cæsar in this war, being then 18 years old, who was always lodged in the same house with him, and always rode in the same coach with him; he honoured this lad with the high Priesthood, [Vellei. Patencul. lib. 2. cap. 99.]

King Dejotarus being in some trouble, sent Blesianus his Embassadour into Spain to Cæsar, who by letters dated to him from Tarraco, bid him be of good hope and good courage, [Cicero pro Dejotaro.]

Whilst the war in Syria with Cæcilius Bassus is prolonged L. Statius (in Velleius called Statius, and in Appian Sextius) Marcus (sally by Josephus called Marcus) one that had been Prætor, being sent by Julius Cæsar as succour of Sextus, came out of Italy with three companies: and is by Bassus valiantly repulled, [Vellei. Patencul. lib. 2. cap. 69. Joseph. lib. 1. bell. cap. 8. fin. lib. 14. Antiqui. cap. 17. fin. Appian. bell. civil. 3. pag. 576. & lib. 4. pag. 623.] for the country furnished the army of Bassus, he had also many Princes of the Arabians, who were associated with him in this war, who held many many fortified places hard by: amongst these places was Lyfias, situate beyond the Lake, which is neer unto Ampea, and Aethusa, the country of Samperanus, and of his Jamlychus, (of whom Cicero makes mention in epist. 1. lib. 15. ad familiar) which Princes governed the nation of the Emiffen, Heliopolis and Chalcis also were nigh, which were under the command of Ptolemy, the son of Meaneus, who also governed Marfa, and the mountainous places of the Iuzreans. [Strabo, lib. 26. pag. 753.]

Alchaudonius the Arabian (called Alchadamus by Strabo) the King of the Rhamman Nomades, who dwelt near Euphrates, who formerly had made a league with Lucullus, but afterwards had sent aids to the Parthians against Crastus, being called to assistance, both by Bassus and his enemies, went into Melopotamia: but when he was come into a place that was between Ampea, and the Carlians Camp, before he would give any answer to either party, he propoied that he would help them that gave most, and so joyned himself to Bassus, that gave most, and in the fight did much over-power the enemy by his archery. [Idem, ibid. Dion lib. 47.]

On the Ides of September, Cæsar made his last Will and Testament: in his own house at Laricum, & committed it to the keeping of the chief Vestal Virgin: in it he appointed three grand children of his sisters, his heirs C. Octavius of 3 fourth parts, (not of the half part only, as it is in Livy, lib. 116.) Lucius Pinarus, and Q. Pedius of the other fourth part: he adopted also C. Octavius, into his name and family. He named also many of his murderers for tutors to his sons, if he should chance to have any. He appointed also Decimus Brutus to be one of his second heirs in remainder. [Sueton in Julio, cap. 83.] and M. Antonius, [Dio, lib. 44. Florus, lib. 4. cap. 4.] if he should formerly appointed, would not take upon them the inheritance. [Idem, ibid. Dion lib. 47.]

In the month of October, Cæsar being now conqueror of all, entred Rome, and gave pardon to all that had born arms against him. [Vellei. Paternul, lib. 2. cap. 56.] And after he had performed the Triumph for Spain, in the beginning of this month, he quitted the Consulship, and by bringing in a new order of substituting honorary Consuls: he made Q. Fabius Maximus, and C. Trebonius Consuls for three months. [Dio, lib. 43. cum inscript. Gruteri, pag. CCXCVIII. ins.] the former of whom being Consul, triumphed for Spain, on the III. Ides of October. [Idem, pag. CCXCVII.] Whereupon, when as Chrysippus had seen in the Triumph of Cæsar, the Ivory Towns carried before him: and a few days after, the wooden ones of Fabius Maximus, he said they were but the cases of Cæsar's Towns. [Quintilian, lib. 6. cap. 4.]

Many and very great honours were by the Senate decreed unto Cæsar, amongst which, that he should be perpetual Dictator: [Livy, lib. 116.] and moreover, that he should be named Emperor: [Sueton, in Julio, cap. 76.] not in that sense, in which both before and after, it was given to Generals for any victory they had obtained in the wars: but whereby the highest power and authority in the Common-wealth was signified. [Dio, lib. 43.] for it was granted unto him, that he alone should have Soldiers, and the command of the Militia, and that he alone should take charge of the publick monies, and that it should be lawful for no other to make use of either of them; and that all Magistrates should be subject to him, yea, even the Magistrates of the common people: and that they should swear that they would never infringe any of his decrees. [Idem, ibid. & Appian lib. 2. Bell. Civil. pag. 194.] And from hence, even from this last return into the City, Vellius Paternulus deduceth, His five months of his principal session. [lib. 2. cap. 56.]

Cæsar had thoughts of repressing the Getæ or Daci, who had made a great incrode into Pontus and Thracia. [Sueton, in Julio, cap. 44. Appian, lib. 2. pag. 497.] for the preparation of which expedition, he sent before Octavius, the son of Atia, his sister Julius daughter, to Apollonia, that he might study there, and learn martial discipline: intending afterward to make him his fellow soldier in the Getick and Pontick war. [Vellei. Paternul, lib. 2. cap. 59. Sueton, in Octavio, cap. 8. Plutarch, in M. Bruti, Appian, lib. 3. pag. 531. Dio, lib. 45.] and thither also came some Squadrons of Pergamus, whom now being very old, he carried with him out of the City thither. [Sueton, in Octavio, cap. 89. cum Strabone, lib. 3. pag. 625.] and thither also came some Squadrons of Horie to him out of Macedonia, with whom he was exercised, whereby entertaining them courteously, he became very gracious with the army. [Appian, lib. 3. pag. 531.]

Caïtor, a young man, incited by his father Suocondarius, (as Strabo calls him) and his mother, the daughter of King Dejotarus, went to Rome to accuse his grandfather: having corrupted the Kings servant and Philitian, one Philip, with hopes and promises, that he should accuse his matter, under a feigned crime of treason, as though he would have killed Cæsar when he entertained him in his Tetrarchy, to whom the kings Ambassadors Hieras, Blesenius, Antigonus, and Dorylaus, opposed themselves offering to Cæsar their own bodies for the safety of the two kings, (the father and son who then reigned together) for him Cicero, in remembrance of their old friendship and familiarity, made an oration in Cæsar's house: using this as a preface, that it was unusual for a King to be guilty of treason, that it was never heard of before, but for this accusation, Dejotarus killed his daughter, together with her husband Caïtor, and his son, (that noble Chronographer) in Gades the palace of Cæsar himself. [Strabo, lib. 2. pag. 568.] concerning all this business famous Volius (alas! some sometime dear friend) is to be consulted in the last chapter of his first book of Greek Historians.

Upon the Ides of December, Q. Pedius Triumphed for Spain, (the third that was within this three months space). [Gruteri, Inscrip. pag. CCXCVII.] in which (as before him Fabius had done) using wooden Pageants and not Ivory, caused much laughter. [Dio, lib. 43.]

The Parthians being by Cæcilius Bassus called to his aid, came, but did not stay long with him by reason of winter, nor did any memorable thing. Thus Dio in [lib. 47.] notwithstanding by their coming, he was freed from that close siege with which he was straitened by Antilius Velus, as Velus himself confesseth in his letters to Bassus: concerning which, Cicero thus, [lib. 14. ad Attic. epist. 9.] Bassus is here, and very much with me: so when letters were delivered on the day before the Kalends of January from Velus, whereas Cæcilius was besieged by him, and was even ready to take it: that Marcus the Parthian came with great Forces, and so escaped him, with the loss of many of his men, for which he accuseth Volucius. So it seems to me that that war is nigh at hand: but let Nicias and Dollabella look to it. As namely to whom the care of the Province of Syria, and of the Parthian War, after the death of Cæsar, was committed: when Cicero wrote this Epistle.

At Rome, the day before the Kalends of January, Q. Fabius Maximus the Consul being dead, C. Caninius Rebilus demanded the Consulship of a few Towns. [Idem, cum Plinio, lib. 7. cap. 53. Sueton, in Claudio, cap. 15. & Trebell. Pollion, in XXX. Tyranno.] concerning whom Cicero, to Curius, [lib. 7. epist. 30. ad familiar.] Know that all the time that Caninius was Consul, there no body died: yet there was no hurt done all the time that he was Consul: for he was of wonderful vigilance, as who never took sleep in his Consulship. [Vid. Macrobi. lib. 1. Saturnal. cap. 3. & lib. 7. cap. 3.]

The next day Cæsar took upon him his fifth and last Consulship: in which he made an Edict, that thanks should be returned to Hyrcanus the High Priest and Prince of the Jews, and to the Nation of the Jews, for their affection to himself, and the people of Rome: and decreed also, that the same Hyrcanus should have the City Jerusalem, and should wall it about, and govern it after his own will. He also granted to the Jews, that every second year there should a deduction be made out of their rents, and that they should be free from impositions and tributes: as it is to be seen in the 14 book and 17 chapter of Josephus his Antiquities. So that the same Josephus seems to be deceived, who in the former chapter declares, that Cæsar being in Syria, sent letters to Rome to the Consul, that authority might be given to Hyrcanus to build the walls of Jerusalem that Pompey had broken down: and that presently after, Cæsar departing out of Syria, Antipater fell to work about it: for that decree of the Senate that he puts down, doth not any thing at all before either to this Hyrcanus, nor to the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem: as we have formerly observed at the year of the World 3897 concerning which also Salustius is to be consulted with, at the year of the World 4007 num. 36. 37.

In the same fifth Consulship, in the second Julian year, the month Quintilis is called July, in honour of Julius Cæsar. M. Antonius his Collegue in the Consulship preferring this law, because Julius was born on the fourth Ides of Quintilis in this month, [Appian, bell. civil. lib. 2. pag. 494. Dio, lib. 44. Constant. de die nativ. cap. 9. Macrobius, lib. 2. Saturnal. cap. 23.] Whereupon, whereas in the following month of Sextilis, M. Brutus, who was the City Prætor, and was to let forth the Apollonian Playes, after that Cæsar was murdered by him, he wrote forth Julius the Nones of July. Cicero wrote to his friend Atticus, [lib. 26. epist. 1.] I could be angry an whole day: could any thing be more base, than for Marcus to write Julius? and Brutus being admonished of this by him, said, that he would write that the hunting that was to be the day after the Apollonian Playes, they should set down to be on the III Ides of Quintilis. [Idem, epist. 4.]

Cæsar rebuilt Carthage and Corinth, which were demolished both at one time, (as hath been formerly said at the year of the World 398.) by bringing Roman Colonies thither. [Dio, lib. 49. Strabo, lib. 6. pag. 538. & lib. 7. pag. 293.] which concerning Corinth, Paulinus in Columbianus, and Solinus concerning Carthage. [cap. 20.] and Appian at the end of his Lybicomum do so far confirm, that they agree, that between the overthrow and rebuilding of Carthage there passed an æra: years which space of time brings us just to this year, on which the Consulship of M. Antonius and P. Dolabella, whom Solinus here names, fell. So that Appian's selfe considerably figured, that these Cities were again rebuilt by Augustus Cæsar.

At this time a great desire took the people of Rome to revenge the death of Cæsar and the army that he left, and hopes of utterly conquering the Parthians: whereupon this war by general consent was decreed to Cæsar, and they very earnestly made preparation for it. And among other things that were done in prosecution of that war, and that both Cæsar might have officers enough with him, and also that in his absence, lest that the City should be left destitute of Magistrates, neither if the city should chuse them there should be any new stir again, they intended to appoint magistrates before hand for the whole three years, (so long they thought that that war might last) half of these Cæsar chose, as indeed was by the law granted unto him, (concerning which law Suetonius is to be consulted) and in truth all the rest. [Ido. lib. 43.]

But minding first to set upon the Getæ, or Daci, he sent before him over the Adriatick sea, sixteen Legions, and 10000 horse, and then to make war upon the Parthians, through Armenia the selfe, and not to come to a set battle, till he had tried what they could do. [Sueton. in Julio, cap. 44. Appian. lib. 2. pag. 497.]

Cæsar sent Cornificius to make war in Syria against Cassius Bassus, and gave unto him the province of Syria. [Cicero. lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 18. 19.] but whilst the Legions were to be conducted to him, the murder of Cæsar happened: after which that province was assigned to P. Cornelius Dolabella the Consul, and (as we shall see) old Africa was given to Cornificius. [Cicero. ibid. epist. 19. 22. Appian. lib. 4. pag. 620. 621.]

Cæsar committed the charge and command of three Legions that he had left in Alexandria, to Rufinus the son of a freed man of his, who was an old carmate of his own. [Sueton. in Julio, cap. 78.]

On the VII Kalends of February, Cæsar entered the City in an oration from the mount Albanus. [Inscr. p. Gruteri. pag. CCXCVII.] for it was decreed that in the performance of the Latine Feria he should be thus brought into the city. [Ido. lib. 44.]

When he had saluted him King, as he was returning from the sacrifice of the Latine Feria, and going into the city from the mount Albanus, he being offended that the people took it ill, answered them, that he was Cæsar and not a King, and when they all held their peace, he went along in their very sad and melancholy, and when one of the company had put a lawrell crown tied with a white ribbon, (which was that that they used to do to their Kings) upon his statue; Epidius Matellus and Cassius Fiarus commanded the crown to be untied, and the man to be had to prison, but Cæsar grieving that the mention of a kingdom went not on very properly, and that the glory of denying it was taken from him, he severely chid the Tribunes, and deprived them of their office. [Sueton. in Julio, cap. 79. Plutarch. in eodem, Dio. lib. 41. Livy. lib. 116. Appian. lib. 2. bell. civil. pag. 495. 496.]

On the Lupercalia (which the old Kalender then were celebrated on the 15 day of February) M. Antonius his Colleague in the Consulship, being naked, came running amongst those that celebrated the feast, and falling down before Cæsar, who sat in the Rostra, in his golden chain, clothed in purple and crowned, and presented him with a diadem, in the name of the people of Rome, which being twice put on his head by him, Cæsar took off again and laid in his golden chair, and answered, that Jupiter only was the King of the Romans, and sending the Diadem into the Capitol to Jupiter, demanded that it should be written in the records: That at the Lupercalia, Marcus Antonius the Consul, offered a Kingdom to Cæsar the Dictator, but he would not make use of it: whereupon he came into suspicion, that this was but a trick between them, and that indeed he did desire the name of King, but that he would fain be forced to take it. [Idem b. d. Cicero. in Philip. 2. 3. 8. 13. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 56. Plutarch. in Antonio, Cissador. in Chronico.]

After this there was a rumour went about, either true or false, (as fables use to be made) That the Priest called Quindemivir found in the Sybils book, that the Parthians might be overcome by the Romans, if a King were General, otherwise they were unconquerable, and thereupon that L. Corra, one of the Quindemiviri, should in the next Senate propose a law, that Cæsar should be filed King, and some were of opinion that he ought to be filed either Dictator or Emperor of the Romans, or any other name that sounded more plausible than the name of Kings: but that of all other nations that were under the command of the Romans, he should positively be filed King. [Sueton. Plutarch. Dion. ut supra Appian. pag. 497.] whether also it is to be referred that of Cicero [in lib. 2. de divinai.] We observe the Sybils verses, which he is reported reported in a fury to have uttered, whose interpreter (L. Corra) was of late thought to speak some false thing: merely one of mens reports, as though that he that we have now for King already, must be called King, if we will be secure.

Cæsar provided by all means to get him out of the City as soon he could, where he began to be hardly thought of: but four days before he intended to go, he was stabbed in the Senate. [Appian. pag. 497.] There was in this conspiracy about 60. Senators and Knights of Rome, as is reported; [Sueton. in Julio, cap. 80. Europ. lib. 6. fin. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 17.] the chief of which were M. Brutus, and C. Trebonius, and C. Cassius, and of Cæsar's party D. Cimius Brutus, [Livy. lib. 116.] when as therefore Cæsar was come into the Senate house, with an intention to advance the Parthian war; there the Senators stabbed him as he sat in the Ivory chair, and he was slain with three and twenty wounds, [Id. ibid. Florus. lib. 4. Histor. Rom. cap. 2. fin.] on the Ides of March, in the fifty sixth year of his age. [Sueton. in Julio, cap. 81. 83. 91. Plutarch in eodem, Appian. lib. 2. bell. civil. pag. 522.]

Thus he who had fought in fifty set battles, and had killed a thousand one hundred ninety two thousand men in battles, (as Plutarch relates, lib. 7. cap. 25.) in that Senate; the most part whereof he had chosen himself, in Pompey's Court, before the image of Pompey himself; so many of his own Centurions looking on, he so fell by the hands of the most noble Citizens, and those too, most of them advanced very much by himself, so that not only none of his friends, but that not so much as any of his servants could come at his body. [Cicero. lib. 2. de divinai.]

P. Cornelius Dolabella, being but twenty five years old, who was by Cæsar himself, when he was to go out of the City, designed Consul in his own room, for the rest of the years: whereas he snatched up the laces, and the consular ensignes, came before them all, and vily reproached the author of his dignity; and as some deliver, preferred a Law, that that day might be accounted as the birth day of the City. [Appian. lib. 2. Bell. Civilis pag. 505. 506. cum Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 58.]

The third day after the murder of Cæsar, (as Cicero hath it in his Philippicks) whereas the Liberalia were celebrated, (as is gathered out of the fourteenth book, ad Atticum, epist. 10. & 16.) that is, on the XVI. Kalends of April, the Senate being called into the Temple of Tellus, whereas the Consul Antonius, Plancus, and Cicero had discoursed concerning an act of oblivion, and a peace; it was decreed, that the memory of all injuries might be blotted out, and that a firm peace might be settled among the Citizens, and that Cæsar's acts might be ratified. [Cicero. Philipp. 2. 1. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 58. Plutarch in Cicerone, Brutus, & Antonio. Appian. lib. 2. D. 0. lib. 44.]

And upon the very day first of all (as it is in the Philippick 1.) M. Antonius, laying aside all enmities, was willing that Dolabella should be his Colleague in the Consulship, although when as formerly Cæsar shewed himself, that he had a mind, before he left the City, that he should be Consul, he vehemently opposed it, as Cicero declareth in Philippick 2. and Plutarch in Antio. For at the first he had determined not to admit him to the Consulship, as being yet too young; but for fear he should make any sedition, he suffered him to be his Colleague. [Ido. lib. 44.]

The next day the Senate meeting again, decreed Provinces for the murderers of Cæsar; as Creta to M. Brutus, to Cassius Africa, to Trebonius Asia, to Cimber Bithinia; and to Decimus Brutus, Gallia Circumpana. [Plutarch in M. Brutus.]

Of these two former were Prætors of the city, who seeing they thought it unhand-some, ambitiously to seize upon Provinces before the time of their Magistracy was out; and when they also saw it was not safe for them to exercise any jurisdiction in the City, they determined to passe over the rest of the year in Italy as private men: which when the Senate understood, they appointed them to be Overseers for the bringing in of corn into the City. [Appian. lib. 3. pag. 530.] that Brutus should take charge of sending corn to the City out of Asia, and Cassius out of Sicilia, but Cassius scorned this office. [Cicero. ad Attic. lib. 1. 5. epist. 9. 11. 24.]

Some had a plot, that there should be a private bank raised for them that killed Cæsar, from the Roman Knights; and they thought that this might be easily compassed, if the chief of them would bring in their monies. Whereupon Atticus is called upon by Flavius, a familiar friend of Brutus, that he would be the chief in this business; but he that alwayes thought of doing his friend courtesies, without any faction answered, That if Brutus had any mind to make use of his estate, let him use as much as his estate would bear; but that himself would not so much as speak with any one about this matter, nor joyne with them in it, and so the whole plot of the conspirators was spoiled by one mans dissent. [Cornel. Nepos in Vitis. Attic.]

In the Temple of Castor, some letters of the names of the Consuls Antonius and Dolabella were stricken down with lightning: by which Julius Obsequens in lib. de Prodigis, faith that their alienation from their country was signified.

The Consul Antonius periwaded his Collegue Dolabella, as one that was an ambitious young man, that he should demand to be sent into Syria; and to the army that was raised against the Parthians: and brought it to pass that the Province of Syria fell to him by the vote of the people, and also the Parthian war, and the Legions that were appointed by Cæsar for that purpose, together with those that were sent before into Macedonia: and he then of the Senate obtained Macedonia, (thus left naked without an army) [Appian, lib. 3. pag. 530, 531, & 550.]

Cicero tearing Antonius his power, determined at first to go with Dolabella into Syria, as his Lieutenant, [Plutarch, in Cicero,] the IIII Nones of April there was a free Lieutenantcy granted him, that he might enter upon it and have it when he would himself, [Cicero, ad Attic. lib. 2. epist. 12.] But being periwaded by Hircius and Panfa who were designed Consuls for the next year, he changed his opinion: and leaving Dolabella, he resolved to spend the Summer at Athens, [Plin. in sup.] to take his journey into Greece before the time that the Olympian Games were celebrated, [Cicero, ad Attic. lib. 15. epist. 24. & lib. 16. epist. 7.] and in this very year, was the 184 Olympiad celebrated.

Octavius in the sixth month after he was come to Apollonia, having received the news of his Uncles death, passed out of Epirus into Italy, where at Brundisium being received by the army that went to meet him as Cæsar's son, without any further delay, he immediately assumed the name of Cæsar, and took upon him to be his heir, (and so much the rather, because he had brought with him great store of money, and great forces that were sent him by Cæsar.) And so at Brundisium adopting himself into the Julian Families, he henceforth called himself Caius Julius Cæsar Octavius, instead of Caius Octavius, [Livy, lib. 117. Julius Obsequens de Prodigis, Appian, lib. 3. pag. 531, 532. Dion, lib. 45.]

To this very name, no otherwise then to the true son, there came great store, partly of friends, partly of freed men and slaves, and with them of soldiers also, who either carried provision and money into Macedonia, or brought the tributes and other monies that they had exacted from the Provinces to Brundisium: he then being more strengthened and emboldened by the multitude of them that flocked to him, and by the authority of the Cæsar's name in great reputation with the common people, he took his journey towards the city, with no contemptible train, and which daily increased like a flood, [Appian, ibid. pag. 532, 533.]

On the XIIIII Kaldens of May, Octavius came to Naples, and the next day at Cumæ he gave Cicero a visit, [Cicero, lib. 1. ad Attic. epist. 10.] of which this Cicero himself in an Epistle to Atticus, written X Kaldens, [ibid. epist. 12.] Octavius was with us, very nobly and friendly, his own followers praised him by the name of Cæsar, but Philip would not: for it stood not with the good liking of his mother Asia, and his father in law Philip, that he should take upon him the name of the envied fortune of Cæsar: as we read in Velleius Paterculus, [lib. 2. cap. 60. Sueton. Ollivius, cap. 8. Appian, lib. 3. pag. 532, 533.]

There met Octavius as he was coming to Rome, a vast company of his friends; and when he entered the city, the Globe of the Sun seemed upon his head, equally bent and rounded like a bow, (as it were putting a Crown upon the head of him that hereafter was to be so great a man) thus Velleius, [lib. 2. cap. 59. and Julius Obsequens de Prodigis.] When as he entered the City with a great multitude about him, the Sun being included in the round of a pure and unclouded sky, compassed him about, with the utmost part of the circle, (as the Rainbow is wont to be bent in the cloudes) to wit, a circle of divers colours, as is wont to be in the Rainbow, did at that time compass about the Sun; as it is in Seneca, [Natural. Questions, lib. 1. cap. 2. Plinius, lib. 2. cap. 28. Sueton. in Ollivius, cap. 95. Dion, lib. 45. and Oros. lib. 6. cap. 60.]

Octavius calling together his friends, over night commanded them all to be ready the next morning with good store of followers to meet him in the Market-place: where going to Caius the brother of Antonius the city Praetor, he told him he did accept of his adoption; for it was the Roman custom in an adoption, to interpose the authority of the Praetor: which acceptance being required by the Scribes, he immediately from the Market-place, went unto Antonius the Consul, [Appian, lib. 3. pag. 534.] whom the Consul entertained proudly, (but this was not contempt but fear) and (scarcely admitting him into Pompeys Gardens, gave him leave to speak with him, [Velleius Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 60.]

The Circensian Playes were neglected which were decreed to be solemnized for the honour of Cæsar in the Pallia, (XI Kaldens of May) because the news of his Victory in Spain was brought to Rome the day before that day, [Dion, lib. 44. & 45.] but but Quintus and Lamia wore Crowns there for Cæsars honours sake, [Cicero, lib. 14. ad Atticum, epist. 16. & 22.]

When as the murderers of Cæsar were sent into the Provinces, that fell to them by lot, (as Dio hath it in lib. 44.) Caius Trebonius went into his Province by By-way, [Cicero, lib. 14. ad Attic. epist. 10.] to succeed Q. Philippus in the Procuratorship of Asia, [lib. 13. ad familiar. epist. 73. & 74. collat. with epist. 43. & 45.] With him went Patricus as ordinary Proquestour: but P. Lentulus the son of Publius Lentulus Spinther was by the Senate sent into Asia as extraordinary in that office, to gather in the tribute, and to raise money, [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 14. & 15.]

XI Kaldens of June, Trebonius came to Athens, and there finding young Cicero earnestly at his study under Cratippus, he invited them both into his Province of Asia: as he himself tells in his letters to his father, dated the VII Kaldens of June, [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 16.] to which his father Cicero answers in lib. 15. in the last epist. to his familiars.

IV Nones of June, there was a law made, that the Consuls should take cognizance of those things that Cæsar had ordained, decreed, and done, [Cicero, ad Attic. lib. 16. epist. 18.]

Antonius, after it was committed to him to oversee and execute those things that Cæsar had commanded to be done, what by corrupting the notes, and changing them at his pleasure, did every thing as it pleased him, as if it were by the appointment of Cæsar, gratifying by this means Cities and Governours, and heaping to himself vast sums of money; for he sold not only fields and tributes, but freedoms also, even of the City of Rome, and other immunities: and that not only to particular persons, but to whole Provinces, and all people; and of these things there were tables hung up over all the Capitol, [Cicero, in Philippica, 2. & lib. 2. ad familiar. epist. 1. Velleius Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 60. Plutarch, in Antonio, Appian, lib. 3. pag. 529. D. lib. 44.] in one of which, the richest cities of the Cretians were freed from tribute; and it was ordained that after the Procuratorship of Brutus Crete should be no longer a Province, [Cicero, ibid.] Antonius also having received a great sum of money fixed up a Register also, as if the law had been made by Cæsar, that the Sicilians should be made citizens of Rome, [Id. lib. 14. ad Attic. epist. 12.]

King Deiotarus, as soon as he heard of Cæsars death, recovered all things that were taken from him of his own accord, notwithstanding his Embassadors being fearful and unskilful, without the consent of the rest of the Kings friends; by a bond given to Fulvia of 100000 Sesterces, got a decree fixed in the Capitol, by which all things were ridiculously feigned as if they were restored by Cæsar himself, [Id. ibid. & in 2. Philippic.]

When as there were Playes to be set forth to Cæsars Victory the XIII of August (as appears in the old Kalender in Guterus his intercalars pag. CXXXIII) and they not daring to do it to whose office it did belong, Octavius set them forth himself, [Sueton. in Ollivius, cap. 10.] And when as he had committed the care for the preparations for them to C. Matius, a most learned man; who gives this reason to Cicero, [lib. 11. ad familiar. epist. 27. & ad Attic. epist. 2.] not approving it. I have taken care for the Playes that young Cæsar made to the Victory of Cæsar, but it belonged to my private service to him, and not to the state of the commonwealth: which service yet I ought to perform to the memory and honour of my chiefest friend, although now dead; neither could I deny it at the request of that hopeful young man, and most worthy Cæsar.

And hither after to be referred those things in the 45 Book of Dio; νεγροδουσι τινος εναντιον της ημερας επι της οποιας τον Κεσαραν ον. They did sacrifice with certain processions on a particular day consecrated to him for his Victories: and that it was formerly decreed to have been so, Appian in a book of the civil wars, [pag. 494.] and in lib. 43. Dion himself confirms; that those days should be celebrated with solemn sacrifices on which he obtained his Victories. It seems that the commemoration of all the Victories he had obtained were summed up on this one day consecrated for his victorial Sacrifices: for that of Lucan in the beginning of the seventh book shews, that the day of the Victory of Pharsalia, the most famous of all the rest, was not particularly reckoned among the Feast days.

Tempora signavit leviorum Roma malorum, Hunc voluit nascere diem.

Rome hath oft celebrated times lesse dire;
But this would in oblivion have retired.

M. Brutus and Caius Cassius privately by letters advise Trebonius in Asia, and Tullius Cicero in Bithynia, that they should legerally gather up money, & confider of an army. [Apian. lib. 3. p. 569, 570.] which advice Cicero obeying provided also a navy. [Cassius, ad Ciceron. lib. 12. ad familiæ. epist. 13.] It was that drunken Cimber, whom Seneca relates, in epist. 87. that he made this jest upon himself; Ego quæquam feram, qui nunquam ferre non possum? Am I able to deal with any one, who cannot bear pain.

Cæsar Octavianus being ninteen years old, by his own advice, and at his own charge, gathered an army: as he himself shewes in the Breviary of his Affairs, ingraven in the Ancyran Marble, [Inscript. Græcæ. pag. CCXXX.] before the day of the XI. Kalends, to wit of October, in which he was entering into his twentieth year of his age; for before the departure of Antonius from the City, (which happened in the following October) he being commended to the Senate by the means of Cicerò, and others that hated Antonius, he endeavoured to get the favour of the people, and to gather an army, [Plutarch in Antonio.] and preparing forces against Antonius, both for his own safety, and the Common-wealths, he stirred up the old Soldiers that were sent into Colonies, [Ætæ. lib. 117.] concerning which Florus perorates, Octavianus Cæsar pitied for his youth, and wronged, and gracious for the majesty of that name, that he had assumed calling the old Soldiers to arms, he being a private person, (who would believe it?) set upon the Consul: thus he, [lib. 4. cap. 4.] where yet he doth not right in making him but eighteen years old: as neither Dio which writes that he was 18 years old when he assumed the name, and took upon him as Cæsar heire. [lib. 45. pag. 271.] Neither is it accurately enough said of Seneca, [lib. 1. de clementia, cap. 9.] That he was newly out of his eighteenth year of Velleius Paterculus, That he was entered on his nineteenth year. for Paterculus saith, C. Cæsar being eured on his nineteenth year: during wonderful things, and straining the highest by his own advice, had a greater mind for the safety of the Commonwealth, than the Senate bad, [lib. 2. cap. 61.] For when he began to provide an army, he was almost out of his nineteenth year of his age; and from that time, even to his death, there is reckoned 57 years, and to many also doth Maximus the Monck, in his computation assign to his government.

Here Antonius being afraid, hath a conference with him in the Capitol, and they are reconciled. The same night in his sleep, his right hand seemed to be strook with lightning: and a few dayes after it was secretly whispered unto him, That Caesar sought to betray him; and when he would not believe Caesar that sought to clear himself, their old enmity brake out again. [Plutarch in Antonio.] to Caesar himself, their old enmity broke out against the forces, and knowing that the Legions of Macedonia, were the best footsolders, and more in number, (for they were six Legions) and that with them there was a great band of archers, and light battelled men, and horsemen also, and all in excellent equipage, which seemed to belong to Doloibella, because the Parthian war was decreed to him, when Caesar made preparation against the Parthians. These he thought to draw to himself, because for the nearness they might presently be in Italy, by crossing the Adriatic sea: and when as there was a false rumour spread abroad, that the Great hearing of the death of Caesar, waited Macedonia by their inroads. Antonius demanded an army of the Senate, that he might be revenged of the enemy, saying, That the Macedonian army was raised by Caesar against the Great, before he determined to set upon the Parthians, and that all things were now quiet towards the bounds of Parthia. At length having agreed to deliver one Legion over to Doloibella, he is chosen General of the Macedonian army. [Appian, lib. 3. page. 541, 542.] He obtained also by a law made by force the change of Provinces, that C. Antonius his brother should challenge Macedonia, which Province fell to Marcus Brutus lor, and the Consul Marcus Antonius should have Gallia Cisalpina, that was assigned to Decimus Brutus, together with the Macedonian army, which was sent before by Caesar to Apollonia. [Dio, lib. 45. cum Livy, lib. 117. & Appian, lib. 3. page. 543, 545, 546.]

It was reported that the Legions of Alexandria were in arms, that Bassus was sent for out of Syria, and Cassius was expected, [Cicero, ad Attic. lib. 15. epist. 13.]

play: 15. time of the dayes being come, which Critonius the Edile was to let forth; Cefar provided for his father a golden chaire and a crown: which thing was ordered by the decree of the Senate to be done for ever in all playes: and whereas Critonius feared that ever he would suffer Cefar to be honoured in thofe playes that he let forth at his own private charge: Cefar was brought before Antonius, as unto the Consul; the Consul did him that he would propole it to the Senate, propole it (quoth he) and in the mean time I will provide the chaire; which Antonius being exasperated, forbade; neither conent with this, but forbid it also, in the following playes, that Cefar sollemnized, and were inflituted in honour of their mother Venus, when a Temple in the market market-place was dedicated to him, and also the market-place it self : which fact of Antonius was entertained with publick hatred. [Appian, ibid. pag. 543, 544.]

On the VI. Kalends of October, in the Marble piece of the old Calendar, in Inscrip. Græcæ top. CXXXV. fin. conferred with another whole one. CXXXIII.] it is there marked. VENERI. GENETRI. CIN. FOR. CÆSAR. On that day therefore Octavianus, to gain the peoples favour, made those plays, that were instituted for the finishing of Venus Temple, at his own charges, as pertaining to him by reason he came from that stock, and which Rome during Cæars life had, was understood that they would tolerate, but yet neglected them. [Dis. lib. 4.5.] which whilst he was letting fourth, Senea teacheth that a Comet suddenly brake forth, [in Natural. questib. lib. 7. cap. 17. Sueton. in Julio. cap. 88. & Pliny. lib. 2. cap. 25.] where he relates these words of Octavius himself. *In the very dayes of my Playes there was a Comet seen seven dayes together, in the North part of the Heaven: it arose about the eleventh hour of the day; it was clear, and conspicuous in all lands: the people generally thought that by this star was signified Cæars soul to be received into the number of the gods: and under that notion was that mark added to the image of his head, that we newly consecrated in the market-place: which is also to be seen in some coins that were stamped after his death, with the inscription DIVI JULII. and signified in that of Virgil, thy fathers star appeared in the North, Aeneid. 8.]*

3961. The VII. Ides of October, Antonius came to Brundisium, going to meet four of the Macedonian legions (of five) that he thought to get to himself by money. [Cicero, lib. 12, ad familiā, epist. 23, with Appian, lib. 3, pag. 552, 554, & Dion, lib. 45, pag. 276, edit. Græcælatini, Hannoveriensis,] And which being granted him by the Senate and people of Rome, against the Getæ, he transported into Italy, [Vellei, Paterculi, lib. 2, cap. 61, with Appian, lib. 3, pag. 543, 546, & 556. ib.]

Thither also Cicero sent his friends with money to hire those soldiers for himself. ["Dis, no usque...] But he himself posted into Campania, to engage those soldiers that his father had sent into Colonies, to war on his side; and first he drew to his party the old soldiers of Galatia: then those of Castilnum, which lay on both sides of Capua, and following upon each of them five hundred pence, (which Appian and Dio, after the custom of the Greeks, render drachmes) he gathered together about 10000 men, but neither well armed, nor marshalled into companies, and marched with them under one Ensign as a guard. [Cicero, lib. 16. ad Attic. epist. 8. & Philippic 3. Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 65. Appian, lib. 3. pag. 552. 553.] And upon these was the name of the Evocati first put; because that when they had had leave to serve no more in the war, they were again called to it. [Servius Galba ad Ciceron. in lib. 10. ad familiar. epist. 30. Dio, lib. 45. pag. 276. & lib. 55. pag. 565.]

30. *In the mean while the other Legions of Macedonia, accusing Antonius for his delay in revenging Calpurnia's death upon the murderers, without any acclamations conducted him to the Tribunal, as if they would hear an account of this business, before any thing. Those Legions of theirs he took ill; neither could he contain himself, but upbraided them with their ingratitude, because they did not acknowledge how much better it was to go into Italy, than into Parthia, neither shewed any token of thankfulness. He complained moreover, that they had not brought to him some disturbers of the peace, that were sent from that malapert young man (for so he called Cæsar) but that he should find them out; and that he would march with the army to the Province that was decreed him by the Senate, even that fortunate Gallia, and that he would give to every one, then present, 100 drachmes, or pence. This misgardingness of his in promising, was entertained with laughter; which when he took ill, he was deserted, and the tumult increased. [Appian. lib. 3. pag. 554. with Dion. lib. 45. pag. 276. & Cicero. lib. 3. 6. ad Attic. epist. 8.]*

When Antonius had demanded the sedicious of the Tribunes, according to the discipline of war, he drew out the tenth man by lot, but neither did he punish them all, but only part of them, thinking to terrify them by little and little. [Appian, lib. 3, pp. 554, 555.] Allis in the house of his host, in the bay of Brundisium, in the presence of his not only most covetous, but most cruel wife Fulvia, he put to death four Centurions, called out of the Martian Legion. [Cicero, Philippics, 3, 5, 13, Dio, lib. 45, pp. 276.]

When the of Caesar's party that were sent to corrupt them, saw that they were more provoked by this deed, they scattered libels about the army, calling to mind the memory of Caesar, in respect of the Boinette and crueky of Antonius, and inviting them to the liberality of the young man : and whereas the Consul had propounded rewards to them that would tell him of them, and punishments to the concealers ; he took it ill that none were discovered, as if the army did defend them, psian, pag. 558.

When Cæsar Octavianus came to have office, and had endeavoured to assure the people to himself, M. Brutus and Caius Cassius, both casting off all hope of holding the state of a popular commonwealth, and also being afraid of Cæsar, for sale out of Italy, and landed at Athens, when they were magnificently entertained, [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 238. 239.] Cornelius Nepos in the life of Atticus writes that they, when Antonius began to have the upper hand, casting of all care of those provinces that were given them by the Consuls, went into exile: and now both fearing the arms of Antonius, and now again to increase the envy they had against Antonius, they feigned as though they feared, and protested by their edicts, that they would willingly live in perpetual exile, as long as the commonwealth was in peace, neither would they give any occasion of civil war; Velleius Paterculus tells that they went out of Italy. [lib. 2. cap. 62.]

When some went to Octavianus his side, and some to Antonius his party, the armies as if they had been set to sale at an outcry addicted themselves to him that would give most. Brutus intended to leave Italy, and through Lucania came by land to the sea at Elea, from whence setting sail he came to Athens, where being scholar to Theonmetas the Academic, and to Cratippus the Peripatetic (the Mitylenian) and together with them following his study, he seemed to give over all business and to live in idleness, whereas notwithstanding he prepared for the war; [Plutarch, in Brutus, Cicero in Philippi. 10.] declares that the navy of Cassius within few daies overtook Brutus.

Brutus and Cassius determined by force to invade Macedonia, and Syria as assigned before to them, to Dolabella and Antonius, which consultation as soon as it was detected; Dolabella hastened into Syria, visiting Asia by the way, to gather money from thence. So Appianus [de bellis civilibus lib. 3. pag. 541.] for he thought (as also before him Florus lib. 4. cap. 7.) that Macedonia was decreed by Julius Cæsar (before he was killed by them) to Brutus, and Syria to Cassius; and that there were other lesser granted to them, in the place of those that were afterwards taken from them by the Consuls, to wit Cyrene and the Isle of Crete, or as some write both these to Cassius, and Bithinia to Brutus, but that they contemned these and gathered an army and money with an intent to invade Syria and Macedonia. [Appian, lib. pag. 527. 530. 531. 533. 536. 550. & lib. 4. pag. 622.]

But that Syria was appointed by Julius Cæsar to Cornificius, we learn from Cicero and the fourth day after his murder that Crete was decreed by the Senate to Brutus, and Africa to Cassius, we have heard formerly out of Plutarch, whereupon in Philippi. XI. Cicero saith of Brutus. Neither went he into his own province of Crete, but hastened into Macedonia which was another's; and of Cassius he obeyed the Law of nature, when he went into Syria, another's province indeed of men would use written Laws, but these being violated, his own by the law of nature. Velleius Paterculus commeth that they, both of them, seized upon provinces without any decree of the Senate, or public authority. [lib. 2. cap. 62.] and of both of them living at Athens. Dio thus writes, [lib. 47. pag. 339.] when they heard that Cæsar increased in strength, Crete and Bithynia (for thither were they sent) being neglected, because they thought that these provinces would stand them in small stead, they let their mind upon Syria and Macedonia, indeed no money belonging to them, but that at that time they flourished both in men and money.

Dolabella making his journey through Achaia, Macedonia, and Thrace, came too late into Asia, but in Achaia having both foot and horse, he met Vetus Antestius, who having returned from Syria, had dismissed his army, (which he had lately used against Cæcilius Bassus) when he had rather undergo any danger than to seem to give either upon compulsion, or willingly any money to Dolabella. [Dio, lib. 47. pag. 344. & Brutus in lib. Cicero's ad Brutum epist. 1.]

On the Kalends of November, letters were brought to Cicero from Octavian, wherein he asketh his advice, whether he had best come to Rome, with those 4000 old soldiers, or should keep Capax, and shun out Antonium from thence, or should go to the three Legions of Macedonia, which came by the way of the Adriatick sea, which because they would not receive the largesse that Antonius offered them, he thought he might get them to himself, [Cicero, lib. 16. ad Attic. epist. 8.] Octavian numbered the centuries of Capua, [epist. 9.] taking his journey into Samnium he came to Calce, and tarried at Theanum, There was a wonderful avalanche and confluence of the free cities and corporations which came to Rome, with a great band, [epist. 1.]

Then going forth to the common people, already prepared for this purpose by Cæcilius the Tribune of the people, he renewed the memory of his father in a long oration to them, and the brave act that he had done, he spake also many things modestly of himself, accused Antonius, and commended the soldiers that followed him; because they were ready to aid the city, and that they had chosen him for that purpose, and that they should by themselves signify so much to multitudes, and being commended commended, partly for the goodly equipage he had, and partly for the multitude of soldiers he had with him; he went into Hæmatia for to raise more soldiers there. [Dio. lib. 45. pag. 276.]

At this time Marcus Cicero dedicates his three famous books of Offices to his son Marcus, having now been a Scholler an whole year to Cratippus, (not now at the first time sent thither, as Dio signifies in lib. 45. pag. 277.) [lib. 16. ad familiares, epist. 11.] and there are yet extant the sons letters to Tiro, [lib. 16. ad familiares, epist. 21.] in which (speaking of them that boarded together with him, he saith, I have hired a place for Brutus hard by me, and as much as I can out of my poverty, I sustain his want: Moreover I intended to declaim in Greek before Cassius, but before Brutus, I will do my exercise in Latin. I use for my familiar friends and boarders, those that Cratippus brought with him from Myslenia, learned men and well approved by him.

Brutus being brought to this want, associated himself (besides Cicero) with other young men that studied at Athens: he sent Hærostratus into Macedonia, to get the favour of them that were Captains of the armies; and when he had received news that some Roman ships laden with money directed their course from Asia towards Athens, and that the Admiral was an honest man, and his familiar friend, he went to meet him about the Carystos, he persuaded him to deliver the ships over to him, [Plutarch, in Brutus.]

Brutus upon his Birth-day made a great Feast for the Admiral, in which when they came to toasting, they began a health to Brutus's victory, and the liberty of the people of Rome: then Brutus taking a large cup, spake aloud this Verse without any evident cause;

*Ἄνδρα μοι ἔνθα βῆθ' ὅς ἑταίρος ἐντὶ πόλει
Sed me fors miseræ & Latona perdidit infans.*

Latona's stem and cruel fate
To my successe have put a date.

Which exclamation was accounted for an ill omen of his overthrow, when going to fight his last battell at Philippi, he gave his soldiers the word Apollo, [lib. 4. pag. 668.]

After this Antistius bestowed on Brutus that money he carried into Italy πυρρὰ δηνον πεντακισχίλια 500 Myriades: as Plutarch writes in that place. The Latin Interpreter rendered it 20000 Sesterterium, which (um Brutus himself acknowledges (that Vetus Antistius both promised of his own accord, and gave him of his money), in an Epistle in which he commends him to Cicero, as Antistius was going to Rome to demand the Prætorship, [lib. ad Brutum, epist. 11.] We read in Cornelius Nepos in the life of Atticus, that Pompeius Atticus also sent a present of an C. M. Sester. when Brutus was cast out and left Italy, and in his absence, commanded that 300 should be given him in Epirus.

Cassius and Brutus, parting the one from the other in Pitaræa, the one went into Syria, the other into Macedonia, [Plutarch.] Cassius that he might keep Dolabella out of Syria, [Cicero, Philippi. 11.] Brutus that he might get Macedonia and Greece to joyn with him, [Dio, lib. 47. pag. 339.] and without any publick authority seizing upon Provinces and armies, pretending that where they were, there was the commonwealth, they received money of those that would deliver it them, that was sent by the Treasurers to Rome from the parts beyond Seas, [Velleius Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 62.]

Cassius, having prevented Dolabella, sailed into Asia to Trebonius the Proconsul: and having received money from him, he joyntly to his party many of those bold men that were sent before by Dolabella into Syria, (which D. Lentulus brags in his letters to Cicero that he first delivered over to Cassius, [lib. 12. ad familiares, epist. 14.] and also many of Asia and Cilicia. He compelled also Tarconthionus and the Tarentines to joyn in alliance with him, but the Tarentines did it against their wills; for they favoured the first Cæsar, and for his sake the latter, that instead of Tarsus, they called their City Juliopolis, [Dio, lib. 47. pag. 342.]

Brutus also after he had received from Apuleius what forces he then had, and in ready money sixteen thousand talents, which being collected out of the payments and tributes of Asia he had received of Trebonius, he came into Bœotia, [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 632. with Dio, pag. 339.] There he gathered up soldiers, partly of those that came of the battle of Pharsalia, he found wandering about Theffalia; partly of those that came with Dolabella from Italy, who either were left there by reason of sickness, or that had run away from their Regiments. Moreover, he took from Cinna 500 Horse, which he conducted to Dolabella into Asia, [Plutarch, & Dio, in supra.] Whither

Who belongs that of Cicero concerning Brutus, Philippick XI. He raised new Legions, and entertained the old: he took to himself Dolabella's Horse, and that before he was defiled with the murder (of Trebonius) but judged him an enemy by his own sentence only; for if it were not so, how could he take away the Horse from the Consul?

Brutus being thus appointed, under colour of service to the Common-wealth, and of undertaking a war against Antonius; without any adoe he seized upon Greece, where there were no soldiers at all. [Dio. ut supra, with Livy, lib. 118.]

From hence he goeth to Demetrius, where he got into his power great store of arms that were provided by the command of Caesar the Dictator, against the Parthian war, which were to be carried to Antonius. [Plutarch & Appian, lib. 3. pag. 567.]

He came also into Macedonia at the same time, that Caius Antonius, the Consul brother was newly come thither, and Q. Hortensius, the Proconsul of Macedonia; was preparing for his departure; but he stood not much upon this, seeing that Hortensius would presently join with him; and Antonius being forbidden (Caesar now commanding all at Rome) to meddle with any thing that belonged to the chief Magistrate, had no forces. [Dio. ut supra, with Cicero, Philippic. 10.]

There was a muster made in Macedonia, by the great care and industry of Q. Hortensius, the Legion that L. Piso the Lieutenant of Antonius conducted, delivered it self over to Cicero's son, whom Brutus brought with him from Athens, the Horse which was conducted in two brigades into Syria, one whereof left him that conducted them in Thessalia, as it is said, and went to Brutus; the other Cn. Domitius in Macedonia withdrew from the Lieutenant of Syria. [Cicero, Philippic. 10.]

Brutus hearing that Antonius would immediately march to the forces which Gabinus had at Dyrrachium and Apollonia, and desiring to prevent him, suddenly took his journey through rough ways and much snow, and far out went them that carried his dinner: as he came near to Dyrrachium, through the labour and cold, he was taken with a Bulimia, which disease takes them that are wearied with going in the snow; whose necessity being understood, the Soldiers left the guard, and came running with meat and drink to him: for which curse Brutus, when the Town was delivered, shewed himself kind, not only to them, but for their takes, to all. [Plutarch.] But Q. Vatinus, who commanded in Illyrium that lay near, came from thence, and had seized upon Dyrrachium before, having been an adversary to Brutus, throughout all the civil war. But being contemned of his Soldiers, by reason of his sickness, and they going to Brutus, he opened the gates to him, and delivers up the army to him. [Dio. ut supra, cum Cicero, Philippic. 10. Livy, lib. 118.]

When a way lay both open, and not long, for Dolabella into Syria, he brake into Asia, another mans Province, in which there was no suspicion of war, he sending M. Octavius a Senator, but poor, with a Legion, wasted the Counties, and vexed their Cities. [Cicero, Philippic. 11.]

But neither Pergamus nor Smyrna would receive him, but they afforded him a market-place without the City, as to one that was Consul: and when he in a passion had in vain assaulted Smyrna, Trebonius the Proconsul of Asia, who fortified Cities, for the retreat of Brutus and Cassius, promised that he would let him into Ephesus, and commanded his soldiers that they should immediately follow the Consul thither. [Appian, lib. 3. pag. 542.]

After this there were familiar conferences with Trebonius, and embracings also, but false tokens of great kindeesse in feigned love. [Cicero, Philippic. 11.] But yet by which Trebonius was deceived, so that he promised Dolabella all countreies, as affording provision for his soldiers, and lived together without any fear. [Dio, lib. 47. pag. 344.]

In Egypt, young Ptolemy being 15. years of age, is poisoned by his wife and sister Cleopatra, in the fourth year of his reign, and the eighth of his sister, (from the death of their father Auletes.) [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 4. Porphyre, in Grec. Euph. Scaliger, pag. 226.]

Marcus Antonius the Consul, being returned from Brundisium to Rome, when he had commanded the Senate to meet the day before the VIII. Kalends of December; and when they neglected to meet on that day, he deferred it till the III. Kalends, and then commanded them to meet in the Capitol. [Cicero, Philippic. 3.]

In the mean time Antonius his Macedonian Legions, mutined as they were going into Gallia Cisalpina; and concerning the Lieutenant that commanded them, many of them revolted to Caesar, [Dio, lib. 45. pag. 276.] all the Martian Legion, took away their colours, and coming to him, tarried at Asia. The fourth Legion also in imitation of that, L. Egnatilius the Questor being their Commander, revolted unto Caesar also. [Id. ibid, Cicero, Philippic. 3, 4, 5, 11, 13. with lib. 11. ad familiar. ep. 7. Livy, 117. Vellei.]

Vellei, Patercul, lib. 2. cap. 6. Appian, lib. 3. pag. 556.] Caesar having entertained them, gave them money, as to the former, and to drew many to his party: he got also all Antonius his Elephants, falling upon them by chance as they were driving along, [Dio. ut supra.]

Antonius as he was going into the Senate in the Capitol on the appointed day, to complain of Caesar's attempt, in the very entrance of the Court he received news of the revolt of the Legions; by which being terrified, he durst not speak a word in the Senate concerning Caesar, whereas he had intended to propound it to the Senate, and on that had been Consul brought a sentence written, by which he would judge Caesar an enemy, [Cicero, Philippic. 3, 5, & 13. & Appian, lib. 3. pag. 556.] And on the very same day at evening, there was calling of lots for the Provinces against the next year, among the friends of Antonius, so that every one might have that Province which was most convenient for him, [Cicero, Philippic. 3.]

He posted out of the City to Alba, to see if he could bring the soldiers of the Martian Legion who were quartered there, to obedience by words as he thought he might: but when they shot at him from the walls, to the rest of the Legions he sent 500 pence a man, and with what forces he had about him in warlike array, he marched with them to Tibur, and then to Ariminum, in the very entrance of Gallia Cisalpina, having with him three Macedonian Legions, (for the rest were now come) and one of old soldiers, with the auxiliaries that were wont to follow them, besides the Praetorians and young soldiers, [Appian, lib. 3. pag. 556.]

Antonius besigned Decimus Brutus, having thit him up in Munia, because he would not leave Gallia Cisalpina as being his own Province, [Id. ibid, pag. 556, 558.] Caesar Octavianus sent aid to him, although he was one of Caesar's murderers, yet now doing as the time required, [Dio, lib. 45. pag. 277.] Octavianus had besides those two valiant Legions of Macedonia that came to him, and one of raw soldiers, two other Legions of old soldiers, who though they were not compleat, yet were filled up with young soldiers; and when the army would have created him Propraetour, he refused the honour they offered him; yet he engaged the mercenaries to him by a donative, giving to every man of the two Macedonian Legions (that skirmished before him) 500 pence a piece more, and promised 500000 to the conquerors, if there should be any need of an engagement indeed, [Appian, lib. 3. pag. 557, 558.] Cicero speaks of them in his X. Philippic. The old soldiers that followed the authority of Caesar first repressed the attempt of Antonius, afterwards the Martian Legion abated his fury, and the fourth routed him.

They at Rome called a Senate on the XIII. Kalends of January, when neither of the Consuls were there, (for Antonius had sent Dolabella before into Macedonia, and he himself then fate down before Munia,) on which day Cicero by his third Philippick Oration perswaded, that those things that Octavianus had done against Antonius might be confirmed, and praises and rewards might be decreed to the Mutinians, the Martian Legion, the fourth, and to the old soldiers that had revolted unto him; and that not only Decimus Brutus, but all the rest (without taking any notice of that appointing of Provinces that Antonius made by lots) should keep their Provinces, and deliver them over unto none, without a decree of the Senate: and there being a decree made accordingly, he called the people together and declared unto them what was done in the Senate, [Cicero, ibid, & Porphy. 5, 6, int. cum lib. 11. ad familiar. epist. 6. & lib. 12. epist. 22. Dio, lib. 45. pag. 277.]

On the Kalends of January, on which Hirtius and Paullus began their Consulship, Cicero in his fifth Philippick Oration, spoken in the Senate, perswaded to make war upon Antonius, and that honours should be decreed to them that dejected the Common-wealth against him. The next day there is given to Caesar Octavianus by the Senate, an extraordinary command (as Cicero calls it in the XI. Philippick) with Consular ornaments and lictours, and the ensignes of a Praetour, and that he should together with the Consul aide Decimus Brutus against Antonius: and it was added, that he should deliver his opinion amongst the Questours and those that had been Consuls, and that he should have authority to demand the Consulship ten years before it was by the law allowed. The Senate also honoured him with his Statue all guilt on horseback; which being set in the Rostra, declared his age by an inscription: and by the same decree it was enacted that the money that he had given to the soldiers, he should again receive out of the publick Treasury, (because that although he did it as a private person, yet it was for the service of the common-wealth) and that the donative that he had promised to give to the two Macedonian Legions after the victory, should be given them in the name of the common-wealth: and that to those Legions, and to other soldiers that were hired by Caesar, as soon as the war was ended, they should be exempted from going to wars any more; and should have lands presently divided unto them, [Cicero, Philippic. 5. & lib. ad Brut. epist. 15. Livy, lib. 118. Vellei.]

Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 81. Sueton. in Octavio. cap. 10. Plutarch. in Antonio. Appian. lib. 3. pag. 359. 360. Dio. lib. 46. pag. 310.]

Although the dignity of Proprius was granted by the Senate to Cæsar Octavianus, which he would not accept of, being formerly offered him by the army, and that he would have the same power in managing the war as the Consuls had, yet there was private command given to the Consuls, that they should withdraw from him the two Macedonian legions, which were most fit to do service, for this was the sum of all their counsels, that Antonius being overcome, and Cæsar weakened, and all the Cæsarians being taken away, the Pompeians should be again restored to the Government of the commonwealth, which thing Panfa the Consul, as he was upon his death bed discovered to Octavian. [Appian. lib. 3. pag. 374. 375.]

But when Octavianus found what things had been decreed, he accepted the honours with great joy: and so much the more, because when he had taken upon him the habit and authority of Prætor, as he was sacrificing the first day of his office, the livers of twelve of the sacrifices appeared double, or doubled inwards from the lowest fillets, and it was answered that within the year his command should be doubled; but he took this ill, that Embassadors were sent to Antonius, and that the Consuls did not go on with the war neither seriously, nor presently under pretext of the winter season, whereupon he was compelled to lie idle all the winter at Forum Cornelii. [Dio. lib. 46. pag. 314. with Julius Obsequens, de prodigiis & Piny lib. 1. cap. 37.]

The first of all Cæsars murderers that suffered punishment, was Caius Trebonius who governed Asia by a consular power, being slain at Smyrna, by the treachery of Dolabella, a man most ungrateful towards the merits of Cæsar, and partner in the murder of him, by whom he was advanced to the height of the consular dignity. [Cic. Philippic. 11. 12. Strabo. lib. 14. pag. 646. Vellei Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 9. Appian. lib. 3. pag. 542. 543. & lib. 4. pag. 624. Dio. lib. 47. pag. 344. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 8.] For Dolabella entering Smyrna by night, took the Proconsul, who after he had upbraided him in words, delivered him to the banished man Samianus, who after he had questioned with him about the publick money tortured him by imprisonings, and scourgings, and by the strappado, and that for two daies together, afterward he commanded him to be beheaded, and his head to be carried on a spear, and the rest of his body to be dragged, and torn, and cast into the sea, this is the relation of Cicero in Philippic. XI. much to be preferred before that of Appianus who delivers that this murder was committed by the command of Dolabella, when he passed first into Asia, and was now Consul.

Dio writes that he cast the head of him that he had killed before the statue of Cæsar Appian relates that it was commanded to be laid in the Prætorian chair, in which he was wont to minister justice, but the soldiers (saith he) and the drudges being angry with him as a partner of the conspiracy, and because he deigned Antonius in talk before the doors of the court whilst Cæsar was killed, they in divers manners abused the other part of his body, as also making a football of his head in a place that was paved with stones, they so tore it that no sign of face appeared. Strabo affirms, that there were many parts of the city of Smyrna that were overthrown by Dolabella.

Asia being seized upon by Dolabella, P. Lentulus the extraordinary Questour, sent with all speed great store of money and great aides to Cassius, that he might seize upon Syria, he himself went into the next province of Macedonia to Brutus, doing his endeavour, that by whom he could soonest, the province of Asia and the tributes might be recovered, which he signifies in two epistles, one publicly to the Senate, and another privately to Cicero himself. [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 14. & 15.] when he tells him he could not see his son, because he was gone into the winter quarter, with the horse.

Dolabella carried himself most cruelly in the province of Asia. [Cicero. lib. ad Brutum epist. 3. 4.] of them that were set forth by the Germans, taking away the Roman tributes, and polling and vexing the Roman citizens. [P. L. in Julius in Cicero lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 15.] he burdened the cities with new exactions of tributes, and hired a number of Levantines, Pamphilians, Cilicians, by the means of L. Figulus. [Appian. lib. 4. pag. 624.]

The Rhodians, being afraid concerning the lands that they had in the continent, (as they said themselves) sent two Embassies to Dolabella, and truly after a new example, and against their laws, because the Magistrates forbid it, [Lentulus ad supra.] when notwithstanding Brutus writes was excluded by the Rhodians. [lib. ad Brutum in supra epist. 4.]

Autus Alienus the Lieutenant of Dolabella, went to him after the death of Trebonius. [Cicero. Philippic. 11.] whom he sent into Egypt unto the Queen Cleopatra, who favouring him for the acquaintance he had with the former Cæsar, sent four Legions to him by Alienus the remainder of the overthrowes of Pompey and Crassus, (or of the number of those that remained with Cleopatra, upon the departure of Cæsar) the

had a Navy also ready to aide him, which yet could not faile, by reason of contrary winds. [Appian. lib. 3. pag. 376. lib. 4. pag. 623. & 626. & lib. 6. pag. 685.]

When as the valiant and victorious army (as Cicero calls it in Philippic 11. in an Oration spoken that year) of Q. Cæcilius Bassus, a private, but valiant and famous man, had prevailed sometime in Syria, Q. Marcus (not, as in Appian, Minutius) Crispus the Proconsul, (as Cicero calls him in Philippic XI.) being called by Statius Mucrus to his aide, out of Bythia (which he commanded by the decree of Julius Cæsar, and approved by the Senate, although Cimber (as it seemeth, endeavoured to hold this province this year also, by Antonius his lottery) with three Troops of his own, and three of Mucrus his Troops, besieged the two Troops of Bassus (called by Strabo Myrsari, by Appian Myrsari, in which it is manifest out of Cassius his letters to Cicero, that they made but one Legion. [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 11. & 12.] But Bassus so stoutly sustained the siege of two Roman armies, that he was not subdued, until having obtained what conditions he pleased, he yielded himself. [Strabo. lib. 16. pag. 752. fin.] For when C. Cassius had come with his forces, being called thither by the content of Mucrus Marcus and the army, as Brutus relates in his letters to Cicero. [lib. ad Brut. epist. 5.] He would not deliver the army over to him: and unless the Soldiers had sent messengers to Cassius, without his consent, he had held Apamea out, till it had been taken by assault; as Cassius himself writes to Cicero. [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 12.]

Cassius raised the siege before Apamea, Bassus and Marcus being reconciled: and having drawn to his party those two Troops that were besieged, and six others that did besiege them, he takes upon himself the Ensignes of a General, and commands them by a proconsular power. [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 99. Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 9. & lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 18. Appian. & Dio. in supra.]

From this time he took upon himself the title of Proconsul, as appears by the inscriptions of his letters to Cicero, [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 11. & 12.] although Cicero in his letters to him gives him not that title. [ibid. epist. 7, 8, 9, 10.] as not yet given him by the Senate; however Appian thinks otherwise. [lib. 3. pag. 376. & lib. 4. pag. 643.]

When Cassius with all these forces had placed his Camp in one place, there fell suddenly a mighty rain, and forces also rushing into the Camp through every Port, confounded and disturbed all things, so that some did preface from these things, his sudden power, and a lile after his sudden overthrow should happen. [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 341.]

Cassius being strengthened with these forces, immediately reduced to his obedience all the Cities of Syria, by the fame of those things he did, being Questour, and by the glory of his name, without any more pains. [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 339. 341.] And going to the Cities, there he got both arms and soldiers, and exacted very grievous taxes. [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 18.] Livy writes that he invaded Syria with three armies which were in that Province. [lib. 121.] and Velleius Paternulus, that he brought under his power ten Legions in that Country. [lib. 2. cap. 69.]

Marcus Brutus having undertaken an expedition against C. Antonius, who kept Apollonia with seven Cohorts, sent publick letters to Rome, concerning the things that he had done in Greece and Macedonia, which being rehearsed in the Senate, by the Consul Panfa, and by the X. Philippick oration of Cicero there spoken, there was a Decree of the Senate made, that Brutus should hold Macedonia, Illyricum, and all Greece, as Proconsul. [Cicero. ibid. cum Appian. lib. 3. pag. 507. & lib. 4. pag. 622. & 632.]

The reliques of Trebonius being brought to Rome, and the scornes likewise with which they used him being known, the Senate declared Dolabella an enemy to the state. [Cicero. Philippic. 11. Livy lib. 119. Appian. lib. 2. pag. 566. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 8.] a day also he set for them who were with them, before which if they departed not from his party, that they also should be esteemed enemies. [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 344.]

The next day when it was disputed in the Senate, concerning the choice of a General, to follow the war against Dolabella, L. Cæsars opinion was, that this war should be committed to P. Servilius contrary to the ordinary course, others thought that the Consuls ought to lose for Asia, and Syria, in respect of prosecuting the war against Dolabella: Cicero in his XI. Philippick oration, having first fiercely inveighed against Dolabella (in times past his son in law, but with whom a lile after his departure out of Italy, there was great heart-burnings) persuaded that this war should be committed to Cæsar, whose opinion Scaliger doth not rightly propound, in his animadversions upon Eusebius (at the number MDCCCLXXII) as an example of the decree of the Senate concerning the command of Cassius, for that this opinion did not prevail in

in the Senate, Panfa the Consul eagerly withstanding it, Cicero himself is witness in his letters to Cassius, [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 7.] adding also these things in them concerning himself. I promised and also performed it, that you had not expected, nor should not expect our decrees, but that you your self should defend the Commonwealth, and although as yet we heard nothing, either where you were, or what forces you had: yet my opinion was, that all, both of aides and forces which were in those parts were at your command, and I was confident that the province of Asia should by you be recovered to the Commonwealth.

Whenas now it was not known at Rome, that Cassius had possessed himself of Syria, the war against Dolabella was altogether committed to the Consuls, if the pretence business against Antonius should come to an end, and a charge is also given to the governors of the neighbour nations, that they should take heed that the forces of Dolabella were not increased, [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 344.] and by the Consuls content the government of Asia is continued to P. Lentius Sphuricus, who now commanded them under the title of Proquaistor and Propriator, as may be seen in his letters to Cicero written after the death of Panfa and Hirtius (which yet he was ignorant of at that time.)

This decree against Dolabella being enacted, there were letters brought from Antonius to Hirtius the Consul, and Caesar the Propriator, which are related and related by Cicero in his XIII Philippick.

Antonius to Hirtius and Caesar.

THE death of C. Trebonius being known, I rejoiced not so much as I grieved, That such a wicked person received due vengeance, and thereby made recompence to the reliques of that illustrious Heroe, and that the just wrath of heaven was manifest so publicly before the eyes of men, (from whence we gather that Trebonius was slain not much before the Ides of March which followed immediately the murder of Caesar.) for that now the wrath of the gods upon the parricide is executed or impending, administrators master of joy. That Dolabella is judged an enemy for killing a common murderer, and that the son of a Parricide (Trebonius) should be more dear to the people of Rome, than C. Caesar, the very father of our country, is no less to be lamented. Well Aulus Hirtius, it is a hard case that you, who by the very benefits of Caesar attained your honour, and were left so well by him that you your self must needs wonder to whom you owe what forever accomplishment you are arrived unto, should all so as to procure Dolabella to be condemned, that that person should be freed from the stage, and that Brutus and Cassius should grow most powerful. And in the same manner do you commence these affairs as you did the former. You call the tents of Pompey the Senate, you accounted Cicero general even when he was conquered, you forsake Macedonia with armies, committed Africa to Varus, who was twice taken, sent Cassius into Syria, suffered Cassia to enjoy the Tribuneship, took the Julian revenues from the Lupercalian officers, abolished the colonies of the Veterans, deduced by law and the decree of the Senate, promised the Mithridates to restore to them, what you had taken from them by the law of arms. Ye have forgotten that by the Hircian Law no Pompeian that lived should bear any office of dignity, subverted Brutus with the money of Apuleia, ye praised Petrus and Menedemus who were punished with the axe, having had a city bestowed on them; and being made guests of Caesar, you neglected Theopompus who was destitute, and forced to fly from Trebonius into Alexandria, you see Serpius Galba environed in his camp by the same sword-bearer, you have contracted either mine or the Veteran soldiers, as it were to the destruction of them, who had killed Caesar, and before they were aware, had brought them into danger, of the Quaistor or Emperours, or their own fellow-soldiers. In fine what have you not proved or done? What could Pompey himself do if he were alive? or his son if he could be at home? I ask of all, you deny that a peace can be made unless I either send out Brutus, or furnish you with money. What? doth this please those Veterans who have all things entire? because you come with flattering and venomous gifts. But you aid the besieged soldiers. I stick not to let them go whether they please, so they will deliver him to execution, who deserves it. You say a peace was moved in the Senate, and write that five consular Legates were appointed. It is a hard matter for me to believe, that those who would have precipitated me, when I brought conditions of the highest equity, and yet thinking to remit something of them too, will at any thing either moderately or fairly: and it is scarce likely that they who condemned Dolabella for justice, as a crime, would spare us who are of the same opinion. Wherefore rather consider whether it be fitter and more profitable to both sides, to prosecute the death of Caesar, or Trebonius; and whether it be more equal, that we combine, that so it may be more easie for us to revive the Pompeian causes that have been too often quast, or to consent, least we become a Ludibrium to our enemies, to whom, whichsoever of us prevail, our contention will be a gain. A spectacle that fortune hath avoided to see two armies of one body (Cicero being the fence) contend, who is so fortunate in his expressions, that he will deceive you in the very same ornaments, in which he gloried he gild Caesar. For my part part I am resolved neither to bear my own, nor my Soldiers and friends disgrace; nor to forsake that part that Pompey hated, nor to suffer the veterans to be moved from their colonies, nor to be drawn one by one to execution, nor to betray the faith I have engaged to Dolabella, nor to violate my society with Lepidus, that most just man, nor betray Plancius, the partner in our counsels. If the immortal gods, as I hope they will, shall assist me with my right wits, I will live free. But if other fortune is allotted me, I foregoe you the joy of your own punishments. For if the Pompeians, now being conquered, are so insolent, you shall especially experience what they will be, when they shall become conquerors. To close, the sum of my opinion, tends to this: That I could be content to endure the injuries to me and mine, if they would but forget they were done, or were prepared together with us, to revenge Caesars death. I believe not that any Embassadors will come; whence the way comes, and when it comes, what it will require, I would Iain know.

When as the Embassadors that were sent from the Senate to Antonius for the settling of a peace, could do no great good in it, the whole people of Rome (even those that did not go to the war) put on theirouldiers cassocks: and making a general muster thorough all Italy, the armies of A. Hirtius and Caius Caesar the Propriator, were sent against him, [Cicero, Philip. 6. 10, 13. Livy, lib. 118. Appian, lib. 3. pag. 569. Dio. lib. 46. pag. 311, 312.] from the undertaking of which Expedition against M. Antonius, Eulebius and Cassiodorus seem to derive the Principality of Caesar Octavianus, assigning unto it, 46 years and 6 months.

Caius Antonius was overcome in a battle that was fought by the River Byllis with Cicero's son a Captain of Brutus; and a little after, hisouldiers yielded up both him, and themselves to Brutus, and Brutus a long time very honourably entertained Antonius, even so far, that he did not take from him the ensignes of his Magistracy, [Plutarch in M. Bruto.]

M. Brutus received three Legions of Illyricum, from Varius, whom by a decree of the Senate he succeeded in the Province of Illyricum; besides one that he took from Antonius in Macedonia, and four other, which he himself had gathered up: so that in all, he had eight Legions, and in them many of C. Caesars oldouldiers. Moreover, he had store of horsemen, and light-harnelled men, and archers, and, prailing the Macedonians, he exercised them after the Italian manner, [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 632, 633.]

As Brutus was thus gatheringouldiers and money, a certain chance out of Thracia offered it self unto him; Polemonarcha the wife of a certain King, her husband being slain by his enemies, the being afraid lest some hurt should come to her son, came to Brutus, and commended her son to him, and delivered her husbands treasure to him: he committed the lad to the Cyziceians to be brought up, until he had leisure to restore him to his fathers kingdom: in this treasure she found great store of gold and silver, which he coined, [ibid. pag. 633.]

C. Cassius, having leized upon Syria, goeth towards Judea, because he heard that theouldiers that were left in Egypt by Caesar, came thither: both those and the Jews also without any great trouble he made of his party, [Dio, lib. 47. pag. 343.] for he circumvented in Palestina Allienus the Lieutenant of Dolabella, as he returned from Egypt with four Legions, before he was aware of him, and forced him to take his bid; Allienus not daring to oppose his four Legions against the others eight: and so he was possessed of 13 Legions in all, more than he looked for, besides some Parthian horsemen, that were archers; for he was in great account with that Nation, ever since the time that he was Quaistor to Crassus, and esteemed by them to be wiler than the General himself, [Appian, lib. 3. pag. 576. & lib. 4. pag. 623, 624.]

As soon as he had received these forces that A. Allienus had brought out of Egypt, he wrote these letters to Cicero concerning these forces, [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 12, 12.] dated on the Nones of March, from the Camp at Tarichea in Galilee.

C. Cassius Proconsul, sendeth hearty commendations to M. Tullius Cicero.

IF thou art in good health, it is well, I indeed am in health: Know that I am come into Syria to the Generals, L. Marcus, and Q. Crispus; both valiant men, and good citizens, who as soon as they heard what things were done at Rome, delivered the armies due to me: they together with me govern the Commonwealth with a constant resolution. Know also, that the Legion that Q. Caelius Bassus had, came unto me. Know also, that the four Legions that A. Allienus

A. Alienus brought from Egypt, were delivered over to me by him. I do not think that you want any encouragement, to defend both as being absent, and the Commonwealth, as much as lies in your power: I would have you know, that there is not wanting to you and the Senate strong aids, that thou mayest defend the Commonwealth with great hopes and a constant mind. Other things L. Cæsar, my familiar Friend shall treat with you of. Farewell, Dicitur, the Nones of March, from the Camp at Tarsisæa.

After these things, Cassius dismissed Bassa, and Crispus, and the rest that would not serve under him, doing them no injury at all: but to Statius Murex, he left that dignity incite, that he came to him with, and also committed the charge of his Navy to him. Thus Dio, [lib. 47. pag. 343.] although it appeareth out of Cassius his own letters to Cicero, that Crispus firmly adhered to him: [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 11. & 12.]

Cassius exacted from Judea 700 talents of silver, (not of gold, as it is read in the 45 Chapter of the Jewish Histories, set forth in Arabic, by the Parisiens, in the Bible of many languages.) But Antipater seeing the Common-wealth in trouble, and fearing Cassius his threats, appointed two of his sons to gather part of the money, and Malichus a Jew, that was an enemy of his, to gather another part, and some others another part. But Herod bringing first of all an 100 talents from Galilee, which belonged to his government, was much in Cassius his favour; for it was accounted well counsel, to seek to get, even then, the favour of the Romans, at the charge of other men: but under the other Governors, the Cities were set to sale, with the inhabitants; of which, four of the chief were, Gopha, Emmaus, Lydda, and Thamma, for the common people of these Cities he put to port sale: he was also so much enraged, that he was about to put Malichus to death, but that Hyrcanus, sending an 100, talents by Antipater, appeased his fury. [Joseph. lib. 1. bell. cap. 9. & Antiquit. lib. 14. cap. 18.]

Cæsar Octavianus finished the war against Antonius, that was committed unto him, in three months. [Sueton. in Octavio, cap. 10.] Which war was so well managed by him about Mutina, when as he was but twenty years old; that Decimus Brutus was freed from besieging, and Antonius was forced to forsake Italy by a dishonourable flight, and without his baggage. [Vellei. Paterni, lib. 2. cap. 61.] concerning which battle Cicero is to be consulted in his XIV. Philippicks, and Ser. Galba, who was in the battle, in his letters to him. [lib. 10. ad familiar. epist. 30.] in the beginning of which, he shews that it was fought on the XVII. Kalends of May, so that from the third day after the victory of Mutina, they seem to begin the principality of Cæsar Octavianus, who have attributed to it 56 years, four months, and one day, as may be seen in Theophilus Antiochenus, in his book to Auxolycus, and Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. 10. Stromatum, if the errors of the Printer of him be corrected, which there puts the number of the years, 46 for 55.

A. Hirtius the Consul (the writer of the Alexandrian and African war, that was managed by Julius Cæsar) died in the battle: the other Consul Panfa also, a little after, died of his wounds. [Cicero, lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 25. Dio. Brutus, ibid. lib. 11. epist. 9. Liv. lib. 119. Vellei. Paterni, lib. 2. cap. 61. &c.] From whence in this verse, both Tibullus assigns the birth-day. [lib. 3. Elegie. 5.] and Ovid. [Tristium. lib. 4. Elegie, 10.]

When both the Consuls fell with equal Fate.

Both the armies of the slain Consuls obeyed Cæsar. [Ensepi. lib. 7. Orf. lib. 6. cap. 18.]

The Senate shewed it self little grateful to Cæsar, who alone survived of the three Generals: who in a Triumph that was decreed to Decimus Brutus, being freed from the siege at Mutina by Cæsar, made no very honourable mention of Cæsar and his army. [Liv. lib. 119. Vellei. Paterni, lib. 2. cap. 62.] Embassadors also being sent to the army, were commanded to speak to the soldiers, when he was out of the way; but the army was not so ungrateful as the Senate was: for when as Cæsar dissembling, bare this injury, the soldiers professed they would not hear any commands, except their General were present, yea, without doubt they had taken the Legions from him, which he had, but that they were afraid openly to decree this, because they were not ignorant of the love of the Soldiers towards Cæsar. [Patercul. ibid. Dion. lib. 46. pag. 317, 318.]

The Tarsenses of their own accord called Dolabella into Cilicia, as also them of Laodicea did into Syria. [Cassius Parmensis, ad Cicero, lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 13.]

Dolabella

Dolabella being about to leave Asia, sent five Cohorts into Chetiondus to be seized upon by Brutus, without any great hazard (who had five Legions, very good Horse, and great Auxiliaries) [Cicero, lib. ad Brutum, epist. 2. dat. 12. or 14. Kalends of May.] And he himself went out of Asia by land with two Legions; and Lucius Figulus followed him with the navy. [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 624.]

On the V. Kalends of May, when as there were divers opinions in the Senate, concerning making war upon them, that were adjudged enemies of the State, Servilius, a Tribune of the people, was of opinion that Cassius should make war upon Dolabella, to which Cæsar assented: and decreed moreover that M. Brutus also should pursue Dolabella, if he thought it profitable; and for the good of the Common-wealth; and that he should do what he thought was best for the Common-wealth. But concerning Cassius there was nothing decreed, neither as yet were there any letters come to Rome from him. [Cicero, lib. ad Brutum, epist. 5.] The reasons of the delay, of which Cassius himself shews in his letters to Cicero. [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 12.]

Dolabella coming into Cilicia, had Tarsus freely yielded unto him, and overcame also some forces of Cassius his; that were in Egge. [Dion. lib. 47. pag. 344.]

Cassius was then in Palestine, [Id. ibid.] from whence he wrote his second letter to Cicero, dated the Nones of May from the Camp. [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 12.] In which writing concerning the state of his own affairs, he saith, All the armies that were in Syria I now possess, I made some stop, whilst I spoke the Soldiers these things: I promised them, but now I have nothing to hinder me, And then exhorting Cicero that he would defend the dignity, both of his Soldiers, and also of the Generals, Murex and Crispus, he adds, I have heard by letters that were written, that Dolabella was come into Cilicia with all his forces; I will go into Cilicia, whatsoever I shall do, I will do my endeavour to give you speedy notice of it; I willingly wish, that we may deserve well of the Common-wealth; and so we shall be happy.

As soon as Cassius left Judea, Malichus practiced Antipaters death, supposing by his death, they should more firmly provide for the security of Hyrcanus his government: whose counsels Antipater having an inkling of, went beyond Jordan and gathered an army, both of the inhabitants there, and of the Arabians: but Malichus being a politic man, denied that he intended any treason, swearing before Antipater and his sons, that never any such thing came into his mind, especially seeing that Phasaelus had a Garrison in Jerusalem, and Herod had the army at his command: and so was reconciled to Antipater, Marcus being President of Syria, who afterward understanding that Malichus went about to make some innovations in Italy, there wanted but little, that he had put him to death, but spared him at the intreaty of Antipater, [Joseph. lib. Antiquit. 14. cap. 18.]

Cassius and Murex, having gathered an army, made Herod Governor of all Cœlœ Syria; and delivered to him great forces both of Foot and Horse and Ships at sea: and promised him also the kingdom of Judea, after the war was ended that they had had against Antonius and young Cæsar, [Id. ibid. cap. 19.]

Cassius made many Tyrants in Syria. Marion also the Tyrant of the Tyrians being left by Cassius, exercised tyranny in Syria: and disposing Garrisons there, seized upon three Castles in Galilee that confined upon it, [Joseph. lib. belli, 1. cap. 10. & lib. Antiquit. 14. cap. 20.]

A certain Cythæran wrote to Satrius the Lieutenant of C. Trebonius, that Dolabella was killed by Tullius and Dejotarus; and that his army was routed: whose Greek Epistle concerning which business, Brutus sent to Cicero, the XVII. Kalends of June, [lib. ad Brutum, epist. 6.] but it was a false report.

For Dolabella, passing out of Asia into Syria, from thence went into Syria: where being refused to enter into Antiochia by the Garrison that defended the City, [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 344.] he many times tempted to enter it by force; but was always repulled with loss. Wherefore having lost about an 100 men, and leaving behind him many sick, he fled by night from Antiochia towards Laodicea. That night almost all the soldiers that he had enrolled in Asia left him, of whom, some returned to Antiochia, and yielded themselves to them, that Cassius had left there to command the City: some came down the Hill Amanus into Cilicia, of which number 30 came into Pamphilia, who said it was reported, that Cassius with all his Forces was but four days journey, just at the time when Dolabella was coming thither, [P. Lentulus, ad Cicero, lib. ad familiar. epist. 15.]

Dolabella having intelligence concerning Cassius his forces, came to Laodicea a City that was his friends, seated in a Peninsula, and where it looked toward the Continent, well fortified, and towards the Sea, having an Haven very convenient for bringing in provision abundantly, and also very opportune for sailing whensoever or wheresoever they they would go out. [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 64.] This City he took without any assault, the citizens truly yielding themselves to him, for the love they bare to the former Cæsar. [Dio, lib. 47. pag. 344.]

At Jerusalem, when Antipater feasted at Hyrcanus his house, Malichus corrupting the Kings Butler, poisoned Antipater, and gathering a band of souldiers, seized upon the Government of the City: but Phalaclus and Herod being grievously incensed, Malichus flily denied all things. But Herod had a great mind secretly to revenge his fathers death, and to raise an army for that purpose; but Phalaclus thought it better to circumvent him with policy, lest he should seem to be the beginner of a civil war: he therefore accepting of his justifications, made as though he did believe, that he was not conscious of his fathers death, and let himself to furnish the Monument that he had built for his father, [Joseph, lib. 14. cap. 19.]

Mean while, Herod coming to Samaria, and finding it in a desperate estate, restored the same, and pacified the dissensions that were among the inhabitants; and not long after the feast of Penecost approaching, he also came into the City of Jerusalem with souldiers: of whom Malichus being afraid, periwaded Hyrcanus not to suffer him to enter: which thing Hyrcanus did, laying, that amongst the holy people, it was not lawful to bring in a mixt multitude of profane men. But Herod making small account of this denial, entered the City by night, and mightily terrified Malichus. Whereupon, according to his wonted dissimulations, he openly bewailed with tears the death of Antipater as his great friend: wherefore it was thought meet by Herods friends to take no notice of this dissembling, but curiously again to entertain Malichus: but Herod by letters certified Cassius of his fathers death; and he that very well knew what conversation Malichus was of, wrote back unto Herod, that he might revenge his fathers death, and secretly also gave order to the Tribunes that were at Tyre, that they should be aiding to Herod in his so just undertakings, [Id. ibid. cap. 19. §. 20.]

In Gallia, the IIII Kalends of June, M. Lepidus joyned himself with M. Antonius. [Plinius ad Ciceron, lib. 10. ad familiar. epist. 23.]

D. Lentulus, the Proquestor of Asia, and Propretour extraordinary, when he saw that Brutus foreflowed his coming into Asia, and that Dolabella was departed out of Asia, he thought it best for him to return as soon as he could out of Macedonia to his office, that he might exact the tribute that was behind, and gather up the money that he had left there, and send it to Rome: but in the mean while, as he was sailing about the Islands, it was told him, that the Navy of Dolabella was in Cilicia, (at Lycia) and that the Rhodians had many ships furnished, and already lanced: wherefore he, with those ships that he had, or which Patiscus, the ordinary Pretour of Asia had provided, returned to Rhodes, trusting to the Decree of the Senate, by which Dolabella was adjudged an enemy, and to the League that was renewed with the Rhodians; but so far off was it, that the Proquestors would strengthen his Navy with their convoy, that by the Rhodians, the souldiers were forbidden to come into the City, or Port, or Rode, yea, they were kept from provision of victuals, yea, water it self, and very hardly themselves were admitted into the City, with each his cock-boat. But Lentulus being brought into their City, and the Senate, could obtain nothing of them: of which both in his publick letters to the Senate, as in his private to Cicero, he greatly complained, [lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 14. §. 15.]

Whilst that Lentulus and Patiscus were detained at Rhodes, Sex. Marius, and C. Titius, the Licutenants of Dolabella, knowing of their coming, presently departed from the Navy from Cilicia, (at Lycia) and fled way in a Gally; leaving their ships of burden, for the gathering together of which, they had spent much time. There were of these above an hundred, and the least of them were of 2000 Tuns in burden, which Dolabella had provided for this purpose, that if his hopes of Syria and Egypt were frustrated, that he might go aboard them with all his Souldiers, and all his money, and go directly into Italy, and joyn himself with the two Antonies that were brethren: therefore Lentulus and Patiscus coming thither from Rhodes, with the ships that they had, took all those ships of burden, and restored them to the right owners. From thence they pursued the Navy that fled as far as Sida, the utmost country of the Province of Asia, whither they knew that some of Dolabella's fleet were fled, and that the rest were sailed into Syria and Cyprus, (at Egypt) which being scattered, when Lentulus heard that Cassius had a very great fleet that was ready prepared in Syria, he returned to his office, [P. Lentul. ut supra.]

But Patiscus and Cassius Parmenis from the sea coast of the Province of Asia, and from all the Islands they could, got together a fleet: they presently got Marinniers together, though the cities were very disobedient: They pursued the fleet of Dolabella, which Lucius commanded: who putting them in hope that he would yield, yet never slackning his sailing, at last he came to Corycus in Pamphilia, and there burning the the Haven kept himself within: wherefore they leaving Corycus, thought it better to come into Cassius his Camp, and because another Fleet that Tullius Cimber had provided the year before in Bithynia, of which Tullius the Quæstor was Admiral, followed them, and so they came to Cyprus, [Cassii Parmenisi, ad Ciceron, lib. 12. ad familiar. epist. 23.]

Concerning the affairs of Dolabella, and of his coming to the City of Laodicea, there are extant two Epistles written to Cicero, [in lib. 12. ad familiar.] viz, the fourteenth from P. Lentulus, from Pamphilia, the fourth Nones of June (not Kalends) as manifestly appears, out of the following Epistle to the Senate, to which that refers us, which was dated at Perga, and the thirteenth that was afterwards sent from Cassius on the Ides of June from Cyprus. In the first he thus related the straits that Dolabella was in, being received into Laodicea, I hope I shall quickly bring him to punishment, for neither hath he any place to flee to, nor can he resist so great an army as Cassius hath. The other Epistle of Cassius (if I be not mistaken) Parmenis, who was also one of the murderers of Julius Cæsar, and wrote that taunting letter to Octavianus, mentioned by Suetonius in Octavio, cap. 4. not of Cassius Longinus, who then bare the title of Proconsul of Syria; of whom also he makes mention in the end of this Epistle: where also we have more exactly represented by him, the condition of Dolabellas Camp in these words. The Tarsenses, very bad allies, and the citizens of Laodicea, much more mad, of their own accord sent for Dolabella: from both which cities, by a number of Greek souldiers, he hath gotten a kind of an army; he hath placed his Camp before the city of Laodicea, and hath broken down part of the wall; and so joyned his Camp to the Town. Our Cassius with ten Legions, and twenty companies of Auxiliaries, and 4000 Horse, hath his Camp at Paltum within twenty miles, and he thinks he may overcome him without once striking stroke; for wheat is now at three tetradrachmes in Dolabella his Camp, and unless he hath gotten some supply by the shipping of Laodicea, he must of necessity shortly perish by famine; but that he cannot supply himself, a great Navy that Cassius hath, which Quintilius Rufus commands, sheweth that I, Tullius, and Patiscus, have brought, will easily perform.

When as Dolabella had been at Laodicea some time in good peace, especially his Navy, following him so suddenly out of Asia, he went to the Aradians to receive from them both money and shipping: in which place being surprised with a few, he brought his condition into great danger; for as he fled, he met with the army of Cassius, and being overcome in fight by him, he retired to Laodicea, [Dion, lib. 47. pag. 344.]

Cassius, fearing that Dolabella might escape from thence, raised a Rampire two furlongs in length cross the Isthmus, with stones and materials brought from the Villages that were without the City, and from Sepulchres; and by his messengers desired ships from Phœnicia, Lycia, and Rhodes: but being sighted of all of them, except the Sidonians, he engaged in a Sea-fight with Dolabella, in which, after the losse of many ships on both sides, five together with all the Mariners were taken by Dolabella, [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 624.]

Then Cassius again sent messengers to those that had slighted his first commands, and to Cleopatra the Queen of Egypt, and to Serapion that commanded her Forces in Cyprus. The Tyrians and Aradians, and Serapion, without the Queens advice, sent as many ships as they had: but the Queen excusing her self that the Egyptians were troubled both with famine and pestilence, sent no aid at all, [Id. ibid. lib. 5. pag. 675.] The Rhodians also and the Lycians, denied they would help any thing toward the civil wars; for even those ships that they had given to Dolabella, were but to this purpose, to convoy him; but they knew not whether heuled them in war or no, [Id. lib. 4. pag. 629.]

The Tarsientes endeavoured to keep Tullius Cimber (who was also one of Cæsars murderers) from passing the mountain Taurus, as he was hastening to Cassius aid: but by and by being surprised with fear, they leaving the passages, thinking Cimber had great Forces with him, made an agreement with him: but when afterwards they understood the smallness of his Forces, they neither received him into their City, nor supplied him with provision; therefore Cimber thinking it better, to carry his aid to Cassius than to assault Tarsus, having built a Fort against them, he went into Syria. But the Tarsientes went thither with souldiers, and having seized upon the Castle, they turned their armes against the City Adana, (which being near to them, they always had a controverfie with) because they said they favoured Cassius his party: of which Cassius being certified, sent L. Rufus against the Tarsientes, [Dio, lib. 47. pag. 345.]

Cassius, having repaired his Fleet as well as he could, after Statius Murcus with the Navy that he had gotten together was come, twice again fought with Dolabella at Sea; the first upon equal losse on both sides, but in the second fight he had much the better: by land also, having perfected his Rampire, he brought the Rame to the walls, walls. Dolabella being thus shut up from bringing of any necessities either by sea or land, for very want of provision made a folly, but was presently beaten back into the Town. [Id. ibid. Appian. lib. 4. pag. 625.]

Caſſius, whenas he could not contend with money the watch by night, whom Marſus commanded, corrupted them that kept guard by day whom Quintus commanded, ſo that whiſt Marſus ſlept by day, he ſtole in by ſome leſſer ports, theſey being taken, Dolabella offered hiſthroat to cut to one of hiſ guards: commanding him that when he had cut off hiſ head, he ſhould provide for hiſ own ſafety: he did as he was commanded; but withall cut hiſ own throat. [Appian. ibid. cum lib. 5. pag. 673.] We read in the fiſt ſtory of M. Seneca, that Deſſia (or Q. Deſſia the Hiſtorian) was about to go from Dolabella to Caſſius, to agree for hiſ own ſafety, if he ſhould kill Dolabella.

And thus Dolabella was forced to die by Caſſius at Laodicea; [Livy lib. 12. Strabo. lib. 16. pag. 752. Vallei. Patencul. lib. 2. cap. 69. Dio. lib. 47. pag. 345. Oroſ. lib. 5. cap. 18.] with whom Marſus alſo laid violent hands upon himſelf. [Appian. lib. 4. pag. 625.] and alſo M. Octavius the Lieutenant of Dolabella, Caſſius afforded them buriall, although they caſt out Trebonius unburied, and thoſe alſo that had followed the camp, although they were declared enemies at Rome, he both gave them quarter and impunity, neither puniſhed he them of Laodicea any more, than by impoſing a ſum of money upon them; [Dio. ut ſupra.] although Appian ſaith that he plundered both the temples and treaſury, and exacted very grievous tribute of the reſt, and that he put to death every noble man, ſo that he brought the city to moſt extreame miſery. [pag. 625. 626.]

Caſſius commanded the army of Dolabella, to take the military oath to him. [App. ibid. pag. 625.] and then went to Tartus, and ſeeing the Tartarles had already yielded to Rulus, he amerced them in all the private, and publick money, and laid no other puniſhment upon them. [Dio. ut ſupra. pag. 345.] but he laid a moſt heavy tax upon them of 500 talents, whereupon for want of money, they, when the ſouldiers violently exacted it, were fain to ſell all their publick and ſacred ornaments, breaking down the pageants and the dedicated things, and when theſe were not enough to pay theſum, the magiſtrates fold thoſe that were free born, ſit virgins and boyes, afterwards women and old men were fold for very little, and after that young men of whom many killed themſelves. [Appian. lib. 4. pag. 625.]

Whenas the taking of Laodicea, the governours came from every place together, bringing Crowns and preſents to Caſſius: Herod expected that Malichus ſhould be here puniſhed for the murder committed on hiſ father Antipater, but he conceiving a ſuſpicion of this thought to make the Phariſians about Tyre to undertake ſome greater matters; and becauſe hiſ ſonne was kept in that city as an hoſtage, he thought to ſteale him away privately into Judea: and whilſt Caſſius was buſied in the war againſt Antonius, to ſtir the Nation of the Jews to revolt from the Romans, and to depoſe Hyrcanus, and get the Kingdom for himſelf: but Herod being poliſtick, having underſtood of the treachery, invites both him and Hyrcanus with their companion to ſupper; at which time he ſent one of hiſ ſervants under colour to provide for the banquet; but indeed he lent him to the Tribunes, that they might let upon Malichus with their weapons, they mindfull of the commands of Caſſius, went forth, and finding him near the city on the ſtoar, ran him through and killed him, at which Hyrcanus being aſtoniſhed, fell in a ſwoone, and being ſcarcely come to himſelf, he asked who killed Malichus, and when one of the Tribunes answered, that it was done by Caſſius hiſ command, he ſaid, truly Caſſius hath preſerved me and my country, in killing him that was a traitour to both, but whether herein, he ſpoke as he thought, or through fear approved the fact, it is uncertain. [Joſeph. lib. bell. cap. 9. & lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 20.]

The day before the Kalends of July, M. Lepidus is judged an enemy of the ſtate, (for entertaining of Antonius) and alſo the reſt that had revolted from the commonwealth; but yet there was power given to come in before the Kalends of September, thus Cicero wrote to C. Caſſius the kiſman of Lepidus, [lib. 12. ad familiar. epiſt. 10.] adding this moreover, We had gallantly overcome, had not Lepidus, entertained Antonius after he was pillaged, diſarmed and flying, wherefore Antonius was never ſo much hated by the city as Lepidus, he raiſed war from a commonwealth that was in troubles, but Lepidus when it was in peace and quiet.

In the ſame epiſtle Cicero ſheweth that he received letters from Caſſius, dated from the camp the Nones of March, in which he ſignified, that he held Syria, and that he prepared for hiſ expedition into Cilicia againſt Dolabella, but of the ſucceſſe of the expedition, and of the miſchance of Dolabella, as yet there was no newes at Rome: he had written to Caſar of hiſ returning into favour, as in like manner Brutus had done to the Senate concerning the ſtate of affairs. [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 343.] for Brutus himſelf alſo, in hiſ letters ſent to Caſar, perſwaded him to reſiſt Antonius, and to agree with with him; [Id. ibid. pag. 340.] but in hiſ letters to Cicero, he declared another manner of courage, for when Cicero had wrote to Caſar, that there was one thing deſired and expected from him, that he would let theſe citizens live in quiet, whom good men and the people of Rome thought well of. Brutus in a rage wrote thus back again to Cicero; What as if he will not, ſhall we not be? it is better not to live, than to live by hiſ means. I, by my ſword, do not think all the gods, to be ſo averſe from the ſafety of the people of Rome, that Octavius muſt be intrusted for the ſafety of one private Citizen, I will not ſay for the deliverers of the whole World. [Lib. ad Brutum. epiſt. 16.]

The Senate being being certified of the affairs of Caſſius, confirmed unto him the government of Syria, (which he then held) and committed to hiſ care the war againſt Dolabella, (which they knew to have been already ended) [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 343. 344.] And for all governments beyond ſea are committed to the diſpoſal of Brutus and Caſſius: and there was a command likewiſe, that all the Provinces and armies from the Ionian ſea, to the eaſt, who obeyed the Romans, ſhould be obedient to theſe two: and moreover, appointing all things that they had done, and praiſing theſe armies that had yielded unto them, [Vallei. Patencul. lib. cap. 62. cum Appian. lib. 3. pag. 567. 568.]

Octavius ſeeing the acts of the Senate manifeſtly to tend to the advantage of the Pompeian party, and to the detriment of the Caſſarian; and thinking it a diſgrace to him, that Decimus Brutus, and not he, was choſen General, for the war againſt Antonius: hiding hiſ diſcontent, he demanded a Triumphe for the victory at Munda: and being ſlighted by the Senate, although he demanded greater matters than were fit for hiſ age; and ſeeking leaſt that if Antonius ſhould be utterly vanquiſhed, he ſhould be the more ſlighted, he began to have ſome thoughts of agreeing with him, according to the advice of Paſia, upon hiſ death-bed. [Appian. lib. 3. pag. 568.] Which agreement with him was made by M. Lepidus. [Livy lib. 119. Oroſ. lib. 6. cap. 18.]

Between theſe three therefore there was a ſociety of power begun, by the commerce of letters that paſſed between them, and mention of conditions made in them: and when Antonius warned Caſar, how great enemies the Pompeian party were to him, and to what an height they were come, and how Brutus and Caſſius were extolled by the means of Cicero. He declared unto him, that he would join hiſ forces with Brutus and Caſſius, who were Commanders of 17 Legions; if he reſuſed hiſ alliance, He ſaid moreover, that Caſar ought more to revenge the death of hiſ father, than he the death of hiſ friend: and by the advice and intreaty of the armies, there was an aſſiny made between Antonius and Caſar, the daughter in law of Antonius, being betroathed to Caſar, [Vallei. Patencul. lib. 2. cap. 65.] to wit, Claudia, the daughter of Fulvia, by a former husband, P. Clodius, who was ſcarce marriagable, [Sueton. in Octavian. cap. 62.]

When the agreement was made with M. Antonius, M. Lepidus, Octavianus ſent 400 ſouldiers to Rome, to demand the Conſulſhip for him: he ſaid the name of the army: and when the Senate made ſome doubt, Cornelius a Cæurnion, the chief man of that meſſage, caſting hiſ ſouldiers cut behind him, and ſhewing hiſ ſwords hilt, ſtook not to lay openly in the Court, This ſhall do it, if you will not do it: and being compelled by hiſ ſouldiers, went towards Rome with them. [Sueton. in Octavian. cap. 26. Appian. lib. 3. pag. 582. Dio. lib. 46. pag. 319.]

Whilſt he was in hiſ journey, the Prætors placed guards in divers places of the city, and ſeized upon Janiculum, with a guard of ſouldiers they had already in the city, and with two Legions that had come from Africa. But when he was entred the city, the Prætors came down from Janiculum, and yielded both themſelves and their ſouldiers unto him. The Legions of their own accord delivering their Enſignes unto him. [Appian. ut ſupra. 584. 585. Dio. pag. 320.] And in the month of Auguſt, the Legions that were brought from Janiculum, followed the conduct and protection of Octavianus; as it is in the Decree of the Senate in Macrobius. [lib. 1. Saturnal. cap. 12.]

In the fiſt day of the chuſing of Conſuls, as Octavian was taking augury in Mars hiſ field, there appeared fix Vultures to him, and three being created Conſul, and ſpeaking to the ſouldiers out of the Roltre, there appeared again fix, or as ſome ſay, twelve Vultures, as there did to Romulus in hiſ Auguries, when he was about to build Rome, from whence he conceived hope, that the Monarchy ſhould come to him. [Julius Obſequens de Prodigii. Sueton. in Octavian. cap. 95. Appian. 3. pag. 586. Dio. lib. 46. pag. 320.] He being choſen conſul, with him, they ſled alſo to Quintus Pedius hiſ colleague; who gave him hiſ portion out of the inheritance of Julius Caſar. [Vallei. Patencul. lib. 2. cap. 95. Appian. lib. 3. pag. 586. Dio. lib. 46. pag. 320.]

Livius ſaith he was created Conſul, when he was but XIX. years old, [lib. 119.] but Suetonius more ſecretly wrote that he invaded the Conſulſhip in the XX. year of hiſ his age [in Olivio, cap. 16.] and Eutropius in his 7 book, which also Plutarch confirms out of Octavianus his own commentaries, thus writing in Brutus, his army being planted about the city, he received the Consulship, being scarce come to man's estate being but twenty years old, as he relates in his own commentaries; that he was made Consul, the day before he was twenty years old, on the X Kalends of October, Velleius Paternulus wrote, [lib. 2, cap. 65.] but yet Velleius was mistaken in the assigning the day of his entering upon the Consulship, for there wanted an whole month and five daies for the full completing of the twentieth year of Octavianus, for neither in the month of September in which he was borne, but in August he first obtained the Consulship, from whence the month Sextilis was called August, as it is manifest out of Suetonius, [in Olivio, cap. 31. Dion. lib. 5, pag. 552.] and from the decree of the Senate produced out of Macrobius, [lib. 1. Saturnal, cap. 12.]

And indeed Dio noted that on the 19 day of the month of August, he was both made Consul the first time, and that he died the same day, [lib. 58, pag. 590.] from whence the observation of the overcurious in Tacitus, [lib. 1. Annal, cap. 90.] wrote: that the same day was the beginning of his acceptance of the Empire, and the last of his life, his empire being not ill derived from this first Consulship, which he exerted from the Senate against their will, as it is in Tacitus, [lib. 1. Annal, cap. 10.] and laid it down at his own pleasure; although in dissimulation he gave thanks to the Senate; and resigned that he accounted it a benefit, that those things that he exerted by force, as if they were offered to him of their own accord; and the Senators bragged, that they had conferred these things upon him of their own accord; and this moreover they gave to him, whom they vouchsafed not the Consulship, that after his Consulship should be ended, as often as ever he went to the army, he should always have precedence of the Consuls, and they commanded the other armies to obey him, whom they threatened to punish, because he had gathered forces by his own private authority, and they added also the Legions of Brutus, for disgrace of whom, and for the repressing of whom, the war against Antonius was committed to him; in short the custody of the city was given to his charge, and it was granted withal, that he should have power, even without any prescript form of law, to do whatsoever he would, [Dio, lib. 46, pag. 321.] this power, that he retained during his life, he bare 56 whole yeares, so that, not without cause Brutus thus gave Cicero this admonition, [in lib. ad Brutum, epist. 4.] I am afraid, lest your Caesar will think himself gotten so high by your decrees, that he will scarce come down again, if he be once made Consul.

Octavianus not being content with the former adoption made by the testament of Julius Caesar, got it to be confirmed by a decree of the people, (which Antonius had hindered the year before) in a full assembly of their wards, and then he took upon him by publick authority the name of C. Julius Caesar Octavianus [Appian, lib. 3, pag. 586, Dio, lib. 46, pag. 321. 322.]

And presently after by another law newly preferred he absolved Dolabella, (of whose death as yet there was no news brought to Rome,) who was by the Senate adjudged an enemy of the state; and appointed procelle for the death of Caesar, [Appian, ibid.] and that it might be thought, that he did nothing by force, but by law, Quintus Pædus his Colleague in the Consulship made the law Pædia; which decreed that all they, that had any hand in the murder of Caesar, should be banished, and their goods confiscated, [Livy lib. 120. Vellei. Paternul, lib. 2, cap. 69. Sueton, in Nero, cap. 3. Dio, lib. 46, pag. 322.] he appointed L. Cornificius to accuse M. Brutus, and M. Agrippa, to accuse C. Cassius: who being abset were condemned without any hearing of their cause [Plutarch, in M. Bruto.] Capito the Eunuch of Velleius Paternulus, one of the Senators order, subscribed to M. Agrippa against C. Cassius, [Vellei. Paternul, ut supra.]

Decimus Brutus one of the murderers also of Caesar, being absent was also condemned: by the command of M. Antonius, in the house of a certain guest of his, a noble man, by name Camilius, was slain by Capenus a Burgundian a year and an half after the death of Caesar, [Livy lib. 120. Vellei. Paternul, lib. 2, cap. 64. Appian, lib. 3, pag. 588. Oros, lib. 6, cap. 18.] whom although Cicero saith that he excelled in this kind of virtue, [lib. 11. ad familiæ, epist. 21.] that he never was afraid, nor ever disturbed, yet Seneca declares [in epist. 88.] that he betrayed a base fear in undergoing death, for the removing of which fear, Helvius Blaesus, a man who always loved him, because they were always soldiers together, killed himself, he looking upon him, animating him by his example to endure the taking of his death, [Dio, lib. 46, pag. 325.] Camilius sent the head of dead Brutus to Antonius, who when he had looked upon it, delivered it to his friends to bury it, [Appian, ut supra.]

He was the next that suffered punishment after Trebonius, for the murder of Caesar, whole murderer he was, when as he was the chiefest of his friends, and he thought it fit, to keep those things that he had received from Caesar, but that Caesar must die, who gave gave them him; for whilst Caesar lived he was the Master of the Horse, and commanded the farther Gallia. He was also elected Consul by him, in the year next after the Consulship of Hirtius and Paulus, and Governor also of the bither Gallia, [Vellei. Paternul, & Appian, ut supra.]

At the same time also, Minutius Bassillus, one of the murderers of Caesar, was killed by his own servants, because in his anger he had grieved some of them, [Appian, & Oros, ut supra.]

M. Brutus, when he had appealed the army that was like to mutiny by the persuasion of C. Antonius, and had left Antonius himself at Apollonia in the custody of one C. Clodius, he went into the higher Macedonia with the greatest and strongest part of his army, and from thence passed on into Asia, that having drawn them as far from Italy as he could, he might then maintain them by the help of those that were under his authority. Here in Asia he provided himself of many Auxiliaries, as also of Djonatus, a man that was now very old, and who formerly had denied aid to C. Cassius, [Dio, lib. 47, pag. 340, 341.]

M. Antonius, and M. Lepidus, leaving their Lieutenants in Gallia, went to Caesar into Italy with the greatest and best part of the army, [Dio, lib. 46, pag. 325.] whose three armies being mulctred together at Bononia, an Eagle sitting upon the Tent of Caesar, beate two crows that troubled her to the ground, all the army marking it, and prefiging, that some time or other there would a difference arise between the Colleague, and that Caesar would get the Victory of them both, [Id, lib. 47, pag. 328. Sueton, in Olivio, cap. 96.]

These three at Confluences, about Bononia and Mutina, in a certain little Island that is made by the River Lavinus, had private conference for three dayes together, and to make peace amongst themselves, that they should joyndly order the commonwealths affaires for the space of five yeares, [Livy, 120. Florus, lib. 4, cap. 6. Plutarch, in Cicerone & Antonio. Appian, lib. 4, pag. 589, 590. Dio, lib. 46, pag. 325, 326.]

Here by a common decree they appointed these things: That Caesar should deliver out the Consulship to Ventidius for the remainder of the year; and that a new Magistracy of the Triumviri for the avoiding all civil dissensions should be created; and that Lepidus with Antonius and Caesar, should beare the office for five yeares with consular power. That the Triumviri should forthwith be annual Magistrates for the city for five yeares. That the Provinces should be so divided, that, Antonius should have all Gallia, as well Togata on this side the Alpes, as Comata on the other side; except the Province of Narbon. That Lepidus should have the command of this, together with Spain. That Africa, together with Sardinia and Sicilia should fall to Caesars share. And thus was the Roman Empire divided among the Triumviri; deferring the division of the beyond sea Provinces, over which Brutus and Cassius commanded. Moreover it was agreed amongst them that they should part to death their enemies, and that Lepidus should for the following year be chosen Consul in the room of Decimus Brutus, and that he should have the Guard of Rome and all Italy; and that Antonius and Caesar should carry on the war against Brutus and Cassius, [Appian, lib. 4, pag. 590. Dio, lib. 46, pag. 326.]

On the third day, the Triumviri entered Rome, every one apart with his Prætorian cohort, and one Legion. When Publius Titius the Tribune of the people, calling an assembly of the Wards, made a law for the creating a new Magistracy, that the Triumviri for the settling of the commonwealth might govern for five yeares space with consular authority, [Appian, ibid. 592, 593. Dio, lib. 47, pag. 328.]

M. Cicero, upon the coming of the Triumviri, went out of the city, being assured, which also came to passe, that he could no more scape Antonius, than Brutus and Cassius could scape Caesar, [Livy, apud Senecam, in orat. Sualfortia, 7.]

M. Emilius Lepidus, M. Antonius, and Caesar Octavianus, the V Kalends of December, began the Triumvirate, the same was to continue to the dayes before the Kalends of January which were to be fix in number (or of the sixth year following) as appeareth out of the Colorian Marble, [in inscription Græterii, pag. CCXCVIII.] in which time M. Terentius Varro saw Rome rise up with three heads: and from thence Suetonius [in Olivio, cap. 8.] and Eutropius, [lib. 7.] derive the beginning of the Principality of Caesar Octavianus; reckoning almost XII yeares before the Victory at Actium, from which they begin his Monarchy, to which there were almost 3 months wanting.

The VII Ides of the December of that year, in which Caesar Octavianus substituted himself and Quintus Pædus for Consuls in the room of Panfa and Hirtius, Marcus Cicero was killed by some that were sent from M. Antonius, as the Author of the Dialogue of the causes of corrupted eloquence confirms out of the writings of Tiro, a freed man of Ciceros, ascribed to Corn. Tacitus. This was the end of his life, who was the first that in peace delivered the Triumph and Laurel of the Tongue, and was the father of Eloquence and Latine Learning, and (as Caesar the Dictator wrote formerly of him) that he had obtained a Laurel far beyond all Triumphs, by how much it is a greater matter to have extended the bounds of the Roman Wit, than of the Empire, [Plin. lib. 7. cap. 30.] concerning whom those things are to be seen, which are in Velleius Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 66. Seneca in Sualorius, orat. VII. and Plutarch in the end of his Cicero.

Cleopatra, brought no aid to Cassius, although he demanded Auxiliaries of her with threats. [Appian, lib. 5. pag. 675.]

Whilſt Brutus was in Africa, Publius laid plots againſt him, and in Macedonia his brother Marcus, ſending ſome for this purpoſe, endeavour'd to get Caius Antonius ſubvert the power; wherefore Caius Clodius that waſt Antonius his keeper, whom he could not keep ſafely, put him to death, juſtifying therein his own authority, or by Brutus his command. It is reported, that when Brutus had a great care for the ſafety of Antonius, after he underſtood of Brutus his death, took no more care of him : yet he puniſhed not Gellius; although convict of Treason againſt him; for knowing that Brutus always accounted him amongst the chiefeſt of his friends, and alſo ſeeing that Marcus Meſſala his brother was very near allied to Caius, he let him alone, [Dis. lib. 49. pag. 341.]

Brutus as soon as he understood the endeavour of M. Antonius and the death of Caius Antonius, fearing lest there should arise some innovation in Macedonia, went in all haste into Europe, [Id. ibid.]

335. When Octavianus had refuted the Consulship, and his colleague Q. Papius was dead, the Triumvir created Consul P. Ventidius (Balla) the Praetor, with one C. Junius, as may be understood from the inscription in Gruetius, pag. CCXXCVII, our Consul, Colatian marble; and delivered the Praetorship to one that was A. E. L., and afterwards deprived all the Praetors of their magistracy, which office they were to bear five days longer; and sending them into Provinces, substituted others in their rooms, [libid. pag. 335.] whether it is to be referred that of Vellicus Paternicus, [lib. 2, cap. 65.] This year five Ventidius, both Consul and Praetor in that city, through which he was led in Triumph to Picennium amongst the captives; concerning whom, being led in Triumph, Valerius Maximus is to be consulted, [lib. 6. cap. 9. and A. Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 4. Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 43.] where also he addeth, That he got his living when he was a young man very bably, by providing mules and coaches for the Magistrates that were to go into the Provinces: whereupon these Verses were commonly written thorough all the ways of the freets,

*Concurrite omnes Augures, Aruspices,
Portentum inusitatum consilium est recens;
Nam mulos qui fricabat, Consul factus est.*

You Augurs, and Auspices draw near,
We have an uncouth wonder happ'nd here ;
He that rub'd mules doth Salve Consul hear.

In the end of the year, those that were newly elected Consuls Triumphed; L. Munatius Plancus for Gallia, IIII Kalends of January, and M. Emilius Lepidus the Triumvir for Spain, the day before the Kalends of January; as appeareth our of the Marble Records of Triumphs, [in infer. p. Gruet. pag. CCXCII.] Val. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 67. Appian. lib. 4. pag. 607.

cap. 67. Appian. lib. 4. pag. 107. In the fourth Julian year there was a day in February fallly intercalated; seeing that the fourth year of the first Julian year until that time, there had passed but the space of three years only: which error had continued unto the 37 Julian year; for whereas they ought to intercalate one day, which is made of four quarters, every fourth year being ended before the fifth should begin; the Priests did not intercalate in the fourth year being ended, but beginning; and so the year that was rightly ordered by Julius Cæsar, by their negligence was disturbed and disordered, [Sueton. in Othavio, cap. 21. Macrobius lib. Saturnal. cap. 14. fn.]

M. Brutus, having fetled all things in Macedonia, went back again into Asia, [Dio. lib. 47, pag. 341.] and having carried a great army thither, he provided a Fleet in Bithynia, and at Cyzicum: he went by land and fetled all the cities, and heard the complaints of the Governours. [Plutarch, in Brutus.] He set Apuleius that fled to him from the proscriptiō of the Triumviri, over Bythinia, [Appian. lib. 4, pag. 616.]

The

The Epistles of Brutus, which he wrote in a Laconic style to them of Asia, are extant: which Aldus let forth in Greek, and Ranzius Florentinus translated and let forth in Latine, Plutarch recites three of them in his Life: The first whereof to the Pergamians, is to be seen in the beginning of the Collection already published, another to the Rhodians hath here before been exhibited by us; the third, and threote of all, inferred in this little book, is to the Gauls, and is written in the same manner, as the Galatians; and in Plutarch to the Samians, is after this manner, ΑΙ ΚΑΤΑ ΠΛΟΥΤΑΡΧΟΝ ΑΙ ΣΥΡΡΑΖΙΑΙ ΚΑΤΑ ΤΗΝ ΕΠΙΣΤΟΛΗΝ ΤΟΥ ΒΡΥΤΤΟΥ, Your counsel is to no purpose, your obedience to commands are very slow: what do you think will befall of these things?

Cassius intended to go into Egypt, having heard that Cleopatra was gone with a great navy to Cæsar and Antonius, supposing that by this means he might both hinder and punish; and also desiring to prevent her, being afflicted with famine, and almost without any foreign aid, by reason of the sudden departure of Allicnus, with four Roman Legions. [Apian. lb. 4. pag. 623. cum lib. 5. pag. 675.]

He hoping that he should have a fit occasion for this enterprize, Brutus recalled him into Syria, by messenger after messenger. [Id. ibid. Plutarch in M. Bruto.] And being thus withdrawn from the hopes he had in Egypt, he sent again light Horse men, and not without bribes to the King of the Parthians, and sent Lieutenants also with them, to demand greater aides. [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 625.]

Caſſius, leaving his brothers ſon in Syria with one Legion, lent his Horſe men before him into Cappadocia ; who ſuddenly ſet upon Ariobarzanes, who took away great ſtore of money, and other proviſion. But Caſſius, returning from Syria, took pity on the Taitentes, moſt miſerably oppreſſed, and quitted them from paying any tributes for the future. [Id. ibid. pag. 626.] And his affairs being thus ſetled in Syria and Cilicia, he went into Asia to Brutus. [Dion. lib. 47. pag. 345. ſm.]

345. Antiq. After Caffius was gone out of Syria, there arose a sedition at Jerusalem, for Felix, who was left there (Caffius) with soldiers, in revenge of Malichus his death, (he) set upon Phaelatus, and the people took up arms. Herod was there with Fabius, the Governor of Damalcus; and having a mind to help his brother, was hindered by Icknefle. Notwithstanding, Phaelatus suffered the better of Phaelix, first forced him into the Town, and agreeing upon quarter, jusseth him to go out: but he was very angry with Hyrcanus, that after the receipt of so many benefits from him, he did favour Felix, and suffered the brother of Malichus to seize upon some Cattles; for he held many, and amongst the rest Maslada, a most famous piece. [Joseph, lib. 3. Bell. cap. 10. lib. 14. Antiquiq. cap. 20.]

But Brutus and Caesar were very joyful and confident at the meeting together at Smyrna, in consideration of both their forces there present: for when as they went out of Italy, poor, and without arms, in manner of most abject exiles, who had not so much as one ship rigged, not one Soldier, nor one Town to friend: in a little time they met together with a fleet, and were furnished with Horse and Foot, and money to pay them, fit to fight for the Roman Empire. Caesar was thought to have the lame honour with Brutus to be the like, but commonly Brutus prevailed, because, coming often unto him, because he was the elder, and of a body fit to endure labour as he was [Plutarch in M. Brut.]

Here both of them ordered their cohorts for the war they were to undertake against the Triumviri, [Living, lib. 127.] and truly Brutus opinion was to go into Macedonia, with his joyful forces, and put all upon a general battle; for now the Senate and the Legions, of which eight were transported over sea to Iconum. On the contrary, Cassius thought the forces of the enemy were contemptible, and that they would want provision for so great a multitude: the best way was to quell the favourers of the adverse faction, as the Rhodians and Lycians, who were strong at sea, least whilst they were setting upon the enemy, they should come upon them behind them; and this opinion prevailed, [Appian, lib. 4, pag. 626,] for they heard say that the Triumviri were buſie about ſetting their affairs at Rome, and they ſuppoſed they ſhould have work enough, Sextus Pompeius keeping the ſea againſt them in Sicily, that was to ſay, [Dio, lib. 47, pag. 346.]

Moreover, when at Smyrna, Brutus desired that he might have part of the money, of which Cassius had great store: for he declared that he had pent all that he had in providing of a fleet, in which they might have the whole island: sea with their command. But yet Cassius his friends were against his giving him any; denying it was just, that, that we had saved through parsimony, and had gotten together with ill will, should be spent in bribing the Souldiers; yet he bestowed a third part of all things upon him; and to both of them went to their own charge.

When

When they, either going about themselves, or sending their Lieutenants, drew to their side, those that were not of the same opinion with them, and got together both men and money, they doing this all those that lived in those parts, and formerly were not so much as spoken to, presently came in to them, only Ariobarzanes, and the Rhodians and Lycians, although they did not resist them, yet denied to enter into society with them, these Brutus and Cassius had in suspicion, as though they favoured the adverse party, because they had received so many favours from the former Cæsar; and fearing lest in their absence they should raise some stir, and incite the rest not to keep their promise, they determined first of all to let upon them: hoping that they, to whom they were superior in power, and on whom they would bestow favours, would easily be brought either by persuasion, or force, into amity with them. [Dio. ut supra.]

As soon as Herod was recovered, he went against the brother of Malchus, and took from him all the Castles that he had seized upon, and himself also in Malchada, whom he let go free upon composition, he also recovered three Castles that were seized upon by Mafion, the Tyrant of the Tyrians in Galilee, but gave quarter to all the garrison Soldiers of the Tyrians; and sent some of them home well rewarded, by this means getting himself the love of the city, and hatred of the Tyrant. [Joseph. lib. 1. belli. cap. 10. lib. 13. Antiquit. cap. 20. 21.]

The Tarsentes, who had resisted Cassius, were commended by the Triumviri; and hopes given them that they should receive something, for the losses they had sustained, of them also Cleopatra obtained, in respect of the aid she had sent to Dolabella, that her son, by name Ptolemaus, whom she said she had by Cæsar, and therefore called Cæsarion, should be called King of Egypt. [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 345.]

Brutus demanded men and money of the Lycians, but because Naucratus, an Orator (ῥητορ) had compelled the cities to a revolt; and they had treated themselves upon some hillocks to keep Brutus from passing over; first he sent his horse against them, as they were at dinner, by whom there were 600 put to death, afterwards taking some Castles, and smaller Towns, he let them all go free without ransom, that he might get the favour of the nation, but they being refractory, and discontented for the losses they had received, despised his clemency and good will. [Plutarch. in Brutus.]

Brutus overcame in battle the common army of the whole nation of the Lycians, and possessed the camp also, entering it with them that fled; and had many cities yielded unto him. [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 347.]

Then he besieged the most warlike of them, having forced them within the walls of Xanthum [Plutarch.] they having levelled their walls to the intent that Brutus should have neither retreat nor materials, and having well fortified their city, drove the enemy from the fortifications, having also a ditch of fifty foot deep, and broad according to the proportion of the depth, so that standing upon the bank they could use their darts and arrows as if they had been divided by an unfordable river, whilst Brutus endeavoured to get over the ditch, he covered his pioneers with hurdles, and dividing his army in two for to follow the assault by night, and by day; he brought his materials from far, (as it is usually done when the bulwark goeth on hearily,) still urging them on to hasten the work, doing whatsoever was to be done with great earnestness and labour: wherefore although at the first he thought, he should do no good by reason of the strong resistance of the enemy, or at least should not overcome them in many months, yet nevertheless he finished his business within few daies, for he assaulted the besieged a far off partly with engines, and near the gate partly with his cohorts, which he continually changed, they being always wearied with fresh men, and wounded likewise yet stood it out manfully, as long as the fortifications held, but they falling, and the Towns being battered with the engines; Brutus perceiving what would come to pass, commanded them that besieged the gate to retreat, which the Xanthians supposing had been done through negligence of the guard, made a sally out by night with torches upon the engines; but the Roman cohorts halting thither as it was agreed, they presently fled back to the gate: which they that kept it had now throu, least the enemy should break in with them that fled, where was a great slaughter made of them that were shut out. [Appian. lib. 4. pag. 633. 634.]

A river ran by the city, this some passed under water and fled, but they were taken again in nets that were let down into the depth, crossed the channel; and had bels that hung at the top of them which gave notice when any one was intrangled. [Plutarch. in Brutus.]

The Xanthians sallyed out again about noon, and beating back the guards burnt all the Engines; and seeing that the gate stood open for the foreseeable occasion 2000. Romans rushed in together with the Townsmen, and others also entering in pell mell, the Portcullis fell upon them, either by the Xanthians means, or by the breaking of the ropes ropes, by which it was let down; therefore as many Romans as had broke in, were either beaten down, or shut in, seeing they could not draw it up again without ropes: and being assaulted from above by the Xanthians they very hardly at length got into the market-place which was high, and there they were grievously insulted by the Archers: and seeing they had neither bows nor darts, for fear they should be injured, they fled into the Temple of Serapedon. In the mean time the Romans that were without, were very solicitous for them that were intercepted, Brutus also running up and down, tried all things in all places; and seeing they could not break open the Portcullis, and they had lost their ladders and wooden Towers by the fire, yet some presently made ladders, others brought props to the walls, and used them for ladders; some fastning hooks to wits, cast them upon the walls, and as often as any stood fast, they crept up by them. [Appian. lib. ut supra. pag. 634.]

The Oenandenes, their neighbours and enemies, and therefore at that time the Allies of Brutus, climbed up the steep rocks, whom the Romans presently initiated with great earnestness, and many fell down, their feet failing them; yet some got over the wall, and opened a little gate, before which was a fortification of sharp stakes set thickly by the help of these, the most daring got up, and now being increased in number, they went to break the gate open, which had no bars to strengthen it; others also endeavoured to do the same on the other side: and seeing that the Xanthians let upon them that were fled into the Temple of Serapedon, they that both within and without were breaking open the gate, brake it with such furious noise, that they rushed in in one company, even as the Sun was setting, and gave a great shout, that this might be a token to them that were shut in. [Ibid. pag. 634. 635.]

The Romans rushing into the Cities, set some houses on fire, the fire first terrified them, before whole eyes these things were done: and to them that were farther off, gave an occasion to think that the City was taken, therefore the neighbours of their own accord, set their own houses on fire, but the greater part killed one the other. [Dio. lib. 4. pag. 347.] For retiring within their own private houses, they killed every one that was dear to them; they willingly offered their throats to be cut. There being a lamentable cry made at that time, Brutus thought the soldiers were lacking the City, which he forbade by public Cryers: but when he was better informed, pitying the generous disposition of these men, born to liberty, he by messengers invited them to peace: whom they beat back with their darts; and having first killed all that belonged to them, and laid them on funeral piles, after they had put fire to them, they cut their own throats. Thus Appian, [ut supra. pag. 635.] But Plutarch after this manner.

Brutus being afraid lest the City should be spoiled, commanded the soldiers, that they should quench the fire, and to help the City; but a great and incredible desperation suddenly seized upon the Lycians, which you may well compare to a desire of death: for both free men and servants, both old and young, with women and children, assailed the enemy from the wall, that came to quench the fire. The Xanthians themselves brought reeds, and all combustible matter to set the City on a flame; and having set fire to it, used all the means they could to encrease it. After all the City was on a light fire, Brutus being grieved for this, went about the City to help it, and stretching forth his hands to the Xanthians intreated them to spare the City, and to preserve it: but none obeyed him, yea, they themselves destroyed themselves by all manner of ways: not only men and women, but little children also, with great cryings and howlings threw themselves into the fire, and some headlong from the wall, some offered their naked throats, to the naked swords of their fathers, desiring them to kill them. The City being thus consumed, there was one woman seen hanging by a rope, which had her dead child hanging at her neck, and with a fiery torch, with which she set her house on fire; which sight appeared so tragical, that Brutus could not endure to behold it, but when it was told him, fell a weeping, and pronounced a reward to the Soldiers, whoever had saved a Lycian. They reckon but an hundred and fifty, which would take quarter. Thus Plutarch.

Appian writes that Brutus got but some slaves, but of free-born, scarce CL. women, and those wanted husbands to kill them; and he adds that Brutus saved all the Temples he could possibly. [pag. 635.]

Brutus from thence went to Patara, a City which might seem to be the Dock of the Xanthians, where their ships were laid up, and denounced unto them that they should yield unto him, or expect such a destruction as the Xanthians had; but the citizens yielded not to the peace that was offered unto them; for the servants having newly gotten the liberty, and the freemen that were poor having newly all their debts cancelled, resisted the pacification. Therefore Brutus sent the Xanthians that he had taken captive captive unto them, because they were akin to each other, who by seeing their miserable condition, should exhort them to change their purposes; who seeing they were never the more altered from their illfellowship, although he had granted as a gift to every one his kindred, he permitted them the rest of the day for consultation, and to withdraw himself; but yet he the next morning brought his Forces thither again, [Appian, ibid. Dio, lib. 47. pag. 347.] and letting up a cage in a false place under the wall, he sold the chief of the Xanthians, bringing them out one by one, if by chance this might move the Patraenles; but when they would not yield for all this, having sold a few of them, he let the rest go free, [Dio, ibid.]

When also he had taken captive the women of Patara, he let them also go free without any ransom, who having told their husbands and fathers who were of the chief men, that Brutus was a most modest and just man, they persuaded them, that they should yield, and deliver up the Town to him, [Plutarch,] and he entering the Town, neither put any to death, nor banished any one: but yet commanded all the publick gold and silver to be brought to him; he exacted also every ones particular treasure, propounding a punishment to them that denied it, and a reward to them that brought it forth, [Appian, pag. 636.]

Here a servant betrayed some gold that was hid by his Master, and shewed it to a Centurion that was sent for that purpose; and when they were all brought forth, the Master was silent; but his mother, that the might have her son, followed crying, that he had hid the money: the servant unasked, said that she lyed, and that the other hid the money: But Brutus having commended the young mans patience, and the mothers piety, dismissed them both with the gold, but hung up the servant, who against all equity betrayed his Master, [Id. ibid.]

At the same time also, Lentulus, which was the dock of the Myrenses, and having broken the chaine with which the mouth of the Haven was barred, he went to the Prætor of the Myrenses: whom when Brutus had dismissed, the Myrenses yielded, and paid the money imposed upon them, [Appian, & Dio, ut sup.] And after the same manner, all the whole Nation of the Lycians was reduced; and sending Embassadors to Brutus, promised they would fend both men and money to their power, whom they had found to be bountiful and indulgent beyond all expectation. For sending home all the free-borne of the Xanthians, he imposed upon the Lycians onely, an 150 talents, neither used he towards them any other violence, [Plutarch, Appian, Dio.]

And thus Brutus conquered the Lycians, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 70.] amongst whose Epistles this is reported to be one, to the Rhodians. We have extremely punished the Xanthians, when they revolted from us; for putting them to death even to the little ones, we destroyed the city with fire and sword. To the Patraenles who were faithful to us, we have released their tributes, and granted them their freedom, and to live after their own laws: and we have given them 50 talents towards the rebuilding of those things that were demolished. You have liberty to provide for your selves, and to see, whether you will be accounted enemies as the Xanthians, or friends as the Patraenles. But in Plutarch this Epistle is much more concise; thus, 'The Xanthians contemning our bounty, have made their country the Sepulchre of their depuration. The Patraenles who have submitted unto me, want not their liberty in governing their common-wealth; therefore it is in your power, either to chuse the opinion of the Patraenles, or the fortune of the Xanthians.'

The Rhodian Noble men feared to contend with the Romans, but the common people were in high conceit of themselves, being mindful of the ancient Victories they had of other manner of men. [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 627.] They trusted so much to their skill in Navigation, that they went first to Cassius into the Continent, and shewed him the fetters that they had brought, as if they would take many of their enemies alive, [Dio, lib. 47. pag. 346.]

Cassius, because he had to do with them that were skillful at sea, exercised at Myndus his ships that he had rigged and furnished with souldiers. Thither the Rhodians sent Embassadors to him, who should intreat him, that neither he would condemn Rhodes who had always revenged the injuries done to her, neither the league that was between the Romans and the Rhodians, by which it is provided in plain terms, that neither people should make war on the other. They sent also Archelaus Embassador unto him, who had formerly been his Master at Rhodes for the Greek tongue, to demand this of him with more submission; to whom Cassius gave answer, That the league was first broken by the Rhodians, and that he would punish them for it, if they yielded nor presently, [Appian, pag. 626, 627, 630.]

This answer more terrified the wiser citizens; but the people were more moved with the Orations of Alexander and Mnaseas, putting them in mind, with how much greater a Navy Mithridates had invaded Rhodes, and before him Demetrius, two most potent Kings. Whereupon they created Alexander, Prytanis, which is a Magistrate among them them of very great power, and made Mnaseas Admiral. [pag. 627, 628.]

Alexander and Mnaseas, the Commanders of the Rhodians, with 33. choice ships, sailed to Myndus, that by this daring, they might put Cassius in fear; and it might by chance become colour of hope, seeing that having overtaken Mithridates near this Town, they law an happy end to that war. After they had shewed their skill in sayling, they went to Cnidus the fifth day. The next day Cassius his souldiers looted from shore against them that came from sea-ward, [pag. 627, 630.]

Here was a sharp fight between them, the Rhodians with their nimble ship, running hither and thither, sometimes ran through the enemies ranks, sometimes about them: on the contrary the Romans trusting to their great ships, as often as they laid hold on any ship with their iron hooks, by being too strong for them they prevailed, as in a fight at land: but because Cassius had the greater number of ships, the Rhodians could not long dally with their enemies, through their swiftnesse and usual artifices: for whereas they set up them only in front, and then retreated, it did them little good, their enemies still keeping themselves close together. The strokes also of their beaks were of no strength against the heavy ships of the Romans: on the other side, the Roman ships bearetholt light with a direct assault, until three Rhodian ships were taken, with all the souldiers in them, two being broken, sunk, the rest very much shattered, fled to Rhodes, [pag. 630.]

With this success the Roman fleet fought with the Rhodian at Myndus [ibid. cum Dion. pag. 346.] Which fight Cassius beheld from a Mountain; and immediately after he had repaired his fleet, he went to Loryma, a Castle of the Rhodians on the other side of the Continent: from whence he conveyed over his land forces in ships of burthen, under the conduct of Fanus and Lentulus; he himself with 80 long ships furnished, to strike a terror into the Rhodians, both by sea and land, rested himself, expecting if by chance the enemy would leave his fiercenesse. [Appian, pag. 631.]

But they boldly met him again, whom Cassius by the help of Statius (Mureus) overcame, conquering their skill by the greatnesse and number of his ships: and then having lost two ships, they are besieged on every side. [Id. ibid. Dion. pag. 346.]

Immediately all the walls are filled with Souldiers; who might keep Fanus from assaulting them by land, and Cassius with his Navy by sea, not unprovided for invading the walls: for Cassius thinking that some such thing would happen, did bring with him Towns that were folded up, which were there set up. Thus Rhodes, twice beaten by sea, was now assaulted both by sea and land, unprovided, as in a thing they looked not for, to sustain an assault; by which it appeared, it would in short time come into the power of the enemies, being overcome either by arms or famine: and this was known to the wifer of the Rhodians, there having passed freer conference between them, and Fanus and Lentulus: and seeing that Cassius was suddenly come into the middell of the City with his choicest souldiers, it is believed that some lesser portals were opened to him by Citizens that privately favoured him, lest the City should be miserably destroyed, [Appian, pag. 631.]

Here Cassius answered the Rhodians, that called him King and Lord, I am neither Lord nor King, but the killer and avenger of a Lord and King, [Plutarch, in Ad. Bruto.] He far under a spear for his Tribunal, because he would tem as if he had taken the City by force of arms: and having commanded his army to be quiet, and by his publick Cryers threatened death to plunderers; he cited before him 50 Rhodian Citizens, whom he commanded to be put to death, and other 25 not appearing, he banished, [Appian, pag. 731.]

There he dispoiled the Rhodians both of their ships and money; he scraped together all the gold that belonged either to the Temples or Treasury, yea, he took away all things that were dedicated to the gods, except the Chariot of the Sun, [Id. ibid. Dio, pag. 246.] Neither was he content with all that, but he took privately from the owner, what gold or silver soever he had: denouncing a punishment by a Cryer, if any one hid it, and propounding a reward to them that told of it, to wit, a tenth part, and to the slaves liberty. At the first some concealed their money, hoping that his threats would go no further than words: but after they law that rewards were given to discoverers, they desired that the time prefixed might be prolonged: which being granted, some digged up that they had hid in the earth; others drew their money out of wells, and some again brought more than they hid before. [Appian, pag. 631, 332.] And when as thus he had extorted from private men 8000 talents, and publicly had fined the City in 900 more, [Plutarch, in Ad. Bruto.] he left to the Rhodians remaining nothing but their life, [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 18.]

Thus therefore Cassi- by a sharp and most prosperous war, took Rhodes, a matter of huge consequence, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 70.] who rejoicing at his sudden over-coming

pian, pag. 632.] After this he put to death Atiobarzanes whom he had taken, [Dio.
pag. 346. fin.] and commanded a tribute of ten years from all the Provinces of Asia, which he exacted without any abatement, [Ap- pian, 632.]

Then it was told Cassius, that Cleopatra was sailing towards Cesar and Antonius with an huge Navy, and great preparation; she having always before followed that side, for the love she bare to the former Cesar; but then far more eagerly for the fear the had of Cassius: for the invasion of whom, Cassius lent into Poloponcus, Marcus together with one Legion and some Archers in 60 covered ships, to keep the road about the Promontory of Tenarus; but Cleopatra concerning Cassius and Marcus his guard, fell sail towards the Ionian Sea: but her Fleet was grievously troubled with a tempest on the coast of Africa, and the tokens of her shipwreck were brought by the waves even into the country of Lycia, and Cleopatra her self fell into a sickle, and so returned home, [Ap- pian, lib. 4. pag. 632, 636. cum lib. 5. pag. 975.]

Among Brutus's Epitaphs, there is one concerning the Victories of him and Cassius, as it were lent to the Coans. Rhodes truly now obeys Cassius, a city rather bold, than strong by her own strength. All Lycia is now at our command, partly conquered in war, and partly for fear of suffering extremities: which choice truly was for their profit; for willingly they chose that, which they must have done in a little time after: (Wise you therefore whether you had rather serve being forced thereby by war, or rather to be called our friends by receiving us.

Brutus being returned from Lycia into Ionia, he did many memorable works, both in honouring them that deserved well, and in punishing others according to their desert; and amongst others, Theodorus the Rhetorician, by whose perswasion (as he himself bragged) Pompey the Great was killed, finding wandering in Asia, he put to death, with all manner of torments, [Plutarch, in Bruto, &
Pompeio.]

Brutus lent for Cassius to come to Sardes, and as he was coming near there, he went to meet him with his friends: the whole soldiery being ready in their arms, saluted them both Generals: as it is wont to be in great matters between two who have many Captains and Friends, that mutual suspicion and accusations will arise between them.
The first thing they did, they two alone went into a private room, and shutting the doors to them, and all men bid withdraw, they began amongst themselves first to ex-postulate, then to argue, and accuse each other: then falling into fear, and to a more free and vehement chiding, their friends wondering at the sharpness of this wrath and contention, feared to what issue this would come, [Id. in Bruto,] but all these suspicions, (which each had conceived against other thorough other mens false accusations,) they wisely at length took away, [Dio. lib. 47. pag. 347.]

M. Favonius was then there, (of whom Cicero makes mention of as a familiar friend to Brutus, lib. 15. ad Atticum, epist. 11.) an imitator a long while of M. Cato, who was a Philosopher, not so much thorough reason, as by some passionate and mad motion; and placed it amongst the least matters to be Consul of Rome: and with a Cynical kind of harsh language which he used, he alleviated the tedium his importunity brought upon many. He then violently thrusting away the porters who forbade him entrance, went into the room where Brutus and Cassius had private conference, with a mimic voice, pronouncing those Verses that Homer saith Nestor used, Ἀλλὰ νῦν δὲ δὴ, καὶ σὺ δὲ νεώτερος ἔσθ' ἵππιος.

At parate ambo, nam te nempto minores;

But both obey, for I your Senior am.

and those that follow. This made Cassius laugh, but Brutus thrust him out; calling him ἀνέκωνος and ὑποκωνος, unlearned dog, and adulterous dog; After this difference was ended, Cassius provided a supper, and Brutus invited his friends thither. As they were going to sit down, Favonius came very trim: Brutus protesting that he came un-tended for, and bidding him be gone; but he thrusting in, placed himself at the upper end of the Table between them: and there was at the Feast both mirth and good discourse, [Id. ibid.]

The next day Brutus condemned in public judgement, and with a note of infamy, L. Peltius, one that had been Prætor, and whose help he had used, being accused of betrery by the Sardians: which deed did not a little touch Cassius, who a few days before, only chastised privately two that were found guilty of the same fault, and absolving them publicly, still made use of them. Whereupon he accused Brutus as too rigidly keeping the laws, and too just, at such a time as he should do but civilly and with humanity: he admonished him again that he should remember the Ides of March,

March, on which they had killed Cesar, who had not so much vexed all men, as a patron of them that did it, [Id. ibid.]

Labienus the younger, the son of Titus Labienus, (Cesars Lieutenant in Gallia, being sent by Cassius and Brutus to demand aid of O. odes, the King of the Parthians, reminded there a long time with him, without any notice being taken of him, both because the King had no mind to help them, and also because he durst not deny them.
[Dio. lib. 48. pag. 371. cum Floro, lib. 4. cap. 9. & Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 78.]

Brutus commanded the whole fleet of the Lycians, to set sail for Abydus, whither also he marched with his land forces: to stay there for Cassius his coming out of Ionia, that they might both go to Scythos together. [Ap- pian, lib. 4. pag. 636.]

When Cassius and Brutus were about to pass out of Asia into Europe, and to transport their army into the opposite continent; an horrible spectacle is said to be shewed to Brutus; for in the dead of the night, when the moon shined not very bright, and all the army was in silence, a black image of an huge and horrid body, standing by him silently is said to offer it self to Brutus, his candle being almost out, but he asking without fear, what either man or god he was, the spirit answered, O Brutus
I am thy evil Genius, thou shalt see me again at Philippi; and that he should answer undoubtedly, Then I shall see thee Florus relates these things [lib. 4. cap. 7. Ap- pian, lib. 4. pag. 668.] Plutarch in the end of Cæsar's life, but more fully in the life of Brutus, where he adds that the next morning he told Cassius what he had seen, and that he expounded to him out of the doctrine of the Epicureans, what was to be thought concerning such spectrals.

Antigonus the son of Aristobolus (the brother of Hyrcanus) invaded Judea, being aided by Prolomei the son of Menneus, and Fabius the governor of Damalus, who whom he had made his friend by money, and Mithon the Tyrant of the Tyrians, who adhered to him, for the hate he bare to Herod, whom Herod meeting being scarce entered the borders of the Country, drove him from thence, having overcome him in battle, wherefore Hyrcanus honoured him with crowns as soon as he returned to Jerusalem, for already by promise he was accounted of as one of the family of Hyrcan-us, being to marry Mariamme (in Syriack called מרים or Mary) born of Alexander the son of Aristobolus (the brother of Hyrcanus, and I Alexander the daughter of Hyrcan-us. [Joseph. lib. belli. 2. cap. 10. & lib. 14. Antiquis. cap. 21. cum lib. 15. cap.
9. 11.]

At the gulf Melanes, Cassius and Brutus having mustered their army, there were found in it 80000 foot, and Brutus had of French and Lusitanian horse 4000, of Thracian, Illyrian, Parthia, and Thessalian 2000. Cassius had of Spanith and French 2000; 4000 horsemen that were archers out of Arabia, Media, and Parthia, (for Justin confirms that the Parthians sent aides hither, [lib. 4. cap. 4.] there followed also Kings that were allies, and Tetrarchs out of Gallagracia, who brought 5000 horse besides foot forces. [Ap- pian, lib. 4. pag. 840.]

These met with the army of the Triumviri, M. Antonius and Octavianus Cesar at Philippi, a city of Macedonia, (not less famous for Saint Pauls epistle, than for this war.) [Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 70.] in like manner on each side there were 19 Legions, Antonius and Cesar had 13, Brutus and Cassi 60000. the Cassians, desiring to tie the enemy out with scarcity of provision, for many daies refused the fight; seeing all things were supplied to them out of Asia, and brought near hand by sea, whereas the enemies were in want in an enemies country; for neither the merchants could get any thing out of Egypt, there being a great famine there: neither would Sexus Pompeius suffer any thing to be brought out of Spain or Atrick, nor Statius Marcus and Domitius Enobarbus out of Italy, and truly Macedonia and Thessalia, could not long suffice, which then alone maintained the army; on the other side Antonius, that he might hinder the bringing in provision to the enemy behind them out of Thra-cia, in ten daies space, having privately opened a passage in a narrow fen, crested many Cattles with trenches on the farther side; which afterward Cassius by running a trench from his camp to the sea through all the fen, rendered unprofitable to him.
[Ap- pian, lib. 4. pag. 652. 653.]

The fight then being begun, (from which Cesar and Antonius are said to have withdrawn themselves) the wing that Brutus commanded, beating back the enemy, took Cæsar's camp; but the wing in which Cassius was, was put to flight and discomfited, and his camp taken by the Antonians; [Floro lib. 4. cap. 7. Vellei. Patercul.
supra, Plutarch, in Antonio.] there fell of the Cassians 8000 reckoning the servants, who was then present in Brutus camp and a little after yielded himself to Cesar, (saith he thought there were lost twice so many or more. [Plutarch, in M. Bruto, cum Ap- piano,
lib. 4. pag. 655.]

Cassius having lost his Camp, could not returne thither, but went about unto an hill by Philippi, to take a view what should be done, [Appian, pag. 655.] and supposing that the whole army was discomfited, killed himself, [Livy, lib. 124.] with the same sword he had killed Cæsar, as Plutarch relates in the end of his Cæsar. Although in another he himself, with others also, say, That his head was cut off by his freed man Pindarus: whom from the overthrow of Crassus in Parthia, he had appointed for such a necessity. [Id. in Bruto, & Antonio. cum Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 70. Appian. pag. 655. Dion. pag. 354.] Of whom Valerius Maximus, lib. 6. cap. 8. Pindarus newly manumitted by Cæsius, now overcome in the war at Philippi, withdrew him from the insulting of his enemies, by cutting off his head at his own command, who withdrew himself from the sight of men, by a voluntary death; so that his dead body could not be found: which of the gods, the revenger of so great a wickedness, bound that right hand with such darts, which he was enraged in the murder of the father of his Country, that it should come trembling to Pindarus his knees, lest he should pay that punishment, which he had deserved, at the will of the pious Conquerour? Truly thou, Deified Julius, hast exacted the revenge due to thy heavenly wounds; by compelling that head was perfidious against thee, to be made a suppliant to the aid of a base man, forced by the rage of mind, that he would not retain his life, nor darst end it by his own hand.

Brutus, having delivered Cæsius his Corps to his friends, caused it to be privately buried at Thafus, least the army, by the sight of his funeral, should be provoked to mourning, and be dejected. [Plutarch, in Bruto. Appian, pag. 655. Dion. pag. 354.] Cæsius died the very day he was born. [Appian. ibid.] and his servant in the evening came to Antonius, with his souldiers coat, and his sword, which he had newly taken from his body; which being brought him, the Antonians took such courage, that they let the army in battle array, as soon as it was day. [Plutarch ut supra.]

On the same day that the army of Cæsar was overthrown in the field at Philippi, the Marthian Legion, and other great forces, that were bringing to Cæsar, by Domitius Calvus out of Italy, were overcome and discomfited by Marcus and Aenobarbus in the Ionian sea, [Plutarch, in Bruto. Appian, pag. 656, 657.] Of which victory Brutus was ignorant for 20 daies together; all which time the Souldiers of Cæsar and Antonius were mired in the fens of Philippi, and very much troubled with autumnal showers, that followed after the battle, and conjealed into ice. [Plutarch. ibid.] In which time many Germans fled to Brutus: and in like manner Amyntas, the General of Dojars, and Rhacipolis the Thracian, left Brutus his party: which when Brutus perceived, in fear of a greater revolt, he determined to put all upon a general battle. [Dion. lib. 47. pag. 355.]

The night before the battle, it is reported, that that ghost came again to Brutus, in the same manner as before, but spake nothing, and so vanished away: although P. Volturnus, a man given to the study of wisdom, who was then in Brutus his Camp, and wrote other prodigies that happened, made no mention of this apparition. [Plutarch, in fin. Cæsar, & in Bruto. cum Appiano, lib. 4. pag. 662.]

At this second fight, not onely Antonius was present, but also Cæsar Octavian, though weak and sickly: to whom Ovid touching the things that were done in this Philippick war, in the third book Fastorum.

Hoc opus, hac pietas, hac prima elementa fuerunt Cæsar; ulcisci justa per arma patrem.

Cæsars first work, or worthe action rather,
Was, By just arms he did revenge his father.

And in the fifth.

*Poverat hoc juvenis tunc, cum pia sustulit arma;
A tantis princeps incipiendus erat.
Ille manus tendens: adstanti milite iusto,
In conjuratos talia verba dedit, &c.*

This the youth vow'd, when first to arms he ran,
Being the chief of them he then began,
His stretch't out hand to th' souldiers whilst he spoke,
He, them confederated, thus bespoke,

Brutus being overcome in battle, fled to an hill by night: and on the next day he desired of Strabo the geates, an Epirote, with whom there was friendship, by reason that they studied Rhetorick together, that he would lend him his hand towards his death:
X x x x and and casting his left arme over his head, when as holding the point of the sword in his right hand, and directing it to his left pappe, where the heart beats, and forcing himself upon a wound, so gave up the ghost, being run through at one thrust. [Livy, lib. 124. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 70. Plutarch in M. Bruto. Appian. lib. 4. pag. 665, 666.]

And this was the end of Brutus and Cæsius in this war, who being the murderers of Julius Cæsar their Emperour, by whom they were saved in the Pharfallian fight, afterwards murdered themselves, [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 667, 668.] being both of them run through with the sword they had killed Cæsar, as Dio affirms in the beginning of his 48. book; and the liberty which they to much desired to see restored, they lost by this murder of Cæsar, [Florus, lib. 4. cap. 7.] although they, in less than two years, had gathered together more than 20. Legions, and about 30000 Horse, above 200. long ships, and other not contemptible preparations, and had extorted huge sums of money from men, whether they would or not: and being often victors in the wars, they waged with many Cities, and with Nations of the contrary faction, and had the command of all from Macedonia to Euphrates; and whosoever they made war with, they drew them to their society, and made use of their help which were faithful to them, as of Kings and Governours, yea, of the Parthians, although their enemies. [Appian, pag. 666, 667.]

Antonius standing by the corps of Brutus, modestly upbraided him with the death of his brother Caius, put to death by him in Macedonia; but often saying, That he rather imputed the death of his brother to Hortensius, (who was Procurator of Macedonia) than to Brutus; he commanded Hortensius to be killed upon his grave, [Plutarch in M. Bruto, & M. Antonio.] He cast upon Brutus his body his purple souldiers coat of great price, and committed the care of his funeral to one of his free men, whom afterwards he put to death, when he knew he had not burnt that coat with him, and sent his althes to his mother Servilia. [Id. ibid. Appian, lib. 4. pag. 668.] But Octavian sent his head to Rome, that it might be bestowed under Cæsar statue. [Sueton. in Octavio, cap. 13.] But in the passage from Dyrrachium, a tempest arising, it was cast into the sea. [Dion. lib. 47. pag. 356.]

As many of the Nobility as escaped into Thafus, some sailed from thence, others yielded themselves to the power and mercy of Messala, Corvinus and L. Bibulus; others having agreed for their security with the Antonians: Antonius himself being come into Thafus, delivered up to him whatsoever of either money, arms, provision, or other preparation remained. [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 659.]

L. Julius Mollia, one that had been Prætor, and his son, and A. Torquates, and others that were abashed with the like fortune, went into Samothracia, to whom Pompeius Atticus commanded all things to be supplied out of Epirus. [Cornel. Nepos, in Vna Attici.]

Cæsius Parmensis, Brutus and Cæsius being gone to the war, was left in Asia with a fleet and an army, to exact money, after the death of Cæsius, hoping better things from Brutus, choise 30 of the Rhodian ships, supposing he should fill to many with Mariners of the Allies; the rest he burnt, least the City should make (some innovations. Having done this, he fers saile with his own, and the Rhodian ships; but Clodius being sent by Brutus, as soon as he law the Rhodians about to rebell, (for now Brutus was dead) he withdrew the Garrison of 3000 men, and joyned himself with Parmenles: to them came Torulus with many other ships, and money which he had exacted from the Rhodians, before their revolt. [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 671, 672.]

To this Fleet, as in which there was yet some strength, resorted as many as were dispersed thorough Asia for divers affairs; and put into them as many Legionary souldiers as they could possibly, and made a muster for rowers of bondmen and slaves, and of the Islanders into whole Ports they came. To them came Cicero the younger, and as many of the Nobility as fled from Thafus: So that in short time, there was a great company, and both a fleet and an army not to be contemned, with Leaders al- lo, [Id. ibid. pag. 672.]

These sailed into the Ionian Sea to Statius Murcus, and Cn. Aenobarbus, who commanded great forces, taking Lepidus with them with another band, who kept Crete with a Garrison of Brutus's: where parting, part remained with Aenobarbus, making a faction of their own (keeping the Ionian Sea, bringing much damage to their enemies) part went with Murcus and joyned forces with Sextus Pompeius; for joyning himself to Pompeius both with that part of the army that was committed to his charge, and a great Fleet, and the reliques of Brutus his army, he doubled Pompeius's Forces, [Id. ibid. cum Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 72. & 77. Dion. lib. 48. pag. 361, 368.]

Cæsar and Antonius dismissed the soldiery that had served out their time, except 8000 whom they intreated to serve longer under them, and divided them between them, and took one of an hundred of them for their Life-guard: of eleven Legions and 14000 Horse, which were left of Brutus his army, Antonius took six Legions, and 10000 Horse; and Cæsar four Legions, and 4000 Horse, [Apian, ibid. pag. 672, 673.] Moreover it was agreed, that Cæsar should give two Legions of his own to go along with Antonius, and that he again should receive two others which were then left in Italy, which were his soldiery under the command of Calpurnius [Id. ibid. pag. 673. Dion. lib. 48. pag. 358.]

Cæsar taking this business upon him, that he might repress Lepidus the Triumvir if he should make any stir, and carry on the war against Sextus Pompeius, and divide the lands promised to the old soldiery that were engaged, returned into Italy; but in his journey fell to sick, that they that were at Rome thought he was dead. Antonius layed to go about the Provinces beyond Sea, to abate the enemies pride, and to get money for the soldiery as he had promised them, [Livy, *lib. 125. Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 74. Plutarch, in Antonio, Apian, lib. 5. pag. 672, 673. Dio. lib. 48. pag. 357, 358.] for seeing they had promised to every soldiery 5000 drachmes; they were to take the greater care to find out and to command money, [Plutarch, in Antonio, cum Dion. lib. 47. pag. 352.]*

Antonius therefore with a great army passing into Greece, at the first shewed not himself harsh or rigid to the Grecians; but rejoiced to be accounted a friend of the Grecians, especially of the Athenians, on whose City he bestowed many gifts, [Plutarch.]

L. Centurius being left in Greece, himself went into Asia. [Id.] There he going about, and sending others, exacted money of the Cities, and sold their Territories. [Dio, lib. 48. pag. 371.] Kings also much haunted his Court, and King-wis striving amongst themselves: in gifts and beauty, offered their service to him. Anaxenor also an harper, Xanthus a musician, where all things abounded in luxury. At length Antiochus being ready to go to the Parthian war, he sent Deltius (the H. Rorian, as Plutarch afterwards calls him, and whom Seneca, in his Suasoia, saith, left Cæsar and went to Antonius) into Egypt to Cleopatra; commanding her to appear before him in Cilicia, to answer for her self, because she was said to have afforded much help and aid to Cæsar, [Plutarch.]

Apuleius, who was proscribed by the Triumviri, by delivering Bythinia to Antonius, over which he was made Governor by Brutus, obtained of him to be restored into his country, [Apian, lib. 4. pag. 616.]

In Bythinia, Antonius met with Embassadors from all Nations; there were also the Rulers of the Jews, to accuse Phalaclus and Herod; as though Hyrcanus reigned only in shew; but in truth all the power was in the two brothers. But Antonius highly honoured Herod, who was come thither to wipe off all objections, by which it came to pass, that his adversaries were not so much admitted to speak to him; for this Herod had obtained by bribing him. [Joseph, lib. 14. cap. 32.]

At his entrance into Ephesus, the women went before him in habits of the Bacchante, and men in the habit of Satyres and Panes: all the city resounded with hurrying after Ivy Garlands with instruments of musicks flutes and pipes: they called him Διόνυσος ἡγεμὼν ἑστῶν ἡμῶν, Bacchus the bountiful and debonaire, [Plutarch.] He there sacrificed to Diana with all magnificence, as to the Protectour of that place: and absolved the Cassians upon their petitions who had fled into Sanctuary there, except Petronius who was guilty of the conspiracy against Cæsar, and Quintus who had betrayed Dolabella to Cæsar at Laodicea. [Apian, lib. 6. pag. 683.]

Thither came the Embassadors of Hyrcanus the High Priest; and of the Jews: to wit, Lyfimachus, the son of Paulanias, Joseph, the son of Mennæus, Alexander, the son of Theodorus, bringing unto him a Crown of gold; they declared unto him the same Embassie they did at Rome: desiring him, that those Jews that Cæsar had taken prisoners, contrary to the Laws of Arms, might, by his letters written to the Provinces, be set at liberty, and that their Country that Cæsar had taken from them, might be restored. Antonius thinking they demanded but equity, presently yielded to their requests, and wrote letters to this purpose, both to Hyrcanus himself, and also to the Tyrians, Sidonians, Antiochians, and Aradians, which are extant in Josephus, [lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 22.]

The Grecians and other Nations inhabiting Asia Pergamena, being cited to Ephesus, Antonius declared unto them, what great promises he had made to his conquering Legions, which with those that belonged to them made up; 150000 men and whereas they had given to Cæsar and Brutus his enemies ten years tribute in a year, he demanded of them that they should give him so much in one year, who complaining complaining that they were exhausted by their former enemies, at length very hardly obtained, that they might pay nine years tribute in two years, [Apian, lib. 5. pag. 673, 674.]

Antonius deprived many noble men of their estates, and bestowed them upon Knaves and flatterers, many begged the fortunes of some that were alive, and had them, and some of those that were dead, he bestowed the goods of a Citizen of Magnesia upon a Cook who had dressed but one supper, (as it is reported) handomely for him; at last, when he had bountified the Cities with another tribute, Hyrcanus who agitated the affairs of Asia, was so bold to say, if you can exact a tribute of us twice in a year, you must be able also to make two summers, and then to yield fruits to us twice, and when Asia brought in 200000 talents he said, if you have not received them, demand them, but if you have not that that you have received, we are undone; sharply nipping Antonius by this saying, who out of simplicity believing his own servants was ignorant of many things that were done, [Plutarch, in Antonius.]

In like manner other tributes were imposed by the command of Antonius upon Kings, Governours, and free Cities, each according to their abilities. [Apian, lib. 5. pag. 674.]

As he was going about the Provinces, L. the brother of Cassius, and as many as had heard of the act of clemency done by him at Ephesus, and were afraid, humbly came and presented themselves unto him, all whom he absolved, except those that were guilty of Cæsar's death, to whom only he continued unplaceable. [Id. ibid.]

The Lycians and Xanthians he freed from tribute, and exhorted them to rebuild their city, to the Rhodians also he gave Andros, Tenos, Naxos, and Myndus which not long after he took from them, as ruling too cruelly over them, but also granted to them of Laodicea and Tarsus, liberty and freedom from tributes, to the Athenians that came unto him, he gave first Tenos, and then Ægina, and also Icos, Cea, Sciatrus, and Parapathus, [ibid. pag. 675.]

Passing by Phrygia, Mylia, Gallogracia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Cœlosyria, Palestine, Iudæa, and other Provinces of the Syrians, he laid very grievous tributes on them all, he composed also all differences of Kings, and Cities after his own pleasure, and particularly in Cappadocia, the business of Silenus and Ariarathes, Silenus being preferred to the Kingdom, in favour of his beautiful mother, who yet in Syria he took away Tyranus from divers Townes, [ibid.] he committed the Government of Cyprus, to Demetrius the freed man of Julius Cæsar. [Dio, lib. 48. pag. 381.]

Antonius promised the Tarlenses the command of the university, and preferred Boethus to that office in that place, once as well an ill Poet, as an ill Citizen; yet Antonius approved his Poem that he wrote of his victory at Philippi: but the Tarlenses chiefly preferred him, because he was able on a sudden to speak something concerning any subject, but when the accounts of the expenses to be laid out in the university, were committed to his charge, he was found to have stolen both other things and also the oyl, upon which account being accused before Antonius, he answered him, as Homer sang the praises of Agamemnon, and Achilles, and also Ulysses, so have I thine, therefore it is not just that I should be accused of these crimes: before thee, but: answered the accuser, Homer stole no oyl from Agamemnon and Achilles, which because thou hast done, thou shalt be punished, nevertheless Boethus, having appeased his anger by some services, kept the Government of the City even to the death of Antonius, [Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 674.]

Cleopatra, what being brought in by Deltius, and partly trusting in the comeliness of her beauty and behaviour, came into Cilicia, unto Antonius, [Plutarch, in Antonio, cum Joseph. lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 23. Apian, lib. 5. pag. 673. & Dion. lib. 48. 371.] the fantastical lude of whose coming, is thus described by Plutarch more like a Poet, than an Historian, she was conveyed by a ship all guile, on the river Cydnus, which runs by the City Tarsus, with purple sails all spread, and the oars all silvered, with rums by the City Tarsus, and harps, the lay being cunningly dressed under a canopy of musick flutes, and pipes, and harps, the lay being cunningly dressed under a canopy of cloth of gold, as Venus is painted, boyes like to Cupids, stood here and there and fanned her, and her maidens in the habits of Nereides and Graces, stood at the helm, and others plied the oars: all the banks were filled with most fragrant fencels, by reason of the abundance of perfumes, the men from both sides the shore accompanied her from the river, and they that were in the city came to see the sight, so that Antonius was left alone sitting in the Forum, upon his Tribunal, and there went a generall rumour, that Venus was coming to feast with Bacchus; for the preservation of Asia, Antonius sent certain men to invite her to supper; but the thought it rather belonged to him to come to her: who that he might just at her coming shew his gentleness and censure, obeyed her and came.

Cleopatra, when Antonius accused her that she was not at part of Cæsar's labours in the last war, objected to him again among other things, both the four Legions that she

he had sent to Dolabella, and how her fleet was torn with Tempests, and how often Calpurnius had threatened her, because she had sent no aide to him: he being overcome, began, like a young man, although he was then forty years old, to love her; upon whom a good while ago, he had wondrously cast his eyes, when she was a but a girl; when he being a young man, followed Gabinus to Alexandria, being at that time master of his Hosts: and immediately Antonius his ancient industry decaying, all men did nothing but execute the commands of Cleopatra, without respect, either of Humane or Divine Law. [Appian, lib. 5, pag. 671, 673, 676.]

At the entreaty of Cleopatra, Antonius sent murderers to Miletus, to kill her sister Arinoe; a Niece of Dana Leucophrine, as Appian relates: [Ibid. pag. 676.] although Josephus saith that she was killed at Ephesus, as she was at her prayers in the Temple of Diana. [Ibid. lib. 15, cap. 14.]

Antonius commanded the Tyrians to deliver to Cleopatra Serapion, the Governour of Cyprus, who had sent aide to Cassius, and now came to beg his pardon: as also the Aradians, another suppliant; who when as Ptolemaeus, the brother of Cleopatra, being overcome by Julius Caesar in a naval fight, upon the river Nilus, and was never seen more, had bragged to the Aradians, that he was Ptolemy. He commanded also Megabazus, the Priest of Diana, the Ephesian, to be brought before him, because he had entertained Arinoe, as a Queen: but at the entreaty of the Ephesians to Cleopatra, he dismissed him. [Appian, ut supra, pag. 676.]

In the interim, Fulvia, the wife of Antonius in Italy, that had nothing of a woman in her, but her body, raised great stir and was against Caesar Octavianus, [Fellei, Paucal, lib. 2, cap. 74.] By which dissension both the affinity between them is broken off, and the Common-wealth is broken into open war: for Caesar seeing he could not endure the infolency of his mother in law, (for he had rather seem not to agree with her, than with Antonius) he made a divorce with her daughter Claudia, whom he swore was yet a Virgin. [Dion, lib. 48, pag. 359, 360. Sueton. in Octavio, cap. 62.]

Hercupon Caesar sent into Phœnicia to Antonius, Cocceius and Cecinna, of whom Cecinna, his Embassy being ended, returned to Caesar: but Cocceius tarried with Antonius. [Appian, lib. 5, pag. 707.]

There came an hundred of the most honourable among the Jews to Daphne, near Antioch in Syria to Antonius, now doting on the love of Cleopatra, that they might accuse Phalaclus and Herod: having chosen out for this purpose the most eloquent of their whole number, and Messala undertook to defend the young mens cause: Hyrcanus also assisted him, who had betrothed his daughter to Herod. But parties being heard, Antonius demanded of Hyrcanus, which party he thought to be fittest to govern a Common-wealth: when he had answered on the young mens behalf, Antonius who loved them, because he had been kindly entertained by their fathers, made them both Tetrarchs, leaving unto them the government of all Judea: and wrote letters also to this purpose, and clapt fifteen of their adversaries in prison, and would have put them to death, had not Herod interceded for them. [Joseph, lib. 1, bell. cap. 10, & lib. 14, Antiqui, cap. 23.]

Then a thousand men came from Jerusalem to Tyrus, to Antonius, who being already bribed by the brethren, commanded the magistracy of that place, that they should kill the Embassadors, as men that made innovations, and that they should aide the Tetrarchs: but Herod and Hyrcanus coming to them at their time without the City on the sea shore, advised them earnestly to withdraw; and admonishing them what danger would ensue, if they followed the suite: but they contemned this advice. Whereupon certain Jews, and the inhabitants of that City, brake out upon them, and killed some, and wounded other some: but Hyrcanus caused the wounded to be cured, and dead to be buried, and the rest took their flight homewards: but when the people did nothing but raise against Herod, Antonius in his displeasure slew those that he had in hold. [Ibid.]

Cleopatra being returned home, Antonius sent Horfemen to Palmyra, a City seated not far from Euphrates, to plunder it: a light crime being objected against them for colour sake; that whereas they lived in the confines of the Romans and Parthians, (they being Merchants, carried out of Persia, Indian, and Arabian wares to the Romans) but indeed, that they might enrich the Horfemen: of which when the Palmyreni had an inkling, they carried their goods to the other side of the bank, and placed Archers to keep them off, in which kind of weapon they do excel: but the Horfemen finding the City empty, returned without either plunder or bloodshed. Hercupon presently after followed the Parthian war; many Tyrants out of Syria, whom Antonius had expelled from thence, flying to the Parthians, and inviting them to seize upon Syria. [Appian, lib. 5, pag. 676, 677.]

Antonius, when he had laid grievous tributes on the people, and had thus offended the Palmyreni; he said not to ferle the troubles of the Province, but dividing his army into winter quarters, he himself went into Egypt to Cleopatra, [Ibid. pag. 677.] leaving Plancas in Asia, and Saxa in Syria, [Dio. lib. 48, pag. 371.] to wit Decidius Saxa: of whom Cicero makes mention in 13 Philippiques, as one of M. Antonius guard, and Livy [in lib. 127.] as of his Lieutenant in Syria.

This thing gave occasion to many stir; for they that inhabited the Island Aradus, obeyed not those that were sent to them, for the exacting the money, but also flew some of them: and the Parthians whereas before they were in some commotions, then much more made insurrections against the Roman; Labienus, and Pacorus the son of Orodes being their Commanders, [Dio. lib. 48.]

To the Aradians belongeth, that that is read in the Chronicle of Eusebius. Curtius Salafinus was burnt alive with four cohorts in the Island Aradus, because he too fiercely exacted their tributes. Concerning Labienus, who Livy notes in lib. 127. to have been of Pompey's faction, thus we read in Plutarch, [in Antonia.] When the forces of the Parthians were in success, of which Labienus being created General for the conduct of the Parthians, the Kings Captains being about to let upon Syria, Antonius was drawn away to Alexandria by Cleopatra.

From whence a place that was brought to this purpose by the compiler of the Parthian Story of Appian, [pag. 155, 156.] is to be corrected: who foolishly insinuates, that Labienus was brought by the Kings Captains to Alexandria: but Dio explains both the Original and Progreffe of this Expedition after this manner.

After the overthrow of Philippi Labienus, supposing that the Conquerors would pardon none of the adverse party, thought it better to live with Barbarians than to perish in his own country, and therefore stayed with the Parthians: and as soon as he understood of the sloth of Antonius, and his love and journey into Egypt, he advised the Parthians to make war upon the Romans, whose armies partly were cut off, partly received some losse, and the rest disgraced among themselves, and looked every day again as if they would come to a civil war. Wherefore he persuaded the King, that whilst Caesar was detained in Italy by reason of Sexus Pompeius, and Antonius gave himself over to his love in Egypt, he might subdue Syria, and the countries neer unto it. He promised him also that he would be the General of this war, and so he might move many Nations to revolt from the Romans, who were offended with them, for the continual damages with which they were afflicted by them, [Dio, pag. 371, 372.]

When he had persuaded the King by this discourse to make war, having received great forces from him, and his son Pacorus, he brake into Phœnicia; and setting upon Apamea, but being beaten from the wall, he took the Garrisons that were placed in that country by their voluntary resignation: those consisted of Cassius and Brutus his soldiers: whom Antonius had chosen into his army, and had left to keep Syria, as well knowing that country: therefore Labienus easily made them of his party, as they that were familiarly acquainted with him: except Saxa, who then commanded them, for he being the brother of Decidius Saxa the Lieutenant of Antonius, and his Quæstor, was the only man that joyned not with Labienus. [Ibid.]

Labienus overcame this Saxa in a late battle by the multitude and valour of his Hosts, and pursued him as he was flying by night out of his Camp. He had before shot tickers into his Camp, to draw his soldiers to his party; which thing also Saxa fearing fled. Labienus having overtaken him, killed most of them that were with him: but when Saxa had fled to Antioch, he took Apamea, which no longer resisted him, because it was generally reported that he was dead. He also took Antioch, and deserted by Saxa. [Ibid.]

M. Antonius being splendidly entertained by Cleopatra, wintered in Egypt without his imperial entigns, either as being in anothers government and royal City, or because he would solemnize Festival dayes in his winter quarters; for setting aside all business for his country, he wore the Grecian four-cornered Robe, and the white Attic shooe called Phacellum, which the Athenian and Alexandrian Priests did use. When he went abroad he went only to the Temples, or places of Exercise, or to the meetings of Philosophers, always keeping company with the Grecians, and courted of Cleopatra, for whose sake chiefly he laid he undertook this voyage, [Appian, lib. 5, pag. 677.]

Being thus given to luxury with Cleopatra and the Egyptians, he lay there idle even to his utter destruction, [Dio, lib. 48, pag. 373.] Plutarch describeth at large the luxury of him and his son, relating those things concerning this business that Philotas the Amphylian Physician told his Grandfather Lamprias, who was then at that time at Alexandria following his studies.

Cleopatra departing from him neither by night nor day, played with him at dice, drank drank with him, buisted with him, and law him exercifing himself in his armes; the accompanied him by night thorough the streets as he was eyvedropping at the gates and windows of the citizens, and talking to them that were within, and rambled with him, clad in the habit of a serving-maid; for he was wont to wear such habit himself; whereupon he returned home oftentimes well jered, and oftentimes well culgelled, [Plutarch, in Antonio.]

Antonius detested the Embassadors that were sent to him from the Italian Colonies; either because it was winter, or because he would conceal his counsels, [Appian, lib. 5. pag. 701.] but in the mean time Cæsar Octavianus did besiege the Consul L. Antonius his brother, at Perathum in Hetruria, [Id. ibid. pag. 689.]

Cn. Domitius Calvinus, and Añinus Pollio being Consuls, Perusia was taken by Octavian, [Dio, lib. 48. pag. 375.]

Labienus having followed Sæza, flying into Cilicia, there killed him, [Dio, lib. 48. pag. 372.] Labienus going from Brutus his camp to the Parthians, and leading an army of them into Syria, killed the Lieutenants of Antonius, having very much afflicted the transmarine provinces: Iach Velleius Paterculus [lib. 2. cap. 5.] but Florus in his fourth book 9 chapter Sæza (for thus it is to be read there: not Cæsa) the Lieutenants, was beholding to his own sword, that he might not come into his enemies power.

Sæza being dead, Pacorus subdued all Syria, [Florus & Dio, ut supra, cum Livio, lib. 127.] Tyrus only excepted, which the Romans that were left, and the Syrians who agreed with, had taken before, and neither by persuasions nor force could they be reduced under his power, for the Parthians had never a fleet with them, [Dio, ibid.]

In the second year (as it is in Josephus, [lib. 14. cap. 22.]) to wit from the coming of Antonius into Syria, in which, Pacorus the Kings son, and Barzaphanes a ruler of the Parthians seized upon Lyfia, Ptolemaus the son of Menneus died, whose successor in the principality Lylantias his son, (whom Dio hath made King of the Iuxians by Antonius) was made friends with An Antonius the son of Aristobolus, a noble man, who could do much with him, reconciling them.

M. Antonius at the beginning of the spring, went against the Parthians, he came as far as Phænicia, yea he came to Tyre; [Plutarch, in Antonio, Appian, lib. 5. pag. 701.] he failed thither, as if he would bring aid to the City; but seeing all the country about seized upon by the enemy, pretending the war against Sextus Pompeius, he left it; on the contrary, under pretext of the Parthian war he excused himself, that he did not sooner go against Pompey: it so happened, that he neither came to help his allies, under colour of Pompey, neither aided he Italy, under colour of the allies, [Dio, lib. 48. pag. 372.]

As he was passing by the continent, and sailing by Cyprus and Rhodes to Asia, he heard of the event of the siege of Perulia: and accused his brother Lucius, and his wife Fulvia, but more especially Marius, who was his agent in Italy in his absence, then passing into Græcia, he met with his mother Julia, and his wife Fulvia, who had fled out of Italy; and from hence, as he failed into Italy, he took Sipus, [Id. ibid. cum App. lib. 5. pag. 679. 701.]

Fulvia being dead at Sicyon, her husband Antonius, at the persuasion of his mother Julia and L. Coccinius, being about to treat of a peace with Cæsar, recalled Sextus Pompeius (with whom he had already entered into league,) into Sicily, as it were to provide for those things that they had agreed upon; and he sent Domitius Aenobarbus unto Bythinia to command there, [Appian, lib. 5. pag. 707. 708.] and seeing that Marcellus the husband of Octavia, the most beloved sister of Cæsar, although by another mother, was newly dead: for the more firm confirmation of a peace, he is betrothed to Antonius, who although he did not differable that he had to do with Cleopatra, yet denied that she was his wife, [Id. ibid. pag. 709. Livy, lib. 127. Plutarch, in Antonio.]

Then, dividing the Roman Empire between them, they made Codropolis, a Town of Illyrium, (which seemed seated within the innermost part of the Adriatick gulf) to be the bound of each others dominions: so that all the Eastern Countreys, as well Islands as Provinces, both of Europe and Asia, even to the river Euphrates, should fall to Antonius his part, and the Western as Sardinia, Dalmatia, Spain, and Gallia to Cæsar, for the Provinces of Africa, Lepidus the Triumvir had already received from Cæsar, and Sextus Pompeius had seized upon Sicily, [Plutarch, Appian, ibid. Dio, pag. 374.]

The war against Pompeius fell to Cæsar; unless something else did intervene, and to Antonius fell the Parthian war, to revenge the injury done to Crassus: Domitius Aenobarbus (although one of the murderers of Julius Cæsar) was taken into league by Cæsar, upon the same condition that he was formerly, by Antonius it was added to the league, that it might be lawful, for both the Generals, to muster the like number of Legions out of Italy, upon these articles the last league was made between Cæsar and Antonius, [Appian, pag. 709.]

Cæsar

Cæsar and Antonius entered Rome with an Oration, for joy of the peace that was made between them, [in script. Græc. per. CCXCVII.] whom the citizens entertained as triumphing; and clad them in a triumphall Robe, and placed them to see the Playes, in Ivory chairs, [Dio, pag. 375.] and then also was solemnized the Marriage between Antonius and Octavia, who was then great with child: and because the law forbade any woman to marry till ten months after the death of her husband, the time was remitted by a decree of the Senate, [Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 78. Plutarch in Antonio, Appian, lib. 5. pag. 710. Dio, pag. 375. fin.] But Antonius put Marius to death because he had exasperated Fulvia by his often complaining on Cleopatra, and because he had been the cause of to great evils, [Appian, ibid.]

Añinus Pollio had a son born in his Consulship, whom he called Saloniis, from his taking Salontæ, a city of Spalato in Dalmatia: for whom Virgil in his Pollio singing verses upon his nativity, out of the Cumzan or Sibylline Pomes, who dividing the ages of the World by metals, and in the tenth and last age of the World, (in which Sol or Apollo was to rule) foretelling that there should come to be a restoring of all things, pronounced that this year the Golden Age (and with it the Virgin, Erigone, or Alitæa, who had left the earth in the Iron Age) should return again, [Servius in Virgil, Eclogues, 4.] In which description the Poet seems to have inserted those things which either he had heard spoken of by the Jews, whom (Cicero in orat. pro Flacco, faith) that there were many dwelt at Rome about the Aurelian Stayres; or which he had himself read in the bookes of the Prophets, (which were common in the Greek tongue) written of him.

Pacorus the King of Parthia his son, having taken Syria, went into Palestina, and deposed Hyrcanus, who was let by the Romans to govern that country, and placed his brother Aristobolus in his room. Thus Dio, [lib. 48. pag. 372. 373.] ill confounding Aristobolus the father, with Antigonus the son; whereas he himself afterwards always calls this Antigonus the King, and not Aristobolus, [lib. 48. pag. 382. & lib. 49. pag. 405.] But most fully doth Josephus lay open this whole matter after this manner.

Antigonus the son of Aristobolus, said that he would give to the Parthians a 1000 talents and 500 women, if they would translate the kingdom from Hyrcanus upon him, and would also kill Herod with all that belonged to him: which things although he performed not, yet the Parthians to claim the kingdom for Antonius, marched with their army towards Judea. Pacorus the Kings son by sea, and Barzaphanes by land. The Tyrians shut their gates against him, but the Sidonians and them of Ptolemais, opened their gates to him. He lent a Squadron of horse into Judea before him to see what was to be done, and gave command that they should help Antigonus. He that commanded the Squadron was the Kings Butler, and called also Pacorus.

The Jews also inhabiting Mount Carmel, joining themselves with Antonius, and shewing themselves ready with him to invade the enemies country, he began to conceive some hope, that by their help he might bring under his power that part of the country, which is called Ditynos; where having encountered with his enemies, and putting them to flight, he pursued them even to Jerusalem.

Here also they of Antigonus his party, their number very much increasing, seized upon the Kings house; Phalaclus and Herod defending it: where in the Market-place there was a fight between them, and the enemies being overcome by the brethren, fled into the Temple: whom they having shut up in the Temple, they appointed 60 men to keep them, placed in the adjoining houses: but these, the people bearing a grudge to the brethren, burnt them with fire. Whereat Herod being angry, killed many of the people: and every hour, one laid waite for another, so that every day some were murdered.

When the day of Pentecost was come, there were many thousands of men, as well armed as unarmed, gathered together about the Temple, from all parts of the country, who seized upon both the Temple and the City, except the Kings house; for this Herod kept with a few soldiers, as his brother Phalaclus did the walls. But Herod (being something helped by his brother) assaulted his enemies in the suburbs, forced many thousands of them to flee, some into the City, some into the Temple, and some into a Rampire that was near the City.

In the mean while, Antigonus demanded that Pacorus the General of the Parthians might be admitted to conclude a peace between them. Pacorus being entertained by Phalaclus, perfwaded him that he would go as Embassadour to Barzaphanes, laying an ambush for him: he suspecting nothing went; Herod by no means approving this matter by reason of the perfidiousness of the Barbarians, but advising rather that he would kill Pacorus, and those that came with him. Wherefore Hyrcanus and Phalaclus went on with their Embassie; and Pacorus leaving with Herod 200

Yyy

Horsemen,

Horsemens, and ten whom they call Elutheri, took with him the Embassadors.

But as soon as they were come into Galilee, the governours of those Towns came out against them in arms; and Barzaphanes entertained them with a cheerful countenance, and bellow'd gifts upon them, but afterward laid ambushes for them. Phaulcus was brought with his train to a place near the sea side, called Ecdippion. Where Opheilius, learning from Saramulla, the richest of all the Syrians, that there were ambushes laid for Phaulcus, offered him shipping to shift away; but he unwilling to leave Hyrcanus and his brother Herod in jeopardy, expostulated with Barzaphanes, concerning the injury offered to Embassadors, who wearing that these things were not true, went presently to Pacorus.

He was no sooner gone, but Hyrcanus and Phaulcus were clapt up in prison, much detesting the perjury of the Parthians, and to Herod also was an Eunuch sent with command, to surprize him if he could get him out of the City. Herod understanding from others what had happened to his brother, taking with him what aide he had about him, and setting the women on Horse, to wit, his mother Cybele, his sister Salome, his wife Mariamne, and the Mother of his wife Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus, and his youngest brother Pheroras, with their Servants, and the rest of the company, he by night, unknown to his enemies, took his flight into Idumæa.

In the journey, his mother by the overthrow of her Coach, was in great danger of death, that Herod was so astonished, least the enemy should overtake them whilst they stayed there: that he thought to kill himself with his own sword: but being restrained by them that were about him, he went towards Mafada, a most strong fortified place, (which is seated in the Country of Arabia, and Palestina) by the nearest way he could possibly: the Parthians first pursuing him, and then the Jews, when he was but 60. furlongs from the City, but both overcome in fight.

After he was come to Refia, a Village of Idumæa, his brother Joseph came unto him; and seeing they brought to great a multitude with them, as without any hired Souldier, the Castle at Mafada, whither they were determined to fly, could not hold them, he dismissed the greater part of them, to wit, 5000. commanding them to shift for themselves in Idumæa, giving them victual, but taking unto him the choicest men, and his nearest friends, he entered the Castle, and there disposing of the women, with the rest of their companions, because there was plenty of corn, water, and things necessary besides, he himself went unto Petra, a City of Arabia.

The next day after he was fled from Jerusalem, the Parthians plundered all the goods of the Citizens of Jerusalem, and the Kings house also, onely the treasure of Hyrcanus, which was 300 talents remained untouched: a great part also of Herods substance, especially that that he providently had carried into Idumæa: neither were the Parthians contented with the plunder of the City, but going out of the City, they harried the Country also, and rased the rich City of Maritima.

Antigonus, being thus brought back into his Country, by the King of the Parthians, received Hyrcanus and Phaulcus, that were then prisoners; but he was very much aggrieved, that the women were got away, whom he had intended to deliver to the Parthians, together with the money that he had promised to give them: but then being afraid, least Hyrcanus, whom the Parthians had then prisoner, should again, by the favour of the people, be restored into his kingdom, he cut off his ears, that he might be rendered unfit for the Priesthood: the Law forbidding, that any one that wanted any member, should approach unto the Altar. [Levitic. XXI. 17, 18. &c.]

Phaulcus knowing that he was appointed to be put to death, seeing he could not lay violent hands upon himself, by reason of his chains, he beat out his own brains against a stone; but before he was quite dead, hearing by a woman, that his brother Herod was escaped, he greatly rejoiced that there was left one to revenge his death. But the Parthians, although they mist of the women which they most of all desired, notwithstanding, having seized all things at Jerusalem with Antigonus, when they departed, took Hyrcanus along with them prisoner into Parthia. [Joseph. lib. 2. bell. cap. 11. lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 24. & 25.]

At the same time Labienus took Cilicia, and all the Cities seated in the Continent of Asia, (for, for fear of him, Plancus, the Lieutenant of Antonius in Asia, had fled into the Island) except Stratonicea, most of them without stroke stricken, but Melissa and Alabanda he took by force: for these Cities, when they had entertained a Garrison from Labienus, on a certain festival day, put to death the Garrison, and revolted. Wherefore Labienus having taken Alabanda, put the Citizens to death, and rased Melissa, being abandoned by the inhabitants: and although he had a long time besieged Stratonicea, yet could he by no means get the City. At length, when he had gotten their money, and robbed their Temples, he called himself the Parthian Emperor, by a clean different reason from the Romans; for he imposed upon himself a name from them whom he led against the Romans, as if he had conquered them, and not his fellow Citizens. [Dio. lib. 48. pag. 373.]

Thus the Parthians, conquering for themselves under colour of Auxiliaries, Labienus being their Captain, they made excursions from Euphrates and Syria, even to Ionium, but yet more like thieves than enemies. [Florus, lib. 4. cap. 9. Plutarch in Antonie. Apian, in Syria, pag. 120, in Parthia, pag. 134, 156, lib. bell. Civil. pag. 739. For the stopping of whole progress, M. Antonius sent into Asia his Lieutenant M. Ventidius Bassus. [Plutarch, lib. 4. Apian, pag. 156, & 709.]

Ventidius was come to Labienus, before he knew any thing of it, who being terrified with his sudden coming, and destitute of his forces, for he had none with him, but Souldiers gathered out of Asia, and was without the Parthians, and not daring to meet him, he immediately put him to flight, and followed him as he fled with his light armed Souldiers, and having overtaken him at the Mountain Taurus, would not let him go any further. [Dio. lib. 48. pag. 380, & 381.]

In that place they lay quiet many days in their Camps, one over against the other, Labienus expecting the Parthians, and Ventidius the Legions: when as in those days that happened to both of them, that both desired to hide. Ventidius, because he was afraid of the Parthian Horse, kept himself on high (for there he had placed his Camp) and the Parthians trusting to their multitude, and contemning those that they had in those days past overcome, before they joyed with Labienus, early in the morning went towards the hill, and nobly coming out against them, they intended to go even to the top of the hill: and when now they were come up, the Romans running towards them, tumbled them headlong without any great paines. Thus the Parthians being slain partly by the Romans, but the greater part destroyed by their own party in their retreat; seeing that some were flying, when as some were but just come to the hill. [Ibid. pag. 381.]

Ventidius followed the Parthians that turned their flight, not towards Labienus, but into Cilicia, even to the Camp; who seeing Labienus there stood still: but when Labienus had let his men in array; but seeing his men astonished by the flight of the Barbarians, he durst not fight, but by night determined to fly some whither. Ventidius having intelligence of this by some Fugitives, killed many of them in their departure by ambushments: all the rest being deterred by Labienus, he took to himself. [Ibid.]

Labienus, having changed his habit, fled, and after he had laine hid in Cilicia some time, he was sought out, and taken by Demetrius, who then governed Cyprus for Antonius. [Ibid.]

These things thus done, Ventidius recovered and seized Cilicia, he sent before him Papedius Silo, with Horsemens to the Mountain Amanus seated in the confines of Cilicia and Syria, in those straits, which are called the gates. Silo by no means could get a Castle that was built there; and also he was brought into great danger by Pharnapates, the Lieutenant of Pacorus, who kept that place, and had been utterly routed, but that Ventidius came by chance as they were fighting, and to brought aide to his own party. He setting upon the Parthians on a sudden, and they also fewer in number, Pharnapates, with many others, being killed, he recovered Syria, now relinquished by the Parthians, without any war, except only Aradus: for the Parthians tearing they should be compelled to suffer punishment for the boldness against Antonius, yielded not to Ventidius, although some time assaulted by him. [Ibid. pag. 381, & 382.]

Herod, not yet assured of his brother Phaulcus his death, went unto Malchus, the King of the Arabians (Nabateans) who was obliged unto him; for many favours he had done him; being willing to expend 300 talents, to redeem his brother as soon as he could from the enemy: for which cause he carried with him Phaulcus, his brothers son, a child of seven years old, to leave him in pledge with the Arabians. But there met him some that were sent from Malchus, to him; that he should depart from the bounds of the kingdom, for to the Parthians had commanded: but he pretended this by the persuasion of his Noble men, and that he might couzen him of that treasure which his father Antipater had committed to their custody. Which Herod taking very heavily, returned unto a certain Temple, where he had left many of his followers: but the next day, when he came to Rhinocouras he heard of his brothers death. [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 25.]

Malchus repenting of this ingratitude, sent in all haste after Herod, but could not overtake him, for he was gotten far onward of his way, posting to Pelsutium, where the Mariners that were to sail to Alexandria, denying him passage; he was by the Magistrates of the place honourably entertained, and brought to Cleopatra the Queen,

Queen, who could by no means, detain him then, because he was hastning to Rome although the sea was very much troubled with tempests, and the affairs at that time were in no very good condition in Italy, for seeing that it was not yet winter time, (as Salianus hath observed against Tormellus, in the year of the world 4014 num. 26. &c. 27.) I take that ἡμεῖς 516 in Josephus concerning a storme at sea, which Herod neglectings failed from Alexandria towards Pamphilia, and being tossed with a grievous tempest, he cast over board much of his substance, and scarce got to Rhodes. [Joseph. ibid.]

Then met him at Rhodes two of his greatest friends, Sappinas and Ptolemæus, and finding the City had suffered much in the war against Cassius, he could not be restrained no not by his present poverty, but that he would do something for it even above his ability, he then caused a frigat to be built, and embarking himself with his friend, he arrived at Brundisium in Italy, from thence he went to Rome, and declared unto Antonius those things that had happened to him and his family, and how through these tempests; (ἡμεῖς 516) and continuing all dangers he had retired to him as his only refuge, and in whom all his hope lay. [id. ibid.]

The narration had moved the compassion of Antonius, calling to remembrance also his fathers friendship, but especially the promise of money, if he were made King by his means, and the hatred of Antigonus, as of a man of a turbulent spirit, and an enemy to the Romans: made him more inclined to Herod: Caesar also, partly for that Antipater had been fellow souldier with his father in Egypt; and for other curtesies which he had shewed him; and partly that he might gratifie Antonius, whom he knew was well affected to Herod, was willing to promote his endeavours, whereupon the Senate being called, Messala, and then Attianus, brought forth Herod, and after they had praised him, reckoning up the services and good will, that both his father and he had done for the Romans; they accused also Antigonus for ancient crimes, and that but newly in contempt of the Romans, he had received the Kingdom from the Parthians, and when Antonius had declared to the Senate, how much conducting it was to the Parthian war, that was then in hands that Herod should be made King; Antigonus was declared an enemy, and the Kingly title was devolved upon Herod by their generall suffrage. [id. ibid. cap. 26.]

The Senate being dismissed, Antonius and Caesar went out leading Herod between them, and being accompanied with the Consuls and other Magistrates, they went up into the Capitoll, to do sacrifice there, and to place there the decree of the Senate, and the new King the first day of his reign, was feasted by Antonius, and after this manner he obtained the Kingdom, in the CLXXXV. Olympiade, (not CLXXXIV. as it is in Josephus;) (Domitius Calvinus II. and Afinius Pollio being Consuls, and within seven daies Antonius dismissed Herod out of Italy, honoured with this unexpected felicity. [ibid.]

All the time of Herods absence, Antigonus assaulted his family in Masfada, abounding in all other provision, but only wanting water: so that for this very cause his brother Joseph was determined with 200 of his friends to fly unto the Arabians, for he had heard that Malchus now repented of the ingratitude he had shewed Herod; but a shower falling that night, he changed his purpose, for the cisterns being filled with water, they made a gallant sallie out, and killed many of Antigonus his men, both in open field, and covert assaults. [ibid.]

Ventidius easily recovered Palestina, Antigonus the King thereof being much afraid and exacted great sums of money from all men, but especially from Antigonus, Antiochus (Commagenian) and Malchus the Nabathæan; because they had aided Pacorus. [Dion. lib. 48. pag. 38a.] he came also into Palestina, under colour as though it were to help Joseph: but indeed with this purpose to extort money from Antigonus, therefore he encamped near Jerusalem, and drew from him a sufficient sum of money and to the intent that his fraudulent dealing should not be discovered, he left Silo there with some part of his forces: who also was to be pleased by Antigonus, lest he should raise him some new troubles, till the Parthians as he hoped, would come to his aid. [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 26.]

There was in the company of Antonius an Egyptian, one that cast nativities, who told him, that although his fortune was most splendid and great, yet it was obscured by the fortune of Caesar, and therefore perswaded him to get from that young man as far as he could, for thy Genius (said he) is afraid of his Genius; for whereas thy Genius is erect and high when alone, but he coming neer, is rendered more remissa and listher. [Plutarch. in Antono.]

After these things Antonius being to go to the Parthian war, had all his acts awfull past as to come, confirmed by the Senate, he again dismissed many of his commanders, and disposed all things as he would himself, he called some Kings by his owne authority, who should only pay a certain tribute, as he made Herod King both of the

Idumeans

Idumeans and Samaritanes, so Darius (the son of Pharnaces, and nephew of Mithridates) of Pontus, Amyntus of the Pisidians, Polemon of part of Cilicia, and other Kings of other Nations, [Appian. lib. 5. pag. 715.] Then committing the care of his family to Caesar, he departed out of Italy, taking with him Octavia into Græcia, of whom he had one son born, [Plutarch.] and there he spent many daies, [Dion. lib. 48. pag. 380.]

But his army, which was otherwise to winter about him, that he might accustom it to plunder and exercise, he sent against the Parthien, a Nation of Illyria, in former time greatly affected to Brutus: others against the Dardaniens, these also were of Illyria, and were wont to make inrodes into Macedonia: others he commanded to stay for him in Epirus, that he might have them all about him; for he had intended his winter quarters should be at Athens. He sent also Furnius into Africa, that he might conduct the four Legions of Sextius against the Parthians, for he had not as yet heard that Lepidus had taken them from Sextus. These things being thus disposed, he wintered at Athens with Octavia, as he had done before at Alexandria with Cleopatra. [Appian. pag. 715, 716.]

As he wintered at Athens, the first news of Ventidius's prosperous success were told him; how that the Parthians being overthrown, Labienus and Pharnapates, or Phraates the chief General of King Herod or Orodes, were killed by him. For this Victories sake he made a Feast for the Grecians, and let forth Playes of exercises to the people of Athens, in which he himself would be chief; wherefore leaving at home his Imperial ensignes, he went abroad with the rods that Judges in such exercises used, clad with coats and shoes called Phæcacia; and staving the young gamblers when they had contended as long as he thought good, parted them, [Plutarch.]

Antonius was praised at Rome, and processions decreed in his name: but to Ventidius himself, there was no reward decreed by the Senate, because he was not General, but carried on the war under the authority of another, [Dion. lib. 48. pag. 38a.]

The countries of Attalus and Dejotarus, which two were dead, were delivered to one Caesar. [ibid. pag. 377.]

Herod being returned out of Italy to Prolomais, having gathered store of souldiers both of hired, and those of his own country, hastned thorough Galilee against Antigonus: being aided by Silo and Ventidius, to whom Dellius (for so his name is to be read, in the 15 book, cap. 2. not Gellius) was sent from Antonius with command, that they should conduct him into his kingdom: although Ventidius was by chance detained for settling the tumults in divers cities, that the Parthians had raised: but Silo was in Judea, but bribed with money by Antonius. Yet Herods forces, as he went on, daily increased, and all Galilee, a few excepted, stood for his party, [Joseph. lib. 14. cap. 27.]

As Herod was marching to Masfada, because he must of necessity succour his kindred, Joppe would not let him passe: which he must first take from the possession of the enemy, because he would not have behind him any fortification, in his march to Jerusalem: which occasion Silo taking hold on, dislodged his army; whom when the Jews pursued, Herod met with a small band of man-serv'd Silo, &c. who fought very cowardly, [Id. ibid.]

After Joppe was taken, he hastned to Masfada to deliver his kindred from the siege, and his army was greatly increased, many of the country people joyning with him: and having discharged his friends from Masfada, he approached Jerusalem, in sight of Antigonus who had laid ambuscades for him in all convenient places: the souldiers also of Silo following him, and many of the Jews terrified with his power. And when he had encamped on the west side of the City, those that kept the walls on that side, shot at him their arrows and darts: divers also coming out in troops, and beating up their quarters, Herod commanded an Herald to proclaim round about the walls, that he came for the publick good, and for the conservation of the City, and that he would pardon all former injuries. On the other side, Antigonus turning his speech to Silo, and the Romans, told them, That it was unjustly done to give the kingdom to Herod, a private man, and an Idumean; that is, an halt Jew: whereas by custom, it ought to be given to the Priests line: and whereas Antonius his men, valiantly shooting from the Towers, had droven the enemy from the walls, Silo being bribed, furnished some souldiers of his acquaintance, who should demand larger provisions, and money to buy them, and should request to be withdrawn into commodious winter quarters. Whereupon the army being troubled and preparing to dislodge, Herod intreated the Captains and souldiers of Silo his army, that they would not leave him now, he being sent both by Caesar and Antonius, and all the rest of the Senate: and presently sending his souldiers into the country, he cut off all occasion of Silo his departure: such store of all necessaries being brought thither, more than any one could could hope for. He commanded also his friends that inhabited about Samaria, that they should bring to Jericho, corn, wine, oil, cattle, and other necessities, that for the future, there might be enough for the soldiery. [Ibid.]

Antigonus, when he knew this, presently sent into the country those that should intercept the victuals; but Herod taking with him some Cohorts, whereof five consisted of Romans, and as many of Jews, with whom he intermixed some foreign soldiery, and a few Horse, and went to Jericho: where finding the City forsaken of the inhabitants, and so that had fled with their families to the tops of the Hills, whom he took and let go again: But the Romans entering the City, plundered it, hiding the houses full of all precious moveables. The King therefore leaving a Garrison there, returned, and dismissed the Roman army to winter in the countries lately surrendered to him; namely, Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus also obtained of Silo by bribery that part of the Roman army should be lodged in Lydda, craving favour with Antonius. Thus the Romans lived in all plenty, and free from bearing arms, [Ibid.]

But Herod could not be idle, for sending his brother Joseph into Idumæa, with a 1000 Foot, and 400 Horse, himself went into Samaria, and there settled his mother and the rest of his kindred, whom he had drawn out of Masada, and marched into Galilee; and there surprised some places that were held by Antigonus his Garrisons. And when he came to Sephoris in snowy weather, Antigonus his men fled from thence, and he took great store of necessities. From thence he sent a troop of Horse, and three Companies of Foot, against some thieves that inhabited in caves, to keep them from doing mischief, who were not far from the Village Arbela. On the 40 day he came with the whole army, whom the enemy boldly met, and made his left wing begin to waver, until he came with the main Body, and succoured them, and forced his enemy that was conquering, to flee, and his own men who were fleeing to stand: and not content with this, he followed the chase as far as Jordan; so that he drew all Galilee to his subjection, except those that inhabited the caves: and giving every man of them a 50 drachmes, and more to the Captains, he dismissed them into their winter quarters, [Ibid.]

In the mean time, Silo came to him with his Captains who had wintered with Antigonus, for that he would not maintain them longer than one month; for he had sent to the inhabitants thereabout, commanding them, to spoil the country of all victual, and to flee to the mountains, that the Romans might perish thorough famine: but Herod committed the charge of provision to his brother Pheroras, commanding him to rebuild Alexandrium; who in a short time furnished the soldiery with abundance of all necessities; and rebuilt again Alexandrium, which was formerly dismantled. About this time Antonius sojourned at Athens, [Ibid.]

P. Ventidius, when he heard that Pacorus was gathering an army and coming into Syria, was afraid; whereas neither the Cities were fed, and the armies as yet were dispersed in their winter quarters. Wherefore that he might give a stop to Pacorus, and remedy the slowness of his own Forces, he went to Chaunæa a certain Governor, one that he was well acquainted with, but one that he knew wished well to the Parthians. Him nevertheless he highly honoured as if he had been his faithful friend, and demanded advice of him in some affairs; so that, yet without any hurt to himself, he would seem to have this opinion of him, that he would make him partaker of his most secret counsels. The business being brought to this pass, he feigned as though he were afraid lest the Parthians omitting their usual passage over Euphrates at Zeugma, should use some lower part of the River: because that there the Champions were fitter for the Parthians, but here the Hill for him; and thus he persuaded Chaunæa, and by him deceived Pacorus. So that chusing the longer march by the Champions, (by which Ventidius feigned he would not have him come) he gave Ventidius time to collect his Forces. Thus Diocletian the business in the 56 book of History, [pag. 403, 404.] but Frontinus, lib. 10. Stratagem. cap. 1. thus, Ventidius in the Parthian war against King Pacorus, knowing that one Pharnæus a Cynethian by birth, who seemed to be one of his allies, that he told the Parthians, whatsoever was done in his Camp, turned the perfidiousness of the Barbarian to his own profit; for those things he most desired, he dissimulated as though he were afraid they should happen, and those he was afraid of, he made as though he desired: for being troubled lest the Parthians should pass Euphrates, before that the Legions could come to him, which he had in Cappadocia on the other side Taurus; he very carefully wrought with the Traytor, that by his ordinary perfidiousness he should persuade the Parthians, that they should pass their army over at Zeugma, both where the cut is shorter, and the channel not so deep; for if they should come that way, he affirmed, that he could make much use of the Hills to evade the archers, but that he was mightily afraid, if they should come into the open field.

Antonius having spent the winter at Athens, with great luxury and pleasure of Octavia, as if he had been clean another man, he returned to the old Roman fashion, and changed his behaviour; for now the Lictors were about the gates, and the Captains, and his guards, and all things ordered to make men afraid of him. Embassadors now had audience, which were deferred for a long time; justice was administered, the ships were launched, and things were in a hurry for the preparation. [Appian, l. 5. p. 716.] Finally, he took him a Crown from the sacred Olive tree, being to go to the war; and for satisfaction of a certain oracle, he carried with him a vessel, filled from the Mountain Claplydra. [Plutarch, in Antonio]

In Syria, Ventidius sending for Silo to go against the Parthians, commanded him first to aide Herod, and then to bring Herod along with him, and the rest of the Auxiliaries of those Provinces; but Herod, having sent Silo unto him, marched with his soldiery against the thieves that lived in the caves; as Josephus more fully shows in [lib. 1. Bek. cap. 12. lib. 14. cap. 27.]

Herod made Ptolemæus governor of the Country, but his government happened not well for him; for being invaded by them, who formerly disturbed the Country, he was killed. Which being done, they retired into tents, and unaccessable places, infesting with robberies and irruptions all that Country. But Herod being returned, made them pay dear for their thievery; for of these revolvers, some he killed, others flying into fortified places, having conquered them, he punished them, and rated their strong holds; and so taking away the authors of the innovations, he freed the Cities in an 100 talents. [Joseph, ibid.]

Pacorus coming into Syria, with great forces of the Parthians, left that shorter cut at Zeugma, and brought his army about by the lower way; and whilst the Barbarians join the bridge to those wider banks, and therefore more unwieldy, and bring on their Engines, 40 days are spent: which space Ventidius used to gather his forces together, which he received, but three days before the Parthians came: whom when Ventidius had suffered to pass the river, for he did not let upon them in their passage; he brought them into this opinion, That the Romans were to retire and towards. Ventidius also, by a dissimulated fear, kept himself a long time quiet, and suffered the Parthians a long time to insult. At last he sent part of the Legions against them, as they were in security and jollity: at whose first brunt the Parthians were discomfited and routed. But when Pacorus saw his men flying, he thought that all the Legions had been withdrawn with them, wherefore he let upon Ventidius his Camp, with his main body, although it had been left without any to defend it: which being leaped upon an hill, and the Parthian Horsemen invading, they were easily tumbled down the precipice, by a sudden fall that the Romans made. Yet Ventidius led not out the other part of the Legions into the Camp again, till they were come within half a mile of him; and then made so sudden eruption, that being near them, he made their darts of no use against him, of which there was great use at a distance: by which policy he quickly beat the Barbarians, because carried with a kind of ostentation of confidence, The slingers helped him very much, who exceedingly afflicted the Barbarians with their violent strokes at a distance: yet the Parthians of whom many armed at all points fought stoutly; and Pacorus himself valiantly fighting, fell down dead: for whole dead body a few courageously strove, but in vain: to be short, Ventidius slew all the Parthian Horsemen, all along between the river Orontes and Euphrates, making a slaughter of above 20000 neither in any war did the Parthians receive a greater wound. Of them that fled, some that endeavoured to get home over the bridge, being prevented by their enemies there perished: others fled into Commagena, to King Antiochus. And thus Ventidius again drove the Parthians within Media, and Melopotamia, but would not pursue them any farther, fearing the envy of Antonius. [*Livy, lib. 128. Florus, lib. 4. cap. 9. Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 751. Vellei. Paternul, lib. 2. cap. 78. Joseph, lib. 14. cap. 27. A Gelius, lib. 15. cap. 4. ex Sueton. Justin, lib. 48. cap. 4. Plutarch, in Antonio. Jul. Frontin. The most famous victory was obtained in Syria Cyrestica. [Strabo, Plutarch, Dio.] and Pacorus was killed the same day of the year, in which (fifteen years before) his father Orodes had killed Crassus by his Captain Surena. [Dio, pag. 404. Eutrop. Sext. Rufus, Oros.] which was done in the month of June, as Ovid faith in his 6. lib. Fastorum.

Ventidius making an expedition against those that had revolted, subdued them, [Plutarch.] for the Syrians did extremely love Pacorus for his justice and clemency, as never any King the like, [Dio, pag. 404.] Wherefore, when as Syria expected the event of the war, but doubtfully, Ventidius carrying about Pacorus his head to all the Cities that had revolted, he easily quieted it without any stroke stricken. [Id. ibid. Florus lib. 4. cap. 9.]

Ventidius making an expedition against those that had revolted, subdued them, [Plutarch.] for the Syrians did extremely love Pacorus for his justice and clemency, as never any King the like. [Dio. pag. 404.] Wherefore, whenas Syria expected the event of the war, but doubtfully, Ventidius carrying about Pacorus his head to all the Cities that had revolted, he easily quieted it without any stroke stricken. [Id. lib. Florus, lib. 4. cap. 9.]

Orodes, who a little before had heard that Syria was wasted, and Asia seized upon by the Parthians, and gloried that Pacorus had conquered the Romans; when he heard of a suddain, that his son was dead, and his army destroyed, for very grief fell mad: for many dayes he spake to no man, nor eat any thing, but was speechlesse, to that he seemed to be stricken dumb: but after many dayes, when grief had loosened his voyce, he did nothing but call Pacorus, that he spake with him, and that he stood by him, and then again would with tears bewaile the losse of him. [Justin, lib. 42. cap. 4.]

At Rome there were decreed for this victory against the Parthians, both processions and a Triumph (but yet he never triumphed) both for his eminency, and also according to the Laws, because it was his Province. There were the same things decreed to Ventidius, because he seemed abundantly to have recompensed the overthrow of Crassus, by the like upon Pacorus. [Dio. lib. 49. pag. 404, 405.]

Ventidius led his army against Antiochus the Commagenian, under colour, that he had not given him his servants, but indeed in hope to possesse his treasure, of which Antiochus had good store. [Id. lib. pag. 404.]

Him he assaulted, being shut up in Samolata, but promising 1000 talents, and that he would be obedient to Antonius, he commanded him to send Embassadors unto him, (for he was far from thence) to demand peace of him; for this onely he would have to belong to him, that all things should not seeme to be done by Ventidius alone, [Plutarch, in Antonio.]

Antonius commanded Ventidius, that he should send Macharas to aide Herod with two Legions, and 1000 Horse, [Joseph, lib. 4. cap. 27.] but yet for both the victories of Labienus, and of Pacorus, which were gotten by Ventidius, Antonius did not onely not rejoyce, but envied him also, because of his prosperous successe by his own conduct; and although there were processions and a Triumph decreed to him, for both the victories that Ventidius had gotten, yet he thrust him from his charge, (the government of Syria) and neither then, nor hereafter, used his help any more. Thus Dio, although Plutarch hath written, that he was honoured by him, and that he was sent by him to Triumph.

Macharas being drawn by Antigonius, and corrupted with money, against Herods persuasion went unto him, as if he went to look to his actions; but Antigonius suspecting him, gave him not admission, but drave him from thence with slings: he then perceived that Herod had given him good counsel, and his own error in not following it. Wherefore he retired to Emmaus, and in his march killed all the Jews that came to hand, without distinction of friend or foe, he being angry at those things that had happened. At which fact Herod being fore grieved, came to Samaria, with an intent to go to Antonius; saying, That he had need of other manner of men than those, who did him more hurt than his enemies, whereas of himself he was to subdue Antigonius. But Macharas overtaking him, entreated him to stay, or if he were determined to go on, at least that he would give him his brother Joseph, that they together might make war against Antigonius. Thus was he, after much intreaty, reconciled to Macharas, and having Joseph his brother with the army, command him that in his absence, he should put all to the hazard of a battle, but he himself halted to Antonius, whom he found assaulting Samolata, a city near Euphrates, and brought with him Auxiliaries both of Horse and Foot. [Joseph, lib. 14. cap. 27.]

After he was come to Antioch, he found many there, who desired to repaire to Antonius, but durst not venture, because the Barbarians had beset the wayes, to whom he offered himself to be their guide, and so came to Samolata to Antonius, having overcome the Barbarians once or twice, when he was entertained by him very honourably and much praised for his valour. [Id. ib.]

Seeing the siege of Samolata lasted long, the besieged turning valiant, out of dispaire of peace, (as it is in Plutarch) Antonius also suspected that his souldiers alienated from him, because he had used Ventidius ignominiously, (as Dio hath it) he privately mentioned some hope of peace, that he might with honour depart: and when he could not receive no more than two hostages, and they not noble men, neither the money he had demanded; he granted peace to Antiochus, and was content with 300 talents, yielding also unto him, that he might put to death Alexander, who had formerly fled from him to the Romans. Dio, lib. 49. pag. 405. Plutarch, in Antonio, Oras, lib. 6. cap. 18.]

This war being ended after this manner, he delivered to C. Sotius the government of Syria and Cilicia with an army, [Dio, lib. 48. pag. 405. Joseph, lib. 14. pag. 27.] who had often very good successe in Syria. [Plutarch, in Antonio.]

The affairs in Syria being something cooled, Plutarch writes, that Antonius returned to Athens; Josephus, that he went into Egypt; Dio that he intended to go for Italy, so that he may seem first to have returned to Athens, from thence to have passed into Italy, being called thither by Caesar, and the King returned to Athens to have sailed into Egypt to winter with Cleopatra, for he was sent for by Caesar from Athens, that they might consult together about the war against Sexus Pompeius; whither he came with a few as far as Boudisium; where seeing he found not Caesar at the day appointed, being affrighted with a certain prodigy, he went back again into Græcia under colour of the urgency of the Parthian war; Caesar not taking it well, that he did not stay for him. [Appian, lib. 5. pag. 717. Dio, lib. 48. pag. 385.] Josephus unmindfull of his brother Herods commands, in his absence taking with him his own and five Roman cohorts given him by Macharas, went towards Jericho, that he might reap: the enemies corn now it was ripe, and encamped in the mountaines, and because the Roman cohorts were most raw souldiers & unskillfull of the art military, because most of them were taken up out of Syria, he being circumvented by the enemies in the midst of those fastnesses, having lost six cohorts, he himself also valiantly fighting was slain; yea Antigonius being master of the dead bodies, was so enraged, that he whipped the dead body of Joseph; although Pheroras his brother offered 50 talents to redeem it, after which the Galileans revolting from their Governours, drowned those that were of Herods party in the lake, in Idumea, also there were many innovations; when Macharas fortified Gitta, [Joseph, lib. 1. cap. 13. Antiquit. 14. cap. 27.]

Caus Sotius being commanded by Antonius to help Herod against Antigonius, sent with him two cohorts into Judea, [Id. ibid.] he subdued the Aradians, who had endured a siege but now were worne out with famine and sicknesse. [Dio, lib. 49. pag. 405.]

His brothers mischance was told to Herod at Daphne, the suburbs of Antioch, who expected some such thing by reason of some dreames that he had, wherefore hastning his journey, after he was come into mount Libanus, he took with him 800 men of that place, and leading with him one cohort of the Romans, and came to Ptolemais; from whence by night he went with the army and passed through Galilee. [Joseph, in supra.]

Here his enemies met him, who were overcome in fight and forced into the castle from which they issued the day before, when Herod assailed by break of day, but being compelled to desist by reason of extremity of the weather, he led his men into the villages adjoining, but upon the coming of another cohort from Antonius, they that kept the fort were dismayed, and forsook it by night: Herod also halted to Jericho, with an intent to revenge his brothers death, whither when he was come, he made a feast to the noblemen; and after the feast was ended, and the guests dismissed, he retired to his lodging, and the room in which they had supped, being now empty of company, fell down and did no body any hurt, whereby it came to passe, that all thought Herod to be beloved of God, who had so miraculously preserved him. [Id.]

The next day 6000 of the enemies came down from the tops of the mountaines, to fight with him, and terrified the Romans, and their forlorn hope with darts and stones chased Herods souldiers, so that the King himself received a wound in his side. [Id.]

Antonius sent a captain whose name was Pappus into Samaria, desiring to seem to have to many forces, as he could make war abroad, but he went against Macharas; and as touching Herod he had taken five rownes, and put 2000 of the Garrison souldiers to the sword, and then having set the Townes on fire he went against Pappus, who was encamped at a village called Ispane. [Id.]

Herod, many coming to him out of Jericho and Judea, when he saw the enemy was so bold as to come to battle with him, fought with them and overcame them: and being inflamed with a desire to revenge his brothers death, he slew them that fled, and followed them even into the village, but the houses being filled with souldiers, and some flying to the tops of the houses, these being overcome and the houses thrown down, yet he found all other places filled with souldiers, all whom being after a miserable manner crushed to death, the rest fled out in companies being fore affrighted, and immediately Herod had gone to Jerusalem, had not the sharpness of the winter hindered him, and put an end to the war, for now Antigonius began to think of flying, and to forsake the city. [Id.]

Herod in the evening, when he had dismissed his friends to retire themselves, he as yet hot in his armour, went into a chamber being accompanied with only one servant

(servant to wash himself, where within were some of his enemies armed-whom fear had forced thither, and whilst he was naked and washed himself, one with a drawn sword run hastily out of the doores, and then another, and likewise a third all armed, they were so affrighted, that they were glad to save themselves, without doing the King any hurt; the next day among others he cut of Pappus his head, and sent it to his brother Phorocus in revenge of his brothers death whom he had killed, it was Pappus who with his own hand had killed Joseph. [ibid.])

At Rome on the V Kalends of December, P. Ventidius for his victory at mount Taurus, and over the Parthians, as we read in marble Kalendars of the triumphs Gruterus inscrip. pag. CCXCVII.] Thus Ventidius Ballus a man of base parentage came by the favour of Antonius to such height of honour, that he was made Governor of the Eastern Provinces, and triumphed for his conquest over Labienus Pacorus and the Parthians, who himself was once, and again too, (if we may believe Maffius in Pliny) led in triumph with other captives: [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 65. Plutarchus Maximus lib. 6. cap. 9. Pliny lib. 7. cap. 43. A. Gellius lib. 15. cap. 4. ex Sueton. Plutarch. in Antonio. Dio, lib. 62. ap. 405. Eutrop. lib. 7.] I see before in the end of the year of the Julian Period 4671. Spain being now reduced under the power of Cæsar Octavianus by Domitius Calpurnius the Proconful, the Spaniards begins their computation of time from the Kalends of January of this year, as may be understood from others; and also from Fulvius the Arch-bishop of Toledo, in his memorial of the Saints.

In the beginning of the Spring, Antonius arrived with 300 ships at Tarentum, out of Syria (as Dio) or from Athen. (as Appian hath it) to aid Caesar against Sextus Pompeius: of which when he would make notice, Antonius took it ill, yet stayed in the same place; for feeling that he had again lost his will bestowed to much cost upon the Navy, and had used of Italian Legions or the Parthian was thought to change his fleet for them: and although by the agreement, both of them had power to raise soldiers in Italy; yet it would be very difficult for him, Italy by her falling to the others there. Wherefore he sent Octavia (who accompanied him out of Greece, who also was then with child, and by whom Antonius had had a second daughter) to her brother Caesar, that the might be a stickler between them: who brought the business to that paffe, that Antonius should deliver to Caesar at Tarentum presently, an 150 ships, (for which Plutarch puts an 100 beaked-ships) for which Caesar promised that he would lend to Antonius out of Italy 100 myriads (as it is in the same Plutarch) or 20000 soldiers, (as Appian hath it) Moreover besides the covenants, Octavia obtained for her brother of her husband, 20 small ships, as Plutarch, or ten Gallies three oares on a feat, as Appian relates: and Caesar again gave to Octavia a 1000 picked men for his guard, leaving the choice of them to Antonius. [Plutarch in Antonio, Appian. l. 5. pag. 755. Dio. lib. 48. pag. 390.] and that there might be more ties of kindred, Caesar betrothed his daughter (Julia) to Annylus the son of Antonius, and again Antonius betrothed the daughter he had by Octavia, to Domitius (Acobarus) although he was guilty of the murder of Julius Caesar, and had been prohibited: but these things were but feigned by them, as which they would never do, but only the present occasions require it. [Do. ibid.] only the present occasions require it. [Dr. Williams.]

 And because the five years time of the Triumvirate was out, they prolonged their power to themselves for another five years, not caring for the peoples content. [Isid. ibid.
Appian, pag. 726, 727.] But Antonius sent back Octavia into Italy, for fear of any danger in the Partisan war: and having commended to Caesar the children that he had, both by hers, and Fulvia, he went into Syria. [Plutarch in Antonio, Appian, pag. 727. Dr. A. pag. 390, 391.]

719. 116. pag. 334. 325. J. The Library in the same place, where the old one at Alexandria was burnt in Julius Cæsar's time, which was called the daughter of the former: as Epiphanius affirmeth in his book of measures and weights: when yet from the year of Ptolemæus Philadelphus, in which we have lived at the year of the Julian Period, 4437, that the former Library was built, he'll reckon 249 years to this time, which should end in the year 4686 of the Julian Period, which was one year after Cleopatra's death, and whereas: the chief error of the calculation ariseth from hence, that Epiphanius attributeth 24 years to the reign of Cleopatra, for 23 which ten superfluous years being taken away, we make the time between the beginnings of the two libraries 239 years, and to this belongs that, which is read in Plutarch, in Antonio, that it was ordered to Antonius by Calpurnius, that he had given to Cleopatra the libraries that were at Pergamum, in which were 30000 entire books, or single volumes, and Strabo (spake of κατασκευασμένα βιβλία, polished, not of libraries that were then extant in his time, [lib. 13. pag. 624.]) (as Lippius thought in the fourth chapter of his Synagoge of libraries.)

Herod in the beginning of the third year, after he had been declared King at Rome, coming with an army to Jerusalem, encamped near the City; and presently moving moving nearer where he thought the walls *se*ft to be assaulted, he placed his tents before the temple; intending to all ute them, where Pompey had do ne i n time past, wherefore having compassed the place with three bulwarks, he erected his batteries, by the assistance of many workmen, and fetching materials from all places thereabout, and setting fire to men to oversee the works, he went to Samaria to solemnize his marriage, with Mariamne the daughter of Alexander the son of Aristobolus, who was formerly betroathed to him. [Jos^{eph}. lib. 4. cap. 27. fin.] understand to him: [Jephr. cap. 2, p. 16.] The marriage Solus could then upon, having sent his army through the country, and Herod, who was then having with him his own horse and foot: Herod also came from Samaria, bringing with him no small accession to the old army: but they were about 3000, all the army came together, there were eleven Legions of Foot, and 6000 Herod, besides the Syrian auxiliaries, (which are not to be reckoned for the least part) placed their camp at the north wall of the City, of this army there were two Generals, Solius: who was sent by Antonius to aid Herod, and Herod, who made war for himself with an intent, that having disposed Antigonus an enemy of the people of Rome, he might be King in his room according to the decree of the Senate. [Id. ibid. cap. 28, lib. 3, bell. cap. 13.]

The Jews being gathered together, out of the whole Country, and here shut up within the walls made valiant resistance, boasting much of the temple of the Lord, and willing wot to the people, and saying, that God would not forsake his in their danger, and [spoiling all provision that was without the City, both for man and horse; by secret thefts all they made provisions very scarce to the besiegers, but Herod provided well for this, for placing ambushments in convenient places he prevented the thieves, and sending soldiers he fetched provisions afar off, to that in a short time the army was well furnished with all necessaries. [ibid.]

By the multitude of the workmen, the three bulwarks were easily finished, it was now summer, and the work went on, being hindered by no untemperance of the weather, he often battered the walls with his engines, and left nothing unslayed, but the besieged fought valiantly, and used all cunning to evade their enemies' endeavours, and making often sallies out, they set fire on their works both which were begun, and some also finished, and coming to handy strokes with the Romans they were nothing inferior to them in manhood, but only in martial skill. [ibid.]

3867. The Sabbath was now coming, brought a famine to the Jews that were besieged, notwithstanding which, they made a new wall for that, that was beaten down by the Engines, and countermined the enemies mine, so that sometimes they came to fight hand to hand under ground, and using despair rather than courage, they held out to the last, 7o pph. lib. 1. c. 28. although Pollio the Pharisee, and Samias his disciple, advised them to bett H-rod into the City, (saying they could not avoid his being their King by reason of their sins.) 1d. ibid. cap. 17. lib. 15. cap. 1.

They held out the siege during five months space, for all there was so great an army besieging them, [Id. lib. 1. bell. cap. 13.] at length 20 of Herod's choicest souldiers got upon the wall, and then the Centurions of Sosius, [Id. ibid. lib. 14. Antiquit. cap. 28.]

The first wall was taken on the 40 day, and the second on the 50, and some galleries about the temple were burnt, which Herod slandered Antigonus to have burned, to show that he had not burnt the temple, but the people, the outward part of the temple being taken, and the lower City, the Jews fled into the inner part of the temple, and the upper City; and fearing that they should be hindered from offering the daily sacrifices to God, they sent Embassadors to demand leave that those beasts only might be brought in, which also Herod granted, hoping by this means they would leave their obduracy and submit themselves. [ibid. cap. 29.]

ulinary and worth themselves. [10:1, 4:1]
 But perceiving that his opinion lailed him therein, and that he befieged obstinately contemned the continuall love of signity in Antigonus, he gave a general assault, and won the City, [10:1, 4:1] to wit: on the Kalends of January, at the year of the Julian Period, 465, on the second day of the month Cifu, which according to the accounts of the Eastern people of the world year was the third 5 being the 28 day in which the Jews were wont to celebrate a solemn fast, in memory of the holy rowle that was burnt by Jehoiachim, as hath been formerly shewed by us, at the year of the Julian Period 465.

These Kalends of January, by reason of the bad account intercalating received at that time at Rome, till upon the last of December, which ended both the first five years of the Triumvir, and also the Consulship of Claudius and Norbanus, to which this calamity of the Jews is referred by Dio, [lib. 49. pag. 405.] and the next day M. Velpfanius Acipia, and L. Cuminus Gallus entered upon their Consulships at Rome, to which the lam: is referred by Josephus, in the last Chapter of the 14. book of Antiquities, declaring the time that this happened in. This calamity of Jerusalem happened in the Consulship of M. Agrippa and Canidius Gallus, in the CLXXXV. Olympiade, (to wit in the third year) the third month, on a solemn Fast-day, as if the calamity brought upon the Jews twenty seven years before, had come again upon the same moment of time, (for the City was taken by him on the same day.) But yet this interval of time exceeds the true account one year; unless you interpret twelve years in the year after twenty seven as Mark VIII. 31. it is said, that Christ shall rise again, twelve years, after three days; which is more clearly propounded, March, XVI. 21. twelve years after the third day, and that in the II of Mac. XIV. 1. twelve years after the time of three years, the Interpreters expound it of the third year, in the Catalogue of the Stadionic, of Julius Africanus, Olympiade CXL, the Games of Olympus are said to be celebrated by Nero not at a lawful time, but twelve years to wit, in the second year of that Olympiade, [in Græc. Eusebian, Scalgeri, pag. 221.] Yea, even in Josephus himself, that which in the first book of the war, cap. 11. is said, twelve years, in the 14 of Antiquities, cap. 23. is expounded twelve years.

The City being won, all things were filled with murders: the Roman, being incensed that they had for long continued the siege, and the Herodian Jews endeavouring to extirpate the contrary faction, so that there were continual slaughters through the Porches and Houles, yea, the reverence of the Temple not saving the suppliants: they spared neither age nor sex, nor so much as the children; and although he besought them, and intreated them to forbear, yet none obeyed him, but as if they had been mad, they shewed their cruelty without any distinction of age. [Joseph, lib. 14. cap. ult.]

Antigonus coming down from the Town, fell at Sotius his feet; who notwithstanding the change of his fortune, insulting over him, called him, Madam Antigonus, but put him in prison, and set keepers over him. [Id. lib.]

When as a multitude of strangers that he had hired, came rushing in, not into the Temple only, but also the Sanctuary; whereof some he reit rained by courtesy, some by threats, and some by force of arms: thinking his victory worse than it he had been overthrown, if any of those things which were not lawful to be seen, were beheld by the profane multitude. He forbade also any plunderings in the City, as much as in him lay; and likewise intreating Sotius, asking if the Romans would make him King of a wilderness, the City being so exhausted with rapines and murders, who answering, That the Souldiers desired the plunder of the City, in regard he had endured the siege; whereunto Herod answered, That he would reward every man out of his own Treasury, and by this means he freed the City from any farther vexation, by performance of his promise; for he bestowed his gifts liberally to the Souldiers, and in proportion to the Commanders, and royally to Sotius, and to Sotius, offering a Crown of gold to God, departed from Jerusalem, leading Antigonus with him prisoner to Antonius. [Id.]

Herod, making a difference of the multitude of the City, advanced those that were of his faction, and daily put them to death that were of the contrary. [Joseph, lib. 1. Bell. cap. 13, lib. 15. Antiquities, cap. 1.] Among whom, he also put to death all those judges of the great Sanhedrim, who had accused him of some capital crime before he was King, except Pollio the Pharisee, and his disciple Sames, whom he highly honoured. [Id. lib. 14. Antiquities, cap. 17. lib. 15. cap. 1.]

He gathered together all the royall ornaments, and what by collections, and by taking away from rich men, great store of gold and silver, and gave it all to Antonius and his souldiers. He put to death also 45 of Antigonus his chief Noble men, and set watch at the doors, that none of them might be carried out under colour of being dead; and what gold or silver soever was found, was all brought to Herod, so that there was no end of these miseries, for the covetousness of the needy Conquerour consumed all their goods. The fields also, by reason of the Sabbatical year, lay untilled, in which it was unlawful to sow. [Id. lib. 15. cap. 1.]

Of these miserable times, among others were spectatours, Zacharias the Priest, with his wife Elizabeth, of the relics of Davids stock, Heli and Joseph, Anna also the Prophetesse, of the tribe of Aser, and Simon the Just, who received an answer from the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, till he had seen the Lords Christ. [Luke II. 26.]

Antonius, having taken Antigonus, intended to keep him prisoner with him until his Triumph: but seeing Herod was afraid, least Antigonus, being brought to Rome by Antonius, should contend with him before the Senate, for his right to the kingdom: and Antonius heard, that the Nation were ready to innovate, and for hatred to Herod, favoured Antigonus, having received great sums of money from Herod, he cut off Antigonus his head at Antioch, having lulled him on with vain hope of life, even unto the last: which being done, Herod was totally freed from fear, the principality lity of the Halmonazan, being taken away. [Id. ibid. & lib. 14. cap. ult. lib. 20. cap. 8. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 13.]

From the beginning of the Priesthood and principality of Antigonus, to the taking of Jerusalem, are reckoned about two years and seven months, from whence also in the third year of the reign, both of Antigonus, and also of Herod, he is said to be killed by Antonius, in the 52 Chapter of the Jewish History, which is written in Arabicke, set forth in the Paris Bible of many Languages: But Josephus attributes to Antigonus but three years and three months, [lib. 20. cap. 8.] which if they be to be extended to his death, will argue that it was delayed till the month of August of this year: to which, according to our account, from the beginning of the Captainship of Judas Maccabæus, there passed 126 years, and two or three months. Josephus also not disagreeing in the end of his 14 book, where he writes, that the principality of the Halmonazans ended, Antigonus being slain, twelve years after an 126 years. But Herod, in the same Authour, [lib. 17. cap. 8.] allows only 125 years to the government of the Halmonazans: which being deduced from the beginning of Judas Maccabæus, are ended in the beginning of the third year of the reign of Herod, in which the liege of Jerusalem began.

Now let us see what forraign Writers have delivered concerning the taking of Jerusalem, and the death of Antigonus. Livy seemeth in lib. 128. to have spoken of this History; in the Epitome of which, The Jews are said to be subdued by the Lieutenants of Antonius, for so the old books have it, where the Vulgar reads, The Embassadors of the Jews were killed by Antonius. But of the death of Antigonus, we have this Testimony preferr'd by Josephus [lib. 15. cap. 1.] out of the books of Strabo the Cappadocian. Antonius having brought Antigonus the Jew to Antioch, caused him to be beheaded; and was supposed to be the first among the Romans, that put a King to death after this manner; thinking that the Jews could not be brought otherwise to admit of Herod for their King: for neither by torments could they be brought to vouchsafe him the name of King, in so high esteem held they the former King. Wherefore it was thought fit to obscure his memory by some ignominious death, and lessen the publick hatred they had against Herod. Of whom Plutarch in Anton. He bestowed tetrarchies of great nations upon many private men, and took away kingdoms from many, as from Antigonus the Jew, whom he brought forth and beheaded, with which punishment no King was ever put to death before.

Dio also mentions this History, [lib. 59. pag. 405.] writing thus of Sotius. He conquered Antigonus, who had killed a Garrison of the Romans which was with him; for being overcome in battle at Jerusalem, for a fled thither. The Jews, (a nation of unplaceable anger, if it be once stirred) did many injuries to the Romans; but suffered far more: those were taken first by them, who fought for the Temple of their God: and then the rest, upon a Saturday, which day they keep a Festival with so much religion, that those that were formerly taken with the Temple, as soon as that day was come, they begged leave of Sotius, that they might go up to the Temple, and there with the rest offer sacrifice after the custom. Over these (Antonius) made one Herod King: but Antigonus began to die, after he had scourged him, and tied him to a post, (which was never done to any King before by the Romans) to wit, to be beheaded at a post. Concerning which the first Exercitation of Cautalon upon Barontius, cap. 7. is to be consulted, but that this was done Claudius and Norbanus being Consuls, as Dio intimates, it is true of Antigonus his being overcome, and of the taking of Jerusalem; but by no means concerning the death of Antigonus, which he underwent in the Consulships of M. Agrippa, and Caninius, or Canidius Gallus, which was the next year.

Nothing worthy of memory was done by the Romans this year in Syria, for Antonius spent the whole year in going into, and returning from Italy: and Sotius, for fear of the envy and anger of Antonius, so spent that time, that he thought not how he might offend Antonius by some gallant action, but he might curry favour with him by doing nothing. [Dio, ibid. pag. 405, 406.] Who nevertheless being returned out of Italy, removed him, and made Plancus Governour of Syria; and in the room of Plancus, appointed C. Furnius, his Lieutenant in Asia. [Appian, lib. 5. pag. 749, 753. Dio, lib. 48. pag. 371, 372. lib. 49. pag. 402, 403.]

Another great trouble, after his long mournings, seized upon Orodas, King of the Parthians; namely, which of his 30 sons, he should make King in the room of Pacorus: for many Concubines, of whom he had begotten many sons, besegged the old mans mind every one for their own children. At last he pitched upon the eldest, which was the worst of them all, and made him King. [Justin, lib. 42. cap. 4. Dio, lib. 49. pag. 406.] This was Phraates the III. called by Plutarch in Anton. Phraortes, although by the compiler of Appians Parthian stories, which he transcribed word for word out of Plutarch, and by Plutarch himself in the end of his Cræsus, he is named Phraates; and likewise by Horace, Ode. 2. lib. 2. speaking of this time.

Redditum Cyri folio Phraatem.

Phraates restored to Cyrus his Throne.

He having received the Kingdom by treachery, slew his brothers, who were born of the daughter of Antiochus, because they excelled him in virtue, and in blood by the mothers side, and killed also Orodes, because he was angry at it. [Dio. pag. 404.] for he poisoned him as he lay sick of the Dropsie: which, when as he had voided the strength of the disease by siege, and began to be better, Phraates, letting his poisoning alone, took a shorter course, and strangled him. [Plutarch in fin. Craffo.]

After Phraates had killed his father, he put to death all his brothers, and when he saw that all the Nobility hated him for his daily vices, he commanded his own son, who was grown up to mans estate to be put to death, that there should be none that might be named King. [Jos. lib. 42. cap. 5.]

Seeing that Phraates went about to put the Nobility to death, and committed many wicked things; many of the chief fled from him, some elsewhere, and some to Antonius; of which one was Moneses, a noble and powerful man. [Plutarch in Anton. Dio. lib. 5. pag. 406.] This happened, Agrippa, and Gallus being Consuls. [Dio. ibid.]

The rest of the Winter, Gellius and Nerva being Consuls, P. Canidius Craffus being left Lieutenant by Antonius, about the Confinies of Armenia, led his army against the Iberians; and having overcome their King Pharnabazus in battle, he compelled him to join forces with him: and going into Albania with him, he likewise joined to him, that Nation also which he conquered, and their King Zoberes. [Id. ibid.] Who going as far as Caucasus with the conquered Armenians, and the Kings of the Iberians, and Albanians, he was the cause that the name of Antonius grew famous amongst the Barbarous Nations. [Plutarch in Antonius, Strabo. lib. 11. pag. 501.]

Antonius being puffed up with these successes, and relying much upon Moneses, committed the carrying on of the Parthian war to him; promising him the Kingdom of the Parthians, and granting to him the revenues of their Cities that were subject to the Romans, that he should receive them as long as the war lasted. [Dio. in supra.] For Antonius comparing the fortune of Moneses with Themistocles his, and equally his own riches and magnificence to the Kings of Persia, he gave him three Cities, Larissa, Arethusa and Hierapolis, called formerly Bamyca. [Plutarch.]

Phraates, the King of the Parthians, courteously entertained the captive King Hyrcanus, for the nobility of his descent; and drawing him out of prison, suffered him to live in Babylon, where were great store of Jews: they no less honoured him then the King and High Priest, and not they only, but also all those of the Nation of the Jews, who were in old time carried beyond Euphrates by the Assyrians (or Babylonians) of whom there were many millions: but after he knew that Herod was made King, he began to cast his hopes another way, expecting favour from Herod, whom he had saved when he was called in question for his life: he began therefore to consult with the Jews, who in duty came to visit him, touching his journey, who with all their wife admonitions, could not withdraw him from the desire of going into his own Country. To this was added the Tetrarchy of Herod, who striving by all means to get the poor old man into his clutches, wrote to him, that he would beg of Phraates and the Jews of that Kingdom, that they would not envy him the joynt power that he should enjoy with his son in law; for now the time was come, wherein he might requite the favours he had done him in being his nourisher and preserver. He sent also Saramala his Embassadour to Phraates himself with great presents; soothing him up. That he should not hinder him from being thankful to him that had deserved so well of him. When therefore he had received Hyrcanus, thus dismissed by the Parthians, and honourably furnished by the Jews, for his expenses for his journey, he entertained him with all honour, giving him the upper hand in all assemblies, and the more honourable place at all feasts, and calling him father, he thus lulled him on, lest he should suspect any treachery. [Jos. lib. 15. cap. 23.]

Herod taking care that none of the Nobility should be created High Priest, sent to Babylon for a Priest of base Parentage, whom he was well acquainted with, but yet of the race of the Priests, but derived from those Jews that were carried beyond Euphrates, this mans name was Ananias (or Hananias) and to him he gave the High Priesthood. [Id. ibid.]

Marcus Antonius refusing all honest and wholeome counsel, sent Fonteius Capito to Cleopatra to bring her into Syria, [Plutarch in Antonio.] into which the was no countenance, but the presently thought how the might get it into her possession, [Jos. lib. 15. cap. 4.] She accused also the Syrian Noble men to Antonius, and persuaded him to put them to death, that the might more easily come to be Mistress of their estates. [Id. lib. 1. bell. cap. 13.]

She accused Paulinus the son of Ptolemæus (Mennæus) King of Chalcis and Itura, as if he favoured the Parthians, and caused him to be put to death by Antonius. [Id. lib. 14. cap. 4. Dio. lib. 49. pag. 411.] in whom for Paconus is to be read Paribian fifteen years after the death of his father Auletes: as is manifest out of Porphyrius, in the Greek Eusebian, of Scaliger, pag. 226, where the name of Lyfimachus is falsely put for Lyfianus.

Antonius made Amyntas the Secretary of Dejotarus Prince of Galatia, adding to it part of Lycaonia and Pamphylia, [Dio. in supra. pag. 411. Strabo. lib. 12. pag. 567.]

Antonius also made Archelaus King of Cappadocia, who was nothing akin to the regal Family, and deposed Ariarathes; whose paternal stock was deriving from those Archelai, who had waged war against the Romans, and his mother was that Harlot Glaphyra, [Dio. in supra. pag. 411.] and that Antonius was naught with Glaphyra appears, out of that lascivious epigram of Cæsar Octavianus, [in Martian. lib. 11. epigra. 21.]

Alexandra the daughter of Hyrcanus, the wife of Alexander the son of Aristobolus, and mother in law of Herod, taking it ill that her son Aristobolus, the brother of Mariamne was concerned, because that during his life time one called from another place should usurp the High Priesthood. She wrote to Cleopatra by a certain Mutician, that she would demand the Priesthood of Antonius for her son: but her neglecting this business, Delius a friend of Antonius, going into Judea upon some occasions, persuaded Alexandra to send the pictures of her son Aristobolus and daughter Mariamne to Antonius; for if he should but once see them, he would deny them nothing. Which being sent, Delius also added, that they seemed to be of Divine, rather than of humane race, [Jos. lib. 15. cap. 2.] This was Delius the Historian, of whom mention is made in Plutarch, and whose wanton letters to Cleopatra were common; as Seneca hath related in his first Swallow Oration: and whom Dio intimates, that Antonius used dishonestly, [Id. 49. pag. 415.]

Antonius thinking it unbecom to send for a Lady that was married to Herod, and assuming also the jealousy of Cleopatra, wrote to Alexandra that she should send her son under some honest pretence; but adding withal, unless it were troublesome to her: but when these things were afterwards told Herod, he thought it not safe that Aristobolus a young man in the flower of his age, being but sixteen, should be sent to Antonius, who was first the most potent of all the Romans, and also very much given to lusts. Wherefore he wrote back, that if the youth did but step out of the kingdom, all the whole country would be up in arms. The Jews hoping for some innovations under a new King, and by this means satisfied Antonius, [Jos. lib. in supra.]

In the Sicilian war, Sextus Pompeius was overcome by Cæsar Octavianus, and M. Lepidus, waxing proud under confidence of his 20 Legions, and attributing to himself, the whole Victory, was so bold as to oppose himself against Cæsar, and to challenge Sicily for himself: but being forsaken by his army, and the Triumvirate taken from him, he was glad to beg his life and goods of Cæsar, by whom he was sent into banishment to Circles, [Liv. lib. 129. Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 79, 80. Sueton. in Octavian. cap. 16, & 14. Appian. lib. 5. Dio. 49. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 18.]

Sextus Pompeius, who was but now Master of 350 ships, fled into Asia with six or seven: as Florus relates, [lib. 4. cap. 8.] although Appian [lib. 5. pag. 741.] and Orosius [lib. 6. cap. 18.] write that there were with him seventeen. He had an intent to flee unto Antonius, because he had saved his mother from the like danger, [Appian. ibid.]

Wherefore putting his daughter, his friends, his money, and all his best things into the ships that were left, which were swift of sail, Pompeius went away by night, none pursuing him; because he went away privately, and Cæsar was continually entertained with troubles from Lepidus, [Dio. lib. 49. pag. 398.] notwithstanding Pompeius being gone from Messina, fearing a pursuit, and suspecting the treachery of his companions, when he had told them that he would set sail for the main sea, he put out the light that the Admirals ships are wont to carry, and sailed by the coast of Italy, [Id. ibid. pag. 401.] and when he arrived at the promontory of Lacinium, he robbed the Temple of Juno of all its offerings, [Appian. lib. 5. pag. 747.]

From hence he passed to Corcyra, and thence into Cephalonia; and there he entertained others, who were cast in there by force of tempest: whom having called together, gether, he laid his soldiers habite aside, and told them, that it would come to passe, that if they all stayed together, they could neither sufficiently help one the other, nor long lie hid; but if they were dispersed, they might more easily flee, therefore he advised them every one to shift for himself: which advice when most of them yielded unto, they departed several wayes; but he with some that stayed with him, went to Lesbos, [Dio. pag. 402.] tarrying at Mitylene, where his father had bestowed him before the Pharsalian battle, and being overcome, received him from thence again, [Appian. pag. 747.]

When the Parthians were troubled for the flight of Monces to Antonius, and Phraates for that cause was in a fright; he sent messengers to Monces to treat of a peace: and perswaded him with great promises to return again: which being known, although, as it was like to do, angered Antonius; yet he did not put Monces whom as yet he had in his power, to death, (which if he had done, he conceived that none of the Barbarians would ever accept of his friendship) yet using policy against the enemy, he dismissed him, as if by his means he would make peace with the Parthians: and with him also sent Embassadors to Phraates, who in words should compose a peace, if the King would restore the enligens and captives that were alive, which the Parthians had taken in the overthrow of Crassus: for he thought he should take the King unprovided by reason of hopes of peace, [Plutarch in Antonio, Dio. lib. 49. pag. 406.]

But he himself in the mean while preparing for the war, came to Euphrates: which he supposed was kept by no Garrison; but when he found that there was a strong Garrison there, he changed his course, and intended pretently to go into Armenia, to make war upon Artavaldes King of the Medes, being drawn thither by Artavaldes the King of the Greater Armenia who was the others enemy, [Dio. pag. 407.]

This Artavaldes the King of the Armenians, Josephus calls Artabazus, the son of Tigranes, [lib. 1. bell. cap. 13. lib. 15. cap. 5.] and Orosius calls Artabanes, [lib. 10. cap. 19.] whom when Antonius had taken him to be his counsellour, and guide, and chief for the management of the war, he then betrayed him, and afterwards brought the Romans into divers calamities, [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 524. & lib. 16. pag. 748.]

Antonius having sent back Cleopatra into Egypt, he went thorough Arabia into Armenia: where he had commanded both his own forces and the auxiliaries of the Kings to meet him: amongst whom were many friends and allies, and among them that Artavaldes or Artabazes King of Armenia, 6000 Horse and 7000 Foot: and when the soldiers were mustered, there were found to be of the Romans and of the allies of Italy, 60000 Foot, and the ordinary Horse of the Spaniards and French 10000. and of auxiliaries from other Nations 30000, reckoning the Horsemen and the light-armed soldiers. Thus Plutarch; but Velleius Paterculus allows Antonius XIII Legions, [lib. 2. cap. 82.] Florus, XVI. [lib. 4. cap. 10.] and Justin, [lib. 42. cap. 5.] and Livy, XVIII Legions, and XVI thousand Horse, [lib. 130.]

The guide of his army made the journey from Zeugma to Euphrates, even to the entering of Arraparena, (which the river Araxes divideth from Armenia) 8000 furlongs, twice so much more as the right way, by carrying them about over mountains and by waies, [Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 524.] and whereas Antonius ought to have refreshed his army in the winter quarters of Armenia, being wearied with a journey of 8000 furlongs, and the spring but now beginning, to have invaded Media, before the Parthians were come out of their winter quarters, he could not away with any delay; being so ravished with the longing after Cleopatra, that he thought rather of a speedy return, than of gaining a victory, [Plutarch.]

Therefore when he understood, that the King of Media was gone far from his own Country, to bring aid to the Parthian; he himself in all haste marched with the best part of his horse and foot, leaving part of his army and baggage with Oppius Stipianus, but commanding them to follow him; hoping that at the first onset he should conquer Media, [Dio. pag. 407.]

Among the carriages that were left, were the engines for battery, which were carried in 300 carts, among which was a ram of 80 foot long, of which if any were broken they could not be mended, for the scarcity of materials in those Countries, that bring forth trees neither high nor strong enough, [Plutarch.]

Antonius after he had passed the river Araxes, was beset with miseries on all sides, [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.] and as soon as he came into Arraparena, he harassed that country, then he besieged Phraata, a great City, in which was the wife of the King of the Medes with her children, when presently he found his error that he had committed, in leaving his engines behind him, and so was faine to raise a mount near the City, which he did but very slowly and with great labour, [id.] this was the royal City of the Medes called by Dio Praappa, and by Strabo Vera, (unless I be deceived) [in his lib. 11. pag. 523.] out of Adelphus, (if it be not Delliis the Historian) who was with with Antonius in this expedition, and wrote it, and commanded part of the army, shewing that this City was 2400 furlongs from the river Araxes.

The Parthians and Medes, knowing that Antonius did but labour in vain, in assaulting that City that was so well fortified with walls and men, they of a sudden set upon Stipianus as he was tired with his journey, and killed both him, and all that were with him, Plutarch reckons μύριοι or 10000, Velleius Paterculus nameth two Legions, and took all the baggage and engines of war, Polmo the King of Pontus, and companion of the war, being taken was dismissed for his ransom of money that he gave: and this wasan easie matter for the Barbarians to doe, because the King of Armenia was not at the fight; who might have helped the Romans; which he not only did not, but departed, not indeed unto Antonius, but into his own kingdom, [Dio. pag. 407. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 82. Plutarch in Antonio.]

Antonius, although he made haste at the first news of Stipianus, that he might succour his men, yet he came too late; for he found none but dead men. Wherefore although he was much afrighted with this overthrow, yet because none of the Barbarians opposed him, thinking that they were gone for fear of him, he took courage again, and not long after meeting with them, by the help of his fingers (of which he had great store, he put them to flight, for the fingers darts went farther than the enemies arrows: so that the cuirassiers were not safe from them, but yet by the swiftnesse of the Barbarian horse there was no great slaughter made, [Dio. in supra.]

Antonius again set upon the assault of Praappa, in which he did not much enamange the enemy, the Garrison which were within strongly repelling them, and the enemy that was without hindring them from coming to handy blows, [id. ibid.] and whereas the Parthians that came to aid the besieged, threatened the Romans most contumeliously; Antonius being unwilling that his soldiers should loose any of their animosity, he took with him ten Legions, and three Praetorian cohorts, and all his Horsemen, and a foraging: hoping by this means that the enemy would set upon him, and so he should come to a set battle, [Plutarch.]

When he had gone a daies journey, as soon as he saw the Parthians, wheeling about him, to hinder his return, he commanded the signall of battle to be sounded, yet trusted up his tents, as though he prepared not to fight, but for his march, and thus he marched by the Barbarians who were drawn up in an half moon, commanding his Horse, that as soon as they were come together, that the Legion might set upon the enemy, they should begin the charge, the Parthians did much wonder at the well ordered army of the Romans, beholding the soldiers passing by and keeping their ranks, and flaking their darts at them, but not speaking a word: but after the sign and a great shout made, the Horse had given the onler, they resisted a little, although that immediately the Romans had gotten to within them, that they took from them the use of the arrows, then presently, the Legions coming to joy, with great shouting and the clattering of the armour, the Parthian horse were frighted, and the Parthians themselves turned their backs before they came to handy strokes, Antonius hoping that now he should overcome them, or at least finish the greatest part of the war, followed the chase very hard, but when his Foot had pursued them 50 furlongs, and his Horse three times so much, and considered the number of the slain, and prisoners, they found they had taken 30, and killed only 80, this did much discourage them; thinking it was hard, if being Conquerours they should kill so few, but being conquered they should lose so many as they had done when the carriages were taken, the next day, as they were returning to their Camp, they met at the first a few of their enemies then more, at last all of them, as if they had not been formerly routed but all fresh men who reviled them and brake in upon them on every side, so that they could not but very hardly and with great labour get to their camp again, [id.]

In the absence of Antonius the Medes that were at Praappa set upon the mount, and put the defenders of it in a fright, for which Antonius being enraged, decimated them that had forsaken the place, and for the rest he gave them barley instead of wheate, [id.]

The Forragers that were sent out by Antonius, at the beginning, when the Romans had their provisions near them were sufficient for bringing them in; but afterwards, when they had eaten up all that was near them, that the soldiers themselves were forced to go a forraging: but it came to passe, that if but few were sent, that they only not brought any thing, but that the forragers themselves were lost; if many, Praappa was left naked of besiegers, and by the sallies of the Barbarians, many of the Romans were killed, and many engines were destroyed, from whence it came to passe that Antonius his men, who besieged others, suffered the same things that those that were besieged use to suffer, for the Townes-men observed fit times for sallies, and those that were without, by their sudden incursions and quick retreats, did grievously trouble them that remained in the Camp, as often as they divided their forces, but the forragers that went to the villages they never molested, but set upon them unexpectedly as they were scattered in their return to the Camp. [Dis. lib. 49. pag. 408.]

Sextus Pompeius hearing that Antonius was in Media, making war with the Medes and Parthians, intended to commit himself, to his protection at his return, and in the mean time to winter in Lesbos; the Lesbians for the memory of his Father most willingly entertaining and detaining him. [Id. ibid. pag. 402. Appian. lib. 5. pag. 747.]

Antonius protruding the siege of Praepa, the war was very troublesome to both parties: for neither Antonius could get any victual, but by the blood and wounds of his own men: and Phraates knew that the Parthians would endure any thing, rather than winter in the Camp, and that in a strange Country, wherefore he was afraid, that if the Romans continued in arms, he should be forsaken of his men: the weather growing very cold, after the Autumnal Equinoxial. [Plutarch.] He was afraid also, that if the siege were continued, Antonius, either by himself, or else being helped with supplies, would very much incommode the City; wherefore he laboured some, that should promote the motion of a peace between them, with an hope that it would be easily granted. [Dis. pag. 408.]

Wherefore the Parthian commanded his men, when they met with the Foragers, to deal more courteously with them, and also to cast in some words of peace; by which means Antonius being persuaded, sent a friend to demand the restitution both of his Ensignes and Prisoners, lest he should seem to be content only to depart with safety: to whom it was answered, That he should let those things alone, but if he desired peace and security, he should depart suddenly. [Plutarch.] And thus Phraates, sitting on his gilded Throne, and twanging a bow string, after that he had in many words inveigled against the Romans, he promised Antonius his Embassadors peace upon this condition, That he should immediately withdraw his army. [Dis. pag. 408.]

When Antonius received this answer, although he was very eloquent, both for civil and military Orations, yet at that time, for shame and sorrow, he did not speak to his soldiers, but made Domitius Aenobarbus supply his place, to speak to the soldiers, and to bid them be of good cheer: and within few days, having trusted up his baggage, he departed. [Plutarch.] leaving his works that he had raised, for the assault of Praepa undismantled, as if he had been in a friends Country, all which the Medes burnt, and cast down the Mount. [Dis. ut supra.]

But when they were to return by the same Campaign, where was no wood, a certain Mardian that knew the fashion of the Parthians, who had done very good service for the Romans, at the battle where the Engines were taken, persuaded Antonius, that he should march with his army by the Mountains on the right hand, and that he should not hazard it in the plain and open fields; they being heavily armed, against the multitude of Parthian Horse men, who were all Archers; for that the Parthians did but seek this occasion by fair words, to draw him from the siege, that he would throw him a shorter way, and more plentiful for the victualling of his soldiers. These things Antonius related to his Council, dissembling withal, That he little trusted to the peace with the Parthians, yet commending the stoutness of the way, and especially the passage through a plentiful Country: he demanded some assurance of the Mardian, who yielded himself to be bound, till he had brought the army into Armenia; and being thus bound, he brought them without molestation for two days together. [Plutarch.]

But on the third day, when Antonius little thought of the Parthians, marched securely, in confidence of the peace: the Mardian perceiving the dam of the river newly broken up, and that all the way was drowned by which they should pass, he understood that this was done by the Parthians, by this difficulty to give an halt to the Roman army: he presently told Antonius of this, and bad him to provide against the coming of the enemy. He ordering his battle, set distances between the ranks, by which those that used darts and slings, might make an excursion upon the enemies, when the Parthians opened their files to compass about and disorder the army: but when the light Horsemen brake in upon them, after the giving and receiving of many wounds, they retired, and again came on, until the French Horse, being reserve, gave them a fierce charge, and routed them so, that they attempted nothing more that day. [Id.]

Antonius learning from hence what was to be done, made his army march in a square body, having a strong guard of darters and slingers, not only in the rearward, but also in the flanks; giving also a charge to his Horse, that if the enemy assailed them, they should repulse them; but if they fled, they should not follow the chase too far, and so the Parthians for four days space, having received as good as they brought, began not to be so hot upon them, but taking the winter for an excuse, thought upon returning back again. [Id.]

desired of Antonius, that he would give him leave to take some light armed men from the rear, and some Horsemen from the front, as if he would do some gallant act. He by a rash attempt, brake in upon the enemy, with much hazard, whilst they sent him aide by small companies: they, as too weak, are cut off by the enemy, until that Antonius came in with the whole strength of the army, and refused the rest from manifest danger. [Id.]

Florus writes, [lib. 4. cap. 10.] that there were two Legions overthrown by the Parthian darts, Plutarch saith that there fell not less than 3000, and that there were 5000 wounded men brought back into the Tents, amongst which was Gallus, who was shot through in four places, who afterwards died of his wounds: Antonius was very much troubled to see this, went and comforted them that were wounded: but they cheerfully took him by the right hand, and desired him that he would look to himself and trouble himself no more for them, and calling him their Emperour, told him that if he were well, then they were all safe and in health. [Plutarch.]

This victory made the Parthians to proud, who were before weary and in despair, that they lodged all night near the Romans Camp, hoping that they should have presently the plunder of all their money, and the ransacking of their tents. [Plutarch.] on which night, a certain Roman whose life was spared in Crassus his overthrow, came in a Parthian habit to the Roman trenches, and saluting them in Latine, after he had gotten to be believed, informed them what danger was at hand, that the King would come with all his Forces; and advised them, that they should not march that way they intended, but that they should go back again, and take the way by the woods and the mountains, and withal told them, that perchance they might meet with the enemy that way also. [Florus. lib. 4. cap. 10. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 82.]

As soon as it was day, many enemies came together, and they lay there was not less than 4000 Horse, the King also sending thither his Life-guard, as to a most certain and an assured Victory, for the King as yet was never at any fight. Then Antonius lifting up his hands to heaven, made his prayers to the gods; that if there were any god offended with his former good fortune, that he would lay all the adversity upon his own head, but that health and victory might be to the rest of the army, [Plutarch.]

The next day the army marched on in a more secure guard: the Parthians setting upon them, were very much deceived in their expectation; they supposing they came but to pillage and plunder, and not to fight; but being cheerfully received by the Roman darts, thereupon their hearts began again to fail them. [Id.]

And as they were going down a certain Hill, the Parthians lay in ambush for them, and overwhelmed them with their arrows as thick as hail; but then the soldiers that carried great shields, took in the light-harnessed men into the middle of them, and kneeling down upon their left knee, held their bucklers over their head, and made a tumult: by which means they defended both themselves and their friends from the enemies arrows, which falling upon the convexity of the shields, did off by reason of the slipperiness. [Florus. lib. 4. cap. 10. Frontin. lib. 2. Strabonem. cap. 3. Dis. lib. 49. pag. 409.]

The Parthians, who had never seen such a thing before, thinking that they had all fallen down by reason of their wounds, or that they would presently all fall; wherefore they cast away their bows, and leapt from their horses, and taking them spears, they came to kill them with their naked swords: then the Romans rose up again, and at the signal given, widened their body, and making a shout, set upon their enemies in the front, and with their darts they slew the foremost, and made them all flee: which thing struck such amazement in the Barbarians, that one amongst them used this speech: [Goye Romans, and farewell, fame with good cause termes ye the Conquerours of Nations, who can outstand the Parthian shot.] [Florus. Plutarch. Dis. ut supra.]

There were continual skirmishes between them, which was the cause that the Romans could rid but little way in their march. [Plutarch.] and when they marched by break of day, they were always infested with the Parthian arrows; whereupon Antonius deferred his removing until the fifth hour, and so made his own soldiers more confident: through which persuasion the Parthians went from thence, and they marched an indifferent way without any trouble for that day. [Frontin. lib. 2. Strabonem. cap. 3. Dis. lib. 49.]

The army then began to be troubled with famine, because they were hindered from foraging by their often skirmishing, and they wanted also Mills; which for the most part were left behind, and the beasts were either dead or else employed to carry the sick and wounded men. It is reported that little above a quart of wheat was sold for fifty drachmes, and barley loaves for their weight in silver. Then they were fain to eat roots and herbs, and by chance they fell upon one that being eaten made them mad; and all that eat it did nothing but dig up stones, and remove them, thinking they had been about some serious business: at last they vomited up a great deal of choler, and died, because they wanted wine, (which was the only remedy,) [Plutarch.]

The famine thus raging in the Camp, they began to flee to the enemy, and but that the Parthians flew these runaways in the sight of the rest, all had a good mind to be going; but the cruelty of the Parthians stopped the revolt, [Dio. lib. 5. pag. 409.]

Antonius (seeing so many of his own soldiers dying, and the Parthians all setting upon) is reported to have often cried out, Q. uisus! wondering at those 10000 men who under the conduct of Xenophon marched a far longer march from Babylon, and often fighting with their enemies, and yet came home safe, [Plutarch.]

And seeing the Parthians could neither break the body of the Romans, nor their ranks, but that they were often overcome themselves and repulsed, they began again to talk peaceably with them that went to fetch water and forage, and shewing them their bows unbent, told them that they were departing, and that they would follow them no more; but that perhaps they might have some Medes follow them a day or two, but that they would not do them any great hurt, only secure some of the remotest villages; and holding them with this talk, they gently took their leave of them: at which the Romans were very joyful; which being told Antonius, he desired rather to march by the champaign, than the mountains, because it was said that that way wanted water, [Id.]

Whilst he was in this determination, there came to him one from the enemies Camp named Mithradates, a cousin of Moneses, to whom Antonius had given the three Cities; and demanded that some might be sent to him that understood the Syriack or Parthian Language, to whom when Alexander an Antiochian, a familiar friend of Antonius, was come, he declared unto him, that in those mountains which he saw, the Parthians with all their forces lay in ambush, to set upon them as they passed by the plains; and advised them to pass by the mountains, which had no other inconvenience than want of water for one day, whose counsel Antonius following, and having the Mardian for his guide, by night took his journey by the way of the mountains; commanding his soldiers to carry water with them, which many did in their helmets and leathrene bags, [Id.]

The Parthians having intelligence of this, contrary to their custom, pursued them by night, and by Sun-rising they overtook the reare ward of the Romans, tired with labour and watching; for that night they had gone 400 furlongs, although they did not think that the enemy would have come upon them so soon; by which they were the more dejected, their thirst also was increased by their fighting; for they were forced to march fighting, [Id.]

In the interim the vowwards met with a River coole indeed and clear, but salt and venomous, which immediately did gnaw the guts of them that drank it, and increased their thirst: which although the Mardian forewarned them of, yet they violently thrust them away that would have kept them from drinking of it, and drank freely of it. Antonius also was very urgent with them, and prayed them to forbear but a little, for not far off, there was one that they might drink of, and that the rest of the way was so rough and uneven, that the enemy could by no means follow them. He founded a retreat also, that at least the soldiers might refresh themselves in the shade, [Id. Florus, lib. 4. cap. 10.]

As soon as the Tents were pitched, the Parthians according to their custom departed, and Mithradates returned: and Alexander coming unto him, he told him, that after they had something refreshed themselves, they should all rise, and make haste over the River, for that was the utmost that they would pursue them. Antonius for this gave him great store of gold-plate, of which he took as much as he could hide in his garment, and departed, [Plutarch.]

The next day's journey was without any molestation, but the following night they themselves made most grievous and dangerous to themselves; for those that had any gold or silver, were killed, and robbed, and the sumpters that carried the Treasure were plundered; and last of all, the household stuff of Antonius himself, as his plate and precious tables, they brake and divided among themselves. Wherefore this tumult and uproar being in the army, for they thought that the enemy had set upon the sumpters to rob them, Antonius called a free man of his, and commanded him to kill him, and to cut off his head, that neither he might nor be taken alive by the enemy, nor known when he was dead, [Id. cum Floro, ut sup. Sexto Rufo, in Breviario.]

As his friends were weeping about him, the Mardian bid Antonius be of good cheer, for he perceived there was a River near: and others told him that this tumult arose from their own covetousness and doing wrong one to the other. Wherefore Antonius

Antonius, that he might compose these tumults and disturbances in the army, gave a signal to encamp. And now it began to grow light, and the army to fall in good order again: when as the rearward perceived the enemies arrows, whereupon the signal of battle was given to the light Horsemen, and the Shieldmen coming together as they did before, defended the force of the Parthian arrows, who durst never come near them. And as they marched a little forward, as soon as ever the river was elapsed by those that went first, Antonius opposing his Horse against the enemy, made all the sick men pass over first: and now both the fear and labour was much diminished in them that fought. For as soon as the Parthians saw the river, they unbent their bows, and bid them a Gods name, highly commending their valour: so they passed leisurely over the river, and made much of themselves, not overmuch trusting to the promises of the Parthians, [Plutarch.]

Cæsar Octavianus, having settled his affairs in Sicily, on the Ides of November entered Rome, out of Sicily in an Orator, as is manifest from the marble triumphal Records, [Inscript. Græc. pag. CCXCVII. cum Suetonio, in Octavio, cap. 22. Dion. lib. 49. pag. 400. Orat. lib. 6. cap. 18.] and had a golden Statue erected for him in the Kostra, which expressed his lively portraiture with this inscription, For peace restored after continual wars both by sea and land. [Appian. lib. 5. pag. 746.] and was then 28 years old: after which manner those words of Appian are to be taken, ὡς καὶ τὸν ἰσὺν ἐν τῇ πόλει ἐθετο.

He received also the Tribunitial power for ever, by a Decree of the Senate, inviting him by this honour to lay down the Triumvirate; concerning which business he wrote privately to Antonius, by Bibulus. [Appian. ibid. pag. 747. Orat. lib. 6. cap. 18.]

Antonius his men came to the river Araxes, the sixth day after the battle, which divideth Media (Atropatena) from Armenia: here the passage seemed very difficult, by reason of the depth and rapidness of the river; and there was a report that the enemy lay in ambush to set upon them in their passage: but after they were safely passed over, and were entered Armenia, as if they had newly landed from sea, they killed the earth, and fell embracing one the other with tears of joy. But when they marched through a plentiful Country, they lo fled themselves with plenty of victuals, after their long famine, that many began to be sick of Dropsies and Fluxes, [Plutarch.]

Here Antonius mustered his army, and found that he had lost 20000 Foot, and 4000 Horse, the half of whom died of diseases, and not in fight against the enemy. [Id.] Of the whole army there was not less than the fourth part wanting, of the grooms and slaves a third, and scarce any of the baggage remained; yet Antonius called this flight his victory, because he came off alive, [Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 82.]

He fled in 21 dayes 300 miles. [Livy, lib. 130.] The march continued for 27 dayes together, from Phraata (or Phraalpa) in which space of time the Parthians were repulsed in fight 18 times: but those 16000 Horse, who were armed after the Parthian manner, and used to fight with them, Artabardes brought out of Armenia: the Parthians could not so often repair their battle, being so often beaten by the Romans, if they had had those to pursue them. Wherefore all men egged on Antonius to punish the Armenians: but he took no advice, neither upbraided him with his treachery, but used him with the same honour and courtesy that he ever had done, but all this was because he knew the army was weak and wanted necessities, [Plutarch.]

Antonius, being now no more troubled with enemies, hasted to Cleopatra, he being unwilling to winter in Armenia; and taking a suddain journey in a sharp winter, and continual snows, and hurrying on his soldiers, he lost 8000 men by extremity of weather. [Livy, lib. 130. Plutarch in Antonio.] And also as they passed over the Mountains of Armenia, that were covered over with snow, the wounds, of which they received many, extremely troubled them. Wherefore many being dead, and many rendered unserviceable, Antonius, because he could not endure to hear of these things, forbade that any one should speak to him of any such thing. But the King of Armenia, although he were angry with him, and carried revenge in his mind, because he had defensed him; yet he strived to induce him to him, that he might get provisions from him. At length, seeing the soldiers could not endure this journey in winter any longer, he so persuaded the King, what by flatteries and promises, that he would let his army winter in his Country, as if intending the next spring to lead his army against the Parthians, [Dio. lib. 49. pag. 310.]

At length, having castle left the third part of sixteen Legions, he fled into Syria, (returning to Antiochia, as it is in Orosius, lib. 6. cap. 19.) where being as it were in a manner belotted, he began somewhat more to brag, as if he had gotten the victory, victory, because he got away. [Florus, lib. 4. cap. 10.]

He coming down to the sea side with a few company, stayed in a Castle between Berytus and Sidon, (called Leucecome) and tarried for Cleopatra's coming, for whose absence he pined away: to wear which away, he fell to feasting and quaffing, amidst which he would oft rise up and run to see if she were coming, until at last she came indeed. [Plutarch, in Anton.]

Cleopatra brought for the soldiers great store of money and apparel; and some reported, That Antonius took the apparel that she had brought, and gave it to the soldiers, and to the soldiers his own money, as if she had given it. [Id. ibid.] Concerning which matter Dio writes thus, Monies were brought him by Cleopatra, of which he divided to every Legionary soldier 35 drachmes, (or pence) and to others proportionably: and when that money was not enough, he made out the rest out of his own treasure, and gave acquittances for that he had received of Cleopatra. He received also much money of his friends, and exacted much of his allies. Which when he had done, he went into Egypt. [Dio. ut supra, 410.]

Herod being continually molested with the intrusions of his wife Mariamne, that he would restore the High Priesthood to her brother Aristobulus, according to his due: wherefore calling a Council of his friends, he bitterly inveighed against his mother in law Alexandra, as if she had privately wrought treason against his Kingdom, and had endeavoured by Cleopatra's means to translate it to the lad; yet notwithstanding, lest he should seem to concern both his piety to her, and the rest of the kindred, he said, he would now restore the Priesthood to her son, to which Ananias had hitherto been preferred, by reason of his tender years. Alexandra, almost beside her self for joy, and grieving that she was suspected, tell a weeping, and cleared her self of these accusations; and giving him many thanks for her sons honour, promised that hereafter she would be most obedient unto the King. And thus Herod gave the Priesthood to Aristobulus, in the lifetime of Ananias's, he being then but seventeen years old. [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. cap. 2 & 3.]

Sextus Pompeius, when he understood of Antonius ill fortune in Media, and that Caius Furnius, who at that time was governor of Asia, was no very good friend of his, he tarried not in Lesbos; but beginning to conceive some hopes, that either he should succeed Antonius (if he were once dead) in whole power, or at least should receive some part of it, especially seeing that both out of Sicily, and from other places, many came unto him, (partly in opinion of his fathers glory, and others, because they did not well know how to live else) so that he both took the ornaments of the General, and provided himself for the seizing upon the opposite Continent of Asia, alwaies letting before his eyes, the late example of Labienus, who had over-run it on a sudden. [Appian, lib. 5. pag. 747. Dio, lib. 49. pag. 402.]

Antonius, when he was come into the Country of his friends, knowing what Pompeius had done, promised, That if he would lay down his arms, he would both pardon him, and be his friend. Pompeius promised he would, and so wrote him word back: but then concerning Antonius, both for the overthrow he had received, and for that he was so immediately gone into Egypt, he went on with his designs. [Dio, ibid.] But yet making way for both, by sending messengers to Antonius, offered himself to him, as to his friend and ally: but indeed to spy out his doings. In the mean time he sent Embassadors to the Governours of Thracia and Pontus, supposing, that if he could not obtain what he desired, he might through Pontus fly into Armenia. He sent Embassadors also to the Parthians, hoping that they would willingly use him for their Captain, in the war that was not yet ended against Antonius, he being both a Roman, and also the son of Pompeius the Great. He also provided ships, and exercised the Mariners, dissembling that he was afraid of Cæsar, and that this preparation was for the service of Antonius. [Appian, ut supra.]

Antonius, as soon as he heard what Pompeius intended, yet he kept on his way, but sent Marcus Titius, who formerly had revolted from Sextus Pompeius to him, as General against him, that having received both a fleet and army from Syria, he should with all his power resist Pompeius, if he made any war, but if he would yield himself, he should receive him with all honour. [Id. & Dio, ibid.]

Pompeius his Embassadors that were sent to the Parthians, were surprised by Antonius his Captains, and brought to Alexandria. When Antonius had learned all these things from these Embassadors, he called the Embassadors that were sent to him, and brought them face to face: who excused him as being a young man in misery, and fearing he should be repulsed by him, was forced to prove the good will even of Nations that were greatest enemies of the Romans; but if he had known Antonius his mind, there had been no need of all the solicitations and policies. This he believed, as being a man not at all malicious, but well meaning, and generous. [Appian, pag. 749.]

Octavia

Octavia being at Rome intended to sail unto Antonius, to which Cæsar consented: not, as most write, for any respect at all to him, but that he might have an honourful colour of war against him if he (the high, or m. l. her, [Plutarch, in Antonia.]) the coming to Athens wintered there. [Appian, lib. 5. pag. 750.]

At this time war broke out between the King of the Medes (Artabardes) and Phraates the King of the Parthians, because by his means the Romans were brought in upon him; and with the Parthians, because he neither received any great matter of the spoils of the Romans, nor any honour at all, and was afraid also that he would take away his Kingdom from him, hence also Polemo the King of Pontus Embassadors to Antonius, desiring his friendship and alliance, desiring him to come unto him, and promising him the aid of all his forces, which Embassadors took very well, for that only thing which seemed to war towards the overthrowing of the Parthians, which was because he was not strong enough in Horsemen and Archers: he thought now he should have, and yet do more pleasure in the receiving them than the other did him in giving them, whereupon being puffed up with great hopes, he prepared again to go through Armenia, and having called the King of the Medes to the river Araxes, then to go forward with the war. [Plutarch, in Antonia, Dio, lib. 49. pag. 411.]

Antonius wrote to Octavia being now at Athens, commanding her to stay there, and advertised her of an expedition that he was about to take; he although she took it ill, and smelled out the pretence, yet she wrote to him to know whether he would have those things sent that she had brought him, for she had brought much apparel for the soldiers, and many horses and much money, and presents for his Captains and friends, and besides all this 2000 choice men all armed, like the Praetorian cohorts, Nigra, a friend of Antonius, being sent from Octavia declared unto him, adding withal the deserving commendations of Octavia, Antonius accepted both her own and others gifts, and also the soldiers that he had begged of her brother for this purpose. [ibid.]

Cleopatra, fearing lest Octavia should draw Antonius from her, seemed to languish for the love of him, making her body lo weak by her feminine tricks, as though she could not live if she were deprived of him, by which Antonius being overcome, left off his journey to the King of the Medes, (although news were brought him that the Parthians were in civil wars) and returned again to Alexandria. [Plutarch, ibid.] and so from thence forward did more and more give himself over to the love and impudience of Cleopatra. [Dio, pag. 411.]

Antonius summoned Artabardes King of Armenia into Egypt, as a friend, that having gotten him into his power he might more easily put him to death, but seeing he did not come, suspecting some deceit, he then found other means to deceive him, neither did he openly shew his anger against him, lest he should provoke him to war. [Id. ibid.]

C. Furnius the Governour of Asia, (whom we read in Plutarch, Antonius, and Strabon's Chronicle, to be a man of great authority, and to be the most eloquent among the Romans) entertained Pompeius coming to him presently, being neither strong enough to repulse him, neither did he know Antonius his mind, but when he saw his soldiers to be exercised, he also mustered them that were of his Province, and sent for Aenobarbus, that commanded the army, that was next him, and called in all bait Amyntas to his aid, who when they came immediately together Pompeius complained that he was accounted for an enemy, at that time when he expected an answer from Antonius, by the Embassadors that he had sent unto him: nevertheless he had a mind to take Aenobarbus by the treachery of Curus a familiar friend of his, hoping that it would be a matter of great moment, if any charge should happen; but the treason being discovered, Curus was put to death being condemned in the consistory of the Romans; and Pompeius also killed Theodorus a freed man of his, who only knew of this business, as if he had been the blabber of it. [Appian, lib. 5. pag. 749.]

Pompeius despairing that Furnius would be received by him, seized upon Lampacus by treachery: where many Italians lived, being brought thither as a Colony by C. Cæsar: which Italians he by great wages incited to serve under him, and now he had 200 Horse and 3 Legions, when setting upon Cyzicum by sea and land, he was repulsed in both places, for there were there then a very great band of soldiers, who kept the fences that were then brought up for Antonius being returned thence into the haven of the Arhæans, he there provided corn. [Id. ibid.]

Seeing Furnius would not fight, but alwaies kept near his Camp with many Horsemen, not suffering him either to provide any corn, nor seize upon any Cities; Pompeius set upon his Camp in front, sending also some about, that should do the same in the the reare; wherefore when Furnius went out against him, he had his Camp at his back. Pompeius flew many as they fled by the fields of Scamander: for the field was very plashy by reason of much rain that fell. Those that escaped, retreated into a safe place, but unable to provide for a new war: and whereas they received supply out of Mylia, Propontis, and other places; poor men, being exhausted with exactions, for very reward did leave under Pompeius; who was now grown famous for the Victory he got at the Haven of the Achæus, [Ibid. pag. 750.]

Seeing Pompeius wanted Horse, and therefore was cut very short in his foraging; he heard that a Squadron of Italian Horse were going to Antonius, being sent by Octavia, who wintered in Athens: and therefore presently lent to corrupt them with gold; these the President that was let over Macedonia by Antonius apprehended, and divided the money to the soldiers, [Ibid.]

Pompeius having seized upon Nicæa and Nicomedia, he gathered money together in abundance, by reason of his great and unexpected successes, [Ibid.]

As Furnius lay incamped near him, at first there came to him out of Sicily, as soon as the Spring began, a Fleet of 70 ships, which only remained of the Fleet that Antonius had lent Caesar against Pompeius; for when the Sicilian war was ended, Caesar dismissed them. Titius also came out of Syria with an 120 ships, and a great army, and all arrived at Proconessus, [Ibid.]

Pompeius being much afraid, being not as yet fully provided, chose those places that were most convenient for his fleeing: but being apprehended in Nicomedia, he demanded peace by his Embassadors, laying the hopes of obtaining it, on the favours that he had formerly done Titius; but Titius absolutely denied to yield to any peace, unless he yielded up into his hands, all his ships and forces, [Dio. lib. 49. pag. 402. 403.]

Wherefore Pompeius, despairing of any safety by sea, having put all his provision of any weight into his ships, let them on fire and armed his Mariners as being of more use to him on land with others, [Id. ibid. pag. 403. Appian. pag. 750.]

Herod fearing lest his mother in law Alexandra should seek occasions to raise new troubles, commanded her to keep within the Palace, and to do nothing of her own authority; and she was kept so strictly, that nothing was concealed from him of all that she did; yea even to the expences of her Table: which servitude she took very heavily, and sent letters to Cleopatra, complaining of her hard condition, desiring her that she would yield her assistance. Wherefore at the command of Cleopatra, that she with her son should flee into Egypt to her, he provided two coffins, wherein he inclosed her self and her son, such as men are put in when they go to be buried; commanding those servants that were privy to the plots that they should carry them out by night, & bend their course to a ship that was ready provided to carry them into Egypt. This business Elxipus a servant blabbed to Sabbatton a friend of Alexanders, supposing that he had known all before: which as soon as Sabbatton knew, he who hitherto was an enemy of Herods, as being suspected to be of the plot in the poisoning of Antipater, took this occasion of being reconciled to the Kings favour by declaring this matter; who dissembling the matter till it was upon execution, surprised her in flight, and brought her back: yet notwithstanding he pardoned her her fault, as not daring to punish her; for he feared that Cleopatra would not be so contented, but would seek any occasion of hatred against him: wherefore under colour of a magnanimous spirit, he made shew as if he pardoned her out of mere clemency, [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 3.]

Cassius Parmensis, Nasidius, Saturninus, Amilius, and other honourable friends of Sextus Pompeius, and his dear friend Fannius and his father in law Libo also, when they saw that he would not leave off making war with one more powerful than himself, nay not after the coming of Titius, to whom Antonius had committed it; began to despair of him, and therefore covenanting for themselves, they went over to Antonius, [Appian. lib. 5. pag. 750. 751.]

Pompeius thus forsaken of his friends, departed into the mid-land Country of Bythnia, intending to go (as was reported) into Armenia: him stealing privately out of the Camp by night, Furnius and Titius, and with them Amyntas pursued, and marching excessive fast, they overtook about evening, they incamped both of them about an Hill, but without either ditch or trench; it being late at night and they weary. Pompeius being in this condition, sent by night 3000 Targariens, who set upon them either in their beds, or running out from their lodgings, who all fled naked most cowardly. If Pompeius had let upon them with all his force, or but pursued them as they fled, he might have had an absolute Victory: which when he observed not, he gained nothing by all this, but that he went on whither he was a going into the mid-land Country, [Id. ibid. pag. 751.]

His enemies being joyned together, kept him from foraging, that he was to oppressed with famine, that he was forced to demand a parly with Furnius in former time a friend of Pompey: the Great, a man of honour and gravity above the rest. Wherefore standing upon the bank of a River that ran between them, he told him that he would commit himself to his protection, upon condition that he might be brought to Antonius; Furnius answered, that this business did not belong to him, but to Titius: Pompeius suspecting Titius his faithfulness, offered again to yield himself, intreating that he might be accepted; which when it could not be obtained, he desired that he might be received by Amyntas: but he told him, that Amyntas would do nothing that might be an injury to him that was to execute the commands of Antonius; and to the parly brake off, [Id. ibid. pag. 751. 752.]

Furnius his soldiers, thought that for very want of food he would the next day yield himself to Titius; but he according to the custom in Campes, made many fires in the night, and by Trumpeters distinguishing the watches of the night, he privately withdrew himself with his army without any baggage, nor so much astelling them whither they were going: for he thought to return to the sea, and to burn Titius his fleet; which perhaps he had effected, but that Scaurus ran from him, and told both of his departure, and which way he went; although he knew not what he intended. Then Amyntas pursued him with 1500 Horse, whereof he was absolutely destitute. As soon as he came near him, Pompeius his soldiers were over to him, more privately, and some openly. Pompeius being now almost desolate, and being afraid of his own soldiers, yielded himself without any conditions, who formerly had refused the conditions of Titius, [Id. ibid. pag. 752.]

Dio writes, that he was surprised and circumvented, and taken by Trius and Furnius at Mileum, which is a Town of Phrygia, [pag. 409.] Appianus saith, that his army was compelled by Titius, to take a solemn oath to Antonius, [pag. 753.]

Antonius being certified of this business, immediately by his letters commanded Pompeius to be put to death: but a little after repenting him, he commanded him to be saved; but seeing the carrier of the last letters came before him that brought the first; Titius then afterwards receiving the letters concerning his death, and perhaps supposing them indeed to be written last, or knowing the truth would not believe it; he followed the orders of the letters, as they were delivered, and not the sense, [Dio. pag. 403.]

There are some who report, that it was not Antonius that commanded the death of Pompeius, but Plancus; who being Governour of Syria: was wont in letters of moment to subscribe the name of Antonius, and also to use his seal: either with the knowledge of Antonius, (yet he himself would not write, either by reason of the renown of Pompeius himself, or because Cleopatra favoured him for the memory of his father the Great Pompeius) or by his own advice being afraid that Pompeius might be some cause of difference between Caesar and Antonius, or lest Cleopatra should transfer her favour upon Pompeius, [Appian. lib. 5. pag. 753.]

And thus was Sextus Pompeius put to death at Mileum, [Id. ibid. Strabo. lib. 3. pag. 401.] L. Cornificus and another Sextus Pompeius being Consuls, [Dio. lib. 49. pag. 402.] of whom in the epitomy of Livies 132 books we thus read. Sextus Pompeius, when he yielded himself unto Antonius, but yet raising war against him in Asia, was overcome by his Lieutenants: and in Orolus, [lib. 6. cap. 19.] Pompeius fleeing, being often overcome both by sea and land, was taken, and a little after put to death: and in Velicius Paterculus, [lib. 2. cap. 87.] Antonius, when he had promised that he would preserve the dignity of Sextus Pompeius, then also deprived him of life. And more fully in the 97 Chapter. Pompeius fled into Asia, and by the command of Antonius, whose help he implored, whilst he was in disturbance between being a General, and a Petitioner, and now would retain his dignity, and now beg his life, had his throat cut by Titius, by which the envy he had contracted lasted so long, that when as he exhibited Plays in Pompeius his theatre, he was driven out thence with the curses of the people from the Shows that he set forth.

Caesar Octavianus, exhibited Plays on horseback, because of the death of Sextus Pompeius; and set up a Chariot for the honour of Antonius before the Rostra and Statues in the Temple of Concord, gave him leave to banquet there with his wife and children, as it was formerly decreed unto him: for as yet he feigned himself to be his friend, and comforted him concerning the Parthian Expedition, and told him what envy there was risen against him, by reason of the Sicilian Victory, and the honour decreed unto him for it, [Dio. lib. 49. pag. 403.]

In the Feast of Tabernacles, the new High Priest Aristobolus being just now past seventeen years old, being to offer sacrifice according to the Law, being clad in Pontifical attire, came to the Altar, and performed the ceremony with all decency, whose excellent beauty and stature being higher than usually of his age, carrying in his countenance the honour of his lineage, turned the eyes and love of all the multitude upon him, Bbbbb him, every one calling to mind the worthy and memorable actions of his grandfather Aristobolus: and being overcome with the affection they bore him, they were to overjoyed, they could not contain themselves, but openly praised for him, and wished him all joy, and that more freely than was fit, under such a King, proclaiming openly both the memory and thanks they owed to that family for all their benefits. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 3.]

As soon as the feast was ended, he was entertained at a banquet by his mother Alexandra; and King Herod courteously inticing the young man into a convenient place, counterfeiting to sport with him, after the fashion of young men: and because that place was too hot they were quickly weary they left their sport, and went to the fish pools that were near the Court, to take the fresh aire at noon time: and at first they beheld some of their friends and servants as they were swimming. At length the young man also, by the persuasion of Herod, went in amongst them; then those to whom this charge was given, ducking him as he was swimming, as it were in sport and jest, holding him under water, never left off till they had drowned him. And this was the end of Aristobolus, in the eighteenth year of his age, and the first of his High Priesthood, which immediately returned to Ananias. [Id. ib.]

Now when this accident was reported to the women, they were all in an uproar, and did nothing but weep and howl over the dead body of the young man. Sorrow also seized upon the whole City, as soon as the rumour was spread abroad, every house bewailing the calamity, as if it had been their own. But Herod endeavoured by all means to make people believe, that this chance happened without his knowledge, not only feigning to be sorrowful, but also tears and grief very like to true grief: and that he might the more comfort the women, he buried the body with a most magnificent funeral; being extremely liberal, both in adorning his monument, and also in perfumes and other precious things. [Id.]

His mother Alexandra, although she was often ready to lay violent hands upon her self, seeing she knew all the treason, yet she repressed her passion, seeming not to be suspicious, as if she had thought that her son had been killed on purpose, until some occasion of revenge might offer it self. [Id.]

Antoniuss seeking some way how he might the more easily be revenged of Artavasdes King of Armenia, lent unto him Q. Dellius, and by him demanded, adding also many promises, that there might be a marriage concluded between his daughter and his son Alexander (whom he had by Cleopatra) at length on a suddain, in the beginning of the Spring, he came to Nicopolis, a City in the lesser Armenia, built by Pompeius; and thither he sends for him to come, as though he would make use of both his advice and aide in the Parthian war; but Artavasdes suspecting treachery, did not come. [Id. lib. 49. pag. 475.]

Alexandra, being incited by her grief to a desire of revenge, certified Cleopatra by letters of the treachery of Herod, and also of the lamentable death of her son, and the who a long time was desirous to help her, and then also pitying the womans misfortune, took a particular care of this business, as if it had been her own: neither was she ever quiet from persuading Antonius to revenge the young mans death, telling him it was an unpardonable act, that he that by his help had enjoyed a Kingdom that belonged to another right, should so insolently rage against the lawful race of the Kings. Antonius being persuaded by these words, after he was come into Laodicea in Syria, he sent for Herod to come before him, to answer to the crime objected against him, of the death of Aristobolus. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 4.]

Herod, committing the care of the Kingdom to his Uncle Joseph, commanded him by private instructions, that if Antonius should do him any mischief, he should put his wife Mariamne to death, telling him, that he so loved her, that he should esteem it a wrong done to himself, if any one should enjoy her beauty, yea, though it were after his death. [Id. ibid.]

Herod then coming to Antonius, to appeased him with the presents, that for this purpose he had brought from Jerusalem; and so appeased his anger by often conferences; that hereafter Cleopatras insigations had less weight with him: for Antonius denied that it was fit a King should give an account of his actions, otherwise he would cease to be a King: for having once given him the honour, the free power also was to be permitted unto him. He said also, That it concerned Cleopatra herself, not too much to meddle with other mens governments. [Id.]

Joseph governing the Kingdom that was committed unto him, converted divers times with Mariamne, partly upon business, and partly to do her honour, and in their discourses, there was often mention made how much Herod loved her; which discourse was laughed at by the Ladies, especially Alexandra; but he was carried on with such a desire of proving the Kings love to them, that he told them what private command the King had given him; supposing that this was a most certain argument of his love, because he could neither endure to live without her, nor in death be disjoyined from her: which words of Joseph, the Ladies did not interpret as an indubitate signe of Herods love, as abhorring his tyrannical mind, who though he were dead, yet would seek their life. [Id.]

In the interim their was a rumour spread about the City, that the King was put to death by Antonius, which disturbed all the Court, especially the Ladies. Alexandria also periwaded Joseph, that taking them with him, he should fly to the Ensignes of the Roman Legions, which were there about the City, for a guard under the Tribune Julius; so that if at first there should be any troubles about the Court, they might be in security by the favour of the Romans. And moreover it was to be hoped, that Mariamne would obtain any thing, if she should once come in the sight of Antonius, and might also recover the Kingdom, and whatsoever belonged to the royall issue. [Id.]

As they were holding this consultation, there came letters from Herod, that clean dashed the rumour, signifying what honours Antonius had done him, both in publick assemblies, and also inviting him to feasts; and that even during the accusations of Cleopatra: who being desirous of that country, fought by all means to destroy him, that the might usurp that Kingdom: but because Antonius had shewed himself just, there was not hereafter any great danger to be expected, and that he should shortly returne, having his kingdom and alliance confirmed by Antonius, neither was there any hope left now for the covetousness of Cleopatra, seeing Antonius had granted her Cæloisira, instead of that he had demanded, upon this condition, That she should not hereafter demand Judea; and that she should no more trouble him with this business. [Id.]

As soon as these letters were received, the intent of flying to the Romans vanished, but yet their resolution was not hid: but as soon as Herod had brought Antonius, some part of the way against the Parthians, (for so he pretended) he returned into Judea, and immediately his sister Salome, and his mother Salome, told him what Alexandra intended to do with her friends. Neither was Salome content with this but accused her husband Joseph, as if he had been too familiar with Mariamne: but this she did for an old grudge, because the Queen, a woman of a high spirit, among other womens brabbles, had upbraided her with her obscure birth. [Id.]

When Mariamne had ascertained to Herod by oath of her chastity, and Herod had told her again how much he loved her; she denied that it was the part of a lover to command, that if he should die, that also his wife should be put to death. Herod supposing this secret could never be known, except the had committed adultery with Joseph, and then wanted but little, but that he had killed her: but being overcome with love, though hardly, yet, restrained himself; but yet he commanded Joseph to be put to death, not so much as suffering him to come into his presence. Alexandra also he cast into prison, as being the cause of all these evils. [Id.]

In the mean while the affairs of Syria were in disturbance, Cleopatra never failing to whet on Antonius his displeasure against all men, persuading him to take every ones government from him, and to give it to her: desiring that Judea and Arabia might be given to her, being taken from the two Kings, Herod and Malchus, whose destruction she plotted to work: but yet Antonius thought it was unjust to put two whole Kingdoms to death, in favour of an importunate woman. But yet he no more accounted them his friends, but took part of their Country from them, and gave them to Cleopatra. Moreover, he gave her all the Cities that lye between the river Eleutherus and Egypt, Tyre and Sidon only excepted, which he knew were always free Cities, although by her earnest intreaties she endeavoured to get these. [Id. cum lib. 1. Bell. cap. 13. & lib. 7. cap. 28.]

Thus Cleopatra, by the bounty of Antonius, enjoyed a great part of Cilicia, the Country of Judea, where the balsame groweth, Arabia, Nabathæa, which was Malchus his country, (to wit, all that that lay toward the sea) Iudea, Phenicia, Cæloisira, Cyprus, and some part of Crete: which vast gifts of Antonius much offended the people of Rome, as did also the filthiness of Cleopatra, or whom he had gotten twins formerly, to wit, Alexandra and Cleopatra, (whom he named one the Sun, and the other the Moon) and also Ptolemeus, whom the named Philadelphus. [Plutarch in Anton. Do. lib. 49. pag. 411. Livy, lib. 132.] Cleopatra is reported to have understood many languages, so that of her self, without an Interpreter, she could answer either Ethiopians, Troglodites, Hebrews, Arabians, Syrians, Medes and Parthians, when as her predecessors, the Kings of Egypt, scarce understood the Egyptian tongues, and some also of them had forgot the Macedonian language. [Plin. ib.]

Cleopatra

Cleopatra having accompanied Antonius, who was going with his army into Armenia, as far as Euphrates, returneth, and by the way visited Apamea and Damaſcus, then came into Judea, [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 5.]

In the third Summer, from that in which Lepidus was cast out of office by Cæsar Octavianus in Sicilia, Antonius undertook this Expedition into Armenia, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 82.] Sexus Pompeius being now dead, [Appian. lib. 5. pag. 753.] and having again sent Q. Delius to the King of Armenia to confer with him, he himself in all speed went to Artaxata, [Dio. lib. 49. pag. 415.]

Cleopatra being entertained by Herod in Judea, allureth unto her that part of Arabia that was granted her by Antonius, and the revenues of Jericho also. This Country beareth Balsom, which being the most precious of all Ointments onely grows there, and also great store of the best Darc, [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 5.] which Balsame, is granted onely to the land of Judea, and is onely in two Gardens, and both the Kings, one of 20 acres, and the other of less, [Plin. lib. 12. cap. 25.]

By these means Herod grew into great familiarity with Cleopatra; she sought to allure him to her lust, either through the intemperance of her lust, or else seeking occasion too by this for her treachery: but the pretended love, yet Herod refused her, and had a consultation with his friends about killing her; but being restrained from this attempt by them, he having appealed Cleopatra by great presents, and all manner of obsequiousness, he accompanied her as far as Pelusium, [Joseph. lib. 1. bell. cap. 13. & lib. 15. cap. 5.] but yet being afraid both of her, and also of the people of the Jews, he provided that cattle as a refuge for himself; laying as many armies there as would suffice for 10000 men, [Id. lib. 7. bell. cap. 28.]

In Armenia, Antonius partly by the persuasion of his friends, and partly fearing him with the greatness of his forces, induced King Artavasdes, being deceived by his many promises, seeing he always shewed himself, his friends, both by writings and deeds, that he would come into his camp upon his assistance, when he was apprehended, [Dio. lib. 5. pag. 415. Livy lib. 131. Strabo. lib. 1. pag. 524. Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 82. Plutarch. in Antonio. Orf. lib. 6. cap. 19.]

As soon as ever Antonius had taken him, he carried him about the Castles in which his treasure was, yet not in fetters; in hope that he should have them without any fighting, signifying that he took him captive, for no other cause but to get money, from the Armenians for their freedom and his Kingdom, but all this was in vain, seeing those that kept the treasure, would not obey him, [Dio. lib. 49. pag. 417.]

Those Armenians that were up in arms, made his eldest son Artaxias King instead of Artavasdes or Artabazus: that was taken prisoner, [Id. ibid. Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 5.] Antonius bound Artavasdes with silver chains, as if it were a balaſting for a King to be tied with iron fetters, [Dio. ibid.] then by his silver chain he compelled him to conſent where the royall treasure was; and having won the Town, in which he told him the treasure was laid up, he took from thence a great masse of gold and silver, [Orf. lib. 6. cap. 11.]

After these things, Antonius partly by force and partly by surrender, reduced all Armenia under his power, [Joseph. & Dio. ut supra.] for Artaxias having ventured a battle and being overcome, fled to the Parthians, [Dio.] but Antonius led Artabazus bound, with his sons who were Prince into Egypt, as a present to Cleopatra, and whatsoever was of great value, in that Kingdom. [Joseph. lib. 1. bell. cap. 13. lib. 15. Antiquit. cap. 5.]

At Rome on the Ides of September, C. Sotius the Proconſul triumphed for Judea: as appears in the marſble triumphall records, [in Inſcript. Græciæ. pag. CCXCVII.]

M. Antonius having obtained for a ſtricter tie of friendship the daughter of Artavasdes King of Media for a marriage with his son, having left his army in Armenia, he returned into Egypt with his great prey, where entering Alexandria in a chariot, among other captives he led before him Artavasdes or Artabazes King of Armenia, with his wife and children, [Dio. lib. 45. pag. 415.] at which the Romans were delighted, as if the prime ornaments of their Country, should be communicated with the Egyptians, in favour of Cleopatra, [Plutarch. in Antonio.]

Antonius presented Artavasdes with his relations, in chains of gold before Cleopatra, in an assembly of the people, who in a Tribunal all guilt, late in a chair of gold, the Barbarians neither revered her, nor fell on their knees, (though they were often commanded to do so by threats and promises;) but only called her by her own name, and although for this they were thought to have the greater spirit, yet they were the more rigidly handled, [Dio. ut supra.]

Antonius seated the Alexandrians, and having called the people into the ſhep-pence, where the young men exercise themselves, there upon a high silvered Tribunal he set two golden chairs: one for himself and another for Cleopatra, and lower chairs for his children, then making an oration to the people, he commanded that Cleopatra should be called Queen of Kings, and her son and partner in the Kingdom, namely, Ptolemy Cæſarion, King of Kings, and gave them Egypt and Cyprus, different from the division that he had formerly made: he told them also that Cleopatra was the wife of Cæſar the Dictator, and that Cæſarion was his lawful son, he feigned also that he spoke this in love to Cæſar, that he might bring into hatred Octavianus, that was not his son born, but only adopted son, and to the children that he had by Cleopatra, to their daughter Cleopatra, he gave Lybia Cyreniaca: to her brother Alexander he gave Armenia; promoting also Media and Parthia, and all those Countries that lie beyond Euphrates even to India, when he had conquered them, he gave also to Ptolemy (surnamed Philadelphus) Phœnicia, Syria, Cilicia, and all the Country on this side Euphrates to the Hellespont. [Plutarch. in Antonio. Dio. lib. 49. pag. 415. 416.]

Antonius also brought forth his other sonnes, namely Alexander in the habit of the Medes, and wearing the Persian attire and bonnets on the head: and Ptolemy in flippers, and cloak, and that, with a Crown about it: for this was the habit of Alexander the Great, and the other of the Medes and Armenians. And as soon as the lads had saluted their Parents, the Macedonians were a guard to one, and the Armenians to the other; for Cleopatra whensoever she came in publick, wore the apparel of the goddess Isis, and so gave audience to all her subjects in the name of new Isis, [Plutarch. in Antonio.] Also he commanded that she should be called Isis and the Moon, and Antonius Oſiris and Liber Pater: seeing he was Crowned with Ivy, and wore buskins, and was carried at Alexandria in a Chariot like Liber Pater, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 82. Dio. lib. 50. pag. 421.]

Antonius went as far as the River Araxis, as if he intended to make war upon the Parthians; but thought he had done enough to have joyned in league with Artavasdes King of the Medes: upon which account, Antonius and the Mede promised each to other mutual assistance, the one against the Parthians, and the other against Cæſar: and for this cause they changed some soldiers. Antonius also delivered to the Mede, part of Armenia that he had newly seized upon, and received from him his daughter Iotape, being very young, to be in time a wife for his son Alexander (born of Cleopatra, to whom he had given the kingdom of Armenia, which also Livy confirms in lib. 131.) and also the ensignes that were lost by Statianus, [Dio. lib. 49. pag. 417. 418. Plutarch. in Antonio.]

Peace being thus concluded with the Medes, Antonius gave to Polemon the Lesser Armenia, as a reward of the Embaſſie he had undertaken for the making of a League between them: he also gave the Consulship to L. Clavius (or Cluvius) who was with him, and took it from him, [Dio. ut supra. pag. 411. 418.]

Cæſar Octavianus, both in the Senate, and to the people, often accused Antonius, incensing the people against him. Antonius also sent to recriminate him, [Plutarch.] Cæſar amongst other things, objected against Antonius, that he held Egypt that was not his by lot: that he had killed Sexus Pompeius, whom (as he said) he had willingly let escape: that having treacherously taken Artavasdes and cast him in prison, he had brought great infamy upon the people of Rome. He demanded also part of the spoils; but above all he upbraided him with Cleopatra, and the children that he had had by her, and the Countries that he had given her; and that especially, because he had brought Cæſarion the son of Cleopatra into the family of Cæſar, [Dio. lib. 5. pag. 419.] But Antonius affirmed to the Senate, that he was acknowledged so by Julius Cæſar, and that C. Marius, and C. Oppius, and other friends of Julius Cæſar knew this: of whom Caius Oppius, as if he himself wanted a defence and countenance for this a book, that he was not Cæſar's son, whom Cleopatra said was, [Sueton. in Jul. cap. 52.]

Antonius being in Armenia, commanded Canidius to go to the sea side with 16 Legions: but he taking Cleopatra with him, went to Ephesus, where when his Fleet were all come together, there were eight hundred ships, of which Cleopatra promised 200, and 20000 talents, and provision for all the army during the war, [Plutarch. in Antonio.]

Antonius by the advice of Domitius and some others, commanded Cleopatra to return into Egypt, and there to attend the event of the war; but the fearing that there might happen a new reconciliation by the means of Octavia, perſwaded Canidius by a great reward, that he would speak to Antonius for her, and that he should shew him, that it was not just, that she should be sent back, that had brought so great aid to the war, neither that it was for his profit, that the Egyptians should be discouraged who made up a great part of the naval force. Which when he had obtained, they gathered together their forces, and sailed to Samos, where they gave themselves over to pleasure: for as it was injoined to all Kings, Governours, Terrarchs, Nations, and Cities,

Cities that lie between Syria, Meotis, Armenia, and Lauria, that they should fend or bring all manner of warlike provision, so was it enjoyed also that all that could skill to make any good sport, should also meet at Samos: and whereas almost all the world was filled with weeping and wailing, this one Island alone resounded with piping, and singing for many daies, and all the theatre was full of these common players, then also every City sent over for sacrifices, and the Kings strove amongst themselves, who should make the greatest feast, and give the greatest presents: so that it was ordinarily said, What will they do when they are Conquerours in triumph, whereas the very preparation for the war is with such sumptuousness? [Id. ibid.]

From hence Antonius failed to Athens, and there gave himself wholly to see plaies and shows, [ibid.] he went with a staffe of gold, and a Persian sword by his side, a purple robe buttoned with precious stones, and a Crown that a King might enjoy a Queen [Florus lib. 4. cap. 11.]

The King of Media using the help of the Romans that Antonius had left with him, overcame the Parthians, and Artaxes (or Artaxias the Armenian) that came against him. [Do. lib. 49. pag. 418.]

Herod duly paid the Tributes of the Countreys of Judea and Arabia, which he had received of Antonius; thinking it was little late to give her any occasion of ill will against him, but the Arabian, after the exaction of them began to belong to Herod, for some time paid 200 talents yearly, but afterward he grew slow and negligent, and scarce paid half and that very negligently. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 5.]

Cæsar and Antonius mutually accused each other, and mutually defended themselves, partly by letters privately sent, (among which that of Antonius to Cæsar was most peevish, mentioned by Suetonius in Octavio, where he saith that he began to company with Queen Cleopatra, whom he affirmed to have been his wife nine yeares since) and partly publicly; when Cæsar pleaded in publick, and Antonius by letters, upon which occasions they often sent Embassadors one to the other, that they might more fully shew their cause to be just, and lay out the affairs of the adversary, in the mean while they got money together, as if it had been for some other purpose, and prepared themselves for war, as if it had been against certain other enemies. [Do. lib. 1. pag. 419.]

The new Consul at Rome, C. Sosius (who had triumphed for Judea) on the very Kalends of January made a long speech in the Senate, in the praise of Antonius and disgrace of Cæsar, (Domitius Acrobardus his Colleague, because he had endured many calamities formerly, meddling with no new business) and was ready to make an edict against Cæsar, who was on purpose gone out of the City, if Nonius Balbus the Tribune of the people had not withstood it. [Do. lib. 50. pag. 419.]

Antonius wrote to Rome that the partition that he had made at Alexandria, the Countrey between Cleopatra and her children might be confirmed, which letters notwithstanding were not publicly read, Domitius and Sosius the Consuls who most favored Antonius forbidding it, although Cæsar desired that all things might be brought into publick; and seeing their opinion was carried in that, Cæsar also got this in the Senate, that none of those that were written concerning Artaxides the Armenian should be publicly proposed; because he both pitted Artaxides, with whom he privately had consulted against Antonius, and he also envied Antonius a triumph. [Id. lib. 49. pag. 416.]

The Senate being come together, Cæsar fate between the Consuls in the curule chair, environed about with his friends and souldiers, that privately carried their weapons about them, when he at large defended himself, and accused Sosius and Antonius and seeing neither any other, nor the Consuls themselves durst speak a word, he commanded them to meet again at a certain day, and then he would demonstrate unto them the injuries of Antonius in writing; but the Consuls not daring to contradict, nor yet able to hold their peace, they privately before the day came went out of the City, and went unto Antonius, whom also many of the Senators followed, which when Cæsar knew, he said that they had free leave from him to go, least he should seem to have been forsaken by them, for some injury he had done them; he gave leave also to any that would go to Antonius that they might safely do it. [Id. lib. 50. pag. 420. Sueton. in Octavio. cap. 17.]

After the departure of the Consuls, Cæsar called a Senate, and did and said what he would, which when Antonius heard, he called a Councell of his friends, and after many arguments on both sides, he undertook the war. [Do. pag. 420.] and commanded a divorce to be declared to his wife Octavia the sister of Cæsar. [Id. lib. 1. liby lib. 132. Euseb. lib. 7. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.]

Afterwards he sent some to Rome, to put Octavia out of his house, who they say when they went took with her all Antonius his children, which he had by Fulvia except the eldest, who lived with his father: the wept and wailed exceedingly because she seemed seemed to be one cause of the civil war; but the people of Rome did not so much pity her as Antonius, and much more those that had seen Cleopatra, who was not to be preferred before Octavia, neither in beauty nor youth. [Plutarch. in Anton.]

But Cæsar, when he heard of the suddain and great preparation of Antonius, was much astonished, fearing he should be driven to fight that Summer; for he wanted money excremely, and did vex the people of Italy with exactions, so that it was accounted one of the greatest faults of Antonius, that he prolonged the giving of battle, by which means he gave Cæsar time to prepare himself, and to quiet the uproare that was risen about the exactions. [Id.]

King Herod being freed from the trouble of Judea, and having taken Hyrcanium, (a Town which the sister of Antonius had kept) The Asian war, in the CLXXXVII. Olympiade (which was this Summer) now breaking out, made great preparation for the aiding of Antonius: but he quitted him of this trouble, telling him he had no need of them. But because he had heard both from himself, and by Cleopatra, of the injurious dealings of the Arabian, that desired to pay the tribute imposed upon him; he commanded him to make war upon him. Cleopatra also perswading him that it would be for her profit; for the hoped, that if Herod should overcome the Arabian, then she should be Mistress of Arabia, but if the Arabian overcome Herod, then she should be Mistress of Judea. Wherefore Herod returned home by Antonius command, and there kept his army, with which he presently, being well furnished with Horie and Foot, invaded Arabia, going to Diopolis, where the Arabians met him, and after a fierce conflict, the Jews got the victory. [Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 14. lib. 15. cap. 6.]

Titus and Plancus, who were chief friends to Antonius, and that had been Consuls, and were privy to all his secrets, being privily envied by Cleopatra, because they were much against his being present in this war, fled unto Cæsar, who willingly entertained them; from whom he learned all, both his actions and counsels, and also those things that were in his Will, and where the Will it self was; for they were witnesses to it, and knew the Contents. [Plutarch in Anton. Dio. lib. 50. pag. 420.] But of Plancus his manners, (who was formerly master of request to Antonius, and afterwards was by him made Procurator of Asia, and then of Syria) and also of his and Titus his flight. Velutius Paternus is to be consulted. [Id. 2. cap. 83.]

The Testament of Antonius was deposited with the Vestal Virgins, who denied the delivery of it at the demand of Cæsar; if he would have it, they bid him come and take it. He went therefore and took it. [Plutarch in Anton.] At first he read it privately to himself, and noted some places that were subject to reprehension, but afterward he read it openly in the Senate, and then to the people: many taking it ill, that a man being alive, should give an account of things to be done after his death. But yet though it was counted very unjust, yet those things that were contained in the Testament, were of such nature, that they clean took away all envy from Cæsar, for doing this deed: for Antonius by this Testament gave Testimony, That Cæsar was indeed the very son of Cæsar the Dictator; he reckoned the children that he had by Cleopatra amongst his heirs, and bestowed great gifts upon them. Also his Will was concerning his funeral, that his body, although he had died at Rome, should be carried through the Forum, and sent to Alexandria to Cleopatra. [Id. ibid. Sueton. in Octavio. cap. 17. Dio. lib. 50. pag. 420. 421.]

These things so enraged every one against Antonius, that they believed all things to be true that were reported: as that Antonius, if he should get the power into his hands, would give Rome it self to Cleopatra, and translate the Empire into Egypt. Moreover, all men were so angry with him, that not only his enemies and newers, but they also who were his great friends, very much blamed him: for being astonished at the rehearsal of the Testament, and meeting with the suspicions that Cæsar had, they all said the same things. [Dio. lib. 50. pag. 421.]

The late runaway Plancus, objected many horrible things against Antonius in the Senate. [Vellei. Paterni. lib. 1. cap. 83.] Many things also Calvisius, or Calvisius, a friend of Cæsar, upbraided him with, as done in favour of Cleopatra, but he was thought that he belied him in many things: but yet Antonius his friends were intercessors for the people for him, and sent one Geminius into Grecia to him, to desire Antonius, That he would take heed that the Empire should not be taken from him, and that he should be declared an enemy to the State. Who at latter time being provoked by Cleopatra, told her that all things would go well, if she were once gone into Egypt, but fearing the Queens anger, he was faine to fly as fast as he could to Rome. [Plutarch in Anton.]

As soon as Cæsar was sufficiently prepared, he proclaimed open war against Cleopatra: the Consulship also (for he was designed Consul for the next year) was taken from from him, as all his other power likewise, which he had committed to the pleasure of women. It is said also that Cleopatra by philtres and charms, had so beloved Antonius, that he was not his own man. [Id. ibid. Dio p. 421.] for the had so intrahled him, that she made him the overlord of the exorcises of the Alexandrians, she being called by him Queen and Lady, that she had Roman soldiers in her guard, and all of them had in their bucklers the name of Cleopatra written. She went also into the forum with Antonius, and with him provided for the plaies, with him sat in judgement, with him rode the Horse, and in Cities she rode in a Chariot, whilst Antonius followed her a foot with the Eunuchs: to be short, she was so bold, as to hope for the government over the Romans; as if she did at any time, by a great oath, she alwaies swore, as she hoped to give laws in the Capitol. [Dio. pag. 421. 422.] Wishing also through her womanish desire, to reign in Rome. [Europ. lib. 7.] Of which Horace. lib. 1. Ode. 37.]

If Antonius had been declared an enemy, those also that were with him, except they had come from him, had been accounted enemies likewise: which least it should happen, (for the power of his friends was to be feared) he was not in word declared an enemy, though he was indeed 1 but impunity and commendations were propounded to them that should forsake Antonius, but war was openly proclaimed against Cleopatra, whom they knew would never forsake him. And it sufficed, that this crime might be objected against him, That he of his own accord had undertaken a war against his own Country, by whom he was never offended, in the behalf of an Egyptian woman, and as if there had now been in actual war; they took their soldiers coats, and went unto the Temple of Bellona: and there Caesar, as if he had been an Herald, performed all those things, by their command, that were accustomed to be done after the manner of the Romans, before the war was begun. [Dio. pag. 421. 422.] And added moreover, That now those that were to make war with the Romans, were Macedonian Eunuchs, and Pothinus, and Iras, that trimmed Cleopatra's hair, and Charmium (Nairas and Carmio, Gala faith were Cleopatras Maids, lib. de Theriaca ad Plinonem) by whom the greatest affairs of Antonius Empire were managed. [Plutarch.]

After this, the youth were called earnestly to arms by them both, money was coined, and all things that were necessary for the carrying on the war were in all haste provided: and the preparation for this war was far greater than all the former, by reason many Nations sent succours to each party. All Italy, France, Spain, Illyricum, both the Aeticks, Sardinia, Sicilia, and other Islands that lay near the forefard Continents, helped Caesar. [Dio. pag. 422.] He had of ships for war 250 sail, 80000 Foot, 12000 Horse. Antonius had not less than 500 ships of war, in which were some that had eight or ten banks of oares, furnished (unusually) and fit for a Triumph; a 100000 Foot, and (as Caesar had) 12000 Horse: the Kings that were his subjects and brought him aid, were, Bocchus King of Africa, (that was outed of his kingdom by the Romans) Tarcondemus, (or Tarcondimous) of the Upper Cilicia, Archelaus of Cappadocia, Philadelphus of Paphlagonia, Mithradates of Commagena, and Adallas King of Thracia: these were in person in the war. Polemon sent aid from Pontus, Malchus also from Arabia, and Herod the Jew. Moreover Amyntas King of Lyconia and Galatia. Antonius also commanded all from Euphrates and Armenia, even to the Ionian Sea and Illyricum, and from Cyrena to Ethiopia. [Plutarch in Antonio.] Whereupon all the Countries of the Continent of Asia which obeyed the Romans, namely, both the Thracians, Grecia, Macedonia, Egypt, Cyrenica, with the borders, and all the neighbour Islands, and almost all Kings and Princes, and all that did but border upon that part of the Roman Empire that obeyed Antonius, some in person, others by their Generals, (as it is said) helped Antonius. [Dio. ut sup.]

Supplies also were sent to him from the King of the Medes, [Plutarch.] which seeing Antonius did not only not fend back, but also recalled his own soldiers he had lent the Medes, that King was overcome and taken by Ptoleas King of the Parthians, and Artaxas (or Artaxias) King of the Armenians: and after this manner was Armenia (which Antonius had but newly gotten) lost together with Media. [Dio. fin. lib. 49.]

Antonius being afraid of the over great curtesie of Cleopatra her self in the preparation of the Actian war, and not taking any meat without assure; she is said by this means to have purged him of this fear: she dipped the uppermost flowers of her Garland in poison, and put the Garland on her own head; and immediately, in the height of their mirth, invited Antonius to drink their Garlands: which Antonius taking from his head, and putting it into the cup began to drink, but with her hand she stopped him, saying, I am she, my dear Antonius, who you provide against by this new care of tasters; Do you think, that either occasion or invention is wanting, if I could live without thee? and then calling for a prisoner, commanded him to drink it, who presently gave up the ghost. [Plin. lib. 21. cap. 5.]

When Herod had routed the greatest part of the Arabian army at Cana in Celo-syria; Athenio the General of Queen Cleopatra in that Country, who hated Herod, having gotten together a band of the natives, and joining with the Arabians, made a great slaughter of the Jews in the rough and difficult places (with which the enemy was better acquainted) but the King seeing his men put to the worst, poised on horseback, to bring new supplies; but yet although he made all the haste he could, he came not time enough, but that the Jews Camp was taken by the enemies. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 6.]

From that time, Herod began to make incursions and to prey upon the Arabians, incamping alwaies upon the mountains, and alwaies forbearing to come to set a battle; but yet he got this good by it, that he accustomed his men to labour, and by continual exercise, he prepared himself a way to blot out the infamy of his former defeat. [Id. ibid.]

Antonius, intending to direct his course for Italy, and there to carry on the war before his enemies were aware: when coming to Coreyra he heard, that some light ships that were sent out for spices, were at anchor by the Ceraunian mountains; and he (suspecting that Caesar was come with his whole Fleet, went back again into Peloponnesus, (for it was now at the end of Autumn) and wintered at Patara, sending soldiers into all places, that they might the better guard them, and that there might be a better supply of victual for them. [Dio. lib. 50. pag. 424.]

Caesar also looting from Brundisium, and having gone as far as Corcyra, thinking to set upon the enemy on a sudden as they were in the road at Actium, but being tolled with a tempest, he was faine to return and missed of his purpose. [Id. ibid. pag. 425.]

Whilst Herod made inroad upon the confines of Arabia, in the seventh year of his reign (reckoned both here and hereafter from the death of Antonius) about the month of August of the year of the Julian Period 4076, the Actian war being now begun, in the beginning of the Spring, Judea was shaken with an Earthquake, as was never the like before, in which were overwhelmed with the ruines of houles 10000 men: but yet the soldiers received no damage, because they were in the open fields. This calamity was made much more by the reports, which the reporters knowing the hatred between the two Nations, told the Arabians, That it was a wonder to see how proud they were grown, as it all the Cities of the Jews were overthrown, and the men all dead, so that there were no enemies left. For which cause laying hold of the Embassadors of the Jews, who in this their affliction came to demand peace, they flew them, and presently prepared for war with all earnestness. [Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 14. & lib. 15. Antiquit. cap. 7.]

Herod having encouraged his men, and offered sacrifice according to the custom, he in all haste marched with his army over Jordan: and having incamped at Philadelphia, there the fight began about the taking of a Castle that lay between him and the Arabians; in which the Jews got the better, and forced the enemy being dismayed to another fight, where after continual skirmishes the Arabians are put to flight, and what by themselves in flight, and by their enemies pursuing them, they were to trodden under-foot, that they lost 5000 men: the rest being besieged in their Camp, and extremely wanting water, they sent Embassadors to Herod; whom when he contemned, and was more earnest upon them for offering 50 talents for their freedom, they being burnt up with thirst, came out in companies, and offered themselves to the Jews: and thus after this manner there were 5000 taken within five days. On the fifth day the rest that were in the Camp came out to fight, but despairing of any good success, for in the first conflict there fell about 7000. By this overthrow the courage of the Arabians was tamed, and Herod being declared Governor of that Nation by them, returned home with great glory. [Id. ibid. c. lib. 15. cap. 89.]

Hillel a Babylonian of the stock of David flourished at Jerusalem an 100 years before the Jewish account of the destruction of the Temple; as is gathered out of Gemara Babylonica tractat. nash cap. 1. out of whose multitude of disciples, came Jonathan the son of Uzziel, the famous author of the Chaldee Paraphrase of the Prophets, from a difference arising between this Hillel and Sammaus (or Sameas) concerning whom was formerly spoken out of Josephus the Pharisees were divided into two sects: concerning whom, St. Jerome, lib. 3. comment. on Elyas, cap. 8. v. 14. The Nazaries (such are those that receive Christ, and yet omit not the observations of the old Law) interpret the two houses of Sammaus and Hillel, two families; from whom spring the Scribes and Pharisees. He adds moreover, That Sammaus and Hillel, (or their two houses, of which there is so often mention in the Talmud) sprang not up long before the Lord was born.

Scing Phraates the King of the Parthians, was become more insolent by the Victory he got of Antonius, and that he dealt more cruelly than before, he was driven into exile by his own subjects: and one Tiridates made King in his room, [Justin. lib. 42. cap. 5. Dio. lib. 32. pag. 456.]

A certain Midian persuaded the Mysians of Asia to revolt from Antonius, and by their aid made war there against the Antonians, [Dio. lib. 51. pag. 443.]

Antonius went to Actium, whither he had appointed his Fleet, and was nothing moved; when he found that almost a third part of his Mariners were starved to death: well (saith he) the oars are safe, for I will not want rowers, as long as Greece hath any men, [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.] Whereupon there were pressed by the Captains of the ships, passengers, groomes, harveist-men, young men: and yet neither thus were the ships fully supplied, but that many were empty, [Plutarch.]

Astius Pollio, seeing he had kept himself in Italy all the while after the peace concluded at Brundisium, and had never seen Cleopatra, or after that Antonius was so besotted with the love of her, had ever any thing to do with his party, being asked by Caesar if he would go with him to the Actian war, answered; My desires towards Antonius are greater, his favours towards me are more known, wherefore I will have nothing to do with your difference, but will be the prey of the Conquerour, [Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 86.]

M. Agrippa being sent before by Caesar, took many ships of burden laden with corn and armes, as they were coming from Egypt, Syria, and Asia, to Antonius his succour: and having passed over the bay of Peloponessus, he conquered Methona that was fortified with a strong Garrison of Antonius his, [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.] and there he killed Bogudes: he observed also which were the fittest places for ships of burden to arrive; and from thence going into divers places into Greece, he very much troubled Antonius, [Dio. lib. 50. pag. 425.]

Caesar being encouraged by these means, went from Brundisium with 320 ships having their stems armed, and all their ships, into Epirus having crossed the Ionian Sea, [Id. ibid. Livy. lib. 132. Plutarch in Anton. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.] Where finding his Foot whom he had drawn within the Ceraunian mountains to Actium, he himself seized upon Coreyra that was left without a Garrison, with his ships: which being drawn within the Haven Dulcis, so called from the sweet water, he there stood at anchor. From thence he went with his Fleet to Actium; where the greatest part of Antonius his Fleet was also at anchor, and having seized upon that place where he afterwards built Nicopolis, he there encamped, [Dio. lib. 50. pag. 425, 426.]

Antonius, seeing his enemies sailing towards him as soon as it was day, fearing they would take his ships, he wanting men to defend them, let his Mariners upon the force-castle in armes, and commanded them to hold up their oars on both sides of the ships, as if they had been soldiers; and so kept them in the mouth of the Haven at Actium with with the prows towards the enemy, as if they had been well furnished with rowers and ready for a fight; by which Stratagem Caesar being deluded returned, [Plutarch.]

Marcus Agrippa failed to Lucas, and took the Island and the ships that were in it, under the very nose of Antonius his Fleet, he seized also upon Patos, having overcome Q. Afidius in a fight at sea, and after that took Corinth. [Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 84. Dio. lib. 50. pag. 427.]

Marcus Titus, and Statilius Taurus suddenly set upon Antonius's Horse and routed them; they also joyed in league with Philadelphus King of Papalagonia, [Dio. ibid.]

Cneus Domitius a very gallant man, who alone of all Antonius's party, never called for Cleopatra but by her own name, being extremely hated by the Queen, through great and headlong danger went over to Caesar, [Id. ibid. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 84.] for being sick of a fever, he took a little boat and went over to Caesar; which though Antonius took ill, yet contrary to Cleopatra's mind he sent him all his carriage together with his friends and servants, but Domitius, as though he repented of this open treason, died soon after, [Plutarch.] but because he seemed to have fled from Antonius, as though he despised of Antonius good fortune; many followed his example. [Dio. pag. 427.]

Antonius being now out of hope began to have all his friends in suspicion, of whom among other, he put to death Janusculus a King of part of Arabia, by torture; and gave command to some that they should rear in pieces Q. Polthumius Senator, then feasting, least Quintus Dellius and Amyntas the King of Galatia, had sent into Macedonia, and Thracia to hire soldiers, should more esteem Caesar's party: he went towards, as if it were to succour them, if the enemy should set upon them. [Dio. ibid.]

In the mean time Sosius hoping that if he should set upon L. Tauriscus, who with a few ships kept a guard against Antonius fleet, before the coming of Agrippa, who was Caesar's Admiral, he might do some great matter; early in the morning on a sudden, went against him, taking the convenience of a fog lest Tauriscus seeing the multitude of his ships should fly, whom having put to flight at the first conflict, he pursued, but by chance meeting with Agrippa, he not only did not overcome Tauriscus or received any fruit of his victory, but himself also perished with Tarcondimotus and many others. [Id. ibid.]

This bulineffe and also because himself was overcome, in his return in a battle of Horleum by Caesar's guard, took Antonius from the opinion of having his Camp over against the enemies Camp; therefore leaving his by night, he went unto the other side of the Ambracian gulf, where his greater forces were encamped, and seeing that now he began to be shut up from provision, he propounded in council, whether they should stay there and bring it to a battle, or leaving that place should protract the war till some other time. [Id. pag. 427, 428.]

Candius, who commanded the Legions, and was the cause of Antonius his bringing Cleopatra with him, now changed his opinion, and persuaded him to leave her back again, and that he should go into Thracia, or Macedonia, and then try it out by a battle at land, because he was stronger at land, and also he might make use of the new supplies that Dicomus the King of the Getæ sent, [Plutarch. in Antonio.]

But Cleopatra, and Antonius also, being affrighted at some prodigies, and by reason of them, with the fadness of the army, obtained of her husband, that the war might be then tried by sea, but yet to providing for her flight, that the trusted up her baggage, not as if she intended to conquer, but that if all were lost, how the might more easily fly, but yet they determined not to depart by stealth or as if they fled, least they should strike a fear into the army, but as it were ready prepared for fight, but yet if any would oppose them, that they might by plain force make their way into Egypt. [Id. ibid. Dio. lib. 50. pag. 428.]

Velleius Paterculius saith, [lib. 2. cap. 84.] that King Amyntas, but Plutarch that both he and Deiotarus, revolted unto Caesar, Q. Dellius the Historian also revolted unto Caesar, (to whom the third Ode of the second book Carmin. of Horace was written) either being afraid of the treacheries of Cleopatra, which he said Glaucus her Philiscus told him of, or else keeping his old wound, for he had fled from Dolabellus to Cassius, and from Cassius formerly to Antonius; he is called by Messala Corinus, the vanisher of the civil wars. [M. Seneca. in Orat. Suasor. 1. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 84. Plutarch. in Anton. Dio. lib. 50. pag. 433.]

Antonius his fleet was twice overcome before the last great battle, [Vellei. Patercul. in supra.] and just as they were going to it, they say, there was a foot Captain, a valiant man, who had fought many battles under Antonius command, and had many skarres on his body, who in Antonius his presence cried out unto him; O noble Emperor, why do you distrust these wounds, and our swords, and put your trust in these wadded spears? let the Egyptians and Phœnicians fight by sea, give us leave to fight by land, where we have been wont either to dye standing, or to overcome our enemies. To which Antonius returned no answer, but yet with his hand and countenance, as it were, bidding him be of good courage, he passed by, yet without any great courage himselfe. [Plutarch.]

Of the Egyptian ships, Antonius and Cleopatra only reserved 60. the rest they burnt, because the number of his souldiers, both by overthrowes, and running away, was much diminished: then by night they carried aboard all the things they had of most value: and when the masters of the Gallies would only in the fight have taken their oares, and have left their sailes, Antonius compelled them to carry them with them, and to clasp them on their ships, laying it must be done, least any of his enemies should escape him, when as by this means he himselfe provided to escape. [Id. Dio, pag. 428.]

Cæsar had 200 beaked ships, and 30 without banks; his Gallies for swiftnesse were like light ships, in which fleet were eight Legions, besides five prætorian Cohorts, Antonius his fleet was 170 ships, which though lesse in number, yet far greater in burden: for they were in height from the sea ten foot, (or rather banks of oars) faith Orofius, [lib. 5, cap. 19.] and so wrote him Florus, [lib. 4, cap. 11.] We had 400 ships, and the enemy had not lesse than 200. but what they wanted in number, was made up in bulk, for all they had were from six to nine banks of oars: and moreover, so raised with turres and dacks, that they resembled Castles and Cities, making the sea groan under them, and the wind out of breath to carry them, which bynesse of theirs, was it selfe their bane. But yet Cæsar himselfe in his Commentaries, produced by Plutarch, gaily saith these things, concerning the number of Antonius his ships, saying, That he took 300 of them. But of the greatest Vegetius [de re militari lib. 4, cap. 27.] relates, which may be reckoned by the banks of oars, that there met together ships of six, and above, banks of oars. Florus saith, that Cæsar's ships had not above three banks of oars to six, and none above. But Strabo, together with Plutarch and Dio, positively say, That Antonius had some ships that had ten: concerning which Scaliger is to be consulted, Ad num. Euseb. MCCXXX.

Now because there was a report that Sextus Pompeius was overcome in Sicilia, by reason of the greatnesse of Cæsar's ships, Antonius had built his ships much greater than his enemies; he had indeed some of three banks of oars, but all the rest from four to ten banks. He also with high Towers in them, and put in them multitudes of men, who thought fight as it were from a wall. He put all the Noble men he had with him a shipboard, lest if they were at their own command, they should make some alteration, (as Scellius and some others that fled to Cæsar had done) he also put aboard some Archers, Slingers, and armed souldiers, [Dio, lib. 50, pag. 433.] and so filled his best and greatest ships, from three to ten bank of oars, with 20000 Foot, and 2000 Archer. [Plut.]

Cæsar seeing the preparation of the enemy, and understanding of his intentions from others, but especially from Dellius, prepares himselfe also for the fight. [Dio, pag. 433.] The four first dayes the sea rose so high, that the battle was put off: the fifth day the fly cleared, and storm ceased, and they came to flock. Antonius and Poplicola were in the right wings, Cælius in the left, the middle battle M. Octavia, and M. Juffeus commanded, Cæsar placed Agrippa in the left wing, and kept the right himselfe. (Thus Plutarch) but yet Vellei is Paternul before him, [lib. 2, cap. 85.] That the right wing of the Julius's ships was committed to M. Lurios, (or Lurios) the left to Arrantius, and to Agrippa, the ordering of the whole battle by sea; Cæsar was present every where, being designed for that place, whither fortune should call him. The command of Antonius's fleet was committed to Publicola and Sotius. But concerning the Commanders of the land forces of both armies, it is agreed on all hands, that Taurus should command Cæsar's forces, and Antonius his forces Cassiodorus commanded.

Antonius being carried about in a swift Pinna, exhorting his souldiers, encouraging them to fight valiantly, as upon firm land, by reason of the heaviness of their ships, and commanded the masters of the Gallies, that they should receive their enemies charge, no other wise than as if the ships were at anchor, and that they should keep the straight in the mouth of the gull. [Plutarch.]

They report that Cæsar, whilst it was yet dark, going out of his Tent to visit his fleet, throughout, met an affeand his driver, the mans name was Eutyclus, the affe Nicon: after the victory was obtained, he put up both their images in brasse, in a Temple that he built in the very place where he had encamped. [Sueton. in Octavia, cap. 96, Plutarch in Anton.] There happened also, that as he was sacrificing before the fight, a beaft had a double liver. [Pliny, lib. 18, cap. 37.]

Cæsar

Cæsar went in a Pinna to the right wing of Antonius his fleet, wondering that the enemy lay to still in the Gulf, thinking they had lyeen at anchor, he kept his Gallies beag, being now eight lurlongs from the enemies: but in the sixth hower, there began a little gale of wind to rife from the sea, and then Antonius his souldiers began to be angry that they were delayed from fighting, trusting to the greatnesse of their ships, as if they had been invincible, they put forward their left wing, with whom Cæsar's men began to fight, as soon as they were come out of the Gulf and Straight. [Plutarch.]

Cæsar's ships being more yare, and ready for any needs of service, either for charge or recharges, or to turn about, but the others were heavy and unweildy, many of Cæsar's set upon each of the others, with darts, and their backs, and casting fire, overcome them: [Florus lib. 4, cap. 11.] on the other side Antonius his souldiers, shot with their crossbows from the wooden Towers, darts and stones, they cast also iron grapples on their enemies ships, if they came near them, which if they took lockely, they overcame, otherwise they blged their own ships: after this manner therefore was the fight at sea, whereas both sides used divers reasons to stir up the skill and courage of their souldiers, they heard also the cries of those land souldiers that heartened them on crying, Courage, Dio, pag. 438, 439, with Plutarch.

Agrippa stretching forth one of his wings to compasse about the enemy, Poplicola on the other side was forced also to widen his wing, and so was divided from his main body, which being distressed, and fighting with Arrantius, but yet upon equal terms, Cleopatra that had been long in careful suspense what to doe, and now overcome with the expectation of the event of a doubtful battle, gave a sign to her ships, and the in a gally whole poop was of gold, and her saile of purple, and 60 of the swiftest Egyptian ships, hoyled saile amaine, and her saile of purple, and 60 of the swiftest Egyptian ships, hoyled saile amaine, and having a propitious gale they fell saile for Ptoleponusius. Antonius as soon as he saw the ship of Cleopatra under saile, he forgetting all things, embarked in a gally with five banks of oars, and taking off the ensign from the Admirall gally he followed his flying wife, accompanied only with Alexander a Syrian and Scellius. [Florus, lib. 4, cap. 11, Plutarch, Dio, lib. 50, pag. 439, 440. Orof. lib. 6, cap. 19.] and thus the generally, who should punish runaways, became the desertour of his own army, so that it may be doubted, whether he would have ordered the victory at the disposing of Cleopatra, who directed his flight at her command. [Vellei. Paternul, lib. 2, cap. 85.]

Cleopatra perceiving Antonius coming, lit up a sign out of her ship, and Antonius being come was taken up into her ship, but he neither saw her nor was seen by her, but went and fate down alone in the prow of the ship, and said never a word, clapping both his hands over his head. [Plutarch.]

Antonius his souldiers being astonished at the flight of their Generall, began also to think of flying, and some hoyled saile, other call the Towers and rakings of their ships into the sea, that the ships being lightned they might fly the faster, Cæsar's souldiers who had no sailes, and were not provided for: for about for a fight at sea, (for now follow them that fled, but setting upon them that were preparing for fight, (for now they were equal to their enemies in numbers) compassing about each ship of their enemies, with many of their own, they fought with them at hand, and at a row. [Dio, pag. 440.] for Antonius's souldiers, valour lasted a long time after their Generall was gone, and when they despaired of victory, they thought that they might die; Cæsar desiring to pacifie them with words, whom he could kill with his sword, calls out to them telling them that Antonius was fled, and demanded of them for whom and with whom they fought. [Vellei. Paternul, lib. 2, cap. 85.] at length upon meer compulsion, he commanded fire to be brought out of the Camp, for now there was no other way of getting the full victory, although he had abstained from setting fire on the ships, in hope to get the enemies treasure; yea the Cæsarians themselves, seeing they would not help themselves when their ships were on fire, much lesse hurt their enemies, they failed to them, and with desire of getting money, endeavoured to quench the fire; of whom many perished by the being burned with their ships, and by the grappings of their enemies. [Dio, fin. lib. 50.]

Whenas the Fleet of Antonius had long resisted Cæsar, and was grievously troubled with the waves that beat full upon the prowes of their ships, they were overcome about the tenth hour: as Plutarch writes; and thus the souldiers when they had long fought for their absent Generall, at last very unwillingly laying down their arms yielded up the Victory: and Cæsar soon gave them life and pardon, that they could be persuaded to ask it; and it was generally granted that the souldiers performed the parts of an excellent Generall, and the Generall of a cowardly souldier. [Vellei. Paternul, lib. 2, cap. 85.]

From the fifth hour (as Orofius saith) to the seventh, the battle on both sides went with uncertain hope of conquest: but the rest of the day with the following night, inclined clined the Victory to Cæsar, [Oros. lib. 6, cap. 19.] for the fight continued till late at night, so that the Conquerour was forced to lodge aboard all night, [Sueton. in Othavio, cap. 17.]

The battle at Actium was fought, Cæsar and Messala Corvinus being Consuls, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2, cap. 84.] the second of September, from which begins the account of the years of Cæsar's Monarchy; as in the beginning of his 51 book Dio observeth, which also in another place he saith was 44 years, [lib. 55, pag. 590.] wanting 13 days, as much as are between the 19 of August in which he died, and the second of September, but both those days being excluded: after which manner Suetonius [in Othavio, cap. 8.] Aurelius Victor and Eutropius are to be taken; whereas they say that he alone governed the Common-wealth full forty years.

As soon as it was day, Cæsar perfected the Victory: there are 12000 of the conquered reported to be slain; and 6 or 7000 wounded, of whom a 1000 died of their wounds. So Orosius, [lib. 6, cap. 19.] But Plutarch saith, that there died not of them above 5000, and 300 ships taken; the reliques of this huge armado, was carried in the wracks thereof up and down over the whole sea: for the seas being purged with the wind, did daily belch upon upon the shoars gold and purple being the spoiles of the Arabians and Sabeans, and a thousand other Nations of Asia, [Florus, lib. 4, cap. 11.]

And this was that famous Sea-fight to much spoken of by the Poets of that time; namely, Virgil lib. 8, Æneid. Ovid, lib. Metamorphos. 15. Horace Epod. 9, ad Mecenatem, & Propert. lib. 4, Eleg. 6. where it is that memorable diffick.

Frangit, & attollit vires in milite causa Que nisi iusta subest, excutit arma pudor.

The cause it is the soldier animates,
Which if not good, his courage shame abates.

To which answers that which Messala Corvinus is reported to have said, when he was commended by Cæsar (with whom he was Collegue this year in the Consulship): that though he was his utter enemy in Brutus his business, yet had done very good service for him in the battle of Actium. O Cæsar, you shall always find me of the better and juster party, [Plutarch in fin. Bruti.]

Cæsar of the spoiles of the enemy, dedicated ten ships to Apollo Actius, from a ship of one bank of oars, to ten, [Strabo, lib. 7, pag. 325. Dio, lib. 52, pag. 442.]

Cæsar sent part of his Fleet in pursuit of Antonius and Cleopatra, who when they could not overtake them, returned, [Dio, pag. 443.] But some light ships overtook him: which he repulsed; onely Lacon a Lacedæmonian, the son of Lacharis who was beheaded by Antonius for theivery, took a lance at him from the deck of the ship as if he would have thrown it at him; but yet he did not let upon Antonius his ship, but he struck with his beak another Admiral Gally, (for there were two of them) that he turned her round and took her, and another of them which was laden with very rich stuff and carriage, [Plutarch.]

After he was gone, Antonius returned to his former silence, composing himself after the same manner: but after he had spent three days thus in the prow of the ship, either stricken with anger or shame, he arrived at Tænarus where Cleopatras women first brought them to speak together, and afterwards to sup and lie together, [Id.]

There arrived also many Merchant ships, and some of Antonius his friends that had escaped by flight, bringing news that indeed the Fleet was scattered, but yet they thought that the land Forces remained whole: where he sent messengers to Canidius, commanding him that with all speed he should retire with the army thorough Macedonia into Asia, [Id.]

Many of the army by land knew not of Antonius his flight; yea when they heard it, it seemed incredible, that he should flee, leaving behind him XIX whole Legions of Foot, and XII thousand Horse: for his soldiers were in desire and hope that he would again appear somewhere else: yea they shewed so much fidelity to him, that when his flight was certainly known, yet they stayed seven dayes, and rejected the messengers that were sent unto them by Cæsar, [Id.]

Cæsar overtook them as they were marching into Macedonia, and without a stroke joynted them unto himself, [Dio, lib. 5, pag. 443.] for when it was night, the General Canidius left the Camp, and in all haste fled unto Antonius; then they being destitute of all things, and betrayed by their Leaders, joynted themselves to the Conquerour, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2, cap. 86. Plutarch in Anton.] who admitted them into his own army, [Dio, pag. 444.]

Many

Many of the Roman Nobility even then fled to Antonius, but the auxiliaries every one into his own Country: yet they never hereafter waged war against Cæsar; but both they, and all people who were formerly subject to the Romans, partly presently, and partly afterwards, accepted of conditions of peace from Cæsar, [Dio, lib. 51, pag. 445.]

Cæsar having commanded money from the Cities, and taken from them the power over the Citizens, which they usurped in the councils of the people; took from the Kings and Governours, all the Towns they had received from Antonius, except onely from Amyntas and Archelaus. He deploied of their Principality, Philopater the son of Tarcond motus, (Prince of Cilicia) Lycomedes who obtained the kingdom of Pontus in part of Cappadocia, and Alexander the brother of Jamblichus, who had received a kingdom in Arabia, for accusing of Cæsar. He gave the Country of Lycomedis to Medius, who was the author of the revolt of the Mylians of Asia from Antonius. He granted freedom to the Cydonians and Lamprans (in Crete,) because they aided him: and rebuilt the City of the Lamprans, which was overthrowen. The Senators and Knights and other Noble men, who had in any way helped Antonius, many of them he fined in money, many he put to death, and some he pardoned, [Id. ibid.]

Among those that he granted life to, was Sosius, who seeing he had often made war against Cæsar, wisthen shrank away and fled, but being afterwards found out, was let go free: and M. Scaurus, the half brother of S. xus Pompeius, who also was designed to death, yet had his life given him for his mother Murcia's sake. Among them that were put to death, was Curio the son of that Curio whose help Cæsar the Dictator oftentimes: and Aquiles Flori, both father and son, of whom when one onely was by Cæsar commanded to be put to death, namely upon whom the lot fell, both died; for the son, before they cast lots, offered himself freely to the Executioner, and the father, in a great passion of grief for this business, laid violent hands upon himself, [Id. pag. 443, 444.]

Cassius Parmenitis fled to Athens, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 1, cap. 7.] he of whom Horace makes mention in the 3 book, epist. 4. asking of Albius Tibullus the Poet, whether he means him; and of whose Poems that Orpheus is thought to be one, which is set forth by Achilles Statius, at the end of the Commentaries upon the book of Suetonius a famous Rhetorician: a Poeme also called Brutus is cited by Varro, in lib. 5, de lingua Latina: and that this Cassius was a frighten now at Athens with such a ghost, as was laid to have appeared to Brutus before the battle at Philippi, Valerius notes in these words in the former place. In the dead of the night as he lay in bed, having his mind astonished with grief and cares, he thought he saw coming unto him, a man of huge greatness, of black brow, with an ugly beard, and long hair: who being asked who he was, answered, Kassidallura. He being a frighten with so horrible a vision, and more horrid name, called his servants, and asked them, if they saw any so habited, either coming in, or going out; who answering him, that none came thither, he gave himself again to rest and sleep; but yet the same vision was always in his mind; wherefore putting away sleep, he commanded a light to be brought in, and forbade his servants to leave him. Valerius adds, that a very little time passed between this night and his death, which Cæsar inflicted on him; for amongst the last that were put to death for the murder of Julius Cæsar, was this Parmenitis Cassius, as Trebonius was the first, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2, cap. 87. Oros. lib. 6, cap. 19.] which we may understand out of the former Relation of Valerius Maximus, was done at Athens a little after the Victory at Actium.

Scribere, quod Cassi Parmenitis opuscula vincat?

What, to excell Parmenitis Cassius, write?

For Cæsar then failed to Athens, and being appealed with the Greeks, he distributed the corn that was left in the war to the Cities that were afflicted with famine, and were deploied of money, servants, and horses, [Plutarch.]

Antonius being to depart from Tænarus into Africa, chose out one ship of good burden laden with great store of treasure, and other rich plate of gold and silver, and gave it unto his friends, commanding them to divide it amongst them, and to shift for themselves; which they refusing and weeping, he very courteously comforted them, and praying them that they would provide for themselves, he dismissed them; and wrote letters to Theophilus the Governour of Corinth, that he would see them safe, and afford them some hiding place, till they might make their peace with Cæsar. This Theophilus was the father of Hypparchus, who was in great authority with Antonius, and and the first of his freed men, that revolted from him to Cæsar, who afterwards went and dwelt at Corinth. [Id.]

Cleopatra, that might safely saille into Egypt, put Crowns on the prowes of her ships, and commanded those longes to be hung on a pipe, that are usually hung after obtaining a victory. [Dio. lib. 51. pag. 446.]

Having thus gotten a safe passage into Egypt, she put to death many noble men, that were alwaies her enemies: and at that time were grown parr by reason of her overthrow, and from what they had, and taking away all obligations to their gods, yea even from temples, that were not to be come unto, she got huge store of money, she provided also forces, and fought out forraign luppies, and that she might draw the King of Media to her alliance, she sent unto him the head that was cut off from the King of Armenia, (Artabazdes or Artabazes.) [Id. ibid.]

She also set upon a bold and great enterprize, for she went about to passe her fleet over the Isthmus which divides the red sea from Egypt, and which is thought to distinguish Africa from Asia, when it is narrow, it and is so: it is thought by the two seas, that it is not above 300 furlongs over, that having sent her forces into the Arabian gulf, with great store of money, she might seek out some remote Country by her shipping, and so be free from slavery and war, [Plutarch, in Antonio.] but the first ships that were so carried over, and others that were built for sailing into the red sea, the inhabitants of Arabia Pefora burnt at the perswasion of Q. Didius the governour of Syria. [Id. ibid. Dio. lib. 51. pag. 447.]

Antonius being come into Africa, went into a desert, wandering up and down only with two friends, namely Aristocrates a Greek Rhetorician, and Lucilius a Roman, [Plutarch, ibid.] and when he had sent some to Plinius Scarpus and the army, which he had then formerly raised for the defence of Egypt, he told them that he would not entertain Antonius, and killed also those that were sent unto him, and put to death like-wile some souldiers that seemed to take it ill. [Dio. ibid. pag. 446.]

When Antonius understood of this revolt, he determined to kill himself; but being hindered by his friends, he went to Alexandria, who being come thither, and thinking that the Legions at Actium remained whole till, (of the losse of which Canidius himself brought him the news) Cleopatra left off her design of sailing into the red sea, and furnished with garriſon the mouths of Nilus. [Plutarch, ut supra.]

But Antonius left the City, and the conversation of his friends, and built him an house in the sea by the Ile of Pharos, by casting a mount into the sea, and there lived as a banished man from all men, saying he would lead the life of Antonius Monarche the man-hater, because his condition was like his: because he was abused by his friends and had experience of their ingratitude, therefore he would trust no man, and was angry with all men, and thereupon called his house Timonium. [Id. ibid. Strabo. lib. 17. pag. 794.]

Herod sending unto Antonius, advised him to put Cleopatra to death, for he said, if that were timely done, he might enjoy her estate, and obtain from Cæsar easier conditions of peace. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 10.]

Cæsar dismissed the old souldiers of his own and Antonius his army into Italy, giving nothing to any of them, and the rest he sent into severall places, but being afraid, least they that were companions of his victory, and were dismissed without any reward, should raise any sedition; he sent Agrippa after them into Italy, as it were upon some other business; and settled the affaires of Greece, as it there were no danger to be expected from those souldiers that were discharged, and being gone into Asia, and settled things there, he expected what Antonius would doe. [Dio. lib. 51. pag. 444. 445.]

When all people and all Kings denied to send any succour to Antonius and Cleopatra, (although many of them had received great favours from them both;) the Gladiators a people of most abject condition, who were brought up at Cyzicum by Antonius, for the setting forth of triumphall plaies, (of whom formerly mention was made out of Appian, at the year of the Julian Period 4679.) valiantly fought for them, for as soon as they knew what things were done; they determined to take a voyage into Egypt for to bring them aid; and in their passage did not a little incommode Amyntas in Galatia, and the sons of Tarcondimous in Cilicia, who formerly had been great friends to Antonius and Cleopatra, but had revolted from them, and also Q. Didius the Governour of Syria who forbade them passage, but seeing they were compelled in, and could not passe into Egypt; yet could they not by any means be brought to revolt, although Didius gave them many fair promises, but sent for Antonius to come unto them, thinking that they might the more easily carry on the war in Syria, if they were joyed with him, but when that neither Antonius came himself, nor sent any messenger unto them, they against their wills yielded unto Didius, but with this condition that they should not hereafter be Gladiators. Didius granted unto them Daphne the the suburbs of Antioch to dwell in, till he had certified this matter unto Cæsar, [Id. ibid. pag. 447.]

For the suppressing of these Gladiators, Didius wrote unto Cæsar, that there were supplies sent unto him by Herod: of which Cæsar in his discontent that he had with Herod; in Josephus lib. 1. bell. cap. 15. Δὲ ποὺ γὰρ Ἰεροδὼτος ἐνυμνήσας αὐτὸν ὡς τοῖς ἡμετέροις χρησάμενος. Because Ventidius hath writ to me that thou hast sent succour to him as against the Gladiators, which in the 15 of the Antiquit. cap. 10. is thus expressly read. Ἐπεὶ Κανιδῶς ὁ γυναικὸς ἀνδρὸς ἀσθενὲς καὶ ἀβελήτος ἀνέβη εἰς τὸν ὄρειον τῆς Ἰερουζαλὴμ. That Capidius had written unto him, how much Herod had assisted him in the war against the Monarchs of Syria: when as in the former place I have put Gladiators for Monarchs; So it is clear, that in both places, for Ventidius and Capidius, the name of Q. Didius is to be put out: and from hence rose that news that was brought to Antonius to his house Timonium; that Herod the Jew with some Legions and some Cohorts, was revolted unto Cæsar; as Plutarch relates in his life.

At Rome many things were decreed in honour of Cæsar for his Victory at Sea; for a Triumph was granted to him for Cleopatra, and a Triumphall arch at Baudium, and another in the Roman Forum. That the bafe of the Julian Temple should be adorned with the beakes of ships that were taken. That there should be Playes every fifth year in honour of him. That Processions should be alwaies on his birth-days, and on the day the news was first brought: and that the Vestall Virgins, Senate and their wives and children, should go and meet him as he entered the City. That all the ornaments of Antonius should be cast down and demolished, his birth-day also was judged unlucky: and it was provided by an Edict, that none of that family should have the fore name of Marcus. [Dio. lib. 51. pag. 454.]

Cæsar retired into Samos to winter there; [Strabo, in Othario. cap. 17.] from whence seeing Antonius had taken away the three great Colossick works of Myron, that stood upon one bafe. Cæsar replaced two of them upon the same bafe, namely, Minerva, and Hercules; but carried Jupiter into the Capitol, and made a Chappel a purpose for it, [Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 637.]

There when Cæsar took a view of the prisoners, one Metellus an old man was brought forth, with long hair, and otherwise deformed by reason of his habit; and when he by the Cryer was cited by name as he stood amongst the prisoners; his son, which was one of Cæsar's Captains, leapt from his seat, and went and embraced with teares, his father whom he yet scarce knew; but then refraining weeping, he said, My father, O Cæsar, was an enemy to thee, I a companion, he hath deserved punishment, I a reward; I desire that either you would grant my fathers life for my sake, or put me to death together with him. When beginning to pity them, Cæsar granted Metellus life, although he was his mortal enemy: So that by no gifts he could be perswaded to revolt from Antonius to him, [Appian, lib. 4. pag. 613.]

Antonius leaving his Sea-cottage which he called Timonium, went unto the Palace; and being there entertained by Cleopatra, he set all the City to rioting and banqueting, and himself to liberality. [Plutarch.] He enrolled Cæsarion the son of Cæsar and Cleopatra, amongst the young men; and to his own Antonius Fulvia, he gave the virgile gown, which was of Purple without any embroidery: both that the Egyptians might be more cheerful, in having a man to raise over them, and the rest that should have them for Commanders should be more confirmed, if any thing should happen not well to Antonius and Cleopatra, [Id. ibid. Dio. lib. 51. pag. 446.]

Whereupon there was huge feasting and banquettings at Alexandria for many days; but yet they turned this meeting into another nothing inferior to the other in delights, luxury, and splendour, which they called Συναποδυσμα, or of them that will do together: for the friends of those that would die together, gave in their names, and passed the time in pleasures and in feasting, when it came round to every ones turn, [Plutarch, ibid.]

Moreover Cleopatra got together divers sorts of deadly poysons of each of which that she might make trial, she gave them to condemned persons, the also made experience of beaſts, and looked on them as they were put divers to divers persons; thus she did daily, and amongst all she found that the biting of the Alpe was the only way, for it brought a sleepincle and heavineſſe upon one without any contraction of the members, or groaning, only with a gentle sweating of the face, and a languishing stupidity of the senses. [Id. ibid.]

Yet although Antonius and Cleopatra thus provided for themselves, as if they would make war both by sea and land; yet they no lesse provided for this, that upon any urgent necessity, they might set saille for Spain, hoping that by their money they might draw it to revolt, or else that they might get into the Red Sea, [Dio. lib. 51. pag. 446.] of whose preparation to flee into the Ocean, Florus also makes mention, [lib. 4. pag. 11.]

Cæsar entred upon the fourth Consulship in Asia, [Sueton. in Orlavio, cap. 26.] where he is the sixth time aluted Emperor, and being now the fourth time Consul with Marcus Licinius, Crassus entred Brundisium, [Orat. lib. 6, cap. 19.] being recalled into Italy, by letters written by Agrippa from Rome, [Plutarch, in Anton.] that he might repress a sedition of the souldiers; demanding rewards, and discharge from service whom (after the victory at Actium) out of the whole number he had sent before unto Brundisium. [Sueton in Orlavio, cap. 17.]

In passing the seas thither, he was twice tossed with tempests; first between the promontory of Peloponnesus, and Ætolia; and again by the Caranlian Mountains. In both places part of his pinnaces were cast away; and also in that ship in which he went, the tackling was rent, and the helme broken. [Sueton. ibid.]

He came into Brundisium in the midst of winter, but went no farther, because the whole Senate (the Tribunes of the people had two Prætors, being left for the government of the City, by a decree of the Senate) with the Knights, and great part of the people, with many others, came to meet him: all those were souldiers, partly through fear (of so great a multitude that were come together, and of Cæsar himself, whom Germanicus laies in Tacitus, lib. 1. Annal. cap. 42.) That he daunted the Ælian Legion, with his looks, and partly through hope, many also came thither, being sent for; to some of which Cæsar gave money, and to some that had been with him in all his wars, he gave lands also. [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 445.]

Suetonius writes that he stayed not at Brundisium above 27 days, till he had ordered his business about the Souldiers. Dio saith that he went into Greece again, on the 31 day after he came into Italy; and that by reason of the Winter, the ships being brought over the Isthmus of Peloponnesus, he came with such speed into Asia, that Cleopatra and Antonius heard both of his departure, and returne at the same time. [pag. 445, 446.]

Antonius sent Alexas, or Alexander, a Laodicean, who by Timagenes means became known unto him at Rome, and could do most with him of all the Grecians, unto King Herod, to hinder his revolt unto Cæsar, who betrayed Antonius, and carried with Herod. [Plutarch.]

Alexandra hoping that Herod should be thoroughly punished by Cæsar, who was his enemy, solicited her father Hyrcanus, that he would no longer suffer this affliction of their family, but that he would provide for himself, and relieve himself for better fortunes: She counselled him also, that he should demand protection and entertainment of Malchus, King of Arabia. These persuasions of hers Hyrcanus at first repelled; but being overcome with the importunity of the woman, always singing the same song of his future hopes, and the treachery of Herod. He sent letters to the Arabian, by one Dositheus, a friend of his, that he should send Herodemen, which should conduct him to the Alphabetick Lake, which lieth distant from the confines of Jerusalem 300 furlongs: this Dositheus was kinsman to that Joseph that was put to death by Herod: his brethren also were put to death amongst others at Tyrus by Antonius: nevertheless, he to curry favour with the King, shewed him the letter. Herod giving him first thanks for this desired of him one courtesie more; which was, That he would now fold up the letters, and new seal it, and give it to Malchus, and receive an answer from him again. The Arabian wrote word back, That he was ready to entertain Hyrcanus, and his family, and all the Jews that were of that faction, and that he would send a band of souldiers, that should conduct him in safety, and should be obedient to his command in all things. After Herod had also received this letter, he called Hyrcanus, and asked him, whether he had any confederacy with Malchus; who denying it, he produced the letters, in the Council of the Sanhedrim, and commanded him to be put to death. Thus are these matters registered in Herods Commentaries, for they are otherwise delivered by others: to wit, that he was not put to death for this crime, but for some treasons against the King. [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 9.]

Antonius and Cleopatra sent Embassadors unto Cæsar into Asia. Cleopatra demanded the Kingdom of Egypt for her children, he demanded that he might lead a private life in Athens, if it would not be yielded to that it might be in Egypt, through the want and distrust of friends, by reason of their many revolts, Antonius sent Euphronem, his sons School-master, Embassador. [Plutarch in Anton.] Cleopatra, without Antonius privacy, sent to Cæsar a golden Scepter, a golden Crown, and a golden Chaire, as it were delivering her Kingdom over unto him, so that if he most hated Antonius, yet at least he might have some pity on her. Cæsar accepted of the presents, accounting them as good omens, but afforded Antonius no answer, and truly openly threatened Cleopatra, and thus answered her, That if she would lay aside her arms, and her Kingdom, he would then advise, what was fit to be done with her; but but privately he promised her impunity and her kingdom sure, if she would put Antonius to death, [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 447.]

Herod having dispatched Hyrcanus posting unto Cæsar, and hoping no good from him for the friendship he had shewed unto Antonius, had Alexandra in suspicion, lest the taking this opportunity should incite the people to rebel, and fill the kingdom with domestic seditions. Wherefore committing the care of the kingdom to his brother Phororas, he left his mother Cyproca, and sister Salome, and all his kindred in the Castle of Masada; and commanded his brother, that if any thing happened otherwise then well, he should keep the government of the kingdom in his own hands; and for his wife Mariamne, who for some difficulties could not live with his mother, he placed her in Alexandria with her mother Alexandra: committing the custody of them to his Treasurer Joseph, and to Sohemus an Iurian, men that had always been faithful unto him, and now let for the keeping of these Ladies, as it were for their honour; but yet he also gave them this command, That if they should certainly know that any sinister mishap befel him, that they should presently put both of them to death, and to the utmost of their power, continue the kingdom for his children, and his brother Phororas. [Joseph, lib. 15. Antiquit. cap. 9.]

Having given these commands, Herod posted to Rhodes, to meet with Cæsar there, whither when he was come, he only laid aside his Crown, but for his other Princely Ornaments, he altered nothing: and being admitted into Cæsars presence, with great constancy and magnanimity of spirit, he freely confessed the love he bore Antonius, and also the succours he sent Antonius of corn and money, because that being detained by the Arabian war, he could not bring any succour unto him in person: adding moreover, that he was ready with the same faith to keep friendship with Cæsar: which that he would do, Cæsar exhorted him, and restoring his Crown to him, exceedingly honoured him. And thus beyond all expectation Herod is again confirmed in his kingdom; both by the free gift of Cæsar, and also by a decree of the Senate which he obtained for him, [Id. ibid. cap. 10. lib. 1. bell. cap. 15.] of whom also Strabo, [lib. 16. pag. 765.] He excelled his ancestors so much especially in familiarity with the Romans, that he was declared King; first by Antonius, and afterward by Cæsar, granting the same authority to him. And Tacitus, [Histor. lib. 1. cap. 9.] Augustus being Conquerour enlarged Herods kingdom that was given him by Antonius.

Herod gave Presents to Cæsar himself, and also to his friends above his ability, to shew the gratefulness of his mind. He endeavoured also to beg pardon for Alexas, or Alexander the Laodicean, that was sent unto him from Antonius, but he could not; because Cæsar had sworn that he would punish him (for he had been the most violent defender towards Antonius of all the machinations that Cleopatra used against Octavia.) Wherefore seeing he relying upon Herod durst come into Cæsars presence, he was presently taken, and carried in fetters into his own country, and there put to death by Cæsars command, (during the life time of Antonius whom he had betrayed,) [Joseph, ibid. Plutarch, in Ant.]

Antonius and Cleopatra sent other Embassadors to Cæsar, and Cleopatra by them promised him an huge masse of money, and Antonius put him in mind of the friendship and kindred that was between them, and excused the familiarity that he had with the Egyptian woman; and reckoned up the society that was between them, and the advantage that they had done in their youth. Moreover he delivered over to him, Q. Tullius a Senator, one of Cæsars murderers, and then his friend, and promised him also, that he would kill himself, if by doing that he might obtain security for Cleopatra. Cæsar put Tullius to death, and that in the Isle of Coos (in which he had felled trees for ship-timber, out of Æculapius his Grove) but neither then afforded he any answer to Antonius, [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 448.]

In the absence of Herod, his wife Mariamne, and mother in law Alexandra, took it very ill that they were shut up in that Castle as in prison, so that they could neither enjoy their own, nor make use of other mens goods: especially when by her feminine flatteries she had fished out of Sohemus, what Herod had commanded him concerning them: the then began to wish that he might never return home, supposing that she should live a most intolerable life with him; all which the afterwards dissembled nor, but openly confessed what it was that afflicted her: for he being returned beyond all expectation, and relating to Mariamne the successes he had, she seemed not to regard them, and at all the caresses that he made her, she would sigh, so that Herod plainly perceived the hatred of his wife against him, and was wavering between love and hatred towards her, [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 11.]

Before Cæsar went with his army into Egypt, he went into Syria, as may be understood out of Josephus Suetonius, [cap. 17.] Plutarch and Orosius.

Phraates and Tiridates contending about the kingdom of Parthia, and demanding aid of Cæsar; he gave them no other answer, than that he would consider of it.

Preventing his business in Egypt, whereas indeed he did nothing else, but that by this civil war, both their strengths might be weakened. [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 456.]

C. Merius a Centurion, who in the war against Antonius had offered one excellent service, was circumvented unawares by an ambush of his enemies, & brought to Alexandria before Antonius, by whom being asked what was fit to be done with him, answered, Command to have my throat cut, for neither can I sufficiently be induced by benefits, nor for fear of death, to leave off to be Caesar's souldier, or begin to be thine; for which vertues sake Antonius pardoned him. [Valerius Maximus lib. 3. cap. 8.]

Antonius and Cleopatra thought fit that their children should be sent before into the red sea, with part of the Queens treasure. [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.] they themselves having disposed garrisons about the two corner coasts of Egypt, Pelusium, and Parætonium, prepared a fleet and forces, for the setting a foot the war again. [Id. ibid. Florus lib. 4. cap. 11.]

Antonius sent a third Embassie unto Caesar, and his son Antyllus with much gold, whom he sent back again, without either granting his Embassie, or giving any answer, only took his gold. But to Cleopatra, as he did at first and second, so now the third time, he propounded many threats and promises. [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 448.]

And that he might win Cleopatra unto him, he sent unto her Thyreus, or Thyrlus, a freed man of his, a very discreet man. [Id. ibid. Plutarch in Anton.] for he was afraid, least Antonius and Cleopatra, being in despair of pardon, should persist in their intention, and overcome him by their own strength, or else should pass into Spain or Gallia, or that Cleopatra should burn all the treasures that he had heaped into her Sepulcher, as he threatened to do: therefore he sent Thyrlus, who conferred very courteously with Cleopatra, and told her that Caesar was in love with her; hoping that she, that had a mind to have all men in love with her, might be brought to that pass, that having put Antonius to death, she would preserve both her self and her money. [Dio, ut supra.]

Caesar marched against Antonius through Syria, and his Lieutenant through Lybia. [Plutarch.] Cornelius Gallus, being sent by him before, having received four Legions of Scarpas, which were at Cyrena, for a guard of that place, suddenly seized upon Parætonium, the prime City of Egypt, that lieth towards Lybia. [Dio. pag. 448. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.]

Antonius having intelligence of this, although he thought to have gone into Syria, being called thither by the Gladiators, yet fearing that designe a part, he marched towards Parætonium, hoping that he should easily draw those forces from Gallus unto himself; for he knew that they were well affected towards him, because they had been souldiers together: but if that would not do, then he would win them by force, for he brought with him great forces both by sea and land: but neither could he so much as partly with them, (for Gallus made all the Trumpeters to sound, so that no body could hear any thing) and beside he received some losse by a suddain fallie, and his Fleet also was somewhat incommoded: for Gallus had by night laid chain crosse the mouth of the Haven, which lay hid under water, keeping the Port with a guard that was not seen, and suffered Antonius his ships, without any fear, to saile within the Haven in contempt of him; but the chains being drawn up by certain Engines, prepared on purpose, he partly burnt, and partly sunck, the ships being assailed on every side by sea and land, and also from the houles. [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 448, 449.]

Herod entertained Caesar with all royal magnificence at Ptolomai, as he passed through Syria into Egypt, and shewed all hospitality towards his army, giving them plenty of all victual; by which means he was accounted one of Caesars chiefest friends, and was wont to ride about with him, when he mustered his army: he entertained him also and his friends, with the service of an 150 men, clad in most rich and sumptuous apparel; yea, he also suffered them to want nothing, in their march to Pelusium, through places that were barren, and wanted water; yet they wanted neither wine nor water, with which the souldier was most delighted. He also presented Caesar with 800 talents, yea, he gave them all such satisfaction, that they confessed that he gave them such entertainment, that it was greater than the Kingdom could afford them. [Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 15. lib. 5. Antiquit. cap. 10.]

Cleopatra by the discourse of Thyrlus or Thyreus believed that Caesar was in love with her, both because she desired it should be so, and also because that by the same reason she had enslaved to her both his father and Antonius: and therefore she hoped for not only pardon and the Kingdom of Egypt for her self, but also the empire of the Romans. [Dio, pag. 449.] but Antonius took this Thyrlus that was extremely honoured by her, and whipped him soundly, and then sent him back unto Caesar writing that he did this being provoked by his insulting pride, who was at that easily provoked by reason of his miseries, and said, if you mislike this, you have Hipparchus my freed man, hang him up, and whip him, that we may cry quittance, from thenceforth that the might wipe off all jealousies and suspicions from him, Cleopatra wonderfully honoured him: for whereas the toleminist her birth day but meanly, for her present misfortune, the toleminist his birth day, with the greatest splendour and magnificence that could be, so that many that were invited to the feast, and came poor, went away rich. [Plutarch.]

Caesar took Pelusium, as it was reported, by force, but indeed by the treachery of Cleopatra. [Dio, pag. 449.] There was a common report, that this Town was delivered unto Caesar by Seleucus, certainly with her consent: but to clear her self, she delivered up Seleucus wife and children to Antonius, to be revenged of them at his pleasure. [Plutarch.] when he being beaten by Cornelius Gallus at Parætonium, and immediately after at Pharos, (as it is in Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.) and was returned to Alexandria.

Cleopatra had store-houses, and monuments built both for sumptuousness and height admirable, which she had joyed to fill her temple, thither had she brought the most precious things of all her royal treasures, as gold, silver, emeralds, pearies, ebony, ivory, and cinnamon, and last of all great store of lamps and flax: whereupon Caesar being afraid he should loose fine riches, and that through despair that the destroy and burn them, daily gave her fair hopes, whilst he marched with his army towards the City. [Plutarch.] but the privately forbad the Citizens of Alexandria, that they should fall out against Caesar, whereas openly he seemed to hearten them on to go meet the enemy. [Dio, pag. 449.]

Caesar fate down with his army in the place where they exercise their horses, and Antonius made a sally out and fought valiantly, and routed Caesar's horse, and drove them even to the Camp, and being heightened with this victory he entered the palace and kissed Cleopatra as he was in his armour, recommending unto her a man that had fought most valiantly. Cleopatra to reward him gave him an armour and headpiece all of gold, which he having received that night led to Caesar. [Plutarch.]

Antonius, casting tickets into Caesars camp, promised each souldier 1500 Drachmes or pence, these tickets Caesar of his own accord read unto the souldiers, by this means rendering Antonius more hateful, and also recalling them to an hatred of base treachery, and to a declaration, of a cheerfulfulness to declare for him, whereupon growing exceedingly angry that their fidelity was tempted, they lo valiantly behaved themselves, that Antonius joyning in a battle only of foot men, with them left the field being overcome by them beyond all expectation. [Dio, pag. 449.] whether I referre also that place of Strabo [lib. 17. pag. 795.] as one goes through the horse, finding Nicopolis, which is built near the sea, so that it may be thought not to be less than the City, and is distant from Alexandria 30 furlongs, this place Caesar Augustus adorned, because here he overcame them in fight, that made a sally out against him with Antonius.

Antonius after this by his Embassadors challenged Caesar to a single duell, who answered, that Antonius had many waies to die: wherefore considering that he could no way more honourably die then in battle, he determined to set up his reit, and to set upon Caesar both by sea and land: and being at supper (as it is reported) he commanded his servants that they should drink and feast themselves heartily, for it was uncertain whether they should die to morrow, or should serve other masters, he being dead and gone, where because of this he saw his friends weeping, he told them he would not to lead them out to fight, when he thought not rather to return with victory and honour, then to die a glorious death. [Plutarch in Anton.]

About the middle of that night, when the whole City was in silence, and sorrow, for fear and expectation of the event, it is reported that on a sudden, there was heard (sweet musicke at all kinds of instruments, and a noyse of a multitude of people, as at the feasts of Bacchus and Satyr-like friskings and dancing, as if indeed it had been the festivity of Bacchus himself, (whom Dionysius used to feign his father) the noise was so great, and that this company fate down together (being indeed a very great one) almost in the very middle of the City, towards that gate, which led unto the enemy without: and that they passed at length through this gate, and so vanished. [Id. ibid.]

Dio reports, that besides this many other prodigies fore-ran the bondage of Egypt, for it rained (as he saith) in those places, in which before there never any drop had fallen, and that not only with water but with blood also, neither did water alone drop from the cloudes, but there appeared armies there also: A Dragon of a huge vastness was suddenly seen among the Egyptians, which hissed horribly, there appeared also Comets, and the images of the dead; the statues seemed to be sorrowfull, and Apis made a mournfull howling, and shed teares. [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 445.]

On the Kalends of August, as soon as it was day, Antonius went down into the Haven to order his Fleet, [Orf. lib. 6. cap. 19.] but Cleopatra caused the Fleet to revolt from him, [Dio. pag. 449.] For Antonius his Fleet as soon as they had rowed neer the other Fleet, saluted Cæsar's soldiers, and being refused, they revolted unto them, and having of all the ships made one Fleet, came in hostile manner against the City; which whilst Antonius beheld, he was immediately forsaken by his Horsemen, who also revolted: his Foot also being overthrown, he retired into the City, crying he was betrayed by Cleopatra to them, against whom for her sake, he had taken up arms, [Plutarch.]

Cleopatra, fearing the anger and despair of Antonius, but pretending it was for fear of Cæsar, and that she would put her self to death that she did this; fled unto her Monument with one Eunuch and two maids; and sent unto Antonius a message that she was dead. This he believed, and therefore desired his faithful servant Eros (who had long ago promised that he would do it when necessity required) that he would kill him. Eros drew out his naked sword, as if he would strike him, but his face being from him, he killed himself: who falling at his feet, Antonius said, Noble Eros, being from him, he killed himself: who falling at his feet, Antonius said, Noble Eros, who teachest me what must be done by my self, but couldst not endure to do for me, and run himself into the belly, and fell upon a bed. The thrust was not such as would much hasten his death, for the blood stinted after he was laid, and when he was a little revived, he desired them that stood about, that they would thrust him thorough, but they all fled out of the chamber, leaving him crying and tormenting himself. Whereupon there was a great tumult made, which when Cleopatra perceived, she looked out from the top of the Monument; for the gate was so made, that if it were once shut, it could not be opened, only the upper parts of it were not yet finished. She sent also Diomedes her Secretary, to bring Antonius into the Monument unto her; whom as soon as Antonius knew that she was alive, he arose, because he thought he might live; but being in despair of life thorough his much bleeding, he was carried by the help of his servants, as he commanded, to the gate of the Monument, [Id. Dio. pag. 449, 450. Livy, lib. 133. Flor. lib. 4. cap. 11. Vellei. Patencul. lib. 2. cap. 87. Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 795. Sueton. in Ollavio. cap. 17. Eutrop. lib. 7. Orf. lib. 6. cap. 19.]

While this was a doing, Decretus one of his Guard, took away Antonius his sword and hid it, and stole away, and running unto Cæsar, was the first that told him of Antonius his death, and shewed him the sword all bloody. Cæsar hearing this news, withdrew himself into the inner most room of the Tent, where he much bewailed Antonius his Kinsman and Colleague, and that had been his companion in many battles, and in the government of the Empire. Then taking his letters, he called his friends together, and read them unto them, and shewed them how proudly and importunately Antonius had answered to all his mild and just demands. He then sent Proculeius, commanding, that by all means, if it were possible, to get Cleopatra alive into his hands: for he was afraid to lose the treasures, and also thought that the would be a magnificent ornament to his Triumph, if he could bring her alive, [Plutarch.]

In the interim, Antonius was drawn up into the Monument, by ropes that were hung, or pulling the stones up on high, [Dio. pag. 450.] They lay there was nothing more lamentable than this sight; for Antonius being all belmeared with blood, and giving up the ghost, was tied to the ropes and drawn up by the great paines of Cleopatra and the two servants that were with her, they that were below raising him up, and Antonius stretching forth his hands to Cleopatra, lifted himself up as well as he could: as soon as Cleopatra had taken him in, she laid him on a bed, then she tore off her head-tire, and trook her breast, and taring her breast and face with her own hands, she was all of a gore blood, and calling him Lord, Husband, and Emperour: and almost forgot her own miseries in compassion of him. After Antonius had a little appeased her grief, he called for some wine, either because he was a thirsty, or because he thought thereby to hasten his death: after he had drank, he advised her, to look to her own affairs, and to save her life if she could without dishonour, and that among all Cæsar's friends she should most trust Proculeius: and that she should not lament the miserable change of his fortune, but rejoice for the great good fortune he had had, because he had been the most famous and powerful Prince of all men, and that now he being a Roman was not cowardly overcome by a Roman: and now he gave up the ghost, just as Proculeius came from Cæsar, [Plutarch.]

Cæsar sent with C. Proculeius a Knight, one Epaphroditus his freed man: telling them both what they should say and do: but Cleopatra fearing that they would use her hardly, tarried in the Monument, that if by no other means she could procure her safety yet she might redeem her pardon and the kingdom of Egypt from Cæsar, by the fear of losing her money; but Cæsar although he desired to get her money, and to take Cleopatra alive, that he might carry her in Triumph, notwithstanding, if he had promised any thing upon his honour, that he might not seem to deceive her, he laboured, laboured, that he might have power to do with her as he would himself, as with a captive, and one reduced to his obedience against her will. [Dio. lib. 51. pag. 450.]

Cleopatra would by no means put her self into Proculeius' hands, but yet had conference with him from the building, he standing without at the door, that was on the plain ground, which although it was so barred, yet the voice might be heard. In this conference she demanded the Kingdom for her children, Proculeius had her be of good cheer, and refer all things to Cæsar. When he had sufficiently ruined the place, he told all things unto Cæsar, who sent Gallus again to demand her answer, who when he came to the door, held her in talk on purpose: and in the mean time Proculeius set up ladders, and got in at the windows, where the women took in Antonius, and drawing up with him two servants, he immediately went down to the gate, where Cleopatra lay talking with Gallus; who seeing Proculeius, went about to kill her self with a Dagger she had about her: but Proculeius came running, and holding her with both his hands, took the Dagger from her, and shook her cloaths, for fear she had some poison hidden about her. Thus Plutarch tells the story, and Dio after this manner,

C. Proculeius and Epaphroditus talking with Cleopatra, propounded very tolerable conditions to her, and of a sudden, before she assented unto them, laid hands on her; but taking away all things, by which she might dispatch her self, yet granting her some daies, that she might stay there till she might embalm Antonius his body: then they brought her into the Palace, diminishing nothing, either of her wonted train and honour, that thereby she might be in hope, that she should obtain what she desired, and also that she might do no mischief to her self. [Dio. lib. 51. pag. 450, 451.] As soon as Cleopatra was taken, an Eunuch of hers, willingly let Alpyranto himself, and being bitten by them, fell into a grave, that he had before prepared for himself. [Id. ibid. pag. 453.]

Cæsar at the first approach conquered Alexandria, a most rich and great City. [Livy, lib. 133. Strabo, 17. pag. 775. Sueton. in Ollavio, cap. 17. Orf. lib. 6. cap. 19.] As he entered Alexandria, he talked with Arius Alexandrinus, a Philosopher, taking him by the right hand, to the end his Country men should honour him the more, when they saw him so honoured, [Plutarch in Anton.] for Cæsar had been his Scholler in Philosophy, and was very well acquainted with him and his two sons, Dionysius and Nicanor. [Seneca, in lib. de Clement. Sueton. in Ollavio, cap. 89. Plutarch in Polit. Dio. lib. 51. pag. 454. & lib. 52. pag. 490. Julian, Cæsar, in Ollavio.]

Then he went into the steeple place of execrations, he accessed a Tribunal which was set up on purpose, and commanded the Cityzeis, who for fear were fallen on their knees before him, to rise; and in a great Oratorio, that he might be understood of all, he told them, he freely pardoned all the people, for their great god Serapis his sake, for the greatness of the City, and for his friend Arius his sake: he likewise pardoned all the Egyptians, being unwilling, that so many men should be put to death, that in many things had done good service for the Romans. [Plutarch in Anton. Dio. lib. 51. pag. 454. Julian, epist. 51. ad Alexand.]

At the intreaty of Arius, he pardoned many amongst other Philostratus, who was he readiest Sophister of his time; howbeit, he still named himself an Academicke, therefore Cæsar hated his manner, and rejected his request, he therefore let his beard grow long, and followed Arius in mourning, always repeating this verse, Σοφὸς ὁ ὅλος αὐτὸν, ἀπὸ σοφὸν ποιοῖ.

Sapiens salus sapienti erit, modo is sapit.

The wile, whilst wile, a savoury safety hath.

which when Cæsar heard of, that he might rather free Arius from envy, than Philostratus from fear, he pardoned him. [Plutarch in Anton.]

Young Autontis, or Antylla, the elder of the two sons Antonius had by Fulvia, Cæsar, although he was betroathed to his daughter Julia, and was fled into a Chapel, that Cleopatra had made for his honour, after many and vain prayers, he took from the image of Julius, and killed him. [Id. ibid. Sueton. in Ollavio, cap. 17. Dio. lib. 51. pag. 446, 454. Orf. lib. 6. cap. 19.] As the soldiers beheld him, Theodorus his School-master, who betrayed him, took from his neck a most gracious Jewel, and sewed it in his girdle, which he denied, but it being found about him, he was trussed up and hanged. [Plutarch ibid.] But to Julius the other son of Antonius by Fulvia, Cæsar commanded his freed men that they should presently deliver over all things to him, that dying men are commanded by the laws to leave to their heirs. [Dio. pag. 454.]

The children that Antonius had by Cleopatra, they were very honourably kept with their Governours and train that waited on them, for them Cæsar saved and nourished and cherished no less, than if they had been linked in alliance with him. [Sueton. & Plutarch. ut supra.]

Of those that favoured Antonius, some he put to death, others he pardoned either of his own good will, or at the intercession of friends. [Dio. pag. 454.] amongst those that were put to death was Canidius, a most bitter enemy always unto Cæsar, and unfaithfull unto Antonius. [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.] who died more cowardly, than became one of that profession, which he always followed. [Vell. Patern. lib. 2. cap. 87.] Q. Onicius also was put to death by Cæsar's own command, because that he being a Senator of the people of Rome, was not ashamed most basely to be Governour to the Queens spinners and weavers. [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.]

There being found with Antonius many children of Kings and Princes, some in the name of hostages others by false accusations, some of them he sent home, others he joyined in marriage together, and some he kept by him, he returned Jopae to her father the King of the Medes, who being conquered had fled to him, but yet he did not send back Artaxas his brothers at his intreaty, because he had killed the Romans that were left behind in Armenia. [Dio. ut supra.]

When he viewed the tomb (which was of glass as Strabo teacheth lib. 17. pag. 795.) and the body of Alexander the great, which was taken out of the vault, Cæsar put a Crown upon it, and strewed flowers over it and worshipped it, and touching the body, it was laid he brake off a piece of his nose: and being demanded whether he would see the bodies of the Ptolemies, although the Alexandrians had a great mind he should, yet would he not behold them, saying, he would see a King not the dead, [Sueton. in Octavio. cap. 18. Dio. lib. 51. pag. 454. 455.] and for that very reason would not go to see Api: saying, he was wont to worship gods not oxen. [Dio. ibid.]

Many great Kings and Captaines desired to bury Antonius, but Cæsar would not take it from Cleopatra, by whose hands he was splendidly and magnificently buried, and Cæsar suffered her to take as much as she would for his funerals. [Plutarch.]

Cleopatra through her much sorrow and grief, (for her breast was troubled with inflammations, and ulcers, through the blows she had given her self,) fell into a fever, which she gladly took for a cover, that she might forget food, and so die without any more trouble, she had a Physician whose name was Olympus, to whom she declared the truth of the matter, and used him as a counsellour and furtherer to bring her into a consumption, as Olympus himself left in writing, who set out an history concerning these matters, when Cæsar smelt out the businesse, he threatened both her and her children, by which she as by so many engines was overcome and afterwards suffered her self to be cured and died as they would themselves. [Id.]

Shortly after Cæsar himself came to visit her and comfort her, [id.] who falling down at his feet, laid bailes for his ries but in vain; for her beauty was beneath the Princes chastity, although he perceived that she intended to stir up affections in him, yet he dissembled it, and fixing his eyes on the ground, laid only this, Woman be of good cheer, you shall have no harm done you: nor was life her suit, which was offered her, but her care was for love and a part of the Kingdom. [Florus. lib. 4. cap. 11. Dio. lib. 5. pag. 451.]

Last of all she delivered to Cæsar a breviary of all the treasure she had; and when Selucus one of her treasurers accused her, that she had suppressed some things and had not told all, she leapt up, and taking him by the hair buffeted him soundly; at which Cæsar smiling reproved her, to whom she answered, Is it not a great matter O Cæsar, seeing thou vouch'st self to come and visit me in this condition that I am in, and to talk with me, that I should be accused by my own servants, if I have reserved some Jewels, not for my self indeed poor wretch, but that I might present Octavia and thy Lyria, that by their intercession to thee, I might find more mercy and favour from thee. Cæsar was glad at this, hoping that now she had a mind to live, declaring unto her that he would both do this for her, and also things beyond her expectation, he departed supposing that he had deceived her, whereas he was of the two the more deceived. [Plutarch.]

There was a young Gentleman Cornelius Dolabella, a familiar friend of Cæsar's, this man was in love with Cleopatra, and at her desire did by a messenger send her word privately that Cæsar was to take his journey by land thorough Syria, and that he was determined to send her and her children into Italy within three daies, when she knew this the desired of Cæsar that he would permit her last obsequies to Antonius, when having ended her lamentations, she put garlands upon the tomb and killed it, she then commanded a bath to be provided for her, and having bathed, she fasted superfluously. [Plutarch.]

After dinner she gave Epaphroditus (to whose charge she was committed) to carry to

to carry to Cæsar, in which she begged of him that he would suffer her to be buried with Antonius: this letter was sealed up, that he supposing it might contain some other businesse, might by the occasion of giving the letter to Cæsar, be out of the way. [Id. Dio. 452.]

He being gone, she shut the doors, only keeping with her two waiting women, Iras or Nairas, and Charmion, who were wont to dresse her; one of them could excellently dresse her head, and the other paire her nailes: then adorning her self with her best apparel she could possesse; and in her robes, she set an Aspick to her left arme, (which she had caused to be brought to her, covered with figs, grapes, and flowers, the better to deceive her keepers) by the biting of which, she died as it were in a slumber. [Florus. lib. 4. cap. 11. Vell. Patern. lib. 2. cap. 87. Plutarch in Anton. Galen. in lib. de Theriaca, ad Pisonem. Dio. lib. 51. pag. 452. Eutrop. lib. 7. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.]

But those that will highly set out in words, the wit of the woman to deceive, and the luddennesse of the Aspick to kill, tell us, That Cleopatra made in her arme a great and deep wound with her teeth, (or some other thing) and put poyson into the wound, which she had formerly prepared from an Aspick, which was brought her in a bone; and that after the poyson had seized upon the body, the gently ended her life, her keepers not so much as knowing of it. [Galen. ut sup. Strabo. lib. 17. pag. 795. Plutarch. Dio. pag. 452, 453.] There were only two little pricks found in her arme: and Cæsar, which law her dead body, carryed her image with an Aspick fixed to her arme in Triumph. [Plutarch and Dio.] Horace speaks of her, lib. 1. Ode 37.

*Ausa & jacente visere regiam
Vultu sereno fortis, & aspectu
Tristare serpentes, ut arum
Corpore combiberet venenum.
Deliberata morte ferocior:
Savia Liburnis scilicet invidens,
Privata deduci superbo
Non humilis mulier triumpho.*

—So stout she could
With cheerful countenance behold,
Her ruin'd Palace, Alps receive,
And of their poison them bereave:
By delay in death more keen;
Enviest the Liburnians they Should her, so great a Queen,
In Triumph lead a private prey.

When Cæsar had opened Cleopatras letters, he found straight what was done, and thought at first to carry thither himself, and sent thither some ill haste to see what was done. They ran together in all haste, and found the guard standing and mistrusting nothing: when they had opened the gate, they found Cleopatra dead, lying upon a golden bed, in all her royal robes: of her waiting women, Iras, or Nairas, was fallen down at her feet, Charmion (or Charmione) half dead, and heavy headed, was trimming of the Diademe that she wore: and when one in anger asked her, Is this well done, O Charmion? she answered, Very well, and becoming one that had sprung from so many Kings, and spake not a word more, but fell down there by the bed side. [Plutarch. Dio. pag. 453.] But Cæsar, having seen Cleopatra's body, tried all means, to see if it were possible to recover her, [Dio. ibid.] yea, he brought the Pylii but in vain, to suck out the venime and poyson. [Id. ibid. Sueton. in Octavio. cap. 17. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.]

When Cleopatra's life could by no means be recovered, Cæsar admired her and pitied her, very much grieved, supposing he was bereft of the chiefest glory of his Triumph; but yet he commanded her body to be sumptuously and royally buried, and to be laid in the same Tomb with Antonius. [Plutarch. Dio. pag. 453.] This honour he did unto them both, namely, to bury them in one Sepulchre, and to finish the Tomb that they had begun. [Sueton. in Octavio. cap. 17.] Her waiting women also by his command were honourably buried. [Plut.]

Plutarch writes that Cleopatra lived 39 years, and reigned 22, and so many years indeed she do allow for her reign, after the death of her father Ptolemies Auletes, Ptolemies in the Catalogue of the Kings, Clemens Alexandrins, lib. 1. Stromat. Porphyrius in Græc. Eusebius in Chronic, and others, which years are only 21, and two or three months, Plutarch writes, that she reigned above above 14 years with Antonius, Tertullian in his third book against the Jews, that he reigned 13 under Augustus, reckoning the government of Antonius from the death of Julius Cæsar, and of Augustus from his first Consulship, from the death of Alexander the Great, who first founded the Macedonian Empire, to the death of Antonius and Cleopatra, with whom it fell, both in Ptolemaeus (as well in the Catalogue of the Kings, as in the third book of his Great Work, as in Clemens Alexandrinus, (in lib. 1. Strom.) are reckoned 294 years, which with us are 293, and a quarter.

And at this time Cæsar put an end to the civil wars, as besides Florus, [lib. 4. cap. 12.] and Velleius Paterculus, [lib. 2. c. 87.] Dionysius Halicarnassensis also confirmeth, writing in the Pæne of his Roman Histories that he came into Italy, as soon as Augustus Cæsar had put an end to the civil wars, ἀφ' οὗ καὶ ἀρχαῖος καὶ ἐκείνου ἀρχαῖος ὁ χρόνος, in the middle of the CLXXXVII. Olymp. to wit, the third year of it then beginning, for in the month of August, Egypt, was reduced under the power of the Romans, and an end put to their civil wars; the words of the decree of the Senate then, in Macrobius [Saturnal. lib. 1. cap. 12.] and Censorius teacheth, that the Egyptians were reckoned from that time, in which they came under the power and government of the people of Rome, the years of the Augusti, (not of the Θαυρὸς Σαβῶνος, as Scaliger thought, but of the Cæsares Augusti, who had the dominion over them) [cap. 21. lib. de natali die.] which book he saith was written by him in the Philippii year of the Augusti CCLXVIII. (for thus the best Copies have it, not CCLXVII) from the death of Alexander the Great DLXII and of Nabonassar DCCCLXXXVI. (the beginnings of these years being taken from the first of the vage or moveable month Thoth of the Egyptians) being certainly of the same opinion with Ptolemaeus, who in the third book of his great Syntaxis, saith, that there passed from the beginning of the reign of Nabonassar, to the death of Alexander. 424 Egyptian years; and then to the Empire of Augustus, 294.

Wherefore that Egyptian Epoch began on the first day of the moveable month Thoth of the year of the Philippii account, beginning from the death of Alexander the Great 293, of Nabonassar 719, and indeed on the first day of the week, as is found in a writing of a certain Jew, let forth at Norimberge, with Melchala, namely, of the month August, in the year of the Julian Period, 4684, on the 31 day; which according to the false account of Leap-year, that was then used at Rome, was called the 29. day of August. And this was that Epoch, πρὸς αὐτὴν ἀρχαῖος ὁ χρόνος, of the years of Augustus, which was accommodated by Ptolemaeus, in lib. 1. cap. 8. of his great Syntaxis, to the moveable year of the Egyptians, by Verius Valens, an Antiochian, in ἡμερολόγιον γρηγοριανόν, lib. 1. to the fixed year of the Alexandrians, and by Theon, an Alexandrian; in the Explication, κατὰ τὸν ἀρχαῖον χρόνον, to the form of both those years; and seeing that Augustus ruled Egypt 43 years (as Philo saith: in his Embassy to Cæsar) we find also to many allowed to his Empire, or Monarchy, in Ptolemaeus his Catalogue of the Kings, and Clemens Alexandrinus, lib. 1. Stromat.

Cleopatra had sent her son Cæsarion, which, as was said, the had by Cæsar the Dictator, with a great sum of money through Æthiopia into India. Him his Governor Rhodon persuaded to return, as if Cæsar had recalled him to his mothers Kingdom: but as Cæsar was determining with himself what he should do with him, they say Arius the Philosopher laid unto him,

Οὐκ ἀγαθὸν πολυμνησθῆναι

Cæsar is in multis nomen non expedit esse.

'Tis not fit Cæsars name should common be.

Therefore Cæsar put him to death, after the death of his mother. [Plutarch in Anton. Dio, lib. 51. pag. 446. 454.]

The images of Antonius were thrown down, but Cleopatra's were not stirred; for her friend Archibulus had obtained of Cæsar for the summe of one thousand talents, that they should not be thrown down when Antonius his were. [Plutarch.]

In the Pallace there was great force of many found, which was there laid up by Cleopatra, being the spoiles of almost all Temples: the exacted also much from them that were guilty of any crime; and two parts of their goods were demanded of the rest: all that could not be accused of any crime: then all the Souldiers arrears were paid; Cæsar also gave to those Souldiers that were with him, 250 pence a man, that they should not plunder the City. Cæsar also paid all his debts that he owed any man, and gave many gifts to the Senators and Knights, that had accompanied him in the war. [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 455. 456.]

For

For this part of the year Cæsar chose M. Tullius Cicero for his colleague in the Consulship, the son of Cicero the Orator, who was put to death by Antonius, who hearted into the people, the letters that Cæsar sent to Rome, concerning the overthrow of Antonius in the Alexandrian war, (not the Asian, as Appian erroneously wrote,) he read the copie of them in the solita, where his fathers head had been formerly openly let up, [Plutarch, in fin. Ciceron. Appian, lib. 4. bell. civil. pag. 619. Dio, lib. 51. pag. 456. 457.]

This year upon the Ides of September, we learn out of the Marble Table at Capua, that M. Tullius was chosen into the Consulship in the room of M. Licinius, [in Annal. tom. 3. pag. 495.] and upon the same Ides of September, that Augustus being Consul with the son of M. Cicero was presented with an additional Crown by the Senators, as we read in Pliny, [lib. 22. cap. 6.] for there were many Crowns and Proceffions decreed for Cæsar at that time in Rome. He had also another Triumph granted him over the Egyptians; the day also on which Alexandria was taken, was thought good to be a Festival, and that the computations of the rest of the wars, should race beginning from that. That Cæsar should have the power of Tribune all his life time; and that he might relieve any that implored his aid, either within the walls, or without for the space of half a mile, which was not lawful for any Tribune of the people, [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 457.]

Herod, wavering between love and hatred towards his wife Mariamne, was continually incensed against her by the false accusations of his sister Salome, and his mother Cyros, kindling in him hatred and jealousy against her: and perhaps he had dealt more hardly with her, had not the news come very conveniently, that Antonius and Cleopatra were both dead, and that Cæsar had won Egypt, whom in all haste he went to meet, and left his family as it was. At his departure he commended Sohemus to Mariamne, professing that he owed him much respect for the care he had had of her, and gave him also the government of a part of Judea, [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 11.]

Cæsar built a City in the same place, in which he overcame Antonius, and called it Nicopolis, and allowed the same Playes that he had done for the former at Actium, [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 456. Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 795.]

When he had reduced Egypt into the form of a Province, to the end that it might be more fruitful, and fit to yield corn for the City of Rome; he skowed by the help of his souldiers, all those ditches whereinto Nilus overfloweth, and by long time had been choaked up with mud, [Sueton, in Octavio, cap. 18.] and made also some new ditches, [Dio, pag. 456.]

Herod meeting with Cæsar in Egypt, in confidence of his friendship, spake freely with him, and was highly honoured by him; for he bestowed upon him the 400 Galatians that were formerly of Cleopatra's guard, to be his guard, and restored him part of his Country which Cleopatra had seized upon, and laid to his kingdom Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria; and by the sea side, Gaza, Antedon, Joppe, and the Tower of Stratton: which was no small accession to the splendor of his kingdom, [Joseph, lib. 1. bell. cap. 15. lib. 15. cap. 11.]

The multitude of men in Egypt both in City and Country, and the inconstancy of that Nation, and the carrying of corn into the City, and the store of money were the cause, that Cæsar durst not commit the Province to any of Senators degree; but also took from the Senators the liberty of going into Egypt; for he so suspected the Egyptians of innovations, that he suffered none of them to be Senators of Rome; he allowed other cities to govern the Common-wealth after their own laws, but he commanded the Alexandrians that they should govern the Common-wealth without Senators, [Dio, lib. 51. pag. 455.]

Arius the Philosopher, as is reported refused the government of Egypt though offered him, [Julian, ad Themisium.] therefore Cæsar made Cornelius Gallus, one raised from a very mean fortune, Governor of Egypt, being now made tributary: who was the first Roman Judge that ever Egypt had, [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 819. Sueton, in Octavio, cap. 66. Dio, lib. 51. pag. 455. Eutrop, lib. 7. Sec. Rufus, in brevuario.] This was that Gallus of Forum Julium that was the poet: whom Virgil in the last Eclogue of his Bucolics speaks of in that pleasant verse, [Ammonius, Marcellinus, lib. 17. Hæray, in Chronicle, 1.] to whom also there are Erotica (love verses) extant which were dedicated by Parthenius of Nice; whose Poetic also Virgil imitated in his Latin verses, [Annius Gellius, lib. 13. cap. 25. Macrobi, Saturnal. cap. 17.] and Tibertius also in his Greek Poems, [Sueton, in Tibertio, cap. 70.]

Cæsar having settled all things in Egypt as he thought fit, came into Syria with his land forces, [Dio, in supr. 456. Oros, lib. 6. cap. 19.] whither also Herod conducted him as far as Antioch, [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 11.]

Seeing Tiridates being overcome fled into Syria, and Phraates being Conquerour sent lent Embassadors unto Cæsar; Cæsar gave them both a friendly answer, and did not intend promiscuous favours to Tigranes, yet gave him leave to tarry in Syria: and kindly accepted of Phraates his sons and bringing him to Rome, kept him as an Hostage, [Di. lib. 51. pag. 436.] namely, the youngest son of Phraates, who thorough the negligence of them that kept him, was stolen away: as Justin hath it, [lib. 42. cap. 5.] but yet referring it to later times.

Cæsar departing out of Syria, left there Messala (Corvinus) by whom the Cyzicene Gladiators, to whom a dwelling in Daphne the Suburbs of Antioch was granted, being deceived, they were sent into divers places as it were to be taken into the Legion; and as occasion offered were killed, [Di. lib. 51. pag. 447.]

Cæsar made Governour over the Tarshen in Cilicia, a Citizen of them, namely, his Schoole-master Athenodorus the son of Sandon, a Stoick Philosopher; who restored the state of the Common-wealth corrupted by Boethius and his soldiers, who domineered there even unto the death of Antonius, [Strabo, lib. 14. pag. 674.]

Cæsar went into the Province of Asia, and there kept his winter quarters, and settled all the affairs of his subjects, [Di. lib. 51. pag. 456. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.]

On the Kalends of January, Cæsar entered upon his fifth Consulship in the Island of Samos, [Sueton. in Oltavio, cap. 26.] and on the same Kalends all his ordinances were confirmed by oath: and when the letters came concerning the Parthian affairs, it was decreed, That in their hymnes he should be reckoned among their gods: That a Tribel should be called Julia from him; That the companions of his Victory should be carried in Triumph with him, and be clad with garments woven with Purple: and that the day on which he entered the City, should be solemnized with publick Sacrifices, and be always accounted festival, [Di. lib. 51. pag. 457.]

Cæsar permitted a Temple to be built at Ephesus and Nicæa, (for those were accounted the most famous Cities of Asia and Bythinia) to the City of Rome, and to his father Julius, and that they should be inhabited by natural Romans: and to foreigners, whom he called Grecians, he gave leave, that to himself (Octavianus) they might build Temples: to wit, the Asians at Pergamus, and the Bythinians at Nicomedia: and permitted to the Pergamians, that they might solemnize those Playes in honour of his Temple, which they called Sacred, [Id. ibid. pag. 458.] whither isto be referred that Tiberius in Tacitus, [lib. 4. Annal. cap. 51.] Augustus of most famous memory forbade not a Temple to be built in Pergamus, in honour of himself and the City of Rome.

The next Summer, Cæsar crossed over into Greece, [Di. sup.] going to his Asian Triumph: whither, he then being at Corinth, there was one of the filthest sent Embassadors to him from the Island Gyaros, to beg a lessening of their tribute: for they were compelled to pay an 150 drachmes, when they were scarce able to pay an 100, such was the poverty of that Island, [Strabo, lib. 10. pag. 485.]

Upon Cæsars entrance into Rome, others offered Sacrifice (as it was decreed) and the Consul Valerius Pontius (who was put in the room of Sextus Apuleius) sacrificed publicly for the Senate and people of Rome, by reason of his coming: this was never done for any before that time, [Di. lib. 51. pag. 458.] Cæsar kept three Triumphs riding in his Chariot, the Dalmatian, Asian, and Alexandrian, for three dayes one after the other, [Livy, lib. 133. Sueton. in Oltavio, cap. 22.] of which Virgil in 8 Æneid.

*At Cæsar triplici inuestus Romana triumpho Mænia, sed Italici votum immortale iacrabat.
Maxima, trecentum totam delubra per urbem
Lætitia, ludisque via, plausuque fremebant.*

But when thrice Rome with Cæsars Triumphs now
Had rung, to th' Latian gods he made a vow:
Three hundred Temples all the City round
With joy, with playes, and with applauses found.

And Propertius, lib. 2. elegie, 1.

*Aut cæcurn Egyptum, et Nilum, quum trahebant in urbem
Septem captivis debilis ibat agnus:
Aut regum auratis circumdata colla capenis, Atque in sacra curreret ossa via.*

Whether of Egypt or of Nilus, whole
Stream into seven channels parted goes;
Or of the golden chains Kings necks surround,
Or how the Asian beaks fall on the ground.

That

That Cæsar brought these three Triumphs into the city on the month of August, the words of the decree of the Senate shew, in Macrobius, [lib. 1. Saturnal. cap. 12.] Not on the eight of the Ides of January, (on which it is manifest he was in Asia) as Orosius would have it [lib. 6. cap. 20.] on the first day he Triumphed for the Pannonians, Dalmatians, Japyda and their borderers, and of some people of Galatia, and Germany: on the second for his victory at sea at Actium, on the third for the conquest of Egypt, which was the most sumptuous; and set out with greater preparation than the rest, in it was carried in a bed the image of Cleopatra, (with an aspick biting of her arm:) pourtrayed in imitation of her death, the children also of her and Antonius, were led among the captives, namely Alexander and Cleopatra; who were named the sun and moon. [Di. lib. 51. pag. 459.]

Alexander the brother of Jamblichus, the King of the Arabians, being taken in the Actian war, was led in triumph and after put to death, [Id. ibid. pag. 443.] that Cleopatra that was called the moon, and led in triumph, was given in marriage to Juba, (who himself was led in triumph by Julius Cæsar.) Cæsar gave this Juba who was brought up in Italy, and had followed his wars, both this Cleopatra, and his fathers Kingdom of Mauritania; and gave unto them also the two sons of Antonius and Cleopatra, namely Alexander and Ptolemæus, but Juba begged of his wife Cleopatra another Ptolemæus, who also succeeded him in his Kingdom, [Id. ibid. pag. 454. Strabo, lib. 17. 828. Plutarch. in Jul. Cæsar. Anton.]

On the fifth of the Kalends of September, there was an Altar dedicated to Victory in the court-house, as is found noted in the old marble Kalendary, [Inscript. Gruter. pag. CXXXIII.] by which being placed in the Julian Court-house, and adorned with the spoiles of Egypt, Cæsar shewed, that he got the empire by victory, the temple also of his father Julius he trimmed up with the dedicated things being there hung up, which were also of the Egyptian spoiles; he consecrated also many things to Jupiter Capitolinus, Juno, and Minerva, whereas by a decree of the Senate all the ornaments that were hung up there before, were taken away as profane, [Di. lib. 51. pag. 459.] he repaired the Temple either decayed through age, or consumed by fire: and adorned both them and others with very rich gifts, as who brought into the Cell of Jupiter Capitolinus by one donation 16000 pound weight of gold, besides pearles and precious stones valued at fifty millions of sesterces, [Sueton. in Oltavio.] so that Rome was so much enriched with the riches of Alexandria, that the price of possessions and other vendible things was raised double, and interest fell from ten to four in the hundred. [Di. lib. 51. pag. 458. 459. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 19.]

In this fifth Consulship Cæsar accepted of the name of Emperour, not such as was wont to be given after the old custome for some victory, (for that he had often received both before and after) but by which all the whole government was shewn, which was formerly decreed to his father Julius and his sons and nephews, [Di. lib. 52. pag. 493. 494.] whither also belongeth that inscription, placed this year in honour of Cæsar, Senatus Populusque Romanus Imp. Cæsari Divo Julii F. Cos. Quinilis. Design. Sex. Imper. Sæpe. Republicæ servatæ. The Senate and people to the Emperour Cæsar, the son of Julius of blessed memory, Consul the fifth time, elected the sixth time Imperator the seventh for having saved the commonwealth, [Inscript. Gruter. pag. CXXVI.]

Among the Captives was Diocles Phenix the son of Artimidorus, the scholar of Tyrannio Amicus taken by Lucullus, (from whom he also was called Tyrannio) who being bought by Dimantis a freed man of Cæsars, was given to Terentia the wife of Cicero, (who as appears from Pliny lib. 7. cap. 46. and Valerius Maximus lib. 8. cap. 13. lived above an CIII years,) he was manumitted by her, and taught at Rome; and wrote 68 books. [Suidas in Voc. Tyranio.]

Cæsar summoned before him Antiochus the Commagagenian, because he had treacherously killed an Embassador of his brothers, that was sent to Rome, with whom he had a suit in law, this Antiochus he brought before the Senate, and being then condemned, he put to death. [Di. lib. 52. pag. 495.]

By the space of an whole year after the return of Herod from Cæsar, suspicious daily increasing between him and his wife Mariamne, (seeing the neglected her husbands careflesse and moreover alwaies upbraided him with the death either of her grandfather (Hyrcanus) or her brother (Antiochus)) so that Herod could scarce contain himself from striking her, whom when by the noise his sister Salome perceived to be very much moved, sent in the butler, who long before that time was suborned by her, who should tell the King that he was solicited by Mariamne, to deliver unto him a love potion, which whatsoever it was he had by him, hereupon Herod examined the most faithfull servant of Mariamne by torture, being assured that she would attempt nothing without him, who not enduring the torments, confessed nothing, but that the King was offended for some things that Sohemus had declared unto her, which when the King heard, he cried out, that Sohemus who had ever been most faithfull both to him and the the Kingdome, would never have spoken of these things, had there not been some more secret familiarity between them, and thereupon commanded Sohemus to be apprehended and put to death, and having called a council of his friends, he accused his wife, for practising to poison him, and that with such harpetic words, that they that were present, easily perceived, that the King had a mind she should be condemned, which is done by the general consent of them all: and when as they thought that the execution should not be over speedy, but that she should be secured in some of the Kings Castles, Salome urged on the King exceedingly, that she should be forthwith put to death, for fear there might be some commotion among the people, the being alive and in prison, and thus was Mariamne brought to her death. [Joseph, lib. 15, cap. 11.]

When her mother Alexandra saw this, and considered that she must look for the same measure at Herods hands, she, that she might not seem to be guilty of the same crime, began in the audience of all to upbraid her daughter, calling her most wicked and ingratefull towards her husband, and that she deserved such a death, who durst do such an heinous act. Whilst the counterfeited these things, and would seem as though she would pull her daughter by the hair, they that were there much condemned her hypocritie; but she that was led to her death, vouchsafed her no answer, but refelld the false accusation with a resolute countenance and mind, and underwent her death without fear. [Id. ibid.]

She being put to death, Herod began to be more inflamed with love to her, he often called upon her name, and often lamented her beyond all decency; and although he thought to find out delights, as much as possibly, in feasting and drinking, yet it availed nothing. Wherefore he cast off the care of his kingdom, and did so much yield to his grief, that he would bid his servants call Mariamne, as though she were alive. [Id.]

As Herod was thus afflicted, there came a plague, which swept away a great part both of the people and nobility, all men interpreting that this plague was sent for the unjust death of the Queen. Thus the Kings discontent being increased, he at last hid himself in a solitary wilderness, under pretence of hunting; where afflicting himself, he fell into great sickness, which was an inflammation and pain of the neck, so that he began to rave; neither did any remedies relieve him, but rather made the disease more painful, so that they began to despair of him: for which cause the Physicians, partly through the stubbornness of the disease, and partly because that in so great danger, there was not any free election of diet, they gave him leave to eat whatsoever he would. [Id.]

Herod lying thus sick in Samaria, Alexandra now living at Jerusalem, endeavoured to reduce the two Castles of the City into her hands, one that joined to the Temple, and the other that was situate within the City; she therefore laboured with the Governours of them, that they would deliver them unto her, and to the children that were between her and Mariamne, lest that he being dead, they should be seized upon by others: but they who had formerly been faithful, were now more diligent in their office, both because they hated Alexandra, and thought it a great offence to dispair of the health of their Prince, for there were the Kings old friends, and one of them Archibulus the Kings Nephew. Whereupon they presently sent messengers to him, to certify him of Alexandra, and he presently commanded her to be slain. At length he overcame his disease, and was restored to his strength, both of body and mind, but grown to cruel, that for the least cause he was ready to put any one to death. [Id.]

Of the three numbrings of the people, which Suetonius notes were done by Caesar Octavianus, [cap. 27.] That the first were made in the lustrum, that is, in the year that they reckoned for the beginning of the space of five years, in which he and M. Agrippa were Consuls is manifest out of the Marble Capuan table. [tom. 3, Annal. Pighii, pag. 495.] In my sixth Consulship, with my Colleague M. Agrippa, I numbered the people, I made another muster, after one and forty years, (to wit, from the Consulship of Cn. Lentulus, and L. Caelius after which the musters were laid aside) in which muster there were numbred of the Citizens of Rome, four hundred thousand, and sixty three thousand, namely, the number of 4063000, for which Eusebius in his Chronicle hath 4164000.

Caesar also exhibited the Playes that were decreed for the victory at Actium, with Agrippa, and in them he set forth a fight on Horseback of Patricians, both men and boyes, and those every fifth year, in which space of time they were finished, were committed to the four Collegies of Priests in order, namely, the chief Priests, Augurs, Septemviri and Quindecimviri. [Dio, lib. 53, pag. 496.]

In the CLXXVIII. Olympiade, Thebes in Egypt is rated eaven to the ground, as is read in the Eusebian Chronicle, to wit, by Cornelius Gallus, whom Georgius Syncellus in his Chronicle out of Julius Africanus, relates, that he overthrew the cities of the rebellious Egyptians, [pag. 308.] for after he having but a few with him recovered Hieropolis which had revolted, he very suddenly appealed a sedition that was raised about taxes, [Strabo, lib. 17, pag. 819.] he exhausted the city by intercepting of many of them, [Asenian, Marcellin, lib. 17.] He erected Statues for himself almost all over Egypt, and wrote his own acts upon the Pyramids, [Dio, lib. 53, pag. 512.]

Caesar being the seventh time Consul, declared by an Oration in writing and spoken in the Senate, that he would resign his government, and deliver it up to the Senate and people. When he had ended his Oration, all of them in many words desired him, that he alone would take the whole administration of the government upon him: and by all the arguments that they brought to persuade him, he was at last brought to take the government wholly upon him, [Dio, lib. 53, pag. 497. & 503.] which that he did it on the VII. of the Ides of January, is manifest, from the Marble Narbon table, [In Inscrip. Gruter, pag. CXXIX.]

When as Caesar had got the Empire confirmed on him by this means, both from the Senate and the people, and yet would seem to be popular, he took upon him indeed, that he would be very careful of the publick affaires, because they required the care of one that would be diligent; but he positively said, he would not govern all the Provinces, or, that he would govern them for ever, which he had now taken upon to govern: wherefore he restored to the Senate, the weaker Provinces, to wit, because they were the more peaceable: but the stronger Provinces, or where was more danger to be seen, or that had enemies near them, or that were likely to have any new commotions, he kept to himself. He did this under this colour, that the Senate might safely enjoy the best parts of the Empire, and he might seem to put himself upon all the labours and dangers; but under this pretence, to make them disarmed and unfit for war; and thus he got both the armes and the souldiers to his party. For this cause Africa, Numidia, Asia, and Greece, with Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Sicilia, Creta, Lybia, Cireniaca, Bythinia, with Pontus adjoining, Sardinia, and Hispania Baetica, were appointed to the Senate: but to Caesar the rest of Spain, all France, and Germany, also Caelioryia, Cilicia, Cyprus, Egypt: but Caesar took this government over the Provinces for ten years time, within which time, he promised himself he should easily reduce them; adding this also in a bragging way, like a young man, that if he could reduce them in shorter time, by so much the sooner he would leave off the Empire. He then made Patricians Governours over the Provinces of both conditions. Over Egypt he set a man but of the degree of a Knight, for the reasons above specified. He gave Africa and Asia, particularly to the Senators, and all the rest of the Provinces to them that had been Praetors: but forbad indifferently either of them, that they should receive by lot the Provinces till the fifth year after they had born office in the city, [Dio, lib. 53, pag. 503, 504, 505.]

Upon the Ides of January this distribution of the Provinces was made, as Ovid notes; thus speaking in the first book of Fastorum to Caesar Germanicus.

*Idibus in magni castris Jovis ade sacerdos
Seminaris flammis viscera libas ovia,
Redditaque est omnis populo provinciae nostrae:
Et tuus Augusti nomen dictum avus.*

On th' Ides the half-man priest in Joves great lane
Offers the intrals of a sheep till'd flame,
Then all the Province came to us, and then Thy Grandfire was Augustus nam'd amongst men.

For on the same day, the name of Augustus was given to Caesar Octavianus: in which Consulship in his book de die Natali, shews was done the fourth day after, in these words. On the sixteenth day before the Kalends of February, the Emperor Caesar, the son of him of blessed memory, by the opinion of L. Munacius Plancus, was saluted Augustus by the Senate and the rest of the Citizens; himself being the seventh time, and M. Vipstanus Agrippa the thirteenth Consul.

Caesar having settled all things, and reduced the Provinces into a certain form, was surnamed Augustus, [Livy, lib. 134.] That that name was given him both in his seventh Consulship, Dio [lib. 53.] and by the opinion of Plancus with the consent of the whole Senate and people of Rome, Velleius, [lib. 2, cap. 91.] confirmeth: of whom Suetonius, in Octavio, cap. 7. The opinion of Munacius Plancus prevailed, that he should be rather called Augustus, (though some were of opinion that he should be called Romulus, as if he also had been a founder of the City) not only because it was a new, but also a more honourable name, because also Religious places, and wherein any thing is consecrated by the flying of birds are are called Augusta, of growing, or from the gesture or feeding of birds, as also Ennius teacheth writing on this manner

Augusto Augurio postquam inclita condita Roma est.

After that noble Rome was built by sacred flight of birds,

And Florus in the fourth book, it was also debated in the Senate, whether he should be called Romulus, because he had founded the empire: but the name Augustus seemed to be the more holy and venerable, that so, while he now lived on earth, he might be as it were deified by the name it self and title.

Dio hath the like things, who notes that he was called Augustus by the Romans, and by the Greeks Σεβας from the splendour of his dignity, and sanctity of the honour greater than humane, [lib. 53. pag. 507. compared with Acts XXV. 21. 22. with the XVII. 23. & II. Thessal. 11. 4.] to which let that of Ovid be added, lib. 1. Fastorum.

Sed tamen humanis celebrantur honoribus omnes:

Hic focius summo cum Jove nomen habet.

Sancta vocant augusti patres: augusta vocantur

Hujus & Augurium dependet origine verbi:

Et quocumque sua Jupiter auget ope.

All common persons have their common fame,

But he with Jove enjoys an equall name,

Of old most sacred things, Augusta were:

Temples that name and hallow'd things do bear:

Yea Augury depends upon this word,

And whatsoever Jove doth add or

Let it enlarge his rule and life let all,

Our coast, be guarded by a fenced wall.

By this meanes the whole power of the people and Senate, was translated upon Augustus, [Dio, lib. 53. pag. 507.] which name formerly held sacred, and till now (such as that not any Governour durst take upon him, so huge a title did he lay to the usurped Empire of the world: and from that day the whole commonwealth and the government thereof began to be and to remain in the possession of one man: which the Greeks call monarchy, Oros, lib. 6. cap. 20.] that the Romans began their Epoch of their Augusti from the Kalends of January, Censorius teacheth in his book, de natali die, where he compares the 265 year of this account, with the 283 of the Julian account: as also in the following Chapter, he casts the Consulship of Marcus Censorinus, and Atinius Gallus upon the twentieth of the Augustan year, falling upon the 38 of the Julian account.

Tralles a City in Asia being overthrowen with an earthquake, the place of exercise fell also, which was afterwards rebuilt by Cæsar. [Euseb. Chronic. Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 57.]

A difference arising between Costabarus the Idumæan, and his wife Salome the sister of Herod, the contrary to the custom of the Jews, sent him a bill of divorce, and going to her brother told him, that she preferred her brothers love, before her tie to her husband, for the said that Costabarus had practised some innovations with Lysimachus, Antipater, and Dositheus building the credit of her affection from this, because he had privily kept and preserved in security within his Country, Bebas his children, now twelve yeares from the taking of Jerusalem by Herod, and all this without the privy and good will of the King, which as soon as Herod knew, he sent some to their hiding places, and killed them, and as many as were in the same crime with them, to the end that there should none remain of the kindred of Hyrcanus; but taking out of the way who excelled in any dignity, that he might do: whatsoever he would himself, there being none now left to resist him. [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 11.]

Hereupon Herod becoming more secure, departed more and more from his Country customs, violating them with strange inventions; and first of all he instituted wrillings every fifth year in honour of Cæsar, for the exhibiting of which he began to build a theatre in Jerusalem, and an amphitheatre in the plain, both of them very sumptuous for the workmanship, but clean contrary to the Jewish customs, among whom there is no use of these things, nor any setting forth of such thews, yet he would have this solemnity to be carolled, and to be proclaimed to the Country: about him, and also to foreign nations, and by propounding of great rewards, he invited not only those that were skilled in wrestlings, but excellent Musicians also, and them that played on instruments: but nothing to troubled the Jews as the trophies, which being covered with armour, they thought to be images, forbidden them by their law, which that Herod might convince them of, he commanded the ornaments to be taken off from them, and shewed them that they were meer stocks of wood, which being done all their anger was turned into laughter. THE FIFTH CALIPPER PERIOD BEGINS.

Cornelius Gallus spake many things with much vanity against Augustus. [Dio, lib. 53. pag. 512.] of whom Ovid in lib. 2. Tristium written to Augustus himself.

Non fuit opprobrio celebrasse Lycorida Gallo;

Sed linguam nimo non tenuisse mero.

To court Lycoris was not Gallus shame;

But he when lib't by drink defild his name.

By reason of his ungratefull and malevolent mind, Augustus noted him with infamy, and forbade him his house, or to live within any of his provinces: he was also accused of thefts, and pillaging the provinces, and of many other crimes, first by Valerius Largus a most wicked man, who was his companion, and fellow commoner with him, and then by many others, who hitherto had flattered Gallus, but had turned all their services to Largus when they saw him begin to rise; and it was decreed by the whole Senate, that Gallus being condemned in judgment should be banished, that his goods should be confiscated to Augustus, and that for this cause the Senate should offer sacrifice, but he not able to bear his grief, and fearing the nobility highly incensed against him, to whom the care of this business was committed, fell upon his own sword, and to by a voluntary death prevented the condemnation: Gallus being thus forced to death by the depositions of his accusers, and by the decree of the Senate, Augustus indeed praised their love towards him in being so displeased for his sake, but withall he wept, and bewailed his own misfortune, that he alone could not be angry with his friends as much as he would himself. [Sueton, in Ollavio, cap. 66. Dio, lib. 53. pag. 512. 513. Ammian, Marcellin, lib. 17. Ierosim, in Chronico.]

Petronius was made successeur to Gallus in the government of Egypt, who sustained the charge of a multitude of the Alexandrians, invading with casting of stones, he being only strengthened with his own soldiers, and having slain some of them, he repelled the rest. [Strabo, lib. 17. pag. 819.]

Polemo the King of Pontus is taken in among the allies and confederates of the people of Rome, and the first seates in theatres, throughout his whole Kingdom, were given to the Senators. [Dio, lib. 53. pag. 513.] It seems that from him Pontus took the name of Polemoniacus, in Justinian. [Novella, 8.]

Ten Citizens of Jerusalem, made a conspiracy against Herod, hiding their swords under their garments, amongst which one was blind, nor for any thing that he could do, but to shew that he was ready to suffer any thing that should happen to the defenders of their country right; but one of them whom Herod had appointed for the searching out such things, having filied out the business, declared it to Herod, who being apprehended with an undaunted countenance, they drew out their weapons, protesting that not for any private profit, but in behalf of the public discipline, they had undertaken this conspiracy, whereupon they were led away, by the Kings ministers, and put to death by all manner of tortures, and not long after their accuser being hated of all men, was slain by some, and being cut in pieces, was thrown to the dogs, in the presence of many men. Yet did none discover this act, until that after long and wearisome inquisitions made by Herod, it was wrung out by tortures from some of his women, who were privy to the fact, but then were the authors of that murder punished with their whole families. [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 11.]

Herod that he might be more secure from the seditions of the tumultuous people, in the 13 year of his reign, (to be reckoned from the death of Antigonus) began to fortifie Samaria, which was distant from Jerusalem a daies journey, and called it Sebaste (or Augusta) the circuit of it was twenty furlongs, in which he placed a temple of a furlong and half space in the very midst of it, wonderfully adorned, and he brought it to passe, that many of the soldiers that had always helped him, and also of the neighbour nations, came and dwelt there, (id. ibid. and the beginning of the next chapter) Africanus calls it, in the Chronicle of Georgius Syncellus, The city of the Gabinians, [pag. 308.] for when Samaria was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, and rebuilt by A. Gabinius and peopled with inhabitants, (as is formerly noted out of Josephus, at the year of the Julian period 4657.) by the name of Tellion or Tarabon, can be understood none other than the colony that Gabinius brought hither, which very thing I am not a little glad that it was observed in like manner by that man of learning and curtesie James Goarus : (to whose great industry, the late famous edition of the Georgian Chronicle is beholding.)

Herod also built another fort as a bridle to the whole nation, namely the tower of Straton, also in the great plain, as they call it, he built a Castle, and chose his horsemen by lot to keep it, and in Galilee Gabalus, and Esthmonitis in Peræa, which Castles being so conveniently disposed through the whole Country, he took from the common people all matter of rebellion. [Joseph, lib. 15, cap. 11.

Augustus began his ninth Consulship in Tarracon (a City of the hither Spain,) [Sueton. in Ottavia, cap. 26.] in the third year of the CLXXXVIII. Olympiade, in which the Indians demanded amity with Augustus, as we read in the Eusebian Chronicle: and thote Embassadours were sent from King Pandion, as in the Chronicle of Georgius Syncellus [pag. 311.] we have found noted out of some Roman tables.

P. Orofius confirmeth that there came to Augustus to Tarracon, Embassadors of the Indians, from the farthest part of the East, and of the Seythians from the North with presents from both their nations, lib. 6. cap. 21. concerning whom Horace in his secular verse.

Jam Scythæ responsa petunt superbi Nuper & Indi.

The lofty Scythian and the Indians, late,
Came for the answer of their future fate.

and lib. 4. Carminum 4. Ode. to Augustus.

*Te cantaber, non autè domabili,
Medusque, & Indus, te profugus Scythes
Miratur, o tutela præsens Italia dominaque Roma.*

The yet untam'd Cantaber in thee,
Mede, Indian, Scythian do mirrours see:
Thou that preservest Italy from dread,
And Rome, her glory and exalted head.

And Florus thus li. 4. left Chapter. The Scythians sent their Embassadors, as also the Sarmatians desiring friendship, the Scythians, and the Indians inhabiting right under the sun, came with precious furs, and pearls, and dragging also Elephants among their presents: nothing so much spoke or seemed as the length of the journey, which had taken up four years, and yet the colour of the men served as if they had come from another heaven. [Suetonius, in Octavian. cap. 2.] He induced he Scythians and Indians, (nations known only by report) to make use of their own accord by Embassadors, for unity of him and the people of Rome. [Eutropius, lib. 7.] The Scythians and Indians, to whom the Roman name was unknown, sent presents and Embassadors to him; (to be short Aurclius Victor, increaseth the number of the nations: Indians, Scythians, Garamantis, and Bactrians, sent Embassadors to him to desire a league.

Amyntus being dead, Augustus did not deliver over the kingdom to his sons, but made it a Province of the people of Rome : and from thence Galatia and Lycania began to have a Roman Governour, [Dio. lib. 53. pag. 514.] M. Lollius as Proprætor governing that Province, [Euseb. Chronic. Entrop. lib. 7. Sex. Rufinus in Breviario.] but the Towns of Pamphilia, which were formerly given to Amyntus were restored to their own particular jurisdiction, [Dio. ut sup.]

In the 13th year of Herod's reign, very grievous calamities befel the Country of the Jews. First there was a continual drought, upon which a famine followed: after thorough this famine by changing their diet, there became sicknesses and the plague. And seeing H^{ro} had not means enough to supply the publick necessity; whatsoever there was in the Palace either of gold or silver, he melted it, not sparing any thing but the good vessels, which were sold for money, that was sent for his daily use; having made money of these things, he sent it into Egypt, where at that time under Cesar, Petronius held the government: Who although he was pestered with a mul-

a multitude of them that fled to him for the like necessity; yet because he was privately Herod's friend, and desired the preservation of his subjects, he therefore especially gave them leave to export corn, helping them both in the buying, and in the carriages: So that the greatest means of the preservation of the Nation was attributed to him,

[Joseph, lb. 15, cap. 15.]

Herod as, as soon as the corn was ripe; first of all very carefully divided it to such who could not provide corn for themselves, and then because there were many that through old age or some other debility could not dress it themselves, he appointed them certain Bakers, that they might have always their food ready. And thus he not only by his diligence made the people change their minds that were averse from him, but also got the praise of a bountiful and provident Prince, [Id. ibid.] month Elul, or of our September) on the 6 day of the week, begins that Egyptian Epoch, which Albarensius in the 3^d Chapter of Astronomical work calls Al-kep. (that is, of the Copitic or Egyptians) by which he faith, the account and order of the motions of the Stars are built up from Theon's calculations, and to which, from the account Dukarnaim (or of the Seleucide, which he begins with the Syrians, from the beginning of Elul or September) he faith there have passed 283 years, for so it is to be read in the Manuscripts, not as yet far forth, 387, far in this year, the first day of the month Thoth, both in the moveable year of the Egyptians, as in the fixed year of the Grecians and Alexandrians (as Theon speaketh) was found to fall upon the same day (of August in the Julian account 29.) which cannot happen but after the full Period of 1460, of the Alexandrian years, and of the Egyptian 1641, which exhibits the renewing or Confitution of either year Περὶ 3^{ου} δὲ αὐτ. ἡρῶ ἀποκαταστήσεται αὐτὸ καὶ διὰ τὴν 29^{ην} τοῦ αὐτοῦ μηνὸς ὡς ἂν ἡμεῖς καταλάβωμεν. This renewing happened to be made after 1460 years, from a certain beginning of time, namely, the fifth year of the reign of Augustus, faith Theon, in the explication of τοῦ μηνὸς to wit, being ended, or five years after the beginning of the Empire of Augustus, which as Theon and Ptolemy both agree, begins 294 years, after the death of Alexander, or the Philippick account, and from this Philippick account, even to this Confitution, are 299 years, as in the Astronomical Epitome of Theodorus Metochita is truly observed: neither did Panodorus, the Alexandrian Monk intend any thing else, who discoursing of this Period and Confitution of 1460 years, falling upon the 29 day of the month August, from the Epoch, of which he wrote that the account, the motions of the stars, and the eclipses are to be cast up in the Astronomical Calculations: howsoever Georgius Syncellus, a man very unskillful in these matters in his Chronicle, [pag. 312, 313.] in relating his opinion, clear perverted, because he did not understand it, it.

Hierod provided for his Subjects against the sharpnose of the Winter, that none should be in danger to want clothing, their cattle being dead, and both wool, and other things tallow; and when he had provided for this, he took care also of the neighbour Cities of the Syrians, he assisted them also feed for lawing; and the Castles and Cities, and those of the common people, who had great families, coming to him for succour, he found a remedy for them also: so that to reckon up all the corn that he gave unto those, who were not his Subjects; it was found that there were 100000 cores given, and within the realm 8000 cores: now a core contained ten Athenian bushels. [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 12.]

Now knowing that Augustus could not celebrate at Rome the marriage of his daughter, and Marcellus, the son of his sister Octavia, by reason of his sickness, he solemnized it by the help of M. Agrippa, he himself being absent, [Dio. l. b. 53. pag. 515.]

On the Kalends of January, on which Augustus entered upon his tenth Consulship, the Senate confirmed by oath that they approved all his acts; and when as he approached near the City, (from which he had been a long time absent, by reason of his sickness,) and had promised an hundred pence a man to the people; yet he said, that before he would give it, the Senate should give their assent. The Senate then freed him from all type of laws, and that he should be of absolute power, and Emperor of himself, as well as the laws, and that he might do all things, or not do according to his own pleasure. [Idem, pag. 519, 515, 516.]

As soon as the corn was ripe for the harvest, Hærold dismissed fifty thousand men, whom he had fed in time of the famine, into their own Countries and his neighbours the Syrians: and by this means, he with his diligence, restored the almost ruined estate of his own Subjects, and did not a little relieve his neighbours, who were afflicted with the same calamities. [Joseph, lib. 15, cap. 12.]

At the same time Herod lent aid to Caesar, namely, five hundred chosen men of his guard, whom Ælius Gallus led into the wars into Arabia, where they did most excellent service. [Id. ibid.]

This Ælius Gallus (fully called Ælius Lavrus in the later editions of Dio,) was of the order of Knights; born as faith Pliny, [lib. 6. cap. 28.] and the third governor of Egypt, under Augustus, of whom Strabo makes mention, as his friend and companion [lib. 2. pag. 118.] and writes that, together with him, he saw the Statue of Mernon. [lib. 17. pag. 816.] This man Augustus sent with part of the Roman Garrison which was in Egypt, into Arabia, [Id. ibid. lib. 2. ut supra, & lib. 17. pag. 819.] that he might make an attempt upon those Nations and places: and moreover the bounds of the Ethiopians, and Troglodytæ, which borders upon Egypt, and near to them the Arabian Gulf, which being very narrow, divides the Arabians from the Troglodytæ: but yet to take this advice with him, to agree with them if they would themselves, or if they withstood him, he should subdue them, [Id. lib. 16. pag. 780.]

For this Expedition into Arabia, Ælius built 80 ships, of two and three banks of oars on a side, and some light Gallions, at Cleopatra's, which was near to the old city of Nilus, when as there was no thought of any fight by sea with the Arabians. When he understood his error, he built a hundred and thirty ships of burden, in which he sailed, carrying with him, of the Roman Foot, and of the Allies, ten thousand, with whom were five hundred Jews, and a thousand Nabatheans with Syllaes.

[Id. ibid.]

At that time Obbes was King of the Nabathreans, a flourishful and idle man, and especially concerning Martial Affairs, (which is a common vice of all the Arabian Kings) not at all careful; for he had committed the government of his affairs to Syllaus, who was a young man, and crafty. [Id. ibid. Joseph. lib. 16. cap. 11.] This Syllaus had promised Aëlius, that he would both be his guide, and that he would help him with provisions, and any thing he should stand in need of; but yet did all things treacherously, for neither was the march by land free, nor the voyage by sea without let, but through by-ways and long windings, and places that were barren, and themselves unfit for harbour, being dangerous, either through hidden Rocks, or miry bogges; the sea never ebbs or flowing in those places. [Strabo. ut supra. pag. 780.]

After many miles, Ælius Gallus came on the fiftenth day to the territory of Albom, the greatest place of trading of all Nabathæa, having lost many of his ships, and some with the men in them, perished not by any war, but by the difficulties of sailing. This was caused by the villany of Syllus, who denied that ever an army could be brought into the territory of Albom by land; when as both thither and farther, Merchants passe that Country, with huge flore of Camels and men in a way that is called the way of the Kings, beinge a waye that is used by the Arabie Petras to the others, for that they seeme to be an army. [Id. lib. viii. c. 780. 781.] Which Troupe of Merchants at this day they call Caravans.

The army of Ælius being come hither, they were seized upon by Stromacacis and Scelotyrbe, which are difeases incident to that Country, whereof one is as it were a pallie of the mouth, and the other about the ham, arising from the badnesse of the water and herbs that they drank and eat, wherefore Ælius was forced to stay there a whole Summer and Winter, to refresh his sick men. [Strabo, pag. 981.]

There was one Zenodorus, who having hired the house of Lyanias, or Territory of Trachonitis, Baranea, Autanitis, and not content with the profits that arose from thence, maintained the inhabitants of Trachonitis, who living in Caves, like wild-beasts, were wont to rob and plunder the Damascenes, and was also partaker of their booty: so that the people that inhabited those Countries, were fain to have recourse to Varus, their Governour of Syria, and complained unto him, desiring him, that by his letters he would signify Zenodorus his injuries that he did them, unto Cæsar: and Cæsar wrote back, that he should take especial care, utterly to root out those thieves. Varro therefore with his Souldiers setting upon the places suspected, clean purged the land from the thieves, and took away the Country from Zenodorus. [Joseph. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 15. and lib. 15. Antiquit. cap. 13.]

Herod build himself a Palace in Sion, building in it two very large and stately houses, with which the Temple it self could in no wise compare, and called one of them by the name of Caesar, and the other by the name of Agryppa. [Joseph. lib. 15. Antiquit. cap. 12. & lib. 1. bell. cap. 16.]

The XXIX. Jubilee.

Herod having removed from the Priesthood Jesus the son of Phabes, makes Simon a Priest of Jerusalem, the son of Boethus of Alexandra, Priest in his room, and took also his daughter Mariamme to wife; that was the most beautiful of that age. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 12. & lib. 18. cap. 7.]

The

The marriage being over, he began to build a new Palace, adjoining also a fair Town to it, which he called Herodion, after his own name, in a place distant from Jerusalem 60 furlongs towards Arabia, where he had overcome the Jews, when he was thrust out by the armies of Antigonus. [Id. lib. 14. cap. 25. & lib. 15. cap. 12. lib. 1. bell. cap. 11. & 16.] Pliny makes mention of Herodion, and of a famous Town of the same name. [lib. 5. cap. 14.]

Gallus departing with his army from Alburn, a Village of the Nabataeans, went through such places, that he was compelled to carry his water upon Camels, which happened to him through the malice of the conductours : wherefore after many days he came into the land of Aretus, who was joined in affinity with Obodas the King of the Nabathians : but the treachery of Syllae rendered this Country hard to be passed ; but he passed it in 30 days through unbeaten paths, where his food was felt and dares, and thole but a few, and butter instead of oil. The Country that he came into at last belonged to the Nomades, and truly a great part of it was defect : it was called Arenalena, and the King of it was Sabus. [Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 781.]

Sabur was King of Arabia Felix; in which although none came out to face Ælius, yet this journey cost him much labour: for the defence of the Country and the Sun, and the Waters that are naturally infected, did much afflict them, so that the greater part of the army perished. That disease was like none of ours; the head was distill'd, and that being dried, killed many, and those that escaped death, the disease went thorough their whole body into their legs; and there did so afflict them, that none-remely would do any good, unless one drank oil mingled with wine, and anointed himself therewith, which very few could do; for neither of those grew in these places, neither had they brought any plenty with them. Amongst these mischances, the Barbarians also, who at first in every battle always had the worst, and lost some Towns also, now taking occasion by the help of this disease, they set upon the Romans and recover their own, and drive the rest of the Romans out of the Country, [Dis. lib. 53. pag. 516, 517.] of Strabo.

Fifty dayes being spent in travelling over Arearena thorough impassable wayes, he came to the City of the Agrans (or rather Egrans) a peaceable and fruitful Country. Then King Sabus fled, and the City was taken at the first assault. From hence on the forty dayes he came to the River; where the Barbarians met him in battell array of whom there were 10000. and but two onely of the Romans, for they were very cowardly, and fled when they saw the King. He slew them all, and took their Arms, Bow, and Sling, but forsook their weapons unskillfully, as the Bow, and Lance, and Sword, and Sling, but forsook the most part, were Bills with two edges. Then he took the City Aela, that was forsaken by the King: from thence he came to Athrula, which he easily took, and put a Garrison there; and having provided corn and dates for his journey, came to Marayab, a City of the Rhamanites, who were under Ilafarus. This he set upon, and besieged six dayes, afterwards being compelled for want of water, he left off his designe. He understood by the Captives that he was onely six dayes journey from that part where the Spices grow; but he spent six monthes in this journey thorough the labour of his guides.

his lack, having feared out the treachery, being returned another way, he came in nine days to Anagana, where there was a skirmish; then on the eleventh day to the seven Wells, so named from the thing it felt: thence thorough places that were filled to the village of Chaalla; afterwards to a Bulwark called Malocha, (feared by the River side: after that thorough Defarts where there was not much water, into the village of Negra (or Hygra) which is under Obodas, and lieth by the Sea. In his return he spent but 60 days in all, whereas before he had spent 6 months, [Sirabo, lib.

With Julius Caesar waged war with part of the Egyptian army in Arabia, the Ethiopians which dwell beyond Egypt being sent by their Queen Candace (a manly woman and blind of one eye) upon a sudden invasion surprised the Garrisons of three Cohorts, which were Syene, Elephantina, & Philie, and carried them away captives, and overthrew Caesars Station. Against these Petronius the Governor of Egypt marched forth with full 20000 Foot, and 800 Horse, against 30000 men; and at first forced them to flee into Pelecha a City of Ethiopia. Then he lent them to demand the things that they had taken away, and also to know the reason why they had begun this war.

and they saying, that they had been injured by the governours, he answered them that they were not lords of the Country, but that Cæsar was: then they demanding three daies time to deliberate, and in the meantime doing nothing to satisfy him, he marcheth towards them, and forceth them to fight, and presently routeth them; for they were ill ordered, and as bad armed, for they had great shields made of raw ox hides, and the weapons with which they fought were, hatchets, speares, and some had swords. Then some being forced into the City, some fled into the desarts, others into the next Island, who also took the river, among whom were Queen Candace captives, these he also took, having passed the river by boats and ship; and sent them to Alexandria, and went to Ptolemaia and took it, then numbering the multitude of them that were taken Captives, and of those that were killed, it was found that very few escaped safety. [Strabo. lib. 17. pag. 820. Dio. lib. 54. pag. 524.]

From Ptolemaia Petronius came to Premis, a City strong by nature, and having passed over those hills or Sande, by which Cambyles army was overwhelmed by reason of wind that fell, he took it at the first assault, then he goes forward to Napata (called Tanape by Dio,) where Candace palace was, and there her sonne stayed him; the being in a Castle that was high, sent Embassadors to treat of a peace, and restored the statues, and the Captives that were taken from Syena: but Petronius stormed Napata and took it, and overthrew it, her son being put to flight; but whereas he neither could go forward because of the sand and the heat, or conveniently stay there with the whole army, having fortified Premis with walls, and a garriſon and victual for 400 men for two years, he returned to Alexandria, of the Captives having sold the rest, he sent 1000 to Cæsar, as he was returned from the Cantabrian war, of whom some died of diseases. [id. ibid.]

With these is to be joynted that place of Pliny, in the 6 book chap. 29. In the time of Augustus, the Romans entered the country of the Ethiopians, P. Petronius being general, who was of the order of Knighthood, and governour of Egypt; he overcame their Townes, which he only found, in the same order that he will speak of: Ptolemaia, Premis, Abocce, Phiburis, Cambyles, Attene, Stadis, where the inhabitants lose their hearing by the noise of the fall of the river of Nile, he seized also Napata. The farthest that he went from Syena was 870 miles, neither yet did the Romans make an utter desolation.

Phraates the III was restored into his Kingdom by the great aid of the Scythians, of whose coming Tiridates hearing, he flies to Cæsar, with a great number of his friends, desiring that he might be restored into that Kingdom, promising that Parthia should be subject to Rome, if he would give him that Kingdom, when Phraates knew this he presently sent Embassadors to Cæsar, desiring that he would send him back his servant Tiridates, and his own son, whom he had delivered as hostage to Cæsar. [Jup. lib. 42. cap. 5.]

When Tiridates and Phraates Embassadors were come to Rome, Augustus brought them both into the Senate, and then taking the knowledge of the difference from the Senate to himself, he heard the demands of either party, but then told them that he neither would yield up Tiridates to the Parthians, neither would allow Tiridates against the Parthians, but least they at last, should learn to obtain nothing of their requests, he commanded a very large allowance to be given to Phraates, as long as he would tarry at Rome, and sent back Phraates his son, that in leise of him he might recover the Captives, and ensignes that were lost in the overthrowes of Crassus and Antonius. [id. ibid. Dio. lib. 53. pag. 519.]

Whenas there were mutual grudges began to shew themselves between M. Agrippa and M. Marcellus the nephew and son in law of Augustus, because one thought the other to be more respected by Augustus than the other, he, fearing that contentions would grow higher between them if they continued both in one place, immediately sent away Agrippa into Asia, to govern those provinces beyond the sea in his stead, Agrippa left the City, but sending his Lieutenant into Syria, he himself tarried at Mitylene in the Isle of Lesbos. [Dio. lib. 53. pag. 518. cum Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 93. Jof. lib. 15. cap. 13. Sueton. in Octavio, cap. 66.]

When Augustus resigned the eleventh Consulship, and made Lucius Sestius the great favourite of Brutus Consul in his room, the Senate decreed these honours to him, That he should be perpetual Tribune of the common people, that he might call the Senate as often as he would, although he were not Consul, that he might make ordinances concerning whatsoever things he pleased, that he should have alwaies proconsular power, and that he should not lay it down when he came within the walls, or have need to renew it, and that he should alwaies have greater power in the provinces, than the very governours. [Dio. lib. 53. pag. 518. 519.]

Julius Gallus returning from the expedition of Arabia, left the village Negra in the Kingdom of the Nabatæans, and in eleven daies space waſted his army into the haven of Maris: hence passing Coprum, he came to Alexandria with those forces that were able able to bear arms; for he had lost the rest, not in war, (wherein only seven were lost) but by famine, labour, diseases, and the badness of the way. [Strabo. lib. 16. pag. 782.] Some of his medicinal compositions are related by Galen, in lib. 2. de Antidotis, among which there is triacle that he gave to Cæsar, with which he had preserved many of his Soldiers.

Marcus Marcellus, the Son of Octavia, the sister of Augustus, and the husband of Julia, the daughter of Augustus died. [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 93. Dio. lib. 53. pag. 517. & 519.]

Augustus restored to the people Cyprus and Gallia Narbonensis, because they needed not any forces, and for them received Dalmatia. [Dio. lib. 54. pag. 523. with lib. 53. pag. 504.]

The dancing of Anticks, and Stage-plays, was first brought up in Rome, by Pyldes Cilices and Bathylus; Pyldas was the first that ever had a Quire to play unto him. [Ensch. Chronic. cum Scaligeri Collectan. Grac. pag. 390. & Animadversion. pag. 155. 156.]

Herod having now built Sebaste, began to build most magnificently, another City, in a place by the sea side, where the Town of Straton stood, which he called Cafaria, with the addition of an Haven of admirable work, equal in greatness to the Haven Piræus, all which he finished in twelve years space, sparing neither labour, nor cost. [Joseph. lib. 1. bell. cap. 16. & lib. 17. Antiquit. cap. 13.] Whereupon Eutropius speaking of Cæsar, saith lib. 7. The name of Cæsar was so beloved by the Barbarians, that Kings that were friends of the people of Rome, built Cities in honour of him, and called them Cæsars; as in Mauritania by King Juba, and in Palestine which is a most famous City.

Herod sent his sons Alexander and Aristobolus (which he had by Mariamne the Asmonæan) to Rome to Cæsar, to be there brought up: for whom their lodging was prepared at Pollios his house the great friend of Herod. Cæsar entertained the young men very curiously, and gave Herod power to make which of his sons he would heir of his Kingdom, and gave him also Trachonitis Barmacea and Auranitis. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 13.]

After Herod had received Trachon, he took guides and went to the Dens of the thieves, retrained their villanies, and gave peace to the inhabitants: but Zenodorus being moved partly thorough envy, and partly with the losse of his possessions, went to Rome to accuse Herod, but could effect nothing. [id. ibid.]

Herod having saluted his chiefest friend Agrippa at Mitylene, returned into Judea, [id. ibid.]

Some Citizens of Gadara go to Agrippa to accuse Herod, whom not vouchsafing so much as to hear, he sent them bound to Herod; but Herod spared them, who although he was inexorable towards his own people, yet he willingly contemned and forgave injuries received from strangers. [id. ibid.]

Augustus went into Sicily, that he might settle thar, as also all other Provinces even to Syria. [Dio. lib. 54. pag. 524.]

Augustus sent for Agrippa (who he wished had had more patience, because for a light suspicion of harboure under colour of the chief office had gone leaving all things, to Mitylene) to come to him out of Asia into Sicily, and commanded him to leave his wives although the daughter of Octavia, Augustus his own sister; and to marry his daughter Julia the widow of Marcellus, and sent him presently to solemnize the Marriage, and to undertake the government of the City. [id. ibid. pag. 525. Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 93. Sueton. in Octavio, cap. 63. 66.]

Zenodorus, counting his estate desperate, had farmed out Auranitis a part of his Country to the Arabians for fifty talents yearly rent. This part although it was contained in the grant that Cæsar gave Herod, yet the Arabians hating Herod would in no wise suffer it to be taken from them. Sometimes laying claime to it by inrodes and force, and sometimes contending for the right of possession before the Judges. They drew all unto them certain needy soldiers, who according to the custom of wretched men, hope for better fortunes by innovations: which although Herod knew well enough, yet he had rather prevent it by good reasons, than by armes, least he should give occasions of new commotions. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. 13.]

Augustus having ordered things in Sicily passed over into Greece, when he took from the Athenians, Aegina and Eretria, because as some report, they had favoured Anthony. [Dio. ut supra. pag. 525.]

Petronius going with incoor prevented Candace the Queen of the Ethiopians, who with many thousands set upon the garriſon of Premis, and having entered the Castle, strengthened it with much provision; and compelled the Queen to accept conditions of peace. [Strabo. lib. 17. pag. 821. cum Dio. lib. 54. pag. 524.]

Petronius commanded the Embassadors that were sent unto him, that if they would demand any thing they should go unto Cæsar, and they denying that they knew whether whither there were a Cæsar, or where they should meet with him, he commanded some that they should conduct him, [Sirabo, ibid.]

Augustus having perfected his affairs in Greece, failed into Samos, and there wintered. [Dio, lib. 54. pag. 525.]

When as the people of Armenia accused Artabazes or Artaxias, (the son of Artavaldes, that was taken by the treachery of Anthony, and desired that his brother Tigranes, who was then at Rome, might be their King. Augustus sent to Tiberius, to drive out Artabazes, and to make Tigranes King in his stead. [Id, ib, pag. 526. cum Tacit. Annal, lib. 2. cap. 3.]

The Embassadors of Candace coming into Samos, found Cæsar ready to go into Syria, and sending Tiberius into Armenia; they easily obtained of him what they desired, and he remitted their tribute alio, [Sirabo, lib. 17. pag. 821.]

In the Spring Augustus went into Asia, M. Apuleius, and P. Silius being Consuls, and there, and in Bythnia alio, he ordered all things, not therefore making lesse account of them, because that, as well there as those Provinces, that he had formerly passed through, were accounted to belong to the people, but he took to much care for all things, as if they had been his own, for he mended all things, where it was convenient; and to some he gave money, and on others he imposed new sums, besides their ordinary tribute. But from the Cyziceniens, he took away their freedom, because that in a certain sedition they had put to death some Romans, after they had scourged them. [Dio, lib. 54. pag. 525.]

Then he went into Syria, in the tenth year after he had been in that Province. [Joseph, lib. 1. bell. cap. 15.] But in the 17. year of the reign of Herod (from the death of Antigonius) [Id, lib. 15. Antiquit. cap. 13.] where he dispoiled the Tyrians and Sidonians of their liberty, because of their factious. [Dio, lib. 54. pag. 535.]

Zenodorus had solemnly sworn to the Gadarens, that he would never leave off to do what possibly he could that they might be freed from the jurisdiction of Herod, and be annexed to Cæsars Province. Hereupon many of them began to exclaim against Herod, calling him cruel and Tyrant, complaining unto Cæsar of his violence and rapines, and for violating and raising their Temples which which Herod being nothing terrified, was ready to answer for himself; but Cæsar used him courteously, and not at all alienated from him for all this tumultuous multitude. The Gadarens therefore perceiving the inclinations of Cæsar and his friends, and fearing by certain conjectures, that they should be delivered into Herods hands. The next night after the meeting, some of them cut their own throats, others for fear of torments, brake their own necks, some also drowned themselves in the river: and thus whereas they seemed to fore judge themselves, Cæsar immediately absolved Herod. [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 13.]

Zenodorus alio having his bowels burst through much blood that came from him, ended his life at Antioch in Syria. [Id, ib.]

Augustus gave the Tetrarchy of Zenodorus to Herod. [Id, ibid, Dio, lib. 54. pag. 526.] Certainly no contemptible part, which being seated between Galilee and Trachon, contained Ulatha Paneada, and the neighbour Countries, he made him alio one of the Governours of Syria, and commanded the Governours of that Province to do nothing without his advice. [Joseph, lib. 1. bell. cap. 15. lib. 15. Antiquit. cap. 13.]

Herod begged a Tetrarchy of Cæsar, for his brother Pheroras, on whom he alio bestowed 100 talents, out of the revenues of his own Kingdom, to the intent, that if he should happen to die, Pheroras estate might be assured, and not subject to Herods children. [Id, ibid.]

Claudius Tiberius Nero was sent by Augustus, his father in law, with an army to visit and order the Provinces that were in the East; where having shewed all experiments of the chiefest virtues, he cured Armenia with the Legions; and having reduced it under the power of the people of Rome, he delivered the Kingdom to Artavaldes. Whereupon the King of the Parthians being terrified, with the fame of his great name, sent his sons Hostages to Cæsar, this Velleius Paterculus, the great flatterer of Tiberius. [lib. 2. cap. 94.]

All Authours else mention, that Tigranes, the son of Artavaldes, was at this time made King of the Armenians; for Artavaldes, being led captive into Egypt by Cleopatra, and Antony, his eldest son Artaxius (whom Dio here calls Artabazes, by his Fathers name) enjoyed the Kingdom of Armenia: to whom Archelaus and Nero, having expelled him by force out of the Kingdom, now made his younger brother successeur; (called by Velleius, after his fathers name, Artavaldes, but by all others Tigranes)

Tigranes) Thus Josephus [lib. 15. cap. 5.] relates the story: meaning by the name of Archelaus, the King of Cappadocia, and by the name of Nero, Claudius Tiberius, although he were not yet adopted by Cæsar, to whom part of that Narration in Horace belongeth. [lib. 1. epist. 12.]

*Ne tamen ignores, quo sit Romana loco res:
Cantaber Agrippæ, Claudii virtute Neronæ
Armenius cecidit; jussu imperiumque Phraates Cæsaris accepit genibus minor.*

Know further too what places do partake
Roman affairs: Cantaber & Agrippa falls,
Claudius Armenia died by Nero take:
The younger brother Phraates hath all Cæsars both right and rule imperial.

With which agrees that of Ovid, in 3. Tristium.

Nunc petit Armenius pacem; nunc porrigit arcus Parthus eques, timida capteque signa manu.

Th' Armenians sue for peace, the Parthian bow, Horcs Arms, and Ensignes are resigned now.

Yet Dio affirms that Tiberius, or this Claudius Nero, Artabazes, or Artaxias, being put to death by the Armenians, before his coming, did nothing that was answerable to his preparation. [lib. 54. pag. 526.] Although concerning this business, he boasted that he had done every thing by his own virtue, and especially, because there then were decreed sacrifices for it: which alio that place of Tacitus seems to favour. [lib. 2. Annal, cap. 3.] Artaxias being slain by the treachery of his nearest friends, Tigranes is made King of the Armenians, and brought by Tiberius Nero into the Kingdom. Who leading his army into the East, restored the Kingdom of Armenia to Tigranes, and put the Crown on his head in the Tribunal, as Sueton hath it in Octavia. [cap. 9.]

Suetonius adds in the same place, that Tiberius recovered the Ensignes that the Parthians had taken from M. Crassus, when alio the Parthians, at Augustus demand, restored the military Ensignes, they had taken away from Marcus Crassus and M. Antonius; and moreover, offered hostages, as it is in the same Suetonius in Octavio. [cap. 21.] For when Augustus came into Syria, for the composing of the state of affairs in the East; Phraates, who had performed nothing as was agreed, fearing least Augustus should make war upon Parthia, sent back to him the Roman Ensignes, both which Orodes had taken, at the overthrow of Crassus, and which his son had taken, when Antonius was put to flight, he delivered alio all the Captives that were in all Parthia, that were gathered up of the army of Crassus, and Antonius, except a few, who had killed themselves for shame, and some that carried privately in Parthia. These things Augustus received, as if he had conquered the Parthian in war. [Livy, lib. 139. Florus, lib. 4. cap. ult. Strabo, lib. 2. pag. 283. & lib. 16. 748. Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 91. Justin, lib. 42. cap. ult. Dio, lib. 54. pag. 527. Europ. lib. 7. Oros. lib. 6. cap. 21. & Cælliodorus in Chronico.]

Europus writes that the Persians, or Parthians, gave hostages to Cæsar, which they never did before to any, and by delivering the Kings children for hostages, that they merited a firm league, with a solemn procession, wishes Orosius. [loc. supra.] And Strabo confirms, that Phraates, in the end of lib. 6. committed his sons, and his sons sons to Augustus Cæsar, and desired with all reverence to deserve his friendship, by delivering hostages to him. And Justin confirms in the end of his 42 book, that his sons and Grand-children were hostages to Augustus: but yet Tacitus warns us in the beginning of the second of the Annals, that he shewed all duty and reverence to Augustus, and sent part of his children, for the strengthening their friendship, not so much for fear of him, as for dissembling the disloyalty of his own Subject, for this was the business.

Thermula, an Italian woman, whom of a Concubine he made his wife, thinking to get the Kingdom of the Parthians, for Phraates her son, whom she had born to the King, when she was yet his Concubine, persuaded the King her husband, with whom she could do any thing, to send his lawful begotten children in hostage to Rome. [Joseph, lib. 15. cap. 3.] Phraates, calling Titius to a conference, who was then governor of Syria, delivered his four lawful begotten sons for hostages; Sarapades, Cerolpades, Phraates and Vonones, two of their wives, and four sons: for fearing a sedition, and least some treachery should be laid for him by his enemies, he sent his sons out of the way : perfwading himfelf, that none fhould be able to do any thing againft him, if he fhould have none of the race of the Arfacidæ to be fet up in his room, to whom the Parthians were fo affectionate, [Strabo, lib. 16, pag. 748, 749.] in an old Roman infcription there joyned with Sarafpadanes (for fo he is there named) another fon of Phraates, not mentioned by Strabo, Rhodafpes a Parthian the fon of Phraates Arfacides the King of Kings, [infeript. Græcæ, pag. CCLXXXVIII.]

Auguftus in the Eaft ordered his fubjects according to the form of the Roman lawes, but fuffered thofe that were in league with him to live after the lawes of their anceftors, neither determined he to take any thing from them, but to be content with what they had gotten, and fo he wrote to the Senate, he therefore at this time made no war, but gave to Jamblichus the fon of Jamblichus his fathers principality in Arabia, he gave alfo to Tarcondimotus the fon of Tarcondimotus, his fathers principality in Cilicia. Except fome few Towns which he gave to Archelaus with the Kingdom of Armenia the leffe, King Melius who had that Kingdom before being dead, and to one whole name was Mithridates being as yet a child he gave Commagena, becaufe the King had killed the father of this Mithridates, [Dio, lib. 54, pag. 526.]

Herod having conducted Cæfar to the fea fide, returned into his Kingdom, and and there built a goodly temple, in honour of him of white marble, near Panion, at the foot of which mountain are the fountains heads of Jordan, then he alfo remitted to his fubjects fome part of their tribute, under colour, that they fhould have fome eafe after the dearth, but in very deed that he might appeafe the minds of his fubjects, that were offended with fuch vaft works of the King, which feemed to tend to nothing but the deftruction of religion, and good manners, as it was commonly talked, [Jofeph. lib. 15, cap. 13.]

Herod to prevent thefe things, forbid all private meeting in the City, and too often feaftings, he had alfo fpies that fhould mingle themfelves in companies, and marke what the people talked of, yea he himfelf would goe in the night in the habit of a private man, and mingle himfelf in the company of the people, to learn what the people thought of him, and as many as obftinately difallowed his doings, he punifhed them without mercy, the reft of the multitude he bound to him by oath, exacting an oath of them that they fhould depart from their fidelity and duty, [id. ibid.]

Herod required this oath of many followers of the Pharifees, as Pollo and Sameas, which although he could not get them to take, yet he punifhed not as he did the others, in refpect of the reverence he bare to Pollo, neither did he impofe this neceffity upon the Effeans, whom he much efteemed for one Manahems lake who was a Propher : who when he was but a private boy, faluted him King of the Jews, and had foretold that he fhould reign King above 30 years, [id. ibid.]

Cæfus is born to Agrippa by his wife Julia, there is a yearly facifice decreed on his birth day with fome other things, [Dio, lib. 54, pag. 526.]

Auguftus returned into Samos and there wintered again, and for a reward of their hofpitality, he grants the Samians liberty, thither came to him frequent Embaffies, the Indians then by a firm league confirmed the peace which they formerly had defired by their Embaffadours, (of whom it is fpoken before in the year of the Julian period 4689.) amongst the prebents that were fent by the Indian thence were tygers, which creatures were never before feen either by the Romans or Grecians, and a certain young man who wanted his armes, (fuch as they use to feign Mercurius to be) who performed all things by the office of his feet, inftead of hands, that he was faid to bend a bow, and fhoot an arrow, and found a trumpet, [id. ibid, pag. 547.]

Nicholas Damafcene reports that he faw thefe Indian Embaffadours at Antioch by Daphnis. The letter they brought makes mention of more, but he faith only three were alive whom he faw, the reft being the greater part died through the length of the journey, that the letter was in Greek written in parchment, in which was fignified, that it was Porus that wrote it, who although he commanded 600 Kings, yet he did much efteem Cæfars friendship, that he was ready to give him a meeting in what placefoever, and that he would aid in any thing that was right. He faith thefe things were contained in the letter, moreover that the prebents were brought by eight fervants that were naked, only having breeches on, and befmeared with perfumes, thofe were Herman, he (of whom we have fpoken) who had his armes cut off from his fhoulder being a child, huge vipers, a ferpent of ten cubits long, a river tortoye of three cubits, and a partridge bigger than a vulture, [Strabo, lib. 15, pag. 719.]

Among thefe was Zomarus or Zomanochebas, one of the wifeft men of the Indians, who for vain glories fake, or for old age according to the lawes of his Country, or that he might fhew himfelf to Auguftus and the Athenians, (for he had come into Athens) and was made a Prieft of the Grecian gods, although (as they report) in an unlawful time, yet in favour of Auguftus ; thinking that he muft die, and leaft fome adverfity fhould fhould happen to him if he tarried longer, then fmiling and naked and annointed, he gave himfelf into the funeral fire : and this intercession was written on his Sepulchre. Here lieth Zomanochebas an Indian, of Barbofus, who according to the cuftom of his Country, led himfelf out of life, [id. ibid, pag. 719, Dio, lib. 54, pag. 527.]

Auguftus being returned to Rome, entered the City on horfeback in a kind of Triumph, and was honoured with a Triumphal Arch that carried his Trophies, [Dio, ibid, pag. 526.]

Auguftus did account it a matter of high praife to him, that he had recovered thofe things that were formerly loft in war, without any fight at all : and therefore he commanded that it fhould be decreed that there fhould be facrifices for that caufe, and a Temple of Mars the revenger (in imitation of Jupiter Feretrius) in the Capitol, where the Enfigns fhould be hung up : and did alfo perform it, [id. ibid.]

This Temple he had formerly vowed to Mars before the Victory at Philippi, but now proclaiming that he had received another like benefit from him, he performed his vow at the twentieth years end ; imitating Romulus, who having killed Acreo the King of the Centinches, hung up his armes in the Temple that he dedicated to Jupiter Feretrius : he built a Temple to Mars the twice revenger, and then laid up the Military Enfigns that he had recovered from the Parthians, and alfo instituted Circenfian playes to be folemnized every year in memory of thefe things, Of which Ovid in 5 Faftorum.

Nec fatis eft meruisse semel cognomina Marti :

Herod in the 18 year of his reign (being reckoned from the death of Antigonus) propounded his intent to the Jews, of building the Temple at Jerusalem: whom he saw that they were troubled, lest if he demolished the old, he could not finish the new. He certified them that the old Temple should remain whole as it was, and not be pulled down, until that all materials that were necessary for the new fabric should be prepared. Neither did he deceive them; he provided a thousand waggons to carry stones, and he picked out of all the multitude of Artificers 10000 that were most expert, and also a thousand Priests that were clothed with Priests garments at his own cost, that were not altogether ignorant of the Masons and Carpenters art: and that they should fall to work, seeing the materials were ready, [Joseph, lib. 14, cap. 14.]

When Augustus his first ten years was almost at an end, he prolonged the Principality to himself for five years longer, and gave to M. Agrippa for the same five years, as well some things almost the same with himself, as also the Tribunical power; for he said that for many years was then sufficient, although that not long after he accepted of more years of the Imperial Power, as that his Principality might be made decennial, [Dio, lib. 54, pag. 529.]

And because now the bookes of the Sybills thorough age were worn out of date, Augustus gave charge to the Priests, that by their own hands they should write them out; that none other should read them, [Id. ibid. pag. 532.]

Augustus restored Pilades the Cilician Player, that thorough factions was cast out of Rome, because he reconciled the favour of the people to him, and because Augustus reproved him, for that he was always quarrelling with Bathyllus one of his own professors, and also a friend of Mecenas, he is reported to have answered thus to Caesar, It is convenient for thee, O Caesar, that the people should spend their time being intent upon us, [Ibid. pag. 533.]

All necessary materials for the setting upon the work being provided in two years space, Herod began to build the Temple of Jerusalem, 46 years before the first Passage of the Ministry of Christ: as it appears out of those words of the Jews, John 11. 20. spoken at that time. Τοιοῦτον δὲ ἔργον οὐδεὶς ποιεῖν ἔβρισε ἔτι. This Temple hath been built forty and six years hitherto: as that Aorist is rightly expounded by our Country-man Lydiar.

And indeed the building of this Temple under Zorobabel, began in the first year of the Monarchy of Cyrus, and for some time interrupted, was after twenty years time finished, in the sixth year of Darius the son of Hystaspes; and the magnificent building of the same begun by Herod at this time, was finished in the space of nine years and an half: but in accounting the time spent in building this most magnificent Structure, we must take into consideration not only the labour of these two, but of their Successors also: whereas in the perfection of it many ages and all the holy treasures, that were sent to God from all the parts of the World thither were spent: as Josephus notes in the sixth book of the wars of the Jews, and sixth chapter: for neither the riches of Herod alone, (being wasted especially with such profuse gifts, such buildings of so many Palaces, Temples, and Cities, one whereof was the City and Port of Celarea, and which was most costly of all, did then lie upon him, when he laboured in building the Temple) a Temple of immenſe riches: (as Tacitus calls it in the 5 of his Histories, chap. 9.) were sufficient for the finishing of it; and that this great building of the Temple begun by Herod, was continued even to the beginning of the war of the Jews under Gellius Florus, by great gifts that were consecrated to God, that place of Josephus shews in the 20 book of his Antiquities, chap. 8. Now was finished the building of the Temple; and the people when they perceived that more than 8000 women would be idle, who were wont to get their living by their work in the Temple, and being loath that the holy treasure should be laid up, for fear it should become a prey to the Romans, and without willing to provide for the workmen; because if one had wrought but one hour, he was presently paid his wages: they persuaded the King

King (Agrippa the younger) that he would build the eastern Porch, which inclosed the outer arduous parts of the Temple.

Agrippa had Lucius by his wife Julia, whom, together with his brother Caius, Augustus, that he might be the freer from treachery, immediately adopted, and made heirs of his Empire, [Dio, lib. 54, pag. 533.]

Marcus Agrippa, after he had exhibited Quinquennial plays (which were the fourth from the battle of Actium) is again by Augustus sent into Syria, [Dio, lib. 4, pag. 534.]

Herod set sail for Italy, to salute Caesar, and to see his children at Rome, [Joseph. lib. 16, cap. 1.] and passing by Greece, was not only present, but also judge at the Olympick exercises, in the CXC. Olympiade, in which Diodorus Tyaneus got the prize (who observing that those exercises did not answer the reſort that was to them, through the poverty of the Elidenes, he bestowed towards them annual revenues, whereby their sacrifices might be made the more splendid, and other things that might belong to the gracing of so great a meeting; for which bounty he is declared perpetual judge of those exercises. [Id. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 16. lib. 15. Antiquit. cap. 9.]

Caesar having courteously entertained Herod at Rome, delivereth to him his sons, sufficiently instructed in the liberal sciences [Id. lib. 16, cap. 1.] goes himself into Galatia, [Dio, lib. 54, pag. 535.]

At Jerusalem, by the endeavour of the Priest, the building of the Temple, properly so called, because it contained the Holy, and the Holy of Holies, was finished in a year and an half space; in all which time, it is reported, that it never rained in the day time, but only in the nights; then in the eight following years, the Porches, the Ranges, and the rest of the buildings about the Temple were all finished, [Joseph. lib. 15, cap. ult.]

There is extant a twofold description of this Temple, one by Josephus, (who himself did the duties of a Priest in it) in the 15 Antiquit. cap. 14. and lib. 6. bell. cap. 6.) Another by R. Juda, (almost 120 years after the destruction of it) in a tractate of his Mishna, which is intitled מידות a Map of the former we have from Ludovicus Capellus, at the end of his short History of the Jews; and of the latter from Constantine Lempereur, prefixed in his Commentary upon the book of Mcdaiah, in the Preface of which he sheweth that the constant opinion of the Jews was, that the Temple of Zorobabel, and this of Herod, were rightly accounted for both the same: as likewise he shews out of the fifth book of Tacitus his Histories, that it was thought to be the same Temple that was wonne by Pompey, that was then besieged by Titus.

When Alexander and Aristobolus were returned into Judea, and had gained all mens loves, Salome, the sister of Herod, and her followers fearing that they would lose some or other revenge their mothers death, call out words among the people, that they hated their father, because he had called their mother to be slain: but Herod as yet suspecting no ill, used them with all honour, as they deserved; and because they were now grown to mens estate, he provided them wives, for Alexander Bernice, the daughter of Salome, and for Aristobolus Glaphira, the daughter of Archelaus, the King of the Cappadocians, [Joseph. lib. 15, cap. 12.]

Augustus restored liberty to the Cyzenians, he gave also money to the Paphians (in Cyprus) that had been afflicted with an Earthquake, and permitted by a decree of the Senate, that their City should be called Augusta. [Dio, lib. 54, pag. 539.]

Herod hearing that M. Agrippa was again come into Asia, he gorth to him, he begged of him that he would vouchsafe to come into his Kingdom, as to his friend and guest, [Joseph. lib. 16, cap. 2.]

Herod entertained Agrippa in all the Cities that he had newly built, and shewing him the buildings, presented both to himself and friends, all kind of delights and magnificence, at Sebaste, and the Port of Caesarea, and in the Castles that he had built, as at Alexandrian, Herodion, and Hyrcania. He brought him also into the City of Jerusalem, where all the people met him in their best and festival attire, and with joy-

full acclamations, Agrippa also having sacrificed an Hecatomb to God, teased the people: and although he would willingly have stayed longer there, yet for fear of storm; the Winter now drawing on, he made haste to sail into Ionia, both he and his friends being honoured with great presents, [Id. ib.]

Atander, being made King of Cimmeric Bosphorus, by Augustus, dying, left the Kingdom to his wife Dynamis, the daughter of Pharnaces, and wife of Mithridates, her own son Scribonius feigning himself to be the Nephew of Mithridates, married, and seized upon the Kingdom. Agrippa hearing this, sent Polemon, the King of that Pontus, which is situate by Cappadocia, to make war upon him, [Die. lib. 14. pag. 538.]

The Bosphorans, as soon as they knew this deceit, killed Scribonius, and resisted Polemon that came against them, fearing that he should be made their King, whom he conquered in battle, but yet did not subdue them, [Id. ibid.]

As soon as it was Spring, Herod hearing that Agrippa was going with an army to Bosphorus, made haste to go to him; and taking his court by Rhodes and Chios, he came to Lesbos; thinking he should find him; but being driven back by the contrary North winds, he tarried at Chios: where many coming privately to salute him, he bestowed upon them many princely gifts; and when he perceived the gate of the City, that was thrown down in the war against Mithridates, as yet lying in ruins, and that it could not be repaired to the former beauty and greatness, by reason of their poverty, he bestowed upon them so much money as was abundantly sufficient to finish it, and exhorted them to adorn the City as soon as they could, to the former beauty and greatness. [Joseph. lib. 16. cap. 3.]

As soon as the wind changed, Herod sailed first to Mitylene, and then to Byzantium; and there understanding that Agrippa, was already past the Cyanean Rocks, he followed him with all speed, and overtook him at Sinope, a City in Pontus: who contrary to Agrippa's expectations arrived there with his Navy. His coming was very grateful to him, and they embraced each other with singular affection, because it was an evident argument of his fidelity and friendship, that the King leaving his own occasion, would come to him in so convenient a time. Wherefore Herod still abode by him in the army, and was his companion in his labours, and partaker of his counsels. He was also present with him when he meant to be merry, and was the only man that was used in difficult matters, for the love he bore him, and in mirth for honours sake, [Id. ibid.]

Agrippa overcame the Bosphorans, and having recovered in war those Roman Ensigns, which they long since had taken under Mithridates, by conquest compelled them to yield. [Oros. lib. 6. cap. 81.]

When Julia, the daughter of Augustus, and wife of Agrippa, went to Ilium by night, it happened that Julia and her servants that waited on the Coach, were in great danger in passing the river of Scamander, which was much swelled by sudden floods, the people of Ilium being altogether ignorant of her coming: but Agrippa being angry that they had not helped her, fined them an 10000 Drachmes of Silver. [Nicol. Damascen. lib. de vita sua. in Excerptis ab Henrico. Vales. edit. pag. 418.]

The Embassadors of the Illynes, not daring to gain say any thing to Agrippa, they entreated Nicholas Damascen, (who by chance was there) that he would get King Herod to speak for them, and to help them; which he for the ancient renowne of the City undertook, and told the King the whole story, how that Agrippa was angry with the Illynes without a cause, seeing he had given them no notice of his Wives coming, and that they could not perceive any thing of her coming, because it was in the night: and Herod undertaking the cause of the Illynes, got their fine taken off, [Id. ibid.] and reconciled Agrippa, being angry with them. [Joseph. lib. 16. cap. 3.]

The Bosphorans at length laying down their arms, are delivered to Polemon, who also marries Dynamis, with the approbation of Augustus: for this there was a procession, in Agrippa's name; but neither did he triumph, although it was decreed, neither wrote he to the Senate any thing at all concerning his affairs; whole example after age: imitating, they also did not certify by letters concerning their doings, neither did they accept of a triumph, though offered, but were content only with the triumphal ornament [Deo. lib. 14. pag. 538.]

The trouble of Pontus being ended, Agrippa and Herod came by land to Ephesus, through Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia, and there again taking ship, they came to Samos, [Joseph. lib. 16. cap. 3.]

The Illyne being now returned into their Country, because they had lost all hope of obtaining pardon, and Herod being about to go into Paphlagonia to Agrippa, gave a letter to Nicholas Damascene concerning the remission of their fine; who went to Chios and Rhodes, where his sons tarried; Nicholas therefore looting from Amisus, came to the Port of Byzantium; thence sailing to Troas, he came to Ilium, where when he had delivered his letters of the remission of their fine, both he, but especially Herod, received great honours from the Illynes, [Nicol. Damascene, ut supra.]

Agrippa in his whole journey thorough many Cities, gratified Herod in many things, at his intreaty relieving the necessities of many; if any one had need of an intercessor to Agrippa, he could obtain his suite by none more easily than by him. Herod also paid the money for the Chians that they were indebted to Cæsars receivers; and got the man immunity. He also assisted others in whatsoever they had need of, [Joseph. lib. 16. cap. 3.]

After they were come into Ionia, there was a great multitude of Jews, that inhabited that Country; who having got an opportunity, complained of the injuries they received of those Country-men, that they would not permit them to live after their own laws, and that upon their Festival dayes, they halted them before the Tribunals, and forbade them to lend holy money to Jerusalem; and that they compelled them to do publick busineses, and interverted the holy money for those affairs, contrary to the privileges granted them by the Romans. Herod took all care that Agrippa should hear their complaints, and allowed them Nicholas Damascene, one of his friends (now returned from Troas) to plead their cause: which when he had largely performed before Agrippa, (many of the most honourable Roman, and some Kings and Princes sitting with him) the Grecians denied not the thing, but only excused themselves, that the Jews that dwelt among them were troublesome unto them; and they proved that they were free-born Citizens, and that they lived in their own laws without injury to any. Therefore Agrippa answered, That both for his friend Herod's sake he was ready to gratify them, and also because they seemed to demand what was just; He therefore ordered that the privileges that were formerly granted them, should remain inviolable, and that none should molest them for living after their Country laws. Then Herod rose up and gave him thanks in the name of them all; and then after mutual embraces, they took their leaves each of other, and departed from Lesbos, [Joseph. lib. 16. cap. 4. & 5.]

Herod in few dayes after, having a prosperous gale, arrived at Cæsarea: and from thence went to Jerusalem; where calling all the people together, he gave them an account of his journey, and how he had gotten an immunity for the Jews that lived in Asia, and then to gratify them the more and to make them the more friendly to him, he professed that he would remit to them the fourth part of their tribute: with which bounty they being exceedingly taken, wished all happiness to the King, and departed with great joy, [Ibid. cap. 5.]

Agrippus now at length took upon him the High Priesthood, Lepidus who was in times past of the Triumviri and Priest, being now dead, but would never take it from him during his lifetime, [Sueton. in Othone, cap. 31. Dio. lib. 54. pag. 540. fin.] the day before the Nones of March, as Ovid shews in lib. 3. Fastorum.

He being made High Priest, whatsoever books either of Greek or Latine, that went about under two Authors name, or not a substantial, he got together and burnt about two thousand: and kept only the books of the Sybills, and of those he picked out some, and laid them up in two golden lances under the foot of the pillar where the Image of Apollo stood in the Palatine hill, [Sueton. ut supra.]

There was a Colony sent to Berythus [Joseph. Chronic.] that was very much honoured by the favour of Augustus, [Ulpian. c. Sciendum est D. de Constitut.] in which were two Legions placed by Agrippa, [Sirabo, lib. 16. pag. 756.]

Herod being incited by the false accusations and artifices of his sister Salome and his brother Ptolemaeus, against his two sons that he had by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobolus, to bring down their haughty spirits, he began to excite him more secretly, and publicly to put in hopes of the kingdom, his eldest son Antipater (but whom he had banished the City, in favour of his two other sons, (only giving him liberty to come thither on Festival dayes) and writing often to Cæsar for him, privately gave him very great commendations: and being overcome by the intreaties of Antipater, he brought also his mother Doris, who being a woman of Jerusalem, whom he had put away when he married Mariamne, [Joseph. lib. 11. bell. cap. 17. & lib. 16. Antiquit. cap. 6.]

Agrippa after his ten years government in Asia (to be reckoned for the time, in which being sent by Cæsar into Asia and Syria, he tarried at Lesbos) being now to depart; Herod failed to salute him, taking with him all of his sons only Antipater, whom he delivered to Agrippa with many gifts, to be brought to Rome, and

and to be received into Cæſars favour. [Id. lib. 16. cap. 6. ſu.]

Agrippa being returned from Syria, was ſent by Auguſtus to make war in Pannonia, having the Tribunal power granted him for five years longer; at whole arrival the Pannonians being terrified, left off their rebellion, and Agrippa in his return died in Campania, and his body being brought in the market-place at Rome, Auguſtus commended him in a Funeral Oration. [Livy, lib. 139. Dio. lib. 54. pag. 541.]

Antipater was much honoured at Rome, being commended to all his friend: by his fathers letters; and although he was absent, yet did he not deſtitute to what his father by letters againſt the ſons of Mariamme, as ſeeming very careful of his fathers ſafety: but indeed by his bad practices, making himſelf away, to the hopes of the ſucceſſion of the Kingdom. [Joſeph. lib. 16. cap. 7.]

Auguſtus took againſt his will his ſon in law Tiberius to be his partner in the government in the room of Agrippa; when his grandchildren C. Caius and Lucius, were but yet children, therefore he betrothed his daughter Julia (the widow of Agrippa) to Tiberius forcing firſt him to leave his wife Agrippina, (the daughter of Agrippa the daughter of Pomponius Atticus) not without great vexation of his mind, which did then nuſe her child Drufus, and alſo was with child again. [Sueton. in Oſio, cap. 63. & Tiberio. cap. 7. Dio. lib. 54. pag. 543.]

Herod now being become an enemy to his ſonnes Alexander and Ariſtobolus, failed to Rome with them to accuſe them before Cæſar, [Joſeph. lib. 16. cap. 3.] and carrying with him Nicholas Damalcene in the ſame ſhip, with whom he ſtudied Philoſophy. [Nicoll. Damalcene. in ſua vita in excerptis Henrici. Valeſ. pag. 421.]

Herod not hiding Auguſtus at Rome, followed him as far as Aquileia, before whom he accuſed them of treachery againſt him, and whenas the young men ſatisfied all that were preſent by their clearing of themſelves, and prayers and teares, they are at length reconciled to their father. Then after thanks given to Cæſar they departed together, and Antipater alſo, feigning that he was glad that they were received again into favour. [Joſeph. lib. 16. cap. 7. & 8.]

A few daies after Herod gave Cæſar 300 Talents, who was now ſetting forth ſhews and giving gifts to the people, and again Cæſar gave him half of the revenues of the metall mines of Cyprus, and the other half he committed to his overſight, and having honoured him with other gifts of hoſpitality, he gave him leave to choiſe which of his ſons he would for to be his ſucceſſour, or if he had rather of dividing his Kingdom amongſt them, which when he was ready to do, Cæſar denied that ever he would ſuffer, but that he ſhould have the Kingdom during his life, in his own power at will as hiſ ſons. [Id. ibid. cap. 8.]

In the abſence of Herod there being a rumour ſpread that he was dead, the Tracontes revolting from him fell to their old thieving; but by the means of the Capitaines that he had left in the Kingdom they are ſubdued and made to be at his command; but forty of the chief of theſe thieves, being terrified by the example of thoſe that were taken, leaving their Country fled into Arabia Nabatea, where they were entertained by Syllæus (that was an enemy to Herod, becauſe he denied him his liſter Salome to wife,) who granted them a certain place well fortified. [Id. ibid. cap. 13.]

Herod and his ſons ſaying home, when they came to Eleufa a City of Cilicia, which the name being changed was called Sebaste, they met there with Archelaus King of Cappadocia. He having very courteouſly entertained Herod, rejoiced much becauſe his ſons were reconciled to him, and that Alexander had fairly answered the crimes that were objected againſt him, and giving royall gifts each to other they parted. [Id. ibid. cap. 8.]

Herod being returned into Judea, called the people together and told them what he had done in his voyage, and declared unto them that his ſons ſhould reign after him firſt Antipater, and then Alexander and Ariſtobolus, that he had by Mariamme. [Id. ibid.]

Agrippa the firſt King of the Jews, of that nickname is born, he died when he was 54 years old being ſtrucken by an Angell, [Act. XII. 23. Joſeph. lib. 19. cap. ult.] about what time that lame man was born, who being above forty years old was healed by Peter, at the beaurifull gate of the temple. [Act. IV. 22.]

Antipater married his daughter Julia to Tiberius, to whom before times he had betrothed her. [Dio. lib. 54. pag. 546.]

Celeſara Stratonis was ſpoiled, in the 28 year of Herods reign, (beginning from the death of Antigonus,) in the CXII Olympiade, (to wit in the 3 year of the Olympiad:) for the dedication of which there was great ſolemnity, and moſt ſumptuous preparations, for Muſicians were brought thither to ſtrive who could do beſt, and and wreſtlers who wreſtled naked; and a great number of (word-players, and wild beaſts, and whatsoever was in account of this kind either at Rome, or in other nations, theſe ſports were conſecrated to Cæſar, and were to be renewed every fifth year, all this preparation the King provided to be brought hither at his own coſt and charges, to ſhew the greatneſſe of his magnificence. Julia the wife of Cæſar (for ſo alwaies Joſephus calls Livia) gave many things towards the ſports, ſo that all being caſt up together they amounted to 500 talents, a great multitude being gathered together to ſee theſe ſports, he entertained all Embaſſadours that were ſent unto him from divers nations to thank him for the favours they had received, he lodged, feaſted, and ſported them, all the day he ſpent in ſeeing the ſports, and the night in banquets. [Id. ibid. lib. 16. cap. 9.]

After the ſolemnity and feaſts, Herod began to build another Town, in a field called Caphartala, (or Caphartuluma, I Maccab. I. VII. 31.) which he called Antipatris, after his fathers name; and a Caſtle alſo which he called Cyprus, after his mothers name: in honour alſo of his dead brother, he built in the City of Jeruſalem, a fair Town, not inferior to the Pharos, and called it Phalaelus, and afterwards a Town of the ſame name, in the Valley of Jericho, from whence the Country thereabouts is called Phalaelus. [Id. ibid.]

The Jews of Aſia and Cyrene complain by their Embaſſadours to Auguſtus, that the Greeks would not ſuffer them to uſe their Country, rites, and immunities that were granted them by the Romans, and obtain of him letters patents for the conſervation of their privilegedges. [Id. ib. cap. 10.]

Herod having waited his wealth by his great prodigality, and now wanting money, after the example of John Hyrcanus, by night, without the knowledge of the people, opened Davids Sepulchre; in which indeed he found no money, but great ſtore of precious attire, and ornaments of gold, which he took away: for the exiation of which fact, he built a moſt ſumptuous Monument at the entrance of the Sepulchre, of white Marble, Nicholas Damalcene mentions this Monument, but not the Kings deſcent into the Sepulchre, who wrote the Acts of this King Herod in his lifetime. [Id. ib. cap. 11.]

Antipater involving his brethren, Alexander and Ariſtobolus, by other mens falſe accuſations, often ſeems to take upon him their defence; that making a ſhew of good will unto them, he might more eaſily oppreſſe them; and by theſe ſubtilties he wrought upon his father, that he thought him to be his only preſerver: wherefore the King commanded his Steward Ptolomæus unto Antipater, and communicated all his counſels with his Mother Doris, ſo that all things were done at their pleaſure, and made the King diſpleaſed with thoſe, whom it was their profit that he ſhould be angry with. [Ibid.]

Phororas fell fo madly in love with his own ſervant, that he reſuled the marriage with Cypros Herods daughter, that was offered him by his brother; although, being perſwaded by Ptolomæus, the Kings Steward, he had promiſed to put away his ſervant, and to marry Cypros within thirty dayes: he alſo accuſed Herod to his ſon Alexander, that he had heard of Salome his ſiſter, (which yet he denied) that Herod was greatly in love with his wife Glaphyra; for both which he was highly in the Kings diſpleaſure. [Ibid.]

He began to be deſeafed, who living at the Pool of Bethſeda, was after 38 years reſtored to health by Chriſt. [John. V. 5.]

Alexander by the ſubtilties of his adventures, being even driven to deſperation, was reconciled to his father by Archelaus, the King of the Cappadocians, that came to Jeruſalem. [Ibid. cap. 12.]

Archelaus being accounted one of Herods chief friends, and having received great gifts, departed into Cappadocia, whom Herod accompanies as far as Antioch; where having reconciled him to Titus, the preſident of Syria, he returns into Judea. [Ibid. cap. 13.]

Herod went the third time to Rome to Cæſar. [Ibid.]

Herod being absent out of his Kingdom, thoſe thieves of Trachonis, that had fled to Syllæus, the Arabian, infeſted not only Judea with their inroads, but alſo all Cæſtolyria; Syllæus affording them both impunity and ſecurity for their thievery. [Ibid. cap. 14.]

Auguſtus being High Prieſt, reſtored to the ancient account, the year as it was ordained by Julius Cæſar, but afterwards, through negligences much diſturbed and conſuled. [Sueton. in Oſio, cap. 31.] For in 36 years there were intercalated 12 dayes, where there ought to have been but nine intercalated. Auguſtus therefore commanded that twelve years ſhould paſſe without any Leap-year, at all; that thoſe three dayes, that had increaſed by the overhaſtineſſe of the Prieſts in thirty fix years, ſhould in the following twelve years be ſwallowed up without any Leap-year. In the ordering of the year Augustus called the month Sextilis after his own name August, rather than September though he was born in that month, because in that month he had been first Consul, and also had gotten many great victories; [Sueton. ut supra. Dion. lib. 54. pag. 552.] concerning which the very words of the decree of the Senate, are to be seen in Macrobius lib. 1. Saturnal. cap. 12. where also he mentions the decree of the people concerning the same matter, Pacuvius the Tribune of the people proposing the law, but this was done C. Marcus Conforinus, and C. Asinius Gallus being Consuls, as Conforinus [in lib. de die natali. and Dion. lib. 55.] doe confirm.

In their Consulship there was a second muster of the Citizens made at Rome, in which were numbered 423000 Roman Citizens, as is gathered out of the fragments of the Ancyran marble, [Inscript. Græcæ. pag. CCXXX.] in Suidas in Ancyræ the number is far less of those that were mustered, 1201017, which yet very ridiculously obtrudeth upon us not for the muster of the City only but of the world.

Herod being returned from Rome, celebrated the dedication of the temple reedified by him within nine years and an half, on the very birth day of his Kingdom (first received from the Senate,) which he was wont to solemnize with great joy, when the King sacrificed to God 300 oxen, and others also an innumerable company of sacrifices according to their abilities. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. ult.]

When Herod had found that in his absence, his people had received much damage by those thieves of Trachona, and seeing he could not subdue them because they were under the protection of the Arabians, neither could he digest this injury, wherefore entering Trachona, he destroyed their families, whereby they were the more incensed, (especially because they have a law by which they are commanded, not to suffer the slaughter of their families to go unrevenged.) Wherefore contemplating all dangers, they molested all Herods Country with continual excursions and driving and carrying away their goods. [id. lib. 16. cap. 13.]

Whenas Augustus would seem to lay down his principality, another ten years coming towards an end, he took it up again as though against his will: and making war upon the Germans, he sent Tiberius against them, but he himself staid at home. [Dion. lib. 55. pag. 551.] he gave money to the soldiers also, because they would have had Caius along with them, being then first trained up in military exercises. [ibid. pag. 552.]

Dionysius Halicarnassensis began to write the books of Roman Antiquities in the CXCIII. Olympiad Claudius Tiberius Nero and Cn. Calpurnius Piso being Consuls, as he shews in the preface to those books, who as he is accounted by Clemens Alexandrinus in lib. 3. cap. 1. amongst the Chronographers, so by Quintilian in lib. 3. cap. 1. he is reckoned amongst the Rhetoricians.

Herod sending to the presidents of Syria that were appointed by Cæsar, Saturninus and Voluminus (the agent) demanded that he might have the punishing of those thieves of Trachona, who by their incursions out of the confines of Arabia and Nabathæa, had often wasted his Country, they when they heard of this, being increased to the number of a 1000 began to make sudden invasion and to waste both field and villages, and cut the throat of all that fell into their hands, wherefore Herod demanded those thieves to be delivered over to him, and required the sixty talents that he had lent Obodas under Syllaus security, but Syllaus who had thrust Obodas from the government and now ruled all himself, denied that those thieves were in Arabia, and he deferred also to pay the money concerning which it was debated before Saturninus and Voluminus; at length it was determined by them that within thirty daies (pace both the money should be repayed, and the runaways of both Countries should be restored each to other, [Joseph. lib. 16. cap. 13.] Syllaus also swore by the fortune of Cæsar, before those presidents of Syria that he would pay the money within thirty daies, and also restore the fugitives to Herod. [ibid. cap. 16.]

After the time appointed was come, Syllaus unwilling to stand to the agreements, went to Rome: but Herod by the permission of Saturninus and Voluminus, who gave him leave to prosecute those obstinate people, entered Arabia with an army, and went in three dayes as far as they use to do in seven. And when he came to the Castle, where the thieves kept, he took it at the first assault: and demolished a fortress called Ræptu, without any more harme to the inhabitants of the Country. And when as a Captain of the Arabians came to their aid, they joyned battle: in which few of the Herodians, but there were killed 25 of the Arabians, with their Captain, and the rest were put to flight. Being thus revenged of the thieves, he brought three thousand Idumæans into Trachona to retrain the thieves committed there: and sent letters to the Roman Captains then being in Phœnicia, in which he certified them, that he had onely used the power they had granted them against those obstinate Arabians: and nothing else: which also, they making inquiry, found to be true. [ibid. cap. 14.]

But there were letters sent to Syllaus to sit to Rome, that related the matter cleane otherwise, aggravating every thing against their manner: by which Iyes Cæsar is so incensed against Herod, that he wrote to him menacing letters, because he had marched with an army out of his own kingdom, and would not so much as admit at first his Embassadors that were sent to plead his cause, and they again petitioning to be heard he dismissed them, without any thing done; [ibid. cap. 15.]

The Trachonites together with the Arabians taking hold of this occasion, did molest the Garrison of the Idumæans that Herod had set over them, which thing Herod being terrified by the anger of Cæsar, was compelled to bear. [ibid.]

Obodas the King of the Arabians (of Nabathæa) being dead, Aeneas succeeded him in the kingdom, who having changed his name, was called Aretas, Syllaus then being at Rome, endeavoured thorough false accusations to have him thrust from the kingdom, and to get the kingdom to himself, bestowing much money upon the Courtiers, and promising many great things to Cæsar, whom he knew to be offended with Aretas, because he durst venture upon the kingdom without his consent. [ibid.]

Caius and Lucius, the sons of Augustus by adoption, being brought up in the Principality, even out of that tender life were made more bold; inasmuch as Lucius the younger of the two, without any command entering the Theatre, where being received with a general applause, and increasing by this his boldness, durst ask, That the Consulship might be given to his brother Caius, he being not yet come to mans estate: which when Augustus heard he wished, that there might never such a necessity of the times happen to him as he had found; that the Consulship should be given to one that was not 20 years old: but when his son did earnestly desire this of him, he then said, That this Magistracy was to be undertaken of one, that could both take heed that he did not himself offend, and that could resist the desires of the people: at the length he gave the Priesthood to Caius, and leave that he might go into the Senate, and to sit with the Senators, both at the Playes and at Feasts. [Dion. lib. 55. pag. 554.] and also that both of them, not being yet seventeen years old, should be called Princes of youth, and designed Consuls, he most earnestly desired, but seeming to refuse, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 3.]

But that by some means he might make them more modest, and as it were private men, he granted to Tiberius the Tribunian power for five years; and gives him also Armenia, which had revolted after the death of Tigranes (that was made King by Tiberius) This being done to no purpose by Augustus, offended them both; them because they thought themselves contemned, and Tiberius because fearing their anger he went not to Armenia, but went to Rhodes, [Xiphil. & Zonaras. ex Dion.] under colour that he might study the Arts, but indeed that he might withdraw himself from both the sight and their actions. [Id. ibid. & in Excerptis. ab Henric. Vales. edit. pag. 662.] left his glory might dim the beginnings of the two rising young men, [Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 99.] for thus some thought: that Augustus his children being now grown to mans estate, he now quitted both the place, and as it were the possession of the second degree so long possessed by him, after the example of Marcus Agrippa, who went to Mytilene, Marcus Marcellus being now admitted to publick offices, that being present he might not seem either to withstand, or to detract from them, which account he gave, but a long time after. [Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 10.]

But there want not some who think he did this because of his wife Julia, whom he durst neither accuse, nor put away, and yet could endure her no farther. [Sueton. ibid. Dion. in Excerptis. pag. 662.] Others that he took it ill that he was not adopted Cæsar; others that he was sent thither by Augustus, because he had used some treachery towards his sons. [Id. ibid.]

Then also dissembling the cause of his intent, asked leave of Augustus who was father in law to him, both in respect of himself and his wife, [Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 99. Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 10.] Neither did he yield to his mother that humbly besought him, or his father in law complaining that he also was forsaken by the Senate; but yet they resolutely detaining him, he sat nothing in four dayes: at length having got leave to go, he went down presently to Otilia, not speaking a word to them that went with him, and kissing very few at the departing. [Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 10.] but yet at his departure, he brake open his will, and read it before his mother and Augustus, [Dion. in Excerptis. Valesii. pag. 665.]

From Otilia he sailed along the coast of Campania, where hearing of the weakness of Augustus, he stayed a little; but the rumour increasing, as if he tarried for an occasion of greater hope, he sailed to Rhodes almost in foule weather, [Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 11.] going his journey even like a private man, except that he compelled the

Phariss, to tell him a statue of Vesta, which he dedicated in the Temple of Concord. [Dion. in Excerptis, pag. 662.]

But being come to Rhodes, he contented himself with no great house there, and not much larger in the Country, he lived a most retired life: he walked sometimes into their places of exercise, without either Serjeant or pursuivant, and both giving and receiving courtesies from the Greeks, almost upon an equal account. [Sueton. ut supra.] Nevertheless, all Proconsuls and Lieutenants going into foreign Provinces, coming thither to visit him, always submitted their bundles of rods to him, although in this privacy, and professed that this retirement of his was more honourable than his living in the principality: [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 99.] and in that retirement he was a diligent Auditor of Theodorus the Gadarean, a Rhetorician, who desired to be called the Rhodian. [Quintil. lib. 3. cap. 1.]

There was a great conjunction of the Planets, and such an one as is wont to happen but once in 800. years.

Enas, who is called Aretas, the new King of the Arabians of Nabathea, sent letters and gifts to Caesar, and in them a Crown worth many talents: in his letters he accused Syllæus, as well for other crimes, as also that being a most wicked servant, he had poisoned Obodas, whose principality he had invaded, even whilst he was alive: but Caesar vouchsafed not so much as to hear his Embassadors, and also contemned his presents, and dismissed them without any thing done. [Joseph. lib. 16. cap. 11.]

Herod compelled by the mischiefs and insolencies of the Arabians, sent Nicholas Damascene to Rome, to see if he could get any justice from Caesar, by the mediation of his friends. [Id. ibid.]

The discord of Herod with his sons that he had by Mariamme, is greatly heightened by the artifices of Eurichus, a Lacedæmonian, (the same (except I be deceived) that followed 25. years before Anthony, as he fled from the battle of Actium, and now being entertained by Herod, and lodged at Antipater's house, he had insinuated himself into the favour of Alexander for the betraying of whom, when he had received 50 talents of Herod, he goes to Archelaus, the King of Cappadocia, and brags how he had reconciled Alexander into his father's favour again, for which having received money of him also, he returned into his own Country again, where, when he had used the like tricks, he was banished from Lacedæmon. [Id. ibid. cap. 10.]

Herod making inquiry into his sons, put to death, by the vehemency of tortures, many both of his own, and of his sons friends: neither yet found he any ill, but only some too free complaints of improvident young men, concerning their fathers immoderate cruelty, and of the dishonest casuistie of his giving ear to base pick-thanks, of the impiety and wicked deceits of their brother Antipater, and of the faction that was combined against them; and that they might free themselves from the mischief they were fain to have thought of flying to Archelaus, which thing they did not deny: nevertheless Herod, cast into prison, as being convicted of treason against their father, &c. said that he would punish them accordingly as his affairs went at Rome: and concerning this business he sent letters to Caesar by Volumnius, (the General of his army) as Joseph calls him, [lib. bell. 1. cap. 17.] and Olympius (his friend) whom he also commanded, that as they failed, they should touch at Elewia, a Town of Cilicia, and should expostulate with him, because he was a partner of their designs. [Ibid.]

At Rome Nicholas Damascene joyned himself to the Arabians that came to accuse Syllæus, professing that he was his accuser before Augustus, and not Herod's defender, least he should have been repulsed, as were others before him; and when he had laid open many of his crimes, he also added, that Caesar was circumvented by his lies in the cause of Herod: which when he had so openly disclosed, and had confirmed by certain and authentick records, Caesar having condemned Syllæus, remanded him into the Province, that he, when he had satisfied the debt, might be punished. [Ibid.]

From this time Augustus is reconciled to Aretas and Herod, and then received his presents to often rejected, and confirmed by his authority the Kingdom of the Arabians upon him. He advised Herod also by letters, that he should call a Council at Berytus, and joyning the prebends of Syria, with Archelaus the King of the Cappadocian, and other of his friends and noble men should determine concerning the whole business. [Ibid.]

In the Isle of Coos, many things are over turned by an Earthquake. [Ensch. Chronic.]

The Angel Gabriel (who had in time past foretold to Daniel the coming of the Messiah, by a definite number of Weeks) appeared at the right side of the Altar of incense to Zachary

Zachary the Priest of the court of Abia as he was offering incense in the Temple of the Lord, according to the custom of the Priests office; [Exod. XXX. 7, 8.] telling him that there should be born to him being now old, and to his wife Elizabeth, who was stricken in years, and barren, a son called John, a Nazarene, and the forerunner of the Lord, in the Spirit and power of Elias: which promise Zacharias not believing, is made dumb. [Luke. 1. 5, 22.]

The days of his ministry being finished, Zacharias returned home, and his wife Elizabeth conceived by him, and hid her (eleven months, saying; Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein he looked on me, to take away my reproach among men, [Ibid. 23, 24, 25.]

Herod having received Augustus his letters rejoiced exceedingly, both because he was returned into his favour, and for the true power granted him to do what he would with his sons, he conveyed by messengers all those that Caesar had appointed to Berythus, except only Archelaus, he kept his sons not far from the City, in Plaran a City of the Sidonians: there first of all Saturninus one that had been Consul, and had run through all honours, (spake his opinion, but moderated with circumstances, that indeed the sons of Herod were to be condemned, but not to be put to death. After him his three sons who were their fathers Lieutenants were of the same opinion. On the other side Volumnius pronounced that they were to be punished with death, who were so impious toward their father, whose opinion the major part followed. Then the King took them with him presently to Tyrus, whither also Nicholas arrived as he came from Rome, with whom he conferred concerning the cause of his sons, and commanded him to sail with him to Caesarea. [Joseph. lib. 16. cap. ult.]

Here when as a certain old soldier named Tiro (most sharply reprehended him for the wickedness determined towards his sons, and told him that he and 300 Caprains were of the same opinion, Herod commanded him to be cast into prison. Trypho the Kings Barber taking this occasion accused him and said, that he had been often solicited by Tiro that he should cut the Kings throat with his razor, as he was trimming him, and immediately both the Barber and Tiro and his son were tortured: who seeing his father so cruelly handled, that he might free him from the tortures, being unadvisedly merciful, accused him of intending to murder the King. Then Herod bringing thither 300 Caprains together with Tiro and his son and the Barber, accused them before the people, against whom the people throwing any thing that came next to hand, flew them every one. [Id. ibid.]

Alexander and Aristobolus were led to Sebaste, and there strangled by the fathers command: and their bodies buried in the Castle Alexandrian, where Alexander their Grandfather by their mothers side, and many of their Progenitors were buried. [Id. ibid. & lib. 1. bell. cap. 17. fin.]

Augustus having taken upon him the twelfth Consulship, brought Caius into the Court, being come to mans estate, and designed him Prince of Youth, and made him Priest of a Tribe, [Sueton. in O. A. A. cap. 26. & Zonar. ex. Don.] But that this Title of Prince was given him by all the Roman Knights, that gave him Silver Spears, Augustus threw in the brevity of his acts: where he mentions also the Consulship that was then decreed both to Caius and Lucius. In respect of doing me honour, the Senate and people of Rome designed them Consuls, they being yet but fifteen years old, that they might enter upon that office after five years time, to be reckoned from that day that they were brought into the Courts. Thus the Ancyran Marble in Gruer. Inscript. [pag. CCXXXI.] Whereas in another Roman Stone it is said, That the people created Caius Consul, being but fourteen years old, (where for created is meant designed; for at this time his fourteenth year was ended, and he was entered on his fifteenth.)

Antipater, his brethren being dead, intended also to remove his father, and whereas he knew he was hated by many in the kingdom, he endeavoured by bribes to get the good will of his friends, both at Rome and in Judea; but especially Saturninus the President of Syria, and Pheroras and Salome the brother and sister of Herod. [Joseph. lib. 17. cap. 1.]

Herod sent home Glaphira the widow of his son Alexander, to Archelaus her father the King of Cappadocia; giving her also a Dowry out of the Kings Treasury, for fear there should some controversy arise concerning it: and he took great care of the young children of Alexander and Aristobolus: which when Antipater took heavily, fearing that when they were come to age they would hinder his power, he plotted their destruction; and he so overcame Herod by his intercessions, that he would suffer himself to marry the daughter of Aristobolus, and his son the daughter of his Uncle Pheroras. [Ibid.]

Herod invited Zamaris a Babylonian Jew, and gave him a Country in Trachonis to inhabit, that he might be a guard to that Country against the eversies. He coming with 500 Horse, and an hundred of his kinsmen, erected divers Castles in divers places places about Trachonis, as also Bathyra, by which he gave security and safe conduct to the Jews that came from Babylon to the feasts at Jerusalem, against the thevries of the Trachonites and others. [ibid. cap. 2.]

Antipater working treason against his father, joynd his uncle Pheroras with him, and some of the Kings women that were most addicted to the sect of the Pharisees, except Salome, who constantly adhered to her brother Herod, the Pharisees were a crafty kind of people, arrogant, and enemies to Kings, whereupon whereas the whole nation were to swear fealty to the King and Caesar, they only would not swear; and they were above 6000. Who being fined by the King for this cause, the wife of Pheroras paid their fine for them, to whom in requital, because they were beleived to foretell things to come from their communications with God, they foretold, that it was decreed that the Kingdom should be taken from Herod and his children, and should be transferred upon her and her husband, and their children; these things Salome made known to Herod, and that they had solicited and corrupted many of his courtiers with bribes, in which fault having taken some of the Pharisees he put them to death, as principall authours of this advice, and with them the Eunuch Dagoas, and his darling Carus that was commended to him for his handfomencesse, and besides these whosoever he had found of his family that had conspired with the Pharisees. [ibid. cap. 3.]

Herod having convicted the Pharisees and punished them, called a councill of his friends, and before them begins an accusation against Pheroras his wife, and whereas Pheroras would not forsake her in favour of his brother, he torbad Antipater Pheroras his company. [ibid.]

Antipater that he might remove all suspicion of his father from him, he by his friends that lived at Rome, provided that he should by his father be sent immediately to Augustus. Which being done Herod sent him with great presents, and his will, in which he declared that Antipater should be King, but if he died then Herod his son by Mariamne the daughter of Simon the High Priest. [ibid. cap. 4.]

In the sixth month after John was conceived, the Angell Gabriell is sent by God to Nazareth in Galilee, to the most blessed Virgin Mary, that was betroathed to Joseph, of the same tribe with her namely of Davids stock, who having saluted her, declared unto her that she should bring forth the son of God, and should call his name Jesus, and she being more fully taught by the Angell of the admirable manner of her conception, to be performed by the power of the Holy Ghost, overshadowing her, with great faith laid, be it to the handmaid of the Lord, according to thy word. [Luke 1. 28. 38.]

Child being thus conceived, the mother of the Lord went into the hill Country with halt into a City of Juda, (viz. Hebron a City of the Priests situate in the mountains of Judea, [Job XXII. 10. 11.] where when she entered into the house of Zacharias the Priest and had saluted her cousin Elizabeth, the perceiving the child to spring in her womb, was filled with the Holy Ghost, and declared that Mary was blessed, which beleived, and confirmed that those things should be performed that were told her of the Lord: to whom for an answer the blessed Virgin, (imitating that song of Hannah, [1 Samuel II. 1.] rehearsed that divine hymn, My soul doth magnifie the Lord, &c. and Mary tarried with her about three months. [Luke 1. 39. 56.]

Syllau the Arabian going to Rome, but performing none of those things that were commanded him by Caesar, Antipater accused him before Caesar of the same crimes, whereof Nicolaus Damascene had before accused him; there was also present another accuser of him even Aretas (the King of the Nabatheans) objecting against him the murder of many honourable men committed by him against his will, but especially that of Sohemus, a man most famous in all verue, and there was objected against him the murder of Fabulus alio Caesars agent. [Joseph lib. 1. bell. cap. 18. & lib. 17. Antiq. cap. 4.]

Herod banished his brother Pheroras into his Tetrarchy, because he so obstinately persisted in the love of his wife, which he willingly did, swearing that he would never return till he heard of Herods death, so that a little after Herod falling sick and often sending for him, to receive some private instructions from him as he lay on his death bed, refused to come for his oaths sake. [Joseph lib. 1. bell. cap. 19. & lib. 17. cap. 5.]

When the time of Elizabeth was come that she should be delivered, she brought forth a son, who when he was to be circumcised the eighth day the standers by would have had him called Zachary, after his fathers name, but his parents signified that they would have him named John, and Zachary, the use of speech being restored, was filled with the Holy Ghost, and prophesied saying, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, &c. [Luke 1. 57. 68.] Joseph finding his betroathed wife Mary with child, was willin willing to put her away privily, but being warned of God in a dream, that he had conceived by the Holy Ghost, and should bring forth her Son Jesus, which should save his people from their sins, he taketh his wife. [Matth. 1. 18. 24.]

Pheroras falling sick, Herod his brother, beyond hope being recovered, came and visited him, and very kindly sought help for him, but he died within a few days after; whose body was brought to Jerusalem, and there buried by Herod, who honoured him with publick mourning. [Joseph lib. 1. Bell. cap. 19. & lib. 17. cap. 5.]

Two of Pharoras freed-men and most dear unto him, (who were Tapenites) declared unto Herod, how he had been killed with poison by Doris, the mother of Antipater; which villany when Herod inquired into, by fortune, he by little and little found out greater villanies, and manifest treasons of his son Antipater; how that Antipater going to Rome, had delivered a deadly poison to Pheroras, that was sent by Anphilus, one of Antipaters friends, out of Egypt, from Theudon, the brother of Doris, for to make away his father; that the suspicion of the Parricide should not lye upon the Sonne, being absent. [Id. lib. 17. Antiq. cap. 6.]

Herod upon Herod puts Doris, the mother of Antipater from the Pallace, and takes from her her Jewels, that were worth many talents: he also put from him his wife, another Mariamne, the daughter of the High Priest, as a partner of all these secrets, and blotted her son out of his Will, where he was appointed successeur: he also deprived his father in law of the High Priesthood, and instituted in his room Matthias, the Sonne of Theophilus, that was borne at Jerusalem. [Id. lib. 1.]

On the day of expiation, on which there is a solemn Fast of the Jews solemne, the new High Priest Matthias could not perform Divine Service, because he had suffered nocturnal pollution; wherefore Joseph, the Sonne of Eleazar was appointed to be his assistent and substitute, by reason of his alliance, and the same day he entered into the Holy of Holies. [Id. lib. 17. cap. 8.]

Bathyllus, the free man of Antipater coming from Rome, being tortured, confessed that he had brought poison, which he gave to his patroness Mother, and to Pheroras, that if the first were too weak, they should be sure to dispatch him with this. There came also letters from his friends, that lived at Rome, to the King, written by the persuasion of Antipater, in which Arcelaus and Philip, Herods sons, were accused, that they often rubbed up the score of the murder of Alexander and Aristobolus, and putted the misfortune of the innocent brethren for the young men were at that time at Rome to study, and now their father had commanded their return: whereupon he corrupted those friends with great gifts, that they might make them, who might be some hinderance to his hopes, suspected to his father, whereas he himself, when he wrote to his father concerning them, as it were excusing them, would impute their speeches to their age. [Idem lib. 17. cap. 6. lib. 1. Bell. cap. 20.]

There came forth a command from Augustus, that all the Roman World should be taxed, which taxing was first made, when Cicerus was Governour of Syria. [Luke II. 1.] Out of which a little book was made by Augustus, in which all the publick riches were contained, a how many Citizens, and Cities in Armes; what Navies, how many Kingdoms and Provinces, what Tribute and Customs there was, what necessary charges, and what Penitions. [Tacit. lib. 1. Annal. cap. 11.]

This here called by the Grecks Kurdai and Kupin is P. Sulpicius Quirinius, who had been Consul at Rome seven years before, of whom St. abas. lib. 1. pag. 569.] speaking of the Moesians, a people of Cilicia, These Quirinus overcame by famine, and took 4000. men, and distributed them into the neighbour Cities. And Tacitus, lib. 3. Annal. cap. 48.] He was a Judian Warour, and forward in all his charges, and had the Consulship under Augustus; of famous memory; then having wonne the Castles of the Homonadenians by assault, he obtained the Ensignes of Triumph. For it was ordained by Augustus himself, that Magistrates should not be sent into Provinces, as soon as they had laid down their honour. [Sweton. in Octavian. cap. 36.] But in the fifth year completely ended from their being Magistrates. [Dio lib. 53. pag. 505.]

Hercurion Quirinius obtaining the Proconsulate of Cilicias might be sent into Syria that was neerer; either as Consul with an extraordinary power, or as Caesars Governour with ordinary, and so he is yet holding the Proconsulship of Cilicia, and Sextius Saturninus of Syria: for we have often heard Volumus and Saturninus by Josephus in like manner called Agrippas, or Priests of Syria, when as Volumus was only Agrippas, (as we see him called in lib. 1. bell. cap. 17.) as a little after Quirinius

Quintilius Varus is made successeur to Saturninus in the Proconsular dignity. So nothing hinders but that Quintinus may be said to have succeeded, or rather to have been added to the office of administration of Cæsars affairs, as King Herod was, whom Josephus notes to be Antiochus Soter, the Governor of all Syria, [lib. 1. bell. cap. 15.] and was so constituted by Augustus that he was to be adjoined to the Governors; that all things should be done by his appointment, [lib. 15. Antiquit. cap. 13.] and so both will stand together, both that which Tertullian hath, [lib. 4. contra Marcion. cap. 9.] that there was a tax raised under Augustus in Judea, by Sentius Saturninus, and that that the words of the Evangelist do relate, that the same taxing was made, when Cyrenius or Quirinus, was governor of Syria, of whom he had rather make mention than of the government of Saturninus, because he would compare together this taxing, with another that was made by the same Quirinus, made ten years after, Archelaus being sent into banishment, declaring that of the two taxings, that was the first that was joyned with the Nativity of Christ.

And when this first taxing was acted, Joseph went up from Galilee, from the City of Nazareth into Judea, into the City of David, which is called Bethlehem, because he was of the house and lineage of David, that he might be taxed with Mary his wife, being great with child, [Luke II. 4, 5.]

The Seventh Age of the World.

JESUS CHRIST the Son of GOD, in the fulness of time was born of the most blessed Virgin Mary, at Bethlehem, [Matt. 1. 25. & II. 1, 5. Gal. IV. 4.] whom she rolled in swaddling-clothes, and laid in a manger, because there was no room in the Inn, [Luke, II. 7.]

The Nativity of our Saviour is revealed by an Angel of the Lord to Shepherds keeping their flock by night in the neighbour-fields, which word a multitude of the Heavenly Host receiving, prayed for glory to God, peace to the Earth, and good will to Men. The Shepherds making haste to Bethlehem, found Mary and Joseph, and the Child lying in the manger, and they published that that was told them concerning the Child, and they returned praising and glorifying God, [Luke, II. 8, 20.]

The Child is circumcised the eighth day after his Nativity; and his name is called Jesus, which was so declared by the Angel, before he was conceived in the womb, [Luke, II. 21.]

The Wilemen from the East, the Star being their guide, coming to Jerusalem, and there being taught that the Birth-place of Christ was Bethlehem of Judea, they went thither, and entering into the house which was shewed them by the Star that stood over it, they found the little Child and Mary his Mother, and falling down worshipped him, and having opened their Treasures, they offered unto him, Gold, Frankincense, and Myrrhe; then being warned of God in a dream, that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own Country another way, [Mat. II. 1, 12.]

The fortieth day after her delivery, Mary goeth to Jerusalem to the Temple, both that she might present him to the Lord, according to the Law of the First-borne, and also that she might offer for her self a pair of Turtle Doves, or two young Pigeons, (the being in that condition of poverty that she could not offer a Lamb) according to the Law of them that had lame in, [Luke, II. 22, 23, 24, 27. with Leviticus, XII. 2, 3, 4, 6, 8.]

When his Parents brought the Child Jesus into the Temple, to do for him after the custom of the Law, there came into the Temple Simeon of Jerusalem, to whom it was revealed by God, that he should not die before he had seen the anointed of the Lord: whom he took in his arms and praised the Lord, speaking prophecies both of Christ himself, and his Mother. In the same moment also, came Anna a Prophetess the daughter of Phanuel, she also openly acknowledged the Lord, and spake of him to all that looked for redemption in Jerusalem, [Luke, II. 25, 38.]

When Joseph and Mary had performed all things, according to the Law of the Lord,

Lord, they returned into Galilee, unto their own City Nazareth, [Luke, II. 39.]

The Angel of the Lord appearing to Joseph in a dream, warneth him of his flight into Egypt; that he might provide for the life of the Child, and escape the devices of Herod, Who being awakened, took the young Child and his Mother by night, and departed into Egypt, where he remained until the death of Herod, [Matt. II. 13, 14, 15.]

Herod thinking the young Child had been still at Bethlehem, that he might destroy him amongst the rest, killed all the children which were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old and under, according to the time (of the Star first seen in the East) that he had enquired of the Wilemen, [Matt. II. 16.]

Herod having received letters from Antipater from Rome, in which he signified to him, that having dispatched all his business according to his own mind, he would in short time return into his own Country again: writes to him back again dissembling his anger, that he should make haste, lest something might happen to him through his absence that he should not like of, and also modestly complaining of his mother, promised that he would remit all differences after his return, [Joseph, lib. 17. cap. 7.]

Antipater heard no news all this while either of the death of Pheroras, or of those things that were brought on foot against him, although there was seven months space between, the wickedness proved against him, and his return. [Id. lib. 1. bell. cap. 20. & lib. 17. cap. 6. fin.] For in his journey at Tarentum, he received a letter of Pheroras death, and in Cilicia those letters of his father, that recalled him back so hastily: and coming to Celeris, a Town of Cilicia, he began to doubt of his return, being extremely sorrowful, for the disgrace of his mother; but failing forwards, he came to Sebaste, a Port of Cæsarea; where being saluted by none, from thence he came to Jerusalem, [Id. lib. 17. cap. 7.]

It happened that Quintilius Varus, was the same time at Jerusalem, being sent successeur to Saturninus into Syria, and then called thither by Herod, to assist him with his counsel in his weighty affairs. As they were sitting both together, Antipater comes in, not knowing any thing, and in his purple garment that he was wont to wear, entered the Pallace: he being entered in, the guards at the gates suffered none of his followers to come in with him: as he was coming near, his father thrust him from him, reproaching him with the murder of his brethren, and intended poisoning of his father, telling him that the next day Varus should both hear and determine all things between them, [Id. ib.]

The next day Varus and the King sitting in judgement, his father himself first began the accusation, and left the prosecution and confirmation thereof to Nicholas Damascene his dear and familiar friend, and one that knew all the business, where when Antipater could not clear himself from the crimes objected against him. Varus commanded the poe that he had prepared for his father to be brought forth, which being given to a condemned man, killed him immediately. Which being done, Varus rose from the Council, and the next day went to Antiochia, because there was the chief Palace of the Syrians: but Herod presently cast him into prison, and signified so much by letters to Cæsar, sending also messengers, who by word of mouth, might certify him of the cruel treason of Antipater, [Id. ib.]

At the same time there were letters intercepted from Antipater to Antipater out of Egypt, together also with others from Rome to Antipater and Herod the King, written from Acme, the was a Jew born, and Chamber-maid to Livia, Cæsars wife; who being corrupted with good store of money by Antipater, sent a feigned letter to Herod, as if it had been written from Salome to her Lady against him: in which she desired that he might have licence to marry with Syllæus, (so wit, that Nabathæus, Herods sworn enemy) who a little after, for betraying of Julius Gallus, in the Arabian Expedition, and other crimes, had his head cut off at Rome, as Strabo writes in lib. 16. p. 782. Herod sent by his Embassadors to Cæsar, a copy of these letters, together with those of his own, against his son, [Id. ib.]

As the Embassadors hasten to Rome, Herod being taken with sickness, made his Will, leaving the succession of his Kingdom to his youngest son, Herod Antipas being exasperated against Archelaus and Philip, by false accusations of Antipater, [Id. ib. lib. 17. cap. 8.]

Judas, the son of Saripheus, and Matthias, the son of Margalothus, two of the most learned of the Jews, and best interpreters of the Law, after they knew that the Kings sickness was incurable, persuaded some young men that were their Scholars, that they should throw down the golden Eagle, that was set up by Herod, over the great gate of the Temple: for going up at noon day, they pulled and hewed down with their axes the Eagle, a great multitude being in the Temple and beholding it: which as soon as it was told the Captain, he comes with a strong band of Soldiers, and lays hold upon some forty of the young men together with their masters and brings them to Herod, these constantly denouncing what they had done, Herod commands them to be bound, and sent them to Jericho: then calling for the rulers of the Jews, he being brought into the assembly in a litter by reason of his weakness, he complains not so much of the injury done to himself as to God (as he said) who denying that it was done according to their order, he being something more mild to the rest, takes away the High-Priesthood from Matthias the High-Priest, and not altogether a stranger from this business, and made successeur to him Jazar the brother of his wife, (Mariamme the daughter of Simon the High-Priest) but he burned alive the other Matthias that was partner of this edition, and his companions, and that night the moon was eclipsed; [id. ibid.] which eclipse to have been on the 3 day of March three hours after midnight, the Astronomical table doth show.

Then Herod's disease began to grow worse, for he was inflamed with a slow fire, which was not perceived so much by the outward touch, as that it burnt up his very bowels, he had also the disease called the Bulimia, with a continual desire of eating, for the satisfying of which he was always eating. He was also continually tormented with ulcers in his bowels, and pains of the colic, his feet swelled with a moist plegm, and also his thighs, his members rotted and were full of worms, and also a filthy and no less troublesome Priapism, and also a most greivous stinke, and over and above he was troubled with convulsions, and difficulty of breathing. [ibid.]

And although he was so grievously tormented, that he seemed to every one that he could not be able to endure it, yet he hoped he should escape, being very careful to send for Physicians, and seeking medicines from every place he went also beyond Jordan, and went into the hot baths at Callirhoe, which running into the Alphatite lake, and besides the medicinal virtue are pleasant to drink, then by the advice of his Physicians being set in a bathing tub filled with oyl, he seemed to them to give up the Ghost, whereupon at the sudden crying out and bewailing him of his friends, he came to himself, and now seeing no more hope of recovery, he commanded 50 drachmes to be given to every soldier, and having used much liberality to his Captains and friends he returned again to Jericho. [ibid.]

When Augustus had heard that among the children that Herod the King of the Jews had commanded to be killed within two years old, that there was a son also of his own killed also. Said, It was better to be Herod's dog than his son. thus Macrobius relates. [lib. 2. Saturnal. cap. 4.]

Herod by an edict calls together from every place to Jericho, the most noble of the Jews, and shews them up in a place called the Hippodrom, giving command to his sister Salome, and her husband Alexas, that as soon as he was dead they should cause the soldiers to kill all those that were shut up, seeking only this, that the people should have cause of sorrow, otherwise they would rejoyce at the death of their King they came to much. [Joseph. lib. 17. cap. 8.]

Latters came from Rome, from the Embassadors that were sent to Caesar, in which was signified, that Acme was put to death by Caesar in a displeasure, because he had been of Antipater's conspiracy, and that Antipater himself was left to his fathers pleasure, either to banish him or to put him to death. Herod having heard these things is a little cheered, but presently being afresh tormented, and greedy of meat, he called for an apple and a knife to pare it, and when he thought to have stabbed himself, Achaius his nephew prevented him, and calling for help, held his right hand and a great sorrow with fear and tumult struck the whole palace, as if Herod had been dead. [Id. lib. 17. cap. 9.]

When Antipater perceived that noise, thinking certainly that his father had been dead, he began to temper with his keeper about letting of him out, promising him many things both in present and for the future when it lay in his power: which practise the Keeper told the King, who for very anger cried out, and although he was so near death yet raised himself up in his bed, and commanded one of his guards, to go presently and to put Antipater to death, and that he should be buried in the Castle of Hyrcanion without any honour. [id. ibid.]

Then changing his mind he made a new testament, for Antipas who before he had made his successeur of the Kingdom, he made him Tetrarch of Galilee and Petrea, but gave the Kingdom to Archelaus, and assigned to his son Philip the regions of Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Batanea and Panchada in the name of a Tetrarchy, to Salome his sister he gave Jamnia, Azotus and Phasaelis with 500000 drachmes to the rest of his kindred he gave money and yearly pensions. To Caesar he gave 10000000 of drachmes of silver, and all his plate as well gold as silver, and a great quantity of precious moveables. To Liria Caesar's wife and to some certain friends 5000000 of drachmes. [id. ib. cap. 10.]

Herod having ordered these things five daies after he had put to death Antipater, he

he died himself, having enjoyed the kingdom 34 years after he had killed Antigonus: but from the time that he was declared King by the Romans 37 years. [Id. ibid. & beth. 1. cap. ult.] about the 25 of our November: viz. the 7 of the month Cilius; which is therefore accounted a Joyful and Festival day, because in that day Herod died whilst all wife men: as Edward Lively a most learned man, noted in his Chronology, in מָוֶתוֹ מִכָּל נְשִׁים or the Volum. of the Fast.

Salome and Alexas, before the Kings death was known, sent all those home that were shut up in the Hippodrome, saying That he had commanded, that they should go into the Country and follow their businesses. [Joseph. lib. 17. cap. 10.]

Then was the Kings death declared, and all the soldiery called into the Theater of Jericho, and there they first read the Kings letters to the soldiers, in which giving them thanks for their fidelity and love to him, he desires them that they would do like for his son Archelaus, whom he had appointed to be his Succesor in the kingdom. Then Ptolemy the keeper of the Kings Seale, read his Testament, which he would not have to be ratified without Caesars content. Then was there a shout for joy that Archelaus was King, and the soldiers came flocking in with their Captains about him, and promised that they would keep the same faith and affection to him as they had done to his fathers praying God to prosper him in his Reign. Then was the Kings Funerals most royally prepared by Archelaus. [ibid.]

Herod being dead who fought the life of the young Child Jesus, the Angel of the Lord appearing to Joseph in a dream in Egypt, commanded that he should return with the young Child and his Mother into the land of Israel: who being awakened performs what was enjoined him, [Mat. II. 19, 20, 21.]

Joseph coming into the land of Israel, when he heard that Archelaus reigned in Judea in the room of his father Herod, he feared to go thither, and being warned of God in a dream, he departed into the parts of Galilee (the Tetrarchy of which his father Herod had given to Antipas by his will) and there dwelt in the City Nazareth: from whence Jesus took the name of Nazarene, [Mat. II. 22, 23.] and the Christians of Nazarenes, [Act. XXIV. 5.]

Herod's body is carried in a Funeral pompe 200 furlongs from Jericho, to the Castle Herodion, where he himself had appointed to be buried, [Joseph. lib. 1. bell. cap. ult. fin.] they going each day but eight furlongs (or an Italian mile) as may be gathered out of the 17 book of Antiqu. cap. 10. He was carried in a golden Litter, set with precious Stones, bearing cloth of Purple: his body also was clothed with Purple; then was a Diadem put on his head, and also over him a Crown of Gold, and a Scepter in his right hand: his son, and kinsfolke marched about the Litter: then followed the soldiers, marshalled according to their Nations, then 500 servants bearing perfumes, [Id. lib. 17. Antiquit. cap. 10.]

The ceremony of the Funerals being ended, Archelaus coming to Jerusalem, solemnized the mourning for his father seven daies, after the custom of the Jews; and at the end of the mourning, made a Funeral Banquet to the multitude. Then going up into the Temple, whosoever he went he was entertained with gratulatory acclamations: then ascending into an higher place, and sitting on a golden Throne, he graciously speaks unto the people, promising them very fairly; but wished said, That he would not take the name of King upon him, until Caesar had confirmed his fathers testament: and after the sacrifices were ended, he banqueted with his friends, [Id. ibid.]

Then there was a sedition raised by their friends, whom Herod had put to death for throwing down the golden Eagle; who then cast reproaches upon the dead King, demanding some of his friends also to be punished; and moreover desired that Joazar the High Priest might be turned out of the Priesthood: whom when Archelaus sought to appease, but in vain, the matter came to that pass, that about the Feast of the Passover, Archelaus sent the whole army against them, where 3000 men were killed by the Herodians about the Temple, the rest saving themselves in the adjoining mountains, [Id. lib. 17. cap. 11.]

Then Archelaus goes down to the Sea with his mother (Malthace a Samaritane) to sail unto Caesars, taking along with him Nicholas Damascene, and Ptolemy (Herods Agent) and many other of his friends: committing his family and kingdom to the trust of his brother Philip. Salome also the sister of Herod went with him, who took with her all her children. Others also of his kindred followed him, as it were to labour to get the regal dignity for Archelaus, but indeed to withstand him, and to accuse him for that fact that was committed in the Temple [ibid.]

As Archelaus was going with this company, he was met by Sabinus Caesars Agent in Syria that was posting into Judea to take charge of Herod's money, whom Varus the Governour of Syria opportunely meeting him, retained, for Archelaus had sent for him by Ptolemy. So that he in favour of the Governour, neither seized upon the For-treasures of Judea, nor sealed up the Kings Treasures, leaving all things in Archelaus his possession, till Caesar should determine something concerning them; and having promised these things, he hurried at Cæsarea: but after Archelaus left sail for Rome, and Varus was gone to Antioch, he then went to Jerusalem and seized upon the Palace: and then calling before him the Captains of the Castles, and the Kings Agents, demanded the accounts from them, and that the Castles should be delivered over to him; but the Governours receded not from Archelaus his commands, but kept all things as they were until the Kings return, pretending they kept them for Caesar, [Ibid.]

At the same time Antipas the son of Herod sailed to Rome, with a hope to get the kingdom for himself, to which he was excited by Salome, as if he were to be preferred before Archelaus, because he was appointed the Successor of the kingdom, by Herods first testament, which ought to be of more validity than the second. He carried with him also his mother (Cleopatra that was born at Jerusalem) and Ptolemy the brother of Nicholas Damascene one of Herods chief friends, and one that favoured his title: but especially Irenæus an Orator, and eloquent man, and one that was conversant in the Kings business, put him most forward to affect the kingdom. After Antipas was come to Rome, all the kinsmen fell to him, for he hated they bore to Archelaus; Sabinus also in the letters he wrote to Caesar, accused Archelaus, [Ibid.]

Archelaus by Ptolemy exhibited a petition to Caesar containing his own right, and the accounts of Herods money that was sealed up. Caesar when he had read the petition, and also Varus and Sabinus his letters, called his friends to council, giving the first place in the Council, to Caius the son of Agrippa, and his daughter Julia, whom he had now adopted; there then Antipater the son of Salome, a very eloquent man speaks against Archelaus, to whom Nicholas Damascene answered in his defence, who having finished his discourse, Archelaus fell down at Cæsars feet, whom he curiously raised up, and pronounced that he was worthy of the kingdom, pretending that he would do nothing unless it were prescribed in his fathers testaments, or that should be profitable for Archelaus; and seeing the young man confirmed in some hope by his promise, he determined nothing more at that time, [Ibid.]

Varus coming from Antioch to repress the tumults that were raised in Judea after Archelaus his departure, punished the authors of the sedition; and the sedition being for the most part appeased, he returning left one Legion in Jerusalem, that he might take away all occasion of innovation from the Jews: but as soon as ever he was gone, Sabinus Cæsars Agent there, having the command of those Forces that were left there, and now thinking himself equal to the people, he endeavoured to seize upon the Castles, and forceably to make search after the Kings coine, for his private lucre and covetousness sake. [Ibid.]

To the Feast of Pentecost came many thousands, not so much for Religion sake, as to be revenged of Sabinus, not onely from Judea which was more grievously offended, but from Galilee, and also from Idumæa, and from Jericho, and from Towns that were beyond Jordan: and fiercely assaulted Sabinus, dividing their Camp into three Brigades. Against whom the Roman souldiers valiantly opposing themselves, and killing many of them, entered the Treasure-house of the holy Treasure, a good part of which the souldiers stole, but there was openly brought 400 talents of that prey to Sabinus: him a company of the most warlike Jews besieged in the Palace; but Rufus and Gratus who had under their command 3000 men of the most warlike and stout of Herods souldiers joyn themselves with the Romans. For all this the Jews never the more slowly followed the assault, and undermining the walls, and exhorting their adversaries to depart, promising them quarter; whose liberal offer Sabinus (suspecting, would not withdraw his souldiers, still expecting succour from Varus, [Ibid.]

In this state of things, there were divers other tumults raised in Judea in divers other places; because the Nation had not a King of their own that might continue the multitude in their duty by wholesome laws. For 2000 men, who had served under Herod, but then dismissed to live at home, assembled themselves together, first upon those of the Kings faction, against whom Archelaus Herods Nephew, and General for the King, made head; and not daring to meet them in a place of equal advantage, as being old and expert souldiers, he defended himself and his party (as well as he could) in inaffence and places of difficult access. [Ibid.]

Judas (the son of Ezechias that arch-thief, who in former time was with so much labour overthrown by Herod) having gathered a Band of desperate fellows at Sephoris, a City of Galilee, made incursions into the Kings Dominion; and having taken the Kings Armory, he armed all his souldiers, and seized also upon the Kings Treasure in those places: whereupon he began to be terrible to the Inhabitants: he spoiled all that fell into his clutches. He aspired also to the kingdom, not by lawful means, of which which he was wholly ignorant, but by a liberty to do injury, [Ibid.] For whereas the word of the Hebrews, is the same with the word of the Syrians, from whence comes Judas and Thaddæus, [Luke. VI. 16. with Mark III. 18.] And much rather Theudas, the same name plainly comes: This Judas seems to be no other than Theudas, of whom [Acts. V. 36.] Gamaliel speaks: Before these times rose up Theudas, boasting himself to be some body, to whom a number of men, about 400, joyned themselves, who were slain, and all as many as obeyed him, were scattered and brought to nought.

Simon also, a Servant of King Herods, a man otherwise esteemed among all men, for his comeliness, stature, and strength, durst venture upon the Crown; and being attended by a mighty company, and proclaimed King by them, who were an unbridled multitude, persuaded himself that he was fit to be a King, rather than any other. He began his Kingdom by plundering and burning the Kings Palace at Jericho; and then burning other Palaces, and giving the plunder to them of his own faction: he had also done more licentious pranks, if he had not been speedily prevented: for Gratus, the Captain of the Kings Souldiers, who then followed the Roman party, marched with his forces against Simon, where, after a fierce conflict, they on the other side of Jordan fighting in disorder, and rather with courage than skill, were overcome. Gratus also took Simon, as he was flying through a narrow passage, and cut off his head. So Josephus, [see supra.] For Tacitus refers this rather to Varus, in the 5 lib. of his History, [cap. 5.] writing thus of this Simon. After the death of Herod, one Simon makes himself King, without so much as looking for Cæsars consent, but he is punished by Varus, the Governour of Syria.

At Amathus, also by Jordan, a royal Palace of the Kings, was burnt by such a rabble of men as Simon had. Athronges also, an obscure Shepherd formerly, and onely famous for his huge stature and strength: he also took upon him the regal dignity. He had four brothers that were of like stature and strength, upon whom, as his Lieutenants, he gave charge of the multitude that came flocking to him, when there was any wars. He himself wearing a Crown, did consult what was to be done, but he kept the sole command in his own hands. The power of this man endured long, (for he was not a King for nought) until he was brought under the power of Archelaus, being returned from Rome. [Joseph. lib. 1.7. cap. 12.]

Athronges his cruelty reached most especially against the Romans, and the kings party, for he hated them alike. His forces surprised a Cohort about Emmaus, as it was carrying Victual and Ammunition to the army, and killed with their Darts Arius, a Centurion, with 40 of his stoutest Foot: the rest looking to be served no better, Gratus coming with the kings souldiers, rescued, but there left the dead bodies. [Ibid.]

Quintilius Varus knowing the danger that Sabinus was in by his letters, fearing the utter overthrow of the third Legion, he takes with him the two others, (for at the utmost there were but three in all Syria) and four Troops of Horse, and the aides of the Kings and Tetrarchs, and hasten into Judea, to succour the besieged, having commanded those that were sent before, to meet him at Ptolemais, and passing by the City of the Berythians, he receiveth 1500 Auxiliaries from them. Aulus also the Petrean, being a friend to the Romans, even for he hated he bare to Herod, lent him good store both of Horse and Foot. [Ibid.]

After all the army was come together to Ptolemais, Varus delivered part of it to his son, and to one of his friends, to march against the Galileans, that bordered upon Ptolemais: who entering the Country, put all to flight that durst make head against him, and took the City Sephoris; and having told all the inhabitants at an outcry, he set the City on fire. [Ibid.]

Varus himself went towards Samaria with the army, but did no harm to the City, because he knew it had not been wrapt in the sedition; but he pitched his Camp in a certain Village, that was called Aras, which was the possession of Ptolemy: this the Arabians burnt, hating his friends, for he hated they bare to Herod. Then marching on, they came to Sampho, which the Arabians first spoiled, and then burnt, although it was well fortified: in all that march they put all to fire and sword, but Emmaus was burnt by the command of Varus, in revenge of his Souldiers that were there slain, but the inhabitants had first forsaken it. [Ibid.]

Then when they came nigh to Jerusalem, the Jews which besieged the Romans on that side, as soon as ever they saw the army approaching, being affrighted, fled, and gave over the assault they had begun: but those of Jerusalem being grievously reproved by Varus, excused themselves, that the people indeed were gathered together in regard of the feast, but that the war arose not with their consent, but by the boldness of the strangers that came thither; and already there had gone out to meet Varus, Josephus, a Nephew of King Herods, Gratus and Rufus with their Souldiers, and the Romans that had sustained the siege: but Sabinus would not come in fight, but stealing, ing privately out of the City, hasted unto the seaward. [Ibid.]

Then Varus sending part of his army throughout all the Country, fought out the authors of this sedition, whom having found he punished, some as guilty, and some were let go free: but there were about 2000 crucified for this cause. After this he dismissed his army, of which he had no more use: and those also, who contrary to his mind, had committed many outrages for mere lucre sake. And hearing that there were 1000 Jews gathered together, he hastens to apprehend them: but they not daring to stand the blow, yielded themselves by Achabius his advice. Varus then pardoned the common people for their sedition, but sent the ring-leaders to Caesar, and so all things being reduced to peace, he left the same Legion in Jerusalem in Garlson, and so returned to Antioch. [Ibid.]

Malhace, the mother of Archelaus, dyed of a sickness at Rome. [Ibid.]

Caesar having received Varus his letter, concerning the revolt of the Jews, he pardoned the rest of the Captains of the seditions, and onely punished some of King Herods kinsmen, because that neither for kindred sake, nor yet for justice sake they had abstained from rebellion. [Ibid.]

There came at the same time, by Varus his permission, an Embassie of the Jews, desiring that they might live after their own laws: the Embassadors were about 5040 whom there journeyed themselves about 8000 Jews that dwelt at Rome. When therefore Caesar had called a Council of his friends and chiefe Citizens into the Temple of Apollo, which he had built to his mighty charge: thither came the Embassadors, a multitude of the Jews following them, and Archelaus came also with his company. Philip also was there, who came by Varus his advice out of Syria, both that he might be an advocate for his brother, to whom Varus wished well, and also that in the division of Herods Kingdom, he might get some share. The Embassadors therefore having leave to speak, they began their discourse from the accusation of Herod and Archelaus, and then desired that they might have no more Kings, but that the form of the Common-wealth might be changed, and be annexed to Syria, and that they might obey the Governours sent them from Rome: to which objections, when Nicholas Damascen had answered both for Herod that was dead, and for Archelaus that was present, Caesar brake up the council. [Ibid.]

A few daies after, Caesar declared Archelaus not King indeed, but made him Lord of half part of that dominion that was left him by his father Herod, but promised him a Kingdom, if he behaved himself as might deserve a Kingdom: to him belonged Judea and Idumea, and besides these Samaria, to which by the command of Caesar, a fourth part of their tribute was remitted, because that they kept themselves in peace, when the rest were in sedition, in his government these Cities were comprehended, the Tower of Straton, Sebaste, Joppa, Jerusalem: for Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon were Cities which followed the lawes of Grecians, for which cause Caesar had dismissed them and annexed them to Syria. Yet there accrewed to Archelaus 600 talents out of his own dominion. [Id. ibid. cap. 15.]

Caesar divided the other half of Herods dominion to two other, two of Herods sons, to Herod Antipas befall Galilee, with the little County of Petrea, (but a most fertile one and lieth beyond Jordan, between the two lakes of Tiberias and Asphaltites,) the yearly revenue of which were 200 talents, to Philip he befall Batanea, Trachonitis and Auranitis, with a certain part of the palace of Zenodorus, (as they call it) which paid yearly 100 talents, to Salome also beside the Cities that were left her by her brother Jambia Azotus and Phasaelis, and half a million of silver, Caesar gave her a place in Acalon, the also received from the places that were subject to her sixty talents, and dwelt in the dominion of Archelaus: the rest of Herods kindred received what was bequeathed by his testament, also two of Herods daughters that were virgins besides what their father left them, received from the bounty of Caesar a quarter of a million of silver, and were married to the sons of Pheroras, yea and all the Kings legacy amounting to the sum of 1500 talents he gave to his sons, keeping for himself but a few moveables, not so much for the value, as for the memory of his friend. [Id. ibid.]

Thus the children of Herod governed the Nation being thus restrained in a three-fold division, saith Tacitus [lib. 5. cap. 9.] to whom Strabo is to be added, writing thus of his children, Some of them he put to death himself, as being assailed by their treachery, others at his death he left his successors, assigning to every one his portion. Caesar also highly honoured Herods children, and his Sister Salome, and Berenice the daughter of Salome.

A certain young man, a Jew of mean parentage, brought up in Sidon, with a Roman Education, that resembled Alexander the son of Herod in the face, feigned himself to be he, who was delivered from death with his brother Aristobulus by the means of a certain friend of his keeper, being induced to feign this by a certain cunning impostour, that was very well acquainted in Herods palace, being instructed by this fellows cunning and deceits, when he had failed into Crete, he persuaded all the Jews that came in conference with him this thing was so, and having got store of money from them, he failed into the Island Melus, where he got huge store of money under pretext that he was of the Kings flock, and now hoping that he should recover his fathers Kingdom, he hasted to Rome, his friends accompanying him, and when he had failed to Puteoli, he was there likewise received with the same favour by the deceived Jews, and as he was coming to Rome, all the multitude of the Jews that lived there came out to meet him, when this news was brought to Caesar, he sent thither Coladus one of his freemen that was very well in former time acquainted with the young men, commanding him that he should bring Alexander into his presence, which thing he did; but was no wiser than the rest in knowing him, but, yea he did not deceive Caesar, who sent this false Alexander when he had confided his imposture to the galiles because he was of a strong body, and caused the other that induced him to this fraud to be put to death. [Joseph. lib. 17. cap. 19.]

Archelaus being returned into his government in Judea, takes away the Priesthood from Joazar, the son of Boethus (or his grandchild by his son Simon) accusing him that he had favoured the seditions, and placed that dignity upon his brother Eleazar. [Id. ib. cap. 15.]

Augustus brought his son Lucius (in his 17. Consulship) into the Court. [Sueton. in cap. 26.] conferring the same honours upon him that he had conferred three years before upon his brother Caius, which the coins do testify, in which were the Effigies of Caius and Lucius, with Bucklers and Spears, with this inscription. C. L. C. & S. A. RES. AUGUSTI. F. COS. DES. PRINCIPES. JUVENT. (i. e.) Caius and Lucius Caesars, the Sons of Augustus, designed Consuls, Princes of youth.

In the same XIII Consulship, he shews in a Monument of Ancyra, that he gave 60 pence to the common people that received corn of the publick, adding withall, that they were not little above 200000, which very thing is also found in Xiphiline, in his collections out of Dio, unless that for 60 pence, which the Greeks call drachmes, the Latine interpreter put 240 pence, I know not by what incogitancy.

Augustus himself and Gallus Caninius being Consul, satisfied the minds and eyes of the people of Rome, with shews of combats with their swords and sea-fights, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 100.] with Hieronymus in Chronico. these shews being exhibited he brought water into the Cirque, in which there were thirty crocodiles killed. [Xiph. ex Dio.]

He exhibited also a naval fight, following the ground about Tiber, in that place where afterward was Caesars Grove. [Sueton. in Octavio, cap. 43.] The length of which place he hollowed, was 1800 foot, and the breadth 200, in which 30 beaked ship, and many Gallies, and lesser hoyes combated, as in the Breviary of his doings, graven in the Marble of Anoyra, Augustus himself shews of this sea fight, as but newly set forth, Ovid makes mention of this in the first book of his Art.

Quid modo, cum belli navalia imagine Caesar

Persidus induxit Cecropidaeque rates?

Nempe ab utroque mari juvenes, ab utroque puella

Veneret, atque ingens orbis in urbe fuit.

What, Caesar when like a sea-fight by land,
Made th' Persian and Cecropian beaks the land
To ride? He brought both men and maids from th'main,
And made the City all the World retain.

There was occasion of business to Augustus in the East from the Armenians, he intending his plaies at Rome, Pompeius had only accustomed them to this only kind of servitude, that they should receive their Governours from Rome, but now they had expelled Artarades (or Artabazes) whom Augustus had set over them upon this title, and had substituted Tigranes in his place, and for the defending of this revolt, they called the Parthians to their aid, and so Armenia withdrawing it self to them, and the Parthians leaving the alliance of the Romans, laies hold on Armenia. [Florus lib. 4. cap. 12. Velleius, Paternulus, lib. 2. cap. 100. Tacitus, Annal. lib. 2. cap. 3. Dio. in Zonaras & excerptis a Fauto. Ursino Edit. legat. 39. Suetonius, Rufus in breviario.]

Augustus brings Caius and Lucius as yet very young into some charge in the commonwealth, and sent them about the provinces and armies, they being designed Consuls,

Consuls, [Sueton, in Ottavio, cap. 64.] Whence we read in Velleius Paterculus, [lib. 2, cap. 101.] That Caius went about the Provinces (ad fidendum) to settle them, where Baetus Rhenustius thinks it should be read (ad sedandum) to quiet them; and Justus Lipsius thinks (ad usendum) to visit them. And that this is the best reading, that place of Dion shews, in the collections set forth by Henricus Valelius, [pag. 665.] "Caius Caesar going about as they were wont to do in peace, viewed the Legions that were incamped by the River Ister; for he had never any command in the wars: not that there was not any war at that time, but because he had learned the arts in peace and security, while the dangers of the war were committed to others management."

At Rome in the very year that Augustus set forth the Shews of the Combatants both at land and sea, there brake out a filthy and horrible disaster in his own house; for his daughter Julia altogether unmindful either of the greatness of her father or husband, left nothing undone in luxury and lust that it was possible for a woman to do or suffer; for she measured the greatness of her fortune by her liberty in sinning, accounting every thing lawful that pleased her, [Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2, cap. 100.] Yea she came to that height of lasciviousness, that she kept her mighty feastings in the very Courts of Justice, abusing those Courts with lascivious acts in which her father had made the law against adulteries. Whereupon her father was so enraged that he could not contain his anger within his own house, but published these things, yea, and communicated them with the Lords of the Senate, [Seneca, de Beneficiis, lib. 6, cap. 32. Dio, in Xiphil. epitome, & Excerptis, Valefii, pag. 665.] only he was not present, but in a note that was read by the Questour, made the thing known to the Senate. He kept himself also from any company a long time for very shame; he was thinking also of putting his daughter to death, [Sueton, in Ottavio.] At last she was banished into Pandataria an Island of Campania: her mother Scribonia of her own accord accompanying her in her banishment, [Vellei. Patercul. & Dio, in supra.] who being divorced from Caesar that very day in which she was delivered of her, L. Martius, and C. Sabinus, being Consuls, [Dio, lib. 48, pag. 377.] to wit, the year of the Julian account, 4675. So that Julia was 38 years old at that time, and that she was not younger than that age, we understand out of Macrobius, [lib. 2, Saturnal, cap. 5.]

Tiberius being in Rhodes, and hearing that his wife Julia was condemned for her lusts and adulteries, and that a divorce was sent her in his name by the command of Augustus, although he was glad at heart, yet he thought it his duty, as much as in him lay, by frequent letters to beg him that he would forgive his daughters, and that he would grant her, although she had deserved very ill, yet whatsoever he had given her, [Sueton, in Tiberio, cap. 11.]

When Augustus heard that the Armenians were revolted, and that they were aided by the Parthians, he was grieved at it, and doubted what to do; for he could not manage the war himself because of his old age; and Tiberius had withdrawn himself, neither durst he trust any of the more powerful Citizens: Caius and Lucius were young and unfit for such matters; but yet necessity compelling him, he chose Caius, making him Proconsul, and marrying him, that by this means he might seem to have more honour, and more friends to give him counsel, [Zonar. ex Dione.] His wives name was Lollia Paulina, [Sueton, in Claudio, cap. 20.] either the daughter or niece of Marcus Lollius, [Plin. lib. 9, cap. 35. Solin. cap. 51.] Whom he would have to be either Governour or Moderatour of Caius his youth, [Vellei. Patercul. lib. 2, cap. 102. Sueton in Tiberio, cap. 12.]

When he was providing for this Expedition, Ovid wrote paratissimus, in his first book; adding this to the mention of the Sea-fight that was but newly ended.

*Ecce parat Caesar domito quod desuit orbi
Addere: nunc Orientis ultime noster erit,
Parthe dabitur pennis: Crassi gaudete sepulcri,
Signaque barbarica non bene passa manus,
Hicor adeat, primisque duces profectus in annis;
Bellaque non puero tradat agenda puer.*

Caesar prepares with courage to subdue
Of the whole World th' only unconquer'd crew;
Now must the Parthian by him overcome,
Receive chastishments, and observe his doom.
Rejoice you buried Crassians, what you lost,
Revengefully is taken to their cost:
By one, though Captain young, yet shews the World,
Such high achievements cannot be controul'd.

Adding

Adding a little after:

*Auspicio annique parvis puer arma movebit;
Et vinces annis auspicioque patris.
Tale rudimentum tanto sub nomine debes;
Nunc juvenum princeps, deinde future senum.*

With fathers fate and gravity renew'd,
Thou fighting shalt with victory be crown'd:
Such expectation doth thy name obtain,
Though now of young, a Prince of old thou'lt reign,

He that was so ill a Prophet in conjecturing what should come to pass, was not much out of the way in setting down the just year of Caius his age. For his father Augustus was nineteen years old when he gathered his army: as it hath been shewed before out of the Ancien Marbles: and Caius was now entered into the nineteenth year of his age, when he provides for the Armenian and Parthian war, so that he was Commander to war just at the same age that his father had been.

The Emperor Augustus sent before Dionysius a most excellent Geographer into the East, to make a Commentary of all things, for his elder son that was to go into Armenia, about the affairs of Parthia and Arabia: as we read in Pliny, [lib. 6, cap. 27.] Whether it was that famous Dionysius whose Periegesis is extant in Greek Verse, or Dionysius the son of Diogenes of whom Marcianus Heracleota in his first book of Periplos, saith, that he set forth the dimension of the Earth.

That Caius Caesar had Armenia for his Province, saith Tacitus, [lib. 2, Annal, cap. 3, lib. 3, cap. 48.] That he was sent into Syria, saith Velleius Paterculus, [lib. 2, cap. 101.] That he was made Governour of the East, saith Suetonius, [in Tiberio, cap. 12.] That he was sent by Augustus to order the Provinces of Egypt and Syria Orosius, [lib. 7, cap. 3.] Pliny in the end of the 27 chapter of the sixth book, citeth Volumes of King Iuba written to the same Caius concerning the Expedition into Arabia, and in the following chapter adding, that Caius had only an eye upon Arabia, but never made any Expedition thither.

As soon as Phraates the King of the Parthians heard of the warlike provision that Caius made against the Barbarians, with an Apology for those things that were done, and desiring peace: to whom Caesar answering by letters, commanded him to leave Armenia; but Tigranes at that time sent no Embassie to him, [Dio, legat, 39. in Excerptis, ab Orsin, edit.]

Tiberius, the time of his Tribuneship being over, at length confessed that he by his retirement went only to shun all suspicion of envy between himself and Caius and Lucius. He requested, that seeing there was no danger concerning that business, they being grown men and next in authority to the Emperor, that he would give him leave to see again his alliances, whom he had a great desire to see: but this would not be granted, and he was moreover warned, that he should lay aside all care of them, whom he had left so desiriously, [Sueton, in Tiberio, cap. 11.]

Hetarted therefore at Rhodes against his will, scarce obtaining so much as his mothers intreaties, that to cover the ignominy he might be there as a Lieutenant to Augustus. Neither lived he only a private life, but in danger and fear, lying hid in the midst of the Island, to shun the services of them that failed by, [Id. ibid, 12.]

Caius going to the Armenian war, Tiberius crossed over to Chius to present his service to him, purging himself of all suspicions, and was very humble not only to Caius, but also to his followers, [Xiphil. & Zonar. ex Dione.] although Velleius flattering Tiberius as he doth always, writes that Caius gave all honour to Tiberius as his superior, [lib. 2, cap. 101.] Suetonius writes that Tiberius went not to Chius, but Samos, for to see his son in law Caius, and that he found him much alienated from him thorough the false accusations of Marcus Lollius, [in supra, cap. 12.]

He came also into suspicion thorough some Centurions of his allowance, who going from the meeting to the Camp again, seemed to have given doubtful commands to many, and which might tempt the minds of many to innovations; of which suspicion being certified by Augustus, he continually desired of him that he would send one to him, of what rank never to be an Overseer of his words and deeds. He left off also his usual riding, and his other martial exercises, and went in his coat and shoes, laying aside his Country habit: and in that habit lived he at Rhodes two years, every day more contemned and more hated, [Sueton in Tiberio, cap. 12.]

Caius

Caius passing by Judea, scorned to worship at Jerusalem, which Augustus, as soon as he knew of from himself much commended. Suetonius relates this, [in Obs. cap. 93.] and of him Orosius, [lib. 7. cap. 3.] adding that Caius coming out of Egypt, passed by the borders of Palestine.

Zonaras relates out of Dion. That Caius coming from thence into Syria, did nothing worthy fame. Velleius Paterculus saith, That he behaved himself variously, that there wanted not matter for any that would either praise him or dispraise him. [lib. 2. cap. 1. &c.] But that through the greatness and majesty of the Roman name, he quieted all things, saith Sexus Rufus in his Breviary.

Quintus being returned to Rome, married that generous woman Lepida, intended sometime for wife for Lucius, and to be daughter in law to Augustus, whom yet after twenty years (C. Marcus Valerius Messala, and Marcus Annius Cora being Consuls) in the year of the Per. Julian, 4713, he divorced, accusing her that she had prepared poison for him. [Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 49. with Tacit. lib. 3. Annal. cap. 23. &c.]

When Augustus in those forementioned letters had plainly called him Pharsites, not calling him King, he was not a whit terrified, but proudly writing back again, and calling himself King, called Augustus nothing but Cæsar. [Dio. in Xephilin. & Legat. 99. Orsin. edit.] But when he knew that Caius was come into Syria, and suspected that for the hatred his subjects bore him, things would not be quiet at home, he made a peace with Caius, upon this condition, That he should leave off pretensions to Armenia. [Xiphilin. ex Dion.] From whence it is read in the seventh book of Eutropius, That Augustus received Armenia from the Parthians. And in the Chronicle of Eusebius, it is said that Caius Cæsar made peace with the Parthians.

When Artabazes, or Artavaldes, was dead of a disease, Tigranes sent presents to Augustus, for joy that his enemy was taken away, and not writing himself King, begged the Kingdom of him. Augustus moved with these things, and fearing the Parthian war, both respects of his presents, and commands him with some hope to go into Syria to Caius. So Dion in Excerptis legat. a Fulvio. Ustin. Edit. Sexus Rufus in Breviary. saith, That the Armenians that were then stronger than the Parthians, yielded themselves to Caius: and if you will hear forwards, The Armenians being joined with the Parthians, are easily overcome by Caius Augustus his help. The Armenians thinking it more profitable to be reconciled to the friendship of the Romans, and to live in their own Country, than to join with the Parthians, lose their Country, and have the enmity of the Romans.

The first year of the Vulgar Christian account, of which we now reckon this 1653, begins here, in which Caius Cæsar being twenty years old, five years after he was brought into the market-place, was Consul in the East, as Pignus in his Annals shews, out of a Marble Table of Naples and Anagna.

This year also Tiberius lived at Rhodes a banished man, under colour of leading a solitary life, for thus Tacitus rightly censures of it. [Annal. lib. 1. cap. 4.] Whereupon one in a familiar banquet, mention being made of him, promised Caius, that if he would bid him, he would sail presently to Rhodes, and bring him the head of that banished man, through which, not to much fear, as danger, he was compelled to desire his return by his own and his mother: (of Livia) most earnest prayers. But Augustus was determined to do nothing concerning this business, but according to the pleasure of Caius. [Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 13.]

When Augustus, his Chimerical year being past, solemnized his birth day of 64 years, on the ninth Kalends of October, he wrote this Epistle to Caius. All hail my Caius, my chiefest delight, whom in good faith I always desire when thou art from me, but especially on such days as this is; my eyes always long for Caius, whom wherever thou wert, I hope that being merry and in health, thou dost solemnly keep my sixty fourth birthday: for thou seest that we have past the sixty third year, the common Chimerical of all men: and I pray the gods, that for the rest of my life that remaineth, I may lead in an happy estate, for the Common wealth, you being in health, and quiting your selves like men, and succeeding my place. Out of a book of the Epistles of Augustus to Caius, Aulus Gellius hath preserved this in Noctibus Atticis, lib. 15. cap. 7.

Caius went to a conference with the King of the Parthians, in an Island that the river Euphrates makes; each having the like number with them, the Roman and the Parthian army standing one on this side the other on that side, first the Parthian was scalded by Caius on the Roman shoar, and then Caius by the Parthian on the Parthian shoar, which fight Velleius Paterculus writes that he happened to see when he first began to pay, being Tribune of the soldiers, [lib. 2. cap. 101.]

At that time the anger of Caius Cæsar divulged the perfidious, fickle and cunning counsels of Marcus Lollius, which were declared unto him by the Parthian, [id. ibid. cap. 120.]

cap. 101.] for being defamed for taking bribes of the Kings, and for robbing all the Countries of the East, he forbad him his friendship: although his own wife the daughter or niece of this Lollius is said to have gained a gown beset with pearls, valued at 400 Sesterterium's, [Plin. lib. 9. cap. 35. Sulin. cap. 55.] but by how much Caius was the more offended with Lollius, by so much the more he shewed himself gentle and exorable to his father in law Tiberius. [Sueton. in Tib. cap. 13.]

The death of Lollius which was within few days after, Velleius Paterculus, who in those places professeth he knoweth not whether it were by chance, or voluntary, although Pliny and Solinus affirm that he died by poison taken; Velleius saith that all men did as heartily rejoice at this mans death, as the City mourned, that Censorius died a little after in those Provinces, a man born to deserve all mens friendship. [lib. 2. cap. 102.] It seems that C. Marius was this Censorius, that offered the request of the Jews of Cyrene and of Asia to Augustus, in Josephus, [Antiquit. lib. 16. cap. 101.]

Quintinus is made Governour to Caius Cæsar, in the room of Lollius, who served Tiberius, living at Rhodes; which Tiberius himself did acknowledge after his death in the Senate, commending the services of Quintinus towards him, and accusing Lollius, as author of the ill will, and difference between him and Caius Cæsar. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 3. cap. 48.]

At Caius his permission, Tiberius is recalled, but with condition, that he should bear no office in the Common-wealth. [Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 13.]

Tiberius was himself very skillful of that divination that is taken from the stars, he had also Thrasyllus, a Mathematician in his company, who seeing a ship sailing towards them, a great way off, which brought the news from Livia and Augustus of his return, affirmed that it brought some joy to him, when as truly, because things happened a little hardly to him, and against Thrasyllus his predictions, he had intended at that very time as they walked together, to throw him headlong into the sea, as one that was false to him, and knew his secrets. [Id. ibid. cap. 14. Xiphilin. ex Dion.]

Tiberius therefore having staid seven years at Rhodes, in the eighth year after his departure, returned into his Country, Publius Vinius being Consul, Lucius and Caius being yet alive. [Sueton. ut supra. Velleius Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 99. & 103.] And being returned to Rome, his son Drusus being brought into the market-place, he presently went from Pomp.ys house, in the street Carinat, to Mecenas his gardens in Esquilæ: he wholly gave himself to ease, doing some private courtesies, but not meddling with any publick offices. [Sueton. ut supra. cap. 15.]

Then Lucius, as he was about to go to the armies in Spain, died at Marcellis of a sudden death, being a woman of no fame, twenty two months before his brother Caius his death. [Florus, lib. 4. cap. ult. Vellei. Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 102. Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 3. Sueton. in Octavio. cap. 65. Zonar. ex Dio.]

After Lucius his death, Augustus would have adopted Tiberius; but he vehemently refused it, fearing the envy of Caius. [Vell. Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 103.]

Caius entering into Armenia, at his first entry behaved himself prosperously, a little after Adon, or Adeus, (he is called also Ador by Strabo) the Governour of Artagera, perwaded that Cæsar to revolt, who inciting Caius to the wall, as though he would tell him some private business, wounded him: but Cæsar's Captains took it by continual assailing and dismantled it. [Id. ibid. cap. 102. Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 529. Zonar. ex Dion.]

In Florus [lib. 4. cap. ult.] this story is thus related. Domitian, whom the King had made Governour of Artaxatis feigning a revolt, assailes him as he was perusing a Scrolle, which he had given him as containing an account of the treasures, he was wounded indeed, but in short time recovered of his wound: but the Barbarians being set upon on every side by the army with sword and fire, into which he threw himself, being wounded, satisfied Cæsar that outlived him. Sexus Rufus also followed Florus in his Breviary: but as if the business here had been concerning the Parthians, and not concerning the Armenians, he without reason adds: That the Parthians for satisfaction of such a bold attempt, did then first give hostages to Octavianus Cæsar, and restored the Engines that were taken away under Crassus. Relating all those things to this History of Caius (falsely called Claudius, both here and by Jornandes, and in that writing of the Latines, that Georgius Syncellus transferred into his Greek Chronicle) which Suetonius in Octavia, cap. 21. had written of the Parthians, comprehending both under one, without any account of the times. The Parthians easily yielded up Armenia to Octavianus claiming it: and restored the military Engines to him demanding them, which were taken from M. Crassus and M. Antonius, and moreover offered hostages.

Caius (et Ariobarzanes, by birth a Mede, in regard of his rare beauty, both of body and mind, over the Armenians at their desire. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 1.]) Caius by reason of his wound began to be in his body less able, and in his mind less profitable to the commonwealth, neither wanted he the company of men that by their history promoted his vices, by which he was brought to that palfie, that he had rather spend all his time in any corner of the world, than to return to Rome, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. cap. 102.] for being become more dull through sickness, and a sicker disposition, he desired that he might live a private life, at which Augustus being grieved, advised him that he would return into Italy, and he should do as he would [Zonar. ex Dion.] after much reluctance and much against his will, he was brought by shipping into Lycia, and died by sickness in the City Limyra, [id. & Vellei. Paternul. ut supra.] Tacitus notes that he died as he came from Armenia, being sick of his wound, [Annal. lib. 1. cap. 3.] Sextus Rufus affirms he died of his wound being returned into Syria, but Suetonius confirms that he died in Lycia, as doth also Dio and Velleius (who being a Tribune of soldiers, served then under Caius, [in Oltavio. cap. 65.]

Caius,

Augustus was much grieved at the death of Caius, for in his letters he complained of Asinius Pollio, that being his dear friend he had a great supper, when his grief was to him and great; to whom Pollio wrote back; I supped after the same fashion, when I lost my son Asterius, would any exact more grief from a friend, than from a father? Marcus Seneca relates this in the proem of the 4. book of his controversies.

The bodies of Caius and Lucius were brought to Rome by the Captains, armies, and commanders of every City, and the golden (or silver rather) teges and spears, that they received from the Knight, when they came to be men, were hung up in the Senate house, [Xiphilin. ex Dion.] although Bellonius relates in the second book of his observations, that the Epitaph of C. Cæsar may be seen at Hama or Emesa in Syria: but that his bones were buried at Rome, this Epitaph shews, which is seen before the temple of the Apostles behind the temple of Minerva, OSSA C. CÆSARIS AVGVSTI F. PRINCIPIS JUVENTVTIS i. e. the bones of C. Cæsar the son of Augustus prince of youth, [Inscript. Græcæ. pag. CCXXXV. 4.] there was a suspicion that both these brothers were taken out of the way by the deceit of their stepmother Livia, (to make a way for her son Tiberius to the Empire, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 3. Zonar. ex Dion.]

Augustus is called Lord by the people, which name he did not only not approve, but forbade it by an edict. [Xiphilin. & Zonar. ex Dion. cum Suetonio, in Oltavio. cap. 53.]

Augustus made Tiberius Nero his partner in the Tribuneship, which he eagerly refused both at home and in the Senate, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 103.] Suetonius saith the Tribuneship was given him for five years, [in Tiberio. cap. 16.] for ten years last Dio. lib. 55. pag. 556. fin.]

The Julian Kalender is set right, the third intercalary day being superfluous, which had increased by the default of the Roman Priest, was this year in the month of February omitted, but afterwards Augustus being High Priest, commanded that one day in the beginning of every fifth year should be intercalated according to the institution of Cæsar, and for the perpetual keeping up this order, he commanded that it should be engraven in a brazen table, [Macrob. lib. 1. Saturnal. cap. 14. fin.] from which institution the accounts of all times hereafter took their rise, [Solim. cap. 3.] and no marvel if it was constantly observed even after, till the change of the Kalender made by Pope Gregory XIII. in the year 1579. But yet less the faires that were kept by the Romans at the beginning of every ninth day, should fall upon the Kalends of January, one day was added often in the end of the preceedent year, before the custom and taken away again in the following year, that the time might agree with the institution of Julius Cæsar, concerning which business Dio is to be consulted, [lib. 48. pag. 377. & lib. 61. pag. 681.]

After five years Augustus brought his daughter Julia from the Island into the continent, giving her some more gentle conditions: but could never be brought to recall her altogether, and when the Roman people treated him for her, and were very urgent with him, he used this imprecation openly to them, that they might have such daughters and such wives, [Sueton. Oltavio. cap. 65.]

Elit. Caius and Sentius (Sacerdotus) being Consuls on the V. Kalends of July Augustus adopted Tiberius Nero, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 102.] (wearing before the people that he adopted him for the commonwealths sake, [id. ibid. cap. 104. cum Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 21.] Marcus Agrippa the brother of Caius and Lucius was adopted adopted the same day: whom Julia bare after the death of Agrippa, [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 15.] But Augustus, fearing lest Tiberius should grow proud, as make some innovation: before he adopted him, he made Tiberius adopt Germanicus, the son of his brother Drusus, although Tiberius had a son of his own, [Dio. lib. 55. pag. 556, 557. cum Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 15. & Tacit. lib. 1. Annal. cap. 3.]

Immediately after his adoption, Tiberius is sent into Germany, with whom Paternulus went and served as a Colonel of Horles, and was a Spectator of all that he did for nine years together, [Vellei. Paternul. cap. 104, 105. fin.]

Tiberius being sent into Germany, the Embassadors of the Parthians, after they had delivered their Embassies at Rome, are commanded to go into the Province to him, [Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 16.] for many contending for the kingdom, there came Embassadors from the Noblemen of Parthia, desiring to have a King of one of the three sons of Phraates, that remained Hostages at Rome: and Vonones is preferred before his other brethren, and being aided by Cæsar, is joyfully accepted by the Parthians for some time, [Id. in Oltavio. cap. 21. Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 3. Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 2.]

Augustus that he might raise a tax in Italy, accepts of the Proconsular power, [Dio. lib. 55. pag. 557.]

4008. The Sun was in part eclipsed, [Id. ibid. pag. 563.] on the 28 day of March about five of the clock after noon, as the Astronomical tables shew.

Toga Virilis which was the gown that the Romans wore at 18 years old, was given to Marcus Agrippa (Potthumus) who had never enjoyed those honours that his brothers (Caius and Lucius) had, [Dio. ibid.]

4009. The Rulers of the Jews as well as of the Samaritanes, not brooking the tyranny of Archelaus, accused him to Cæsar, knowing that he had done contrary to his command, by whom he was commanded to govern his Subjects with justice and equity. Cæsar having heard this was moved with anger, and sent for his Agent that was Resident at Rome, and not vouchsafing to write any thing to Archelaus, commanded him to repair into Judea, and immediately to bring his Matter to him, [Joseph. lib. 2. bel. cap. 6. & lib. 17. Antiquit. cap. ult.]

Archelaus is reported to have had a dream foretelling this misfortune, of nine ears of corn which he saw to be eaten up by oxen. Those ears Simon an Idæan interpreted to be nine years of his kingdom, and laid that now the end of his government was at hand. The fifth day after the Agent of Archelaus is said to have come into Judea, who finding him banqueting with his friends, told him Cæsar's pleasure was that he should come and answer the accusation, [Id. ibid.]

4010. About the 11th of November, on the seventh day of the Jewish month Cileus, began the tenth year of the reign of Archelaus, (for that which Augustus called ethnarchy, the Jews called a kingdom) in which was born to Joseph the Priest, a son named Matthias; (in the tenth year of the reign of Archelaus) as it is in the publick Registers, as Flavius Josephus the Historian the son of this Matthias, relates in the beginning of the book of his life: who for this very cause, thought fit to charge what he had written formerly in his books of the wars of the Jews of the nine years of Archelaus, in his books of Antiquities; substituting in them ten years in his kingdom, and ten ears in his dream: of which amendment there was no need, when as he reigned not many days of his tenth ethnarchy, or kingdom; for he was sent into banishment at the end of that year in which M. Amilius Lepidus, and L. Aruntius were Consuls; for under their Consulship, Herod of Idæa (which indeed was no other than this Archelaus) being accused by his brethren, was banished beyond the Alps, and part of his government confiscated, as Dio saith in lib. 55. pag. 561.]

Cæsar having heard both the accusation and defence of Archelaus, sent him into banishment into Vienna of France, and adjudged both his Country and his treasure to be confiscated. [Joseph. lib. 2. bel. cap. 6. & lib. 17. Antiquit. cap. ult.] And this is that son of Herod, whom Strabo noted to have lived in exile among the Allobroges of France, [lib. 16. pag. 765.]

Augustus procured his only Nephew Marcus Agrippa Potthumus, unlearned indeed, but foolishly fierce out of a pride of his strength, but yet found guilty of no crime, and confiscating all his goods to the military treasury, banished him into Planasia, an Island near to Corsica, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 3. Dio. lib. 55. pag. 569, 570.]

The government of Archelaus, that is, Judea, (containing the tribe of Judah and Benjamin) Samaria and Idumea, being reduced into the form of a Province, and annexed to Syria, Quirinius by Cæsar sent as Governor of Syria, that he might tax both it and all Syria, and let a valuation on the Jews estates, sell Archelaus his house, and bring the money thereof into his own possession, [Joseph. in fin. lib. 17. & initio 18.]

The

The Jews, although at the first they thought but hardly of the very mention of description, yet at the perswasion of Joazar the son of Boethus the High-Priest, (who either was restored by Archelaus, or else took the Priesthood again in his absence) without much contradiction, they suffered themselves to be taxed. [Id. lib. 18. cap. 11.]

In the time of this taxing Judas Galileus arose, and drew away much people after him, he also perished, and all that obeyed him were dispersed, as saith Gamaliel, Acts. V. 37. which Judas Josephus in 18. Antiquit. calls the Gaulonites, and saith he was born in the town of Gamala, but in another place with Gamaliel he calls him a Galilean, and writes that he solicited the people to revolt from the Romans when Quirinus taxed Judea, [lib. 18. cap. 2. & lib. 20. cap. 3.]

This man, Sadoc a Pharisee being his confederate, laboured to stir up the people to rebellion, saying that this taxing was nothing else but a manifest profession of their servitude, exhorting all the nation to stand for their liberty, putting them in hope thereby that they should enjoy their estates, and being confirmed in the possession of them, they should be accounted valiant, neither was help from God to be hoped for, if they did not provide for themselves, these speeches were entertained by the people with great pleasure, and they were encouraged to do something, for it cannot be spoken how those men troubled the nation, for they filled all things with murders and robberies, for they plundered without any respect of friend or foe, and murdered many noble personages; and all under pretext of defending the public liberty, but indeed for their private profit sake. Judas and Sadoc were the authors of all these calamities, all that were desirous of novelties flocking to them, which for the present only disturbed not the common wealth, but was the seed plot of all the future calamities. [Joseph. Antiquit. lib. 18. cap. 11.]

To the three ancient sects of the Jews, (viz. of Pharisees Sadduces and Essenes) this Judas Galileus brought in the fourth, whose followers in other things agreeing with the Pharisees, they affirm that God only is to be accounted Lord and Master of all, and would more easily endure most exquisite torments, together with their friends and children, than call any mortal man Lord, [id. ibid. cap. 2.]

Quirinus having sold and confiscated Archelaus his goods, and gone through with the tax, which happened in the year 37 after the victory at Actium, beginning at September of the former year) there being a sedition of the common people raised against Joazar the High-Priest, he deprived him of his dignity and substituted Ananias (or Annas) the son of Seth in his room. [id. ibid. cap. 3.]

Together with Quirinus came Coponius, who was of the order of Knighthood, being sent by Augustus and was the first governor of Judea, after it was reduced into a province, [id. ibid. cap. 7. 11. cum lib. bell. cap. 7. which command of the Governors by him sent thither seems always to have been ended in the space of three years.

Coponius being governor of Judea, in the Passover of this or the following year, when the Priests (as it was the custom always at this feast) had opened the gates of the temple about midnight, that certain Samaritanes secretly entering Jerusalem, scattered mens bones amidst the porch, and over all the temple, whereby it came to passe, that the Priests kept more diligent watch than they were wont to do before. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 3.]

At the Passover of this year, Christ in the twelfth year of his age being brought to Jerusalem by Joseph and Mary, and the seven daies of unleavened bread being ended, his parents returning home, he staid behind; they not knowing where he was, sought him three daies and found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the Doctors, hearing them and asking them questions: and all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers. [Luke. II. 41. 47.]

Jesus went down with his parents to Nazareth, and was obedient unto them, [Luke. II. 51.] followed his fathers trade of a Carpenter, eating his bread in the sweat of his browes, which thing the saying of his fellow Citizens of Nazareth doth sufficiently prove? Is not this the Carpenter, the son of Mary. [Matthe. VI. 3.]

Ovid was banished to Tomos in Pontus, partly for seeing some dishonest act of Augustus, which he would not have been seen of; of which misfortune we read him complaining of in (secundo libro Tristium ad Augustum.)

*Cui aliquid vidi? cur noxia lumina feci?
Cur imprudens cognita culpamili est?*

Why saw I caught? Why did I guilty make My eyes? This sin why did I, wretch, partake?

Partly

Partly for his love books, which he set forth, as it is delivered by Sidonius Apollinaris and others, and which is not obscurely hinted at by himself. [ibid.] But whereas we have shewen before, That he was born in the Consulship of Hircius and Pansa, he must at this time be fifty one years old: but the current being neglected, the Poet himself thus sets down the full number of compleat years, in his fourth book Tristium, the last Elegie.

*Postque meos ortus Pisca vincit olivæ
Abstulerat decies præmia victor eques;
Cum maris Euxini positos ad lava Tomitis
Querere me læsi Principis ira jubet.*

When twice five times with olive girt the Knight,
Had bore away the Prize (his virtues right)
When by my Princes rage I had command
Of th' Euxine Tomitz to seek the land.

That is, as it is more clearly exprest by him, in his book in Iben, (which at his first going to Tomos, he wrote against his accuser.)

Tempus ad hoc lustris mihi jam bis quinque peractis.

When to this time five lustrals I had seen.

For he, by no mean mistake, is wont to confound the Olympiades, which were every four years, with the Lustra of the Romans, which were every five years.

Ovid signifies this in his third book Tristium and 12 Elegie, that he had passed the first winter in Pontus, and with that, the first year of his banishment, (for he had passed the former winter in his journey.

*Frigora jam zephyri minuant; amoque peractis,
Longior antiquis visa Maota hyems:
Impositamque sibi qui non bene pertulit Helles, Tempora nocturnis æquis diurna facit.*

Now Zephyr tames the cold; the years run round,
A longer Winter the Maota found.
The figure in Aries, the night did make
Her equal hours with the day partake.

Then in the fourth Elegie of the sixth book, he designs the second year of his banishment.

*De patria careo, bis frugibus arva tria est;
Diffusus nudo pressa bis nova pede.*

Since I my Country left the Barns twice fid,
And Presses, Corn and wine did to them yield.

Marcus Ambivius was sent by Augustus, the second Governour into Judea, in whose time Salome, the sister of Herod, departed this life, he bequeathed to Julia (Livia Augusta) Jamnia, with the government thereof, and Phasaelis situate in the Plain, and Archelaus very well planted with Date trees, which is a most excellent fruit. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 3.]

Ovid thus relates in the fifth book Tristium, 10 Elegie, in the beginning of his third winter passed in Pontus.

Ut sumus in Pontus, ter frigore constitit Ister; Fallax est Euxini duræ ter unda maris.

Since I to Pontus came thrice Ister flood
With frost, and thrice I lay glad'd the Euxine flood.

The Senate and people of Rome, at Augustus his request, made a decree that Tiberius might have the same power in all the Provinces and armies as he himself had. [Vellei.]

[Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 12. 1.] Suetonius relates that this law was propounded by the Consuls, [in Tiberio. cap. 21.] that Tiberius should govern the Provinces in common with Augustus; but Germanicus was Consul all that year, whom Augustus being now very old, by writing, commended to the Senate, as the Senate it self did also commend him to Tiberius, as Dio tells in his History of this year: [lib. 56. pag. 587.] for it was no wonder that the Senate should be commended by Augustus, to his son his Colleague of the Empire, and partner in the Tribuneship, as Tacitus speaks, [lib. 1. Annal. cap. 3.] and being made also Censor, he committed the care of the City to Lucius Piso, because he had continued two days and two nights in drinking with him, being now Prince, as Pliny speaks in the last Chapter of his fourteenth book: which Piso Tacitus confirms to be Prefect of the City for twenty years together, with great approbation, and dyed Domitius Aenobarbus, and Aulus Vitellius being Consuls, that is, in the 32. year after the Christian account, and was honoured with publick funerals, [Annal. lib. 6. cap. 11.] From whence it is gathered that Tiberius was now Prince in the twelfth year of Christ, two whole years before Augustus his death: and therefore there must be a distinction observed between the beginning of Tiberius his fifth being Prince, and he afterward being Monarch.

Ovid mentioneth the fourth winter that he lived in exile, in the first book of Pontus, and second Elegie to Maximus in these words,

*Hic me pugnantes cum frigore, cumque sagittis,
Cumque meo fato, quarta sagittat hyems.*

Here the fourth winter wearied me doth hold,
Resisting adverse late, weapons, sharp cold.

Annius Rufus is the third Governour sent into Judea by Augustus. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 3.] 4017.

Lucius Munacius, and Caius Silius being Consuls, the fourth ten years space of his Empire, now coming to an end, accepts of though against his will, for ten years longer, the Government of the Common-wealth, and continues Tiberius in the Tribuneship. [Dio. lib. 56. pag. 588.]

Sextus Pompeius, and Sextus Apuleius being Consuls, Augustus signifies in a Breviary of his Acts, cut in Marble of Ancira, that he with his Colleague Tiberius, had a third time numbered the people of Rome, in which muster were numbered of Roman Citizens 417000. [Inscript. Gruter. pag. CCXXX.] Where Eusebius in his Chronicle mistakes, saying, That there were numbered 937000, which error Jornandes following in his book of the succession of Kingdoms and Times, gives up a greater than this, adding that Augustus had commanded all the World to be numbered, being then in peace at the Nativity of Jesus Christ: when as both he in that place, and Eusebius conjecture, That the Nativity of the Lord, fell in the forty second year of his Empire.

When Augustus made this great muster in Mars field, a multitude of people being there, an Eagle often fluttered about him, and then went and sat upon a Temple that was nigh, upon the first letter of Agrippa his name: which being observed, he commanded his Colleague Tiberius to make those vows that were wont to be made for the next year ensuing, for although that all things were ready for the solemnities of those vows, yet he refused to make those vows that he should not live to perform. [Sueton. in Octavia. cap. 97.]

About the same time the first letter of his name, that was upon the inscription of his Statue that was set in the Capitol, fell down, being stricken with a flash of lightning: and it is answered by the Southlayers, that he should live only an hundred days after; which was denoted by the letter C. and that he should be canonized a god, because that Æ. S. A. R., which was the other part of his name, in the Hetrúcan tongue, signified a god. [Id. ibid. cap. 97. Dio. lib. 56. pag. 589.]

In the mean while he wrote a Catalogue of his doings, which he would have engraved in Tables of Braffe, and that they should be set over his Tomb. [Sueton. in Ciliario. cap. ult. Dio. lib. 56. pag. 591.] An example of which, that is, that was carried in the Marble of Ancyra, is often commended by us, in which that former muster that he took to lately is described.

And so Augustus ended his dayes at Nola in Campania, those two Sexti being Consuls, (and named upon his Tomb.) [Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 123. Sueton. in Octav. cap. 100. Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 5. & 7. Dio. lib. 56. pag. 589.] in the same house and chamber, where his father Octavius ended his life. [Sueton. lib. Tacit. ut suprà. cap. 9.] the nineteenth day of August, on which he was first made Consul. [Sueton. ibid. Dio. ut suprà. pag. 590.]

Tiberius published not the death of Augustus before he had put to death Agrippa Posthumus; yet to the Captain that killed him, and bringing back word that he had done as he had commanded him; he answered, That neither he had commanded it, and that he should give an account thereof to the Senate, willing at the present to shun the envy thereof, [Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 22. Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 6. Dio. lib. 57. pag. 604.] And having provided all things according to the time, the same news came: together that Augustus was dead, and that Tiberius Nero was Emperour, [Tacit. ibid. cap. 5.]

Although he doubted not immediately to seize upon and take the Principality, yet he along while most imprudently refused it, holding the Senate in suspense, that both prayed him, and falling on their knees to him, with doubtful and delaying answers, for that some upbraided him with it to his face; laying that others did slowly perform that that they did promise, but he did slowly promise that that he would fain have, [Sueton. in Tiberio. cap. 24. cum Vellei. Paternul. lib. 2. cap. 24. Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 7. Dio. lib. 57. pag. 602, 603.]

Between this new Principality, as Tacitus calls it, [lib. 1. Annal. cap. 6, 7.] and the former, that he had a years before Augustus his death, this was the difference, that that extended only to armies and provinces of the Roman Empire, but this to the head City it self, in which Tiberius only had the authority of Censorship and Tribuneship; but the Augustal Principality, that is, of governing after his own will, and being freed from all bound of laws, he obtained afterwards. For Tiberius had not equal power with Augustus, as Lucius Varus had with Antoninus the Philosopher, which two governed the Common-wealth with equal authority: as Spartianus relates, [in Hadrianus. Alio Vero, & M. Aurelio.] but such as Antoninus Pius had with Hadrian, who being adopted by him, was made Colleague with his father in the Proconsulary power (in respect of the other Provinces) and in the Tribuneship (at home) as Julius Capitolinus declares. Whereupon Tiberius gave not out the Edict by which he called the Senators into the Senate-house, by the authority of his new Principality, but by the prelection of the Tribuneship which he had under Augustus: but yet he gave the watch-word to the Pretorian Cohorts as Emperour; [Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 7.]

The Legions of Pannonia being in a mutiny, are afrighted at a sudden eclipse of the Moon, and so submit themselves to Tiberius, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 28. Dio. lib. 57. pag. 604.] This total eclipse was seen on the 27 of September, five hours after mid-night, so that the Moon fell even in the very eclipse.

In Ovid in the 4 book of Pontus after the fifth Elegy to Sextus Pompeius who was Consul this year, follows the sixth to Brutus, in which he mentions the death both of Augustus and Fabius Maximus (who it is manifest out of the first book of Tacitus's Annals, cap. 5, that he died this year under Tiberius) in which time he sheweth in these Verses that he had past the fifth year of his banishment, and that then was the sixth, (of the beginning of which we are certain.)

In Scythia nobis quinquennis Olympias acta est, Jam tempus lustris transiit in alierius.

Now one quinquennial Olympiad's run,
In Scythia I, and th' second Lustral'gun.

which sixth year he also remembers in the beginning of the tenth Elegie to Albinovanus.

Hæc mihi Cimærio his tertia ducitur æstas Littore, pellicis inter agenda Cæsar.

This is th' sixth Summer on th' Cymmerian shores
That I must spend amongst these Getic bores.

He makes mention also in the 13 Elegie to Caras of the sixth Winter, (from which he accounts the beginning of the seventh year of his banishment)

4728. 15.

*sed me jam, Caræ, rivali
Sexta relegatum bruma sub axe videt.*

This the sixth Winter (my dear friend)
Must I in this cold Climate spend.

L1111

Where

Where also he tells of a Poeme at this time written by him in the language of the Getaes of the canonization of Angulfus.

*Ah pudet, & Getico scripsi sermone libellum, Struclaque sunt nostris barbara verba modis.
Et placui, gratare mihi, capique poete
Inter inhumano nomen habere Getæ.*

Ah shame, in Getick language then did I
Compile a book, phancy my Poetic;
Yea glory'd in it, and effoon began
Amongst these Barbaras to be the only man.

An Hebrew woman that had been bowed by Satan eighteen years, is by Christ restored to health, [Luke, XIII. 1, 16.]

Valerius Gratus is by Tiberius sent Governour into Judea in the room of Annus Rufus: in the government of which Province he continued eleven years, [Joseph, lib. 18. cap. 3.]

The Governour of Crete being dead, for the rest of the time the Island is committed to the charge of the Treasurer and his assistant, [Dio, lib. 57. pag. 611.]

4019. When the Armenians had received Vonones into their kingdom that was turned out of his own, at the threatening of Artabanus the King of the Parthians and Medes, Vonones in vain desires aid of Tiberius by his Embassadors that he sent to Rome: and whereas the most powerful of the Armenians followed the faction of Artabanus, Vonones being destitute of all hope of a kingdom, retires with an huge mass of treasure to Antiochia, and yields himself to Cereus Silanus Governour of Syria. He in respect of the education that he had had at Rome kept him with him in Syria, and let a guard over him, yet suffering him to maintain the pomp and name of a King: but Artabanus let Orodus one of his sons to be King over the Armenians, [Joseph, lib. 18. cap. 3, Tacit. Annal, lib. 2. cap. 4, Sueton, in Tiberio, cap. 49.]

4020. Ovid the Poet died in banishment, and was buried near the City Tomos, [Hieronym, in Chronico.]

Tiberius caused Archelaus the King of Cappadocia whom he hated because he had not offered him any service all the while he lived at Rhodes: to be inveigled to come to Rome, by the letters of his mother Livia. She not dissembling her sons displeasure, offered him mercy, if he would come and beg it. Archelaus not knowing of the treachery, or misdoubting violence if he seemed to perceive it, maketh haste to the City. He is churlishly entertained, and not long after accused of leigued crimes in the Senate, [Tacit. Annal, lib. 2. cap. 42.] Being therefore accused as though he went about some innovation, the man worn out not only with extreme old age, but also with the gout, and believed also to doat, answered some things for himself in his letter in the Senate, and feigning that he was not at that time well in his mind, escaped at that time the danger, [Dio, lib. 57. pag. 614.] notwithstanding not long after being tired what with grief, and what with old age, he ended his life: and then Cappadocia being reduced into a Province, is committed to the government of a Knight, [Id. ibid, Tacit. ut supra, Sueton, in Tiberio, cap. 37.]

Tiberius professing that by the profits of that kingdom the tribute of one in the hundred might be cased, appointed the tribute of one in two hundred to be raised, [Tacit. ibid,] and commanded that his chief City called Mazaca, a most noble City, should be called Cefarea, [Hieronym, in Chronico.]

At the same time Antiochus the King of the Commagenes being dead, there arose a contention between the Nobility and the Commons, the Nobility desiring that the kingdom might be made a Province, and the Commons on the other side, desiring to live under a King as they formerly had done, [Tacit. ut supra, Joseph, lib. 18. cap. 3.] In like manner also the Nation of the Cilicians is in troubles, their King Philopatour being dead, many desiring the Roman, and many a Kingly government. The Provinces of Syria and Judea, oppressed with taxes, made a petition that their tribute might be lessened, [Tacit. Annal, lib. 2. cap. 42.]

Tiberius discoursing of these things to the Senators, persuaded them that these commotions in the East, cannot be compoised but by the wisdom of Germanicus; and thereupon by the decree of the Senate, Germanicus had the charge given him of all the Provinces, divided by sea, and a greater command also being given unto him, than any that received government, either by lot, or the Princes sending, [Id. ibid cap. 43.] For by this colour of stir in the East, Tiberius had a mind to withdraw him from the Legions that he was wont to command: and giving him charge over new Provinces the more expected him to treachery and hazard, [Id. ibid, cap. 5.]

And

And because the governour of Syria Creticus Silanus was joyined in affinity with Germanicus, Tiberius appointed Cn. Piso his successeur, a man head-strong, and that knew not how to obey, neither was he ignorant that he was made governour of Syria to bridle Germanicus his hopes, and some believed that he had private commands given him by Tiberius to do so, and without doubt his wife Plancia was advised by Augusta through womanish emulation to quarrel with Agrippina (the daughter of M. Agrippa) and Julia, the wife of Germanicus [Id. ibid. cap. 43.]

In the same year twelve famous Cities of Asia were destroyed in one night by an earthquake: Ephesus, Magnesia, Sardes, Mithene, Æge, Hiero-Cefarea, Philadelphia, Temnus, Cyme, Myrina, Apollonia, Hyrcania, they relate also that huge mountains were laid flat, and plains raised up into hills, and fire flashed out of those ruins, the disaster was most grievous among the Sardians, which drew much compassion towards them, for Tiberius promised them 1000000 Sesterces, and to release them for five years (space of all that they were to pay to the common treasury, the Magnesians near to the mountain Sypius, were next to them in damage and relief, it was thought meet for the same space, to discharge of all tributes, the Temnians, Philadelphians, Ægeians, Apollonientes, and such as are called Mitheniens, or Macedonians of Hyrcania, and those that inhabit Hiero-Cefarea, Myrina, Cyme, and to send some of the Senators unto them which should view and relieve their present estate. This charge was committed to M. Aulus once Prætor, least if one that had been Consul over Asia had been deputed, there might loose emulation have risen between equals, and thereupon the business have been hindered. [Id. ibid, cap. 47, cum Strabone lib. 12. pag. 579, & lib. 13. pag. 627. Eling. lib. 2. cap. 84. Dio, lib. 57. pag. 614. Euseb. in Chronico, Orosio, lib. 7. cap. 4.]

For this magnificent bounty to the publick, there was a great statue erected for Tiberius in the market place at Rome by the temple of Venus, and statues also set up to him in every one of the Cities that were restored, as Ptolemy Trellianus in his book of wonders relates out of Apollonius the Grammarian. Scaliger also adds that there were silver medalls coined for the illustration of these things, in the superfluities of which coinage there was the face of Tiberius, and on the other side the picture of Asia in a woman's habit sitting with these words CIVITATIBUS ASIÆ RESTITUTIS for the Cities of Asia restored.

4021. Germanicus being brought on (as Suetonius speaks in C. Caligula cap. 1.) for to compose the affairs of the East, failed into the Isle Lesbos, where his wife Agrippina at her last delivery had Julia. Then with a desire to relish places of antiquity and fame, he went to the confines of Asia and Perinthus, and Byzantium Cities of Thracia, then he entered the straits of Propontis, and the mouth of the Pontick sea: likewise he relieved the Provinces that were oppressed with civil discord, or oppressions of magistrates: failing to Colophon he consulted the Oracle of Clarus Apollo, which is said to have told him by dark speeches (as the manner of Oracles is) that his death was nigh at hand, [Tacit. Annal, lib. 2. cap. 54.]

But Cn. Piso failing with all celerity by the Cyclades, and using the shortest cut by sea overtook Germanicus at Rhodes, by whom Piso being relieved from danger or shipwreck, but yet not mollified, held Germanicus, and goes before him into Syria, whither when he was come to the Legions what with gifts, and bribes, and luxury, he endeavours to reconcile them to himself: yea he came to such an height of corruption, that among the common sort he was called the father of the legions, yea and his wife Plancia as well by her self, as by some of the soldiery, ready enough at her bare commands, used reproachfull speeches against Agrippina and Germanicus; and to much the easier because it was secretly whispered, that this was not done with the Emperours dislike. [Id. ibid, cap. 55.]

Although Germanicus knew those things, yet the affairs of Armenia drew him first to them, for at that time the Armenians having expelled Vonones, had no King (i. e. believe Tacitus, for Suetonius in C. Caligula cap. 1. relates that the King of Armenia was conquered by Germanicus; to wit: Orodus the son of Artabanus King of the Parthians, as it is already declared out of Josephus,) but the good will of the nation inclined more towards Zeno, the son of Polemon the King of Pontus, because that from his infancy he had imitated the customs and attire of the Armenians, in hunting and feasting, and other exercises greatly esteemed by the Barbarians; he had won to him the good will both of the nobles and commons: upon this man therefore Germanicus set the Crown in the City of Artaxata, the noble men approving it, and the multitude flocking about him, the rest reverencing him as their King, saluted him by the name of Artaxias, which name they gave him from the name of the City, [Id. ibid, cap. 56.]

Then

Then the Cappadocians being reduced into the form of a Province, Q. Veranius made Governour thereof, [Id.] and to give them hopes that the Roman government would be mild, some of the tributes that they used to pay to their Kings are abated: and over the Commagenians Q. Servius is made Governour: then first reduced under the Regiment of a Prætor. [Tacit. ut supra.]

Albeit all the affairs of the Allies were prosperously composed, yet did they not ease, Germanicus his mind being vexed at Pilo his pride, who being commanded that either he himself, or by his son, should conduct part of the Legions into Armenia, neglected both: At length they both met at Cyrrhus, a City of Syria, where the tenth Legion wintered; where in the presence of a few families, Cæsar began some such speech as anger and dissimulation doth suggest; and Pilo answered with a proud submission, and so they departed in private grudges, one against the other. After that Pilo was feldome at Cæsar's Tribunal, and at any time he assisted, he shewed himself forwardly and manifestly differed from him. This speech also of his is reported as a Banquet made by the King of the Nabateans, where great Crowns of gold were given to Germanicus and Agrippina, and light ones to Pilo and the rest. That this Feast was made for the son of a Roman Prince, and not for the son of the Parthian King, and withal threw away his Crown, uttering also many things against the superstition, which although Germanicus could hardly digest, yet endured all patiently, [Tacit. ut supra.]

Embassadors came from Artabanus King of the Parthians, to Germanicus; for to renew the friendship and league between them: the King said that he would yield so much to the honour of Germanicus, that he would come to the banks of Euphrates; desiring in the mean while, that Vonones might not remain in Syria, least by private messengers he might draw the Noble men of the Country therabouts to civil dissensions: touching the alliance between the Romans and the Parthians, Germanicus answered magnificently; but concerning the Kings coming, and the honour done to himself, he answered civilly, and with modesty. Vonones was removed to Pompeiopolis, a sea Town of Cilicia, not so much at Artabanus his request, as to spite Pilo, to whom Vonones was most acceptable, for many services and gifts which he had bestowed upon Plancia. [Id. cap. 58.]

M. Silianus, and L. Norbanus being Consuls, Germanicus went into Egypt, for to learn Antiquities, but pretended a care of the Province, and opening the granaries, brought down the price of corn, and did other things to win the favour of the people; as going without Souldiers, wearing open shoes, and appareling himself like the Grecians. Tiberius having lightly blamed him for his behaviour and apparel, sharply rebuked him, That contrary to Augustus's order, he had entered Alexandria, without the leave of the Prince: but Germanicus not yet knowing that his voyage was disliked, went up the Nilus, beginning at the town Canopus, afterwards he visited the great ruins of Thebes, where yet were to be seen the Egyptians letters in old buildings, which contained their ancient wealth: but he let his mind to see other miracles, of which the chiefest were the Image of Memnon, made of stone; which when it is strook with the beams of the Sun, yields a sound like a mans voice: and the pyramids as high as Mountains, built at first by the former Kings, to shew their riches, on the not passable sands, and the ditches wrought by hand to receive the overflowing of Nilus: so narrow in some places, and so deep in other, that the bottom cannot be found by any search. Then he came to Elephantine and Syene, and so that Summer was spent by Germanicus in seeing divers Provinces. [Id. cap. 59. ad. 61.]

At the same time Vonones having corrupted his Keepers, endeavoured by all means to escape to the Armenians, and from thence to the Albanians, and Heniochians, and to his kinsman the King of Scythia, under colour of going a hunting, he left the sea-coasts, and took by-ways, then through the swiftness of his Horse he came to the river Pyrimus, whose bridges the inhabitants had broken down, having heard of the Kings flight, neither could it be passed at any forde: wherefore on the bank of the river, he is taken by Vibius Fronto, Captain of the Horse and bound: and then as he was through anger he is run through by Remmius Evocatus, to whose charge he was first committed. [Id. cap. 68.]

Jairus, the Ruler of the Synagogue, had only one daughter, who being dead, when she was twelve years old, Christ restored to life. And the woman that was sick of the flux of blood twelve years also, by the touching of his garment is healed. [Luke VIII. 42, 43. Mark. 25. 42.]

There being many vain oracles that went about as though they had been the Sybels concerning the destruction of Rome, which should happen in the year 900, from the foundation of it, Tiberius reproving them, looked on all books, that contained any prophecies; and of those he rejected some, as of no moment: others he received into the number of those that were to be approved. [Dio. 57. pag. 615.]

It

It was debated in the Senate, touching the rooting out of the Egyptian and Jewish ceremonies, and an act made that those that used them should depart Italy, it within a certain day they did not leave off their customs. [Tacit. Annal. lib. cap. 85.] And they were compelled to burn all their religious garments, with all things belonging to them. [Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 36.] Whither also may be referred that of Seneca in his 108. Epistle. It was a young man in the principality of Tiberius, then were the forerunners of the Nations removed, and it was counted superstition to abstain from some kinds of meats.

An horrible villany committed against Paulina, a noble woman by the Egyptian Priest, gave occasion of the removing of the Egyptian superstition; which being made manifest, Tiberius commanded the Temple of Isis to be thrown down, and her Statue to be drowned in Tiber. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 4.] And for the expulsion of the Jews, a certain Impostour gave occasion, who for fear of being punished, according to their laws, fled his Country. He then living at Rome, made himself as though he were an Interpreter of Moses's Law. He had also three Associates like unto himself. And when as one Fulvia, a Noble woman, embracing the Jewish religion, became their Scholar; they persuaded her that she should send purple and gold to the Temple of Jerusalem: which having received, they turned to their own use. Which when Tiberius knew, being informed thereof by his friend Saturninus, the husband of Fulvia, complaining of the injury done to his wife, he commanded all the Jews out of the City. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 5.]

The Consuls enrolled of the youth of the Jews, that were the sons of free men, 4000 Souldiers, and sent them into Sardinia, for the suppressing of robberies: supposing it no great losse if they should perish through the intemperance of the aire. Many that refused to be enrolled through the religion of their Country, are grievously punished, the rest of that Nation, or any that followed their customs, are turned out of the City, under the penalty of perpetual slavery, if they did not obey. [Id. ibid. cum Tacit. & Sueton. ut supra.]

Rualcopolis, or Rhafcoporis, the King of Thracia, the killer of Cotrys his brothers son, who also was partner of the Kingdom, is betrayed by Pomponius Flaccus (of whom Ovid makes mention [lib. Poni. 3. Eleg. 9.] as governour of Melia) and brought to Rome, and there condemned, then carried to Alexandria, and there put to death, as though he had made an attempt to fly from thence. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 67. Vellei. Patencil. lib. 2. cap. 126. Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 37.]

Germanicus returning from Egypt, perceived that all that he had commanded, either in the Legions or Cities, was left undone, or changed clean contrary. Whereupon were reproachful speeches raised against Pilo, neither were they lesse grievous than that were by him attempted against Cæsar. Whereupon Pilo determined to leave Syria, but was then deterr'd by reason of Germanicus his sickness: when he heard of his amendment, and that the vows were accomplished for his health, he by his Sergeants, drove away the beasts brought to the Altar, and disturbed the preparation for the sacrifices, and the solemn meeting of the people of Antioch, among whom Germanicus then was. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 69.] Who also, when Germanicus was sick, used him most harshly, both in words and deeds, without any moderation. [Sueton. in Caligula, cap. 2.]

Pilo then went to Seleucia, expecting the event of Germanicus his sickness, which he fell into again. [Tacit. ut supra.] and there were found in the same house that Germanicus dwelt in, pieces of humane bodies dug out, verres and charms, and his name engraven in leaden sheets, ashes half burned, and mingled with corrupt blood, and other foul ceremonies, by which it is believed that souls are dedicated to the infernal powers. [Tacit. ibid. lib. 57. pag. 615.]

Germanicus moved with anger, renounceth by letters Pilo his friendship, according to the ancient custom: and some adde, he commanded him to leave the Province, neither did Pilo stay, but weighed anchor, yet sailed slowly, that he might returne the sooner, if the news of Germanicus his death should open him a way to Syria. [Tacit. Annal. 2. cap. 70. Sueton. in Caligula, cap. 3.]

Germanicus being much weakened by his sickness, and finding his end approaching, accuseth Pilo and his wife Plancia, and desiring his friends to revenge it, gives up the ghost, to the great regret of the Province, and the neighbour people. [Tacit. ibid. cap. 71, 72.] He died at Antioch, of a disease that had no intermissions, he being 34 years old; not without suspicion of poison, ministred unto him by the treachery of Tiberius and Pilo's means. [Sueton. in Caligula, cap. 1. & 2.]

The day that Germanicus died, the Temples were battered with a tempest of stones, Altars overturned, the household gods by some thrown into the streets, children laid out to perish: they report also that the Barbarians did consent to a truce, with whom whom whom there was civil war, or war against the Romans, as in a domestic or common mourning, and that some Governours amongst them cut off their Beards, and shaved their Wives heads, in figure of their greatest mourning; and that the King of Kings forbore his hunting and feasting of the Nobles, which is a kinde of vacation among the Parthians. [Sueton. ut supra. cap. 5.]

His Funeral without any images or pomp, was solemnized with the praises and memory of his virtues: his body before it was burnt, was laid naked in the marketplace of Antiochia, which place was intended for his burial, it is uncertain, whether as shewed any signes of poison or no: for divers did diversely interpret it, either as they were inclined to pity Germanicus, or out of a presumptuous suspicion, or favoured Pilo. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 73.] Yet besides the marks that were over all his body, and the froth that came out at his mouth, the heart was found not burned among the bones; concerning which it is thought the nature of it to be such, that it will not be consumed with fire, if it be touched with poison. [Sueton. in C. Caligula. cap. 1.] The oration also Vitellius afterwards (et forth, in which he strive to prove Pilo guilty of this villany, and uteth this argument, and openly testifies, That the heart of Germanicus could not be burned, by reason of the poison. On the contrary, Pilo is defended by that kinde of dilectate called Cardiacæ Passio, of which those that dye, their hearts also will not be burned. [Plin. lib. 11. cap. 37.]

Cneus Sentius being chosen Governour of Syria, by the Lieutenants and Senatours that were there, sent Martina to Rome, a woman infamous in that Province for poisoning, but very much beloved of Plancia: at the intreaty of Vitellius and Veranius and others, who framed crimes and accusations, as against them already found guilty. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 74.] But Agrippina, although tyred out with grief and sickness, yet impatient of all things that might hinder her revenge, took shipping with Germanicus his ashes, and her Children. [Ibid. cap. 75.]

Pilo having received the news of Germanicus his death, at the Isle of Cos, expressed his joy most intemperately; but Plancia was more inolent, who then stifled all left off her mourning, which she ware for the death of her sister. [Ibid.] The Centurions came flocking about him, telling him that the Legions were already at his command, that he should returne into the Province taken from him wrongfully, and now voide of a Governour. [Ibid. cap. 76.] He sending letters to Tiberius, accused Germanicus of riot and pride, and that himself was driven out, that a way might be opened to innovation, that he had again taken the charge of the army, with the same fidelity he had governed it before; and withall he commanded Domitius Celer with a Gallie to saile into Syria, avoiding the coasting of the shoares, and letting passe the Islands, to take the open sea. Then marshalling and arming runnagates, and rascall companions, and sailing over into the Continent, intercepts an Ensigne of raw Souldiers going into Syria, and writeth to the Lords of Cilicia to send him aide. [Ibid. cap. 78.]

Pilo and his Companions passing by the coast of Lycia and Pamphilia, met with the ships which conveyed Agrippina, each hating one the other, made ready for a fight: but being both afraid each of other, they proceeded no farther than to hard words. And Marius Vibius told Pilo that he should come to Rome and answer for himself, he scoffingly answered again, That he would then come, when the Pretour that should inquire of poisonings, should appoint a day both for the plaintiffe and defendant. [Ibid. cap. 79.]

In the mean time Domitius going to Laodicea, a City of Syria; came to the Winter Quarters of the sixth Legion, as most fit for new enterprises, he was prevented by the Lieutenant Pucereus. Sentius openeth this by letters to Pilo, warning him that he should not go about to corrupt the army, nor raise any war in the Province, and withall, marcheth with a strong power, and ready for the fight. [Ibid.]

Pilo seizeth upon the strong Castle of Celenderis in Cilicia, for by mingling the Runnagates and the Raw Souldiers that he had intercepted, with his own and Plancia her slaves, and the aides that the Lords of the Cilicians sent him, he had marshalled them into the forme of a Legion, then he draws out his companies before the Castell walls on a steep and craggy hill; the rest being invironed with the sea. But when the Roman Cohorts came, the Cilicians fled, and shut themselves within the Castle. [Ibid. 80.]

In the mean space Pilo went about but in vain, to assaile the Navy that waited for them not far off; then returned to the Castle again, now tormenting himself upon the walls, now calling every souldier by name, offering rewards, assayed to raise a mutiny, and did so much prevail, that the Standard-bearer of the sixth Legion went with his Ensigne unto him. Then Sentius commanded the Cornets and Trumpets to sound, and gave an assault to the Rampire, raised the ladders, and commanded the ablest men to follow, and others to shoot out of Engins, darts, stones, and firebrands. In the end Pilo, his obstinacy being overcome, encreased that having delivered up his armes, he might remain still in the Castle, until Cæsar were consuled, who should be Governour of Syria. These conditions were not accepted, nor any things granted, but onely shipping, and safe conduct to the City. [Ibid. cap. 81.]

But when Germanicus his sickness was noised abroad, all things as coming from far, being encreased to the worse, grief, anger, and complaints, burst out, [Ibid. cap. 82.] and his death as it pleased Tiberius and Livia, lo it was a great grief to all others, [Dio. lib. 57. pag. 615.] neither by any consolations, nor by any edicts could the publick mourning be restrained; yea it lasted also all the festival dayes of the month December. [Sueton. in C. Caligula. cap. 6.]

Honours were decreed as every mans love to Germanicus or wit could invent: there were Arches erected at Rome, and on the bank of Rhene, and in Amanns a mountain of Syria, with an inscription of what he had done, and that he died for the Common-wealth. A Sepulchre at Antioch where he was buried, and a Tribunal at Epiphane where he ended his life. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 83.]

Agrippina although it were winter, yet still continuing her voyage by sea, arrived at the Island Corcyre over against the coast of Calabria, where she rested a few dayes to settle her mind, and then sailed to Brundisium; where after she was come to land with her two children, holding the Funeral Urne in her hand, there was a general mourning amongst them all. [Id. Annal. lib. 3. cap. 1.]

D. Rufus the son of Tiberius went as far as Terracina to meet her with his brother Claud u, and the children of Germanicus, who had remained in the City: the new Consul M. Valerius, and M. Aurelius, the Senate, and a great part of the people, filed up the way. [Ibid. cap. 2.]

The day that the reliques of Germanicus were put in Augustus his Tombe in Campus Martius, was sometime desolate thorough silence, and sometime unquiet thorough their weeping: every one honouring him that was dead, and greatly affectionating the widow Agrippina, and railing upon Tiberius. [Ibid. cap. 4. & 5.]

Pilo coming to Rome, landed at Cæsars Tombs, on a day when the shoar was full of people, himself with a great company of followers after him, and Plancia with a great company of women after her, both of them looking very cheerfully, and solemnizing their happy return in an house that looked into the Market-place, which was trimmed up for Feasts and Banquets. [Ibid. cap. 9.] The next day Fulcinus Tiro accused Pilo before the Consuls. Tiberius referred the whole cause to the Senate, [cap. 10.] The day the Senate met Drusus Cæsar made a premeditate Oration; tempered and accommodated for the mitigation of the defendants offence. [cap. 12.] Then had the accusers two dayes given them to bring in their accusations, and after six dayes space, the defendant had three dayes to answer for himself. [cap. 13.]

As the cause was a pleading, the outcry of the people was heard before the Court, that they would tear him in pieces, if he escaped by sentence of the Senate: and they had dragged his images into the Gemonies, and broken them in pieces if they had not been secured and put in their places again by the Princes command. [cap. 14.] Then was the same hatred against Plancia, but the favour of Tiberius (ill gotten as it is believed) protected her; Pilo then perceived he was undone; when his wife separated her defence from her husband's, whereupon he flew himself with his own sword, [cap. 15.]

Suetonius writes that he was almost torn in pieces by the people, being condemned to death by the Senate, [in C. Caligula. cap. 2.] Dio relates, thus for the death of Germanicus, that he was brought into the Senate by Tiberius himself, desiring that he might have time to defend himself, and that he laid violent hands upon himself, [Ibid. 57. pag. 615.] Cornelius Tacitus saith that he had often heard from ancient men, [Annal. 3. cap. 16.] that there was often seen a little book in his hand which he published not, but as his friends said, it contained Tiberius letters and commission against Germanicus: and that he had purposed to disclose it to the Senatours, and to reveal the place, had he not been deluded by Sejanius his vain promises, and that he did not kill himself, but that one was sent to murder him, but (saith he) I will not assure mine of these things, although I ought not so to conceal it to have been uttered by those, who lived and all I came to mans estate. [Look Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 52.]

The licence and impunity of ordaining sanctuaries, increased throughout the Cities

Cities of Greece, into which were received debtors against their creditors, and those that were suspected of capital crimes, so that the wickedness of men was protected by the ceremonies of the Gods. Tiberius ordered that the Cities should lend their charters and Embassadors to the Senate to Rome, and the Ephesians were first heard concerning this business, then the Magnesians, Aphrodisians, Stratoniceans, Hiero-Carians, Cypriots, Pergamenians, Smyrnians, Tenians, Sardiars, Milefians, Cretians, and others their acts made, in which a mean was prescribed, but yet with much honour. And they were commanded to erect altars in the very Temples for a sacred memory, yet so that under colour of Religion, they should not fall into ambition. [Tacit. Annal. a cap. 60. ad 63.]

Caius Silvanus was accused of bribery by his companions, and banished into the Isle Cythera, [Ibid. a 66. ad 69.] Caius Cordus was also accused of bribery by the Cyrenesians at the suite of Ancharius Priscus, and is condemned, [Ibid. cap. 70.]

Elius Sejanus killed Drusus (the son of Tiberius, and his partner in the Tribuneship, having committed adultery with his wife Livia) by poison given him by Lygidas an Eunuch, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 8. 10.] who also accused the Jews that lived at Rome to Tiberius of feigned crimes, that he might wholly destroy that Nation, which he knew either only or chiefly to withstand his wicked practices, and conspiracy against the life of the Emperour. [Philo. in lib. de legat. ad Caium. & lib. in Flaccum initio.]

Drusus's Funerals being ended, Tiberius returns to his accustomed business, forbidding any longer vacation: and to the Embassadors of the Illyrians that came too late to comfort him, he jeered them, as though the memory of grief had been blotted out: He answered them, That he also was sorry that they had lost to gallant a Citizen as Hector was. [Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 52.]

There are decrees of the Senate made, by the persuasion of Tiberius, that the City Cibara in Asia, and Egeium in Achaia, that were much damaged by an Earthquake, should be relieved by remitting them three years tribute. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 13.]

The Samians and the Coans, by their Embassadors sent to Rome, desired that the ancient right of Sanctuaries might be confirmed, the one for Juno, and the other for Æsculapius. [Ibid. cap. 14.]

Lucilius Longus died, the only partaker of the fortunes of Tiberius, both adverse and prosperous, and who only of all the Senators was his companion when he withdrew himself to Rhodes. [Ibid. cap. 15.]

Lucius Capito the Governour of Asia, is condemned at the accusation of the Province; for which revenge, and because in the former year they had been revenged of C. Silanus, the Cities of Asia decreed a Temple to Tiberius, his mother, and the Senate, and leave is given them to erect one. [Ibid.]

Valerius Gratus the Governour of Judea, taking away the High Priesthood from Annas (or Annas) made Imael the son of Fabus High Priest, whom also he cast out shortly after. [Ioseph. lib. 18. cap. 3.]

Imael being removed, Eleazar the son of Annas (or Annas formerly removed) by the name Valerius is made High Priest. [Ibid. lib. 18. cap. 3.]

Cassius Severus the Orator, who 17 years before was banished into Cret for his ill tongue by the decree of the Senate, and whereas he used the same thing there, he had all his estate taken from him, being forbid both water and fire, he is banished into the stony Island of Seriphus; where eight years after he ended his life in extreme poverty. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 11. Hieronymus in Chronica.]

P. Dolabella the Proconsul of Africa, calling to his aid with his Country men Protenus the son of Juba, King of Mauritania, slew Tacfarinas, and put an end to the Numidian war. The King of the Garamantes, who had helped Tacfarinas with light-armed men, that he sent from a far off, he being slain, sent Embassadors to give satisfaction to the people of Rome. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. a cap. 23. ad 26.]

Vibius Sereenas a banished man, being falsely accused by his son of treason, is condemned for an old grudge that Tiberius owed him: and whereas Gallus Ailius was of opinion that he should be confined, either to Gyarnor or Doufa, and that he might diminish the grudge, he milked that sentence; saying, That both those Islands wanted water, and that to whom life was granted, things necessary for life were also to be granted; whereupon Sereenas is banished to Amorgus, (one of the Sporades) [Ibid. cap. 28. 29. 30.]

Ten years of Tiberius's Empire being ended, he made no account of refusing it by any decree for ten years longer, neither did he intend to have it divided by ten years as Augustus had done, yet there were Decennial Games made. [Dio. lib. 57. pag. 619.]

Eleazar

Eleazar after one year, being removed, Valerius Gratus gives the High Priesthood to Simon the Son of Camithus. [Ioseph. lib. 18. cap. 3.]

The Citizens of Cyzicum because they had cast some Roman Citizens into prison, and had not perfected the Temple that they had begun to Augustus, as to a god, had their liberty again taken from them that they had merited by being besieged in the war of Mithridate. [Tacit. Annal. 4. cap. 36. Dio. lib. 57. pag. 619.]

Fortius Capito who had governed Asia as Proconsul, is abolished, it being found that he was falsely accused by Vibius Sereenas. [Tacit. Annal. 4. cap. 36.]

Eleven Cities of Asia strove with great ambition, in which of them the Temple that was appointed for Tiberius and the Senate should be built: and Tiberius heard their Embassadors disputing concerning this business in the Senate many dayes together. The Hyperboreans and Trallians, as also the Laodiceans and Magedians, are dismissed as not having strength enough; nor the Ilians when they related how Troy was the mother of Rome, had any good argument, but the glory of antiquity: there was some doubt, because the Halicarnassians affirmed that their City had not been shaken with an Earthquake for 1200 years, and that the foundation of their Temple was upon a natural rock. The Pergamenians grounding their reasons because they had Augustus his Temple among them, were thought to have enough because they had that. The Ephesians and Milefians were thought that their Cities were a ready taken up by the ceremony of those of Apollo, those of Diana, then the dispute came between the Sardians and Smyrnians, both whose reasons being heard, the Senate preferred the Smyrnians; and Volius Marus was of opinion, that M. Lepidus to whom that province belied, should have one chosen over and above to take a care of the temple, and because Lepidus through modesty refused to ensue one Valerius Nafio one that had been Praetor, was chosen by lot. [Ibid. cap. 55. 56.]

When Simon had continued one year in the Priesthood, Valerius Gratus made Joseph his successor in that dignity, Surnamed Capphas, the son in law of Annas or Ananias, that was formerly put out of the Priesthood. [Ioseph. XVIII. 13.] which annual changes of High-Priests being thus made, Josephus intimates, that Gratus altered he had been eleven years in Judea returned to Rome. [Ioseph. lib. 18. cap. 3.] by which reason also we are rather induced to refer these changes to the end of his government, than to the beginning.

Pontius Pilate came successor to Valerius Gratus [Ioseph. lib. 18. cap. 3.] who how he behaved himself in his government appeareth out of Philo, [in lib. de legat. ad Caium.] where he writes that he was afraid, lest the Emphasy that was sent by the Jews, the taking away of the bucklers to it were dedicated by him within the holy City, should also detect some other crime: as his sale of judgments, rapines, slaughters, rackings, often putting to death of men uncondemned, savage cruelty.

The XXX Jubilee and the last falling in the XXX year of our Lord Jesus Christ, and beginning of his Gospel: or proclaiming now by the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord making his paths straight. [Matth. 1. 12.] and opening the acceptable year of the Lord, or the time of his divine visit, in which the good God vouchsafed to manifest the great one unto the world. [Ioseph. LXI. 2. Luke. IV. 19.]

For in the 15 year of the principality of Tiberius Caesar, (which was the 15 of his monarchy, begun from the death of Augustus) Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea, Herod (Antipas) Tetrarch of Galilee, in brother Philip Tetrarch of Pontica and the region of Trachonitis, and Lysanias Tetrarch of Abiyne, under the Priesthood of Annas and Capphas, came the word of the Lord unto John the son of Zacharias in the desert, [Luke. III. 12.] according to whose command this Nazarene both Priest and Prophet of the Lord did baptize in the desert of Judea, (in which that there were Cities is mentioned in [Ioseph. XV. 16.] preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, [Matth. III. 1. Matth. 1. 4. Luke. III. 3.] doing his endeavour, that Christ that came after him should be made known to Israel, [Ioseph. 1. 7. 8. 13.] which that he might more certainly know, this sign is given to him of God; that upon whom he should see the Holy Ghost descending and remaining, that he should know that it was he that should baptize others with the Holy Ghost. [Ibid. v. 33.]

It is most probable that this his ministry began, on that most convenient day, the tenth day of the seventh month, (about the 19. day of our October, which was then pentecost), joyed with a solemn fast, in which whosoever did not afflict his soul, was to be cut off from his people, and also expiatory, in which the High-Priest went into the holy of holies, to expiate the sins of the people with blood that was offered; and that same day in which by a trumpet sounding the Jubilee was commanded to be declared over all the land. [Leviticus. XXV. 9.]

the blood of Christ that was to come, coming into every region round about Jordan, lifting up his voice like a trumpet proclaiming, Repent ye for the Kingdom of heaven is at hand, and then went out unto him Jerusalem and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, (especially of that huge multitude, which returned from Jerusalem, the feast of Tabernacles being ended, about the beginning of November) and were baptized of him in Jordan confessing their sins. [Matthew, III. 2. 3. 5. 6. Mark, I. 5.]

And John had his garment of Camels hair, and a girdle of skins about his loins, (like Elias II. Kings, I. 8.) and his food was locusts (a clean kind of meat Leviticus, XI. 22, but cheap) and wild honey. [Matthew, III. 4. Mark, V. 6.]

John sharply reproveth the Pharisees that came to his baptisms, [Luke, III. 10. 13.] whilst the people expected, and thought within their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ, he answered, Indeed baptize you with water, but there cometh one who is stronger than I, whose shoe I latchet I am not worthy to unloose, he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire, whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into his barn, and will burn up the chaffe with unquenchable fire. [Ibid, 15. 17. with Math. III. 11. 12. & Mark, I. 7. 8.]

When all the people were baptized, Jesus cometh from Nazareth of Galilee to Jordan, to be baptized of John, [Luke, III. 22. Math. III. 13. Mark I. 9.] which office he denying as he that had need to be baptized of him, and the Lord urging, that it behoveth that all righteousness be fulfilled, he baptized him, [Matthew, III. 14. 15.] Jesus then beginning to be about thirty years old. [Luke, III. 23.]

Then there was made a most illustrious manifestation of the Trinity, for the son of God in the humane nature, that he and the Father descending out of the water, and praying, the heavens being opened, the spirit of God was seen in a bodily shape like a dove, descending upon him, and the voice of the Father was heard from heaven saying, This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased. [Math. III. 16. 17. Mark, I. 10. 11. Luke, III. 21. 22.]

And Jesus being full of the Holy Ghost returned from Jordan, and was driven by the spirit into the desert; where for forty daies and nigths, being tempted of the Devil he remained among wild beasts, in a eating any thing, and when they were ended he was an hungered. [Luke, IV. 1. 2. Math. IV. 1. 2. Mark, I. 12. 13.]

Then Satan sets upon the Lord with a cruel temptation, all which temptation being ended he departed from him for a time; [Math. IV. 3. 11. Luke, IV. 3. 13.] and the Angels came and ministered unto him, [Math. 4. 11. Mark, I. 13.] and Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee. [Luke, 4. 14.]

Herod Agrippa the son of Aristobolus had by Cyprus the daughter of Phasaelus Agrippa the younger, the last King of the Jews, of whom in Acts XXV. & XXVI. is mention made, for he was 17 years old when his father died, [Josephus, lib. 18. cap. 7. lib. 19. cap. ult.]

4037. Berenice his sister of whom likewise mention is made in the Acts, is born afterwards married to Herod King of Chalcis, being sixteen years old when her father died, [Joseph. supra.]

4038. The fourth year of John Baptist ministry begins, in which his preparatory ministry (which was the chief part of his function) took end, the Lord himself, whose way he had hitherto prepared being come, and executing his prophetical office, and sealing it with famous miracles, for John did no miracle, for which magnificent preparation, so celebrated by Isay and Malachi to many ages before, none will wonder that so long space of time is assigned by us, who shall consider that a little time for so great a work would be too little, especially without the help of miracles, for the perfecting of so much as the Angel Gabriell confirmed to his father Zachary should be performed by him, [Luke, I. 16. 17.] Many of the children of Israel shall be turned to the Lord their God, and he shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, that he may turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just, and to prepare a people ready for the Lord; and those words of Paul argue that not a little space of time, but a full course of preaching was to be finished by John, before the coming of the Lord. [Acts, 13. 24. 25.] When John had first preached before his coming the baptism of repentance to all the people of Israel, and as John fulfilled his course, he said, whom I think ye that I am? I am not he, but behold there cometh one after me whose shoes of his feet I am not worthy to loose.

For John the next day after the coming of Christ, when the Jews from Jerusalem sent some Priests and Levites of the sect of the Pharisees, to him as he was baptizing at Bethabara by Jordan, to ask who he was, he professed clearly, that he was not the Christ: and when he had denied that he was Elias, or that Prophet fore-spoken of by by Moses, [Deut. XVIII. 15.] the same indeed with Christ, [Acts III. 22. VII. 37.] but by the Jews thought to be another) and had said that he was The voice of one crying in the wilderness, make straight the way of the Lord: and then added that testimony of Christ, (so praised of Paul; I baptize with water, but there standeth one amongst you, whom ye know not, he it is, who cometh after me, who is preferred before me, whose shoe I latchet I am not worthy to unloose.) [John, I. 19. 28. with V. 33.]

The next day John seeing Jesus coming unto him, saith, Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the World. This is he of whom I spake, there cometh one after me, that is preferred before me, for he was before me, &c. and I saw him, and testifie that this is the Son of God. [John, I. 29. 34.]

The next day John stood and two of his Disciples with him; and he beholding Jesus walking, said, Behold the Lamb of God: which the two disciples hearing, followed Jesus, and tarried with him that day, for it was about the tenth hour. Andrew being one of these, brought his brother Simon to Jesus, who seeing him, said, Thou art Simon, Sonne of Jonah, thou shalt be called Cephas. [Ibid. 35. 42.]

The next day Jesus, going into Galilee, commanded Philip (which was of Bethsaida, the City of Andrew and Simon Peter) to follow him. He finding Nathanael under a fig-tree, brings him to Jesus, who pronounceth him truly to be an Israelite, in whom there was no guile; and that he was that Ladder of Heaven, (fore-telven in Jacob's dream, Gen. XXVIII. 12.) upon which the Angels of God were seen ascending and descending. [Ibid. 42. 51.]

On the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee, to which Jesus was invited, together with his Mother and his Disciples, where he made water, being turned into wine, the beginning of his miracles: and his glory-being in this wile made manifest, his disciples believed on him. [John, II. 1. 11.]

After that He goeth down to Capernaum, He, his Mother and Brethren, (or kind-men) and his Disciples; and tarried there many daies. [John II. 12.]

Now we are come to the publick Ministry of Christ, whose Acts we do, here set forth according to four distinct Passovers, out of the Harmony of the four Gospels, contrived by that learned man, and much excelled in the studies of the Holy Scriptures, John Richardson, Dr. of Divinity, and worthy Bishop of Ardagh, in our Province of Armagh; in which this is singular, that Matthew is found only to have neglected the order of time, which is constantly observed by the other three, (if you will except the parenthesis of Johns being cast into prison by Herod) [Luke III. 9. 20.]

FIRST PASSEOVER
OF THE MINISTRY of CHRIST. [John II. 13.]

From which the first year of the seventieth and last week of Daniell begins; in which the Covenant is confirmed with Many, (Dan. 9. 27. compared with Matth. 26. 28.)

Jesus goeth to Jerusalem to the Passeeover.

Going into the Temple, he scourgeth out them that bought and sold there; and for a signe of his authority, he declares unto them, how that the Temple of his body should be dissolved by the Jews, and be raised again by himself.

He worketh miracles, and many believe on him, but he did not commit himself unto them, because he knew what is in man.

He instructs Nicodemus the Disciple, that came to him by night, in the mystic of regeneration in faith in his death, and in the condemnation of the unbelievers.

Leaving Jerusalem, he goeth into the land of Judea with his Disciples.

He carries there and baptizeth. (viz. by the hand of the Disciples, that had been before baptized, either by Himself, or John) John then baptized in Enon, for he was not yet cast into prison.

There ariseth a question between some of
Johns Disciples and the Jews about purifying.

John instructs his Disciples, telling him of Jesus in emulation, concerning himself and his office, and of the excellence of Jesus Christ the son of God: giving this notable and last testimony of him before his imprisonment.

Herod the Tetrarch cast John into prison, for reprehending his incest with his brother Philips wife, and other evils done by him.

John hearing that John was cast into prison, and that the Pharisees had heard that there were many made Disciples by him, and baptized, viz. by the hand of his Disciples, he left Judea (when he had stayed about eight moneths) and went into Galilee.

But he must needs go through Samaria, where he brings the Samaritan woman, near the City Sychar,

Sychar, and the Citizens of Sychar to the acknowledgement of him, four moneths before harvest, (or the Passeeover about the middle of the ninth moneth, called Ab.)

After he had stayed two dayes in Sychar, he goes onward in his journey into Galilee. (Which is his second return from Judea into Galilee, after his bap-tisme.

Being received of the Galileans, who had seen what things he had done at Jerusalem; he preach-eth with great fame in their Synagogues.

In Cana he heales the son of a Nobleman, that lay sick. This was the second miracle that Jesus did in Galilee.

He worketh miracles in Capernaum, and afterwards comes to Nazareth where he was brought up.
And entering into the Synagogue, as his custom was, he expounded the Prophecie of Esay, of himself: the Citizens first wondering, but afterwards being filled with wrath, they thrust him out of the City, endeavouring to cast him down headlong from a hill; but he passing thorough the middle of them, went his way.

Then leaving Nazareth he dwells at Capernaum and there teacheth them on the Sabbath dayes: and they are astonish'd at his doctrine.

In the Synagogue of Capernaum he cast out an unclean spirit, commanding him that he should not tell who he was.

And he arose out of the Synagogue, and went into the house of Simon and Andrew, and heales Simons wives mother that lay sick of a fever.

About Sun-set he heales all sick folke that are brought unto him, and casts out Devils, commanding them to hold their peace.

In the morning he goeth into a desert place to pray: and when Simon and others sought and would have stayed him; he answereth them, That he must preach to other Cities also.

He goes thorough all Galilee, and teacheth in their Synagogues, and casts out devils.

As he stood by the lake of Genasareth, a great multitude pressed upon him, therefore he entred into Simons ship, and taught the multitude from thence.

And when he had left speaking, at his command there is a great draught of fishes taken; whereat Simon-Peter, and Andrew, James, and John, being astonish'd, he commands them to follow him, and he makes them fishers of men.

And Jesus went thorough all Galilee, teaching in their Synagogues, and healing every disease; and his fame went into all Syria; and a great multitude followed him.

In a certain City he heales a Leger, who although he were forbid, yet publisheth it: and they come to him from every place; to hear him, and to be healed: inasmuch that he could no more enter openly into the City, but was in desert places, and prayed.

And again he entred into Capernaum the own City, after some dayes, and taught them at home: and before the Scribes and Pharisees, and a great multitude, forgives sins to one sick of the Palfie, that was let down thorough the roof of the house, and heals the disease to the astonishment of all.

And Jesus went forth again by the sea side, and all the multitude came unto him, and he taught them; and as he passed by he saw, and called Levi, or Matthew sitting at the receipt of custom.

Jesus in the house of Levi, defends both himself and his Disciples, for that they eat with Publicans, and excommunicate and vindicate them, against the Pharisees, for their not fasting.

And it came to passe on the second Sabbath after the first, (that is, the first Sabbath of the new year, instituted after their coming out of Egypt, and beginning from the moneth Nisan, or Abib.) Jesus going thorough the corn fields, clears his Disciples from the reprehension of the Pharisees, because they plucked the ears of corn; and explains the doctrine of the Sabbath.

The second PASSEOVER of the Ministry of CHRIST, John, V. 1. compared with IV. 3, 5. from which the second year of the LXX. week of Daniel begins.

After these things was the Feast of the Jews, and Jesus went up to Jerusalem, and heales on the Sabbath day a man that had had an infirmity thirty eight years, lying at the poole of Bethesda: and makes a most divine Apology to the Jews seeking to kill him, because he said that God was his Father.

And he went from thence, and entred again into a Synagogue, and taught, and heales one that had a withered hand: and the Pharisees went forth, and straightway with the Herodians took counsel how they might destroy him.

But Jesus when he knew this, withdrew himself to the sea, and healed the multitudes that followed him; straitly charging them that they should not make him known, and commanded his Disciples that a small ship should waite on him, because of the multitude that thronged him.

And it came to passe in those dayes, that he went into a mountain to pray, and continued in prayer all night: and when it was day, he chose twelve, whom he called Apostles, that are specified by name.

And he came down with them and stood in a plain, a great multitude coming unto him, and he healed them all.

And they went into a house, and the multitude cometh together again, so that they could not so much as eate bread: and when his kinsmen heard of it they went to lay hold on him, for they said, he is beside himself.

When he saw the multitude, he went up into a mountain, and when he was set, his Disciples came unto him. Then he preaches that long and excellent Sermon, first to the Apostles, and afterwards to all the people.

Now when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people, he entred into Capernaum, and heales the Centurions servant that lay sick of the paltic ready to die.

The day following he goes into the City of Naim, and raises one that was dead and carried out, which was the only son of a widow, whereupon his fame spread abroad.

John being in prison, being moved with the relation of his disciples concerning the fame and deeds of Jesus, sends two of them to him, saying, Art thou he that was to come, or shall we look for another, who when they were returned with his answer, he gives a large testimony of John: he then upbraides some Cities for their ingratitude, and willingly rests in the sole good pleasure of his Father, hiding him from some and revealing him to other.

And Simon the Pharisee desired him that he would eate with him, and as they were at meat, he contends against Simon, and absolves the woman a sinner that washed his feet with her teares, and wiped them with the haire of her head, both kissing and anointing them.

And it came to passe afterward that he went from City to City preaching, and his disciples were with him, and certain women ministered unto him.

They bring unto him one that had an aduelt, that was both blind and dumb, and he healed him, and eagerly contends himself against the Pharisees and Scribes that came down from Jerusalem that blasphemed him saying, he casteth out devils through Beelzebub.

Then answered some of the Scribes and Pharisees, saying, Master. We would see a sign of thee, to whom when he had sharply rebuked them, he gives no other sign than that of Jonas.

And while he spake to the people, it was told him, that his mother and brethren, stood without desiring to see him and speake with him, but Jesus answering, shewes them whom he accounts for his mother and brother and sister.

The same day Jesus went out of the house, and sat by the sea side, and great multitudes were gathered unto him, so that he went into a ship, and sat, and taught the multitudes many things, by the parable of the sower, and many other parables.

And the same day when it was evening, he said unto them, let us launch forth unto the other side of the lake; when he had given an answer to some that would follow him, and sent away the multitude, they took him even as he was in the ship, and there arose a great tempest, but he rebukes the wind and calmes the sea, and saves his disciples.

And they came unto the other side, into the Country of the Gadarenes, or Gergesens, which is on the opposite shore to Galilee, and when he was come to land, there met him, two possessed with devils, very fierce, (Marke and Luke speak but of one) out of whom the devils that being cast, Jesus suffering them, enter into the swine, upon the Gadarens requesting him to quit their coasts; and the possessed persons importuning him, that he might abide with him, (who notwithstanding was denied, and sent back to publish about Decapolis what great things Jesus Jesus had done for him) he passed over again by ship unto the other side: and from thence went unto his own City: [Capernaum.]

And it came to passe that when Jesus was returned, the people received him gladly, for they waited for him, and he was by the sea side.

Then came to him the disciples of John, saying, why do we and thou Pharisees fast oft, but thy disciples fast not to whom he gives his answer.

While he yet spake, behold there cometh Jairus one of the rulers of the Synagogues, and besought him greatly for his only daughter of about twelve years old who lay at point of death, as he was going, even at Jairus door, a woman that had an issue of blood twelve years is suddenly healed by touching the hem of Jesus his garment, and the daughter of Jairus now already dead is restored to life by his word only, and likewise straightly chargeth, that no man should know it.

When he departed thence, two blind men followed him, whose eyes he opened, straightly charging (but to no purpose) that no man should know it.

As they went out, behold, they brought unto him a dumb man possessed with a devil, and when the devil was cast out the dumb spake, and the multitude marvelled, but the Pharisees blasphemed.

And he went round about all their Cities and villages, teaching, and healing their diseases, then he comes into his own Country, and his disciples follow him, and teaching in their Synagogue on the sabbath day, he is again contemned of them, and called the Carpenter, notwithstanding they were astonished at his doctrine.

And he went round about their villages, teaching.

And he was moved with compassion towards the multitude, when he saw the great harvest, and the few labourers, and saith to his disciples, that they should pray the Lord that he would send forth Labourers.

Then he sends the twelve Apostles, by two and two, sufficiently instructed with commands and power, to preach and heal diseases.

And it came to passe when Jesus had made an end of commanding his disciples, he departed thence to teach and to preach in their Cities.

And the twelve departed, and went through the Townes preaching the Gospel and healing every where.

The seventeenth of November, Sejanus was killed, [Tacit. Annal. 6. cap. 25.] who being taken away, Tiberius straightway knew that all the crimes that he had accused the Jews of were feigned by himself. Wherefore Tiberius commanded the governors of all provinces, that in every Town they should spare this nation, except very few that were guilty persons, but that they should alter none of their customs, but should take much account of the men as lovers of peace, and their customs as conducing to publick tranquillity. [Philos. de Legat. ad Caium.]

Severus, the Governour of Egypt being dead, Tiberius made Flaccus Avilius, one of his friends, his successor for six years: who governed well that Province for the five first years, as long as Tiberius lived. [Philos. in Flac.]

John

John Baptit is beheaded,

When his Disciples heard this, they came and took up the body, and buried it, and came and told Jesus.

The opinions of Herod the Tetrarch, and others hearing of the fame of Jesus, which Herod desired to see him.

The Apostles being returned, tell Jesus what things they had done.

When Jesus had heard of the death of John, and of the deeds of the Apostles, he said unto them, Come yet your selves apart into a desert place, and rest a while, for by reason of the multitude they had not leisure to eat, he therefore, taking the twelve with him, went by ship privately into a desert place of the City, called Bethsaida. But when the multitude heard it, they followed him on foot out of all Cities, and overtook him, and he taught and healed them.

And Jesus went up into a mountain, and there sat with his Disciples, and the Passover was nigh. And when it was evening, he feeds above five thousand men, besides women and children, with five barley loaves, and two little fishes, and there remaineth twelve baskets full of fragments. And when they would have made him a King, Jesus constrained his Disciples to go before him unto the other side, opposite to Bethsaida, towards Capernaum. And he himself went into a mountain apart to pray: and when they had gone about 25 or 30 furlongs, in the fourth watch of the night, Jesus goes to them, walking upon the sea, and would have passed by them, and tells them, they being affrighted, who he is, and rebuking, saves Peter ready to sink, and they were amazed. And they drew to shore, and came to the land of Genesaret: and when he was come out of the ship, as soon as it was known, they brought their sick, that they might touch the hem of his garment, and they were made whole.

The next day, after Jesus was passed over, the people which stood on this side the sea, took shipping and came to Capernaum seeking Jesus: to whom he preacheth in the Synagogue of Capernaum of the bread of life, and affirms to the Jews that murmured that he was the bread of life. From that time many of his Disciples went back, but the Apostles would not go away; notwithstanding, he calls one of them a devil.

The third PASSEOVER of the Ministry of CHRIST, [John VI 4] From which the third year of the LXX week of Daniel begins.

THE Scribes and Pharisees which came from Jerusalem, came to Jesus, and when they saw some of his Disciples eat with defiled, viz. unwashen hands, they found fault. That they did not walk after the tradition of the Elders:

Elders: to whom he answers concerning tradition, that they frustrated the command of God, that they might keep the traditions of men, and teacheth the people, which also he expounds to his Disciples at home, that nothing that entrench into a man, but that that cometh from within, that defileth a man.

And he arose from thence, and went into the borders of Tyre and Sidon, and he could not be hid. For a Canaanitish woman, a Gentile, a Syrophenician by nation, came to him, earnestly beseeching him for her daughter, that was vexed with a devil: whom having praised for the greatness of her faith, he casts out the devil of her daughter.

And again departing from the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he came unto the sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coast of Decapolis, and they bring unto him one that was deaf, and had an impediment in his speech, whom he heals, charging him that he should tell no man, but in vain.

When he went up into a mountain he sat there, and healeth many, and the multitude wondered.

In those days, when there was a very great multitude remaining with him three days in the desert, he feeds four thousand men, besides women and children, with seven loaves, and a few little fishes, and there remaineth seven baskets full of fragments.

And straightway entering into a ship with his disciples, he came into the parts of Dalmanutha, or the coasts of Magdala.

And the Pharisees came, requiring of him a sign from Heaven, who after he had deeply sighed, denies any sign but that of Jonas; to those hypocrites that knew how to discern the face of the sky. And, leaving them, entered again into the ship, and passed to the other side.

And when his Disciples were come unto the other side, they had forgotten to take bread, and they had but one loaf with them in the ship. Then Jesus saith unto them, take heed of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, and the leaven of Herod: they reasoning among themselves, because they had forgotten to take bread: Jesus rebuking them that they had forgotten the miraculous multiplication of the loaves, gives them to understand that he spake not of the leaven of bread, but of doctrine.

Then he cometh to Bethsaida, and they bring him a blind man, who being led out of the Town, and having his eyes anointed with spittle, recovered his sight, and is forbidden to tell of it.

And Jesus went and his Disciples into the Towns of Cæsarea Philippi. And it came to pass as he was alone praying, and was now in the way, that he asked his Disciples, Whom do men say that I am? when they had answered, he saith unto them, But whom do ye say? And when Peter had answered, he pronounceth him happy, annexing promises, and forbids his Disciples to tell any man, that he was the Christ. He foretells of his death and resurrection, and calls Peter, Satan, because he rebuked him for so saying. Then he preacheth to his Disciples and the multitude, of the Crosse that every one must bear that will follow him; and at length foretells his transfiguration.

And it came to pass about eight days after these sayings, (or six intermediate days) that he was transfigured in a high mountain: and when they came down from the mountain, he charged them that they should tell no man what they had seen, till he was risen from the dead; and they kept it close, questioning one the other, what the rising from the dead should mean. And they asked him, Why do the Scribes say that Elias must first come? and they received an answer, by which they understood that Jesus spake of John Baptist, that Elias.

And it came to pass the next day, when they were come down from the hill, and that he was come to his Disciples, he saw a great multitude about them, and the Scribes questioning with them: and straightway all the multitude, when they saw him, were greatly amazed, and running to him, saluted him; and as he was asking about their questioning with them, the father of a lunatick child answered him, that it was about his child that had an unclean spirit, both deaf and dumb, and that his Disciples could not cast him out: then Jesus, having cast out the spirit, restores the child whole to his father, and being at home, shews his Disciples the reason why they could not cast out this devil.

And they departed thence, and passed through Galilee, and he would not that any man should know it: and he taught his Disciples concerning his death and resurrection: but they understood not that saying; and being exceedingly sorry, were afraid to ask him.

When they were come to Capernaum, they ask Peter about Jesus his paying tribute money. And when Jesus was come into the house, he prevents Peter, telling him that he should find a piece of money in a fishes mouth, and bidding pay that for tribute, both for himself and Jesus.

At Capernaum, Jesus asks his Disciples, what it was that they disputed among themselves by the way, at which they were silent at the first, but then told him that it was about, Who should be greatest in the kingdom of Heaven: then taking a child, and setting him in the midst, teacheth them that they should have humility, even as a child. He warns the World of offences; and that we must take heed, that neither hand, foot, nor eye, make thee to offend. That little ones are not to be despised. How our brother sinning against us, is to be reprov'd, and also to be bound and loosed of the Church, and to be forgiven till seventy times seven times, as he shews in the parable of two debtors to the King.

But John answered, saying, we saw one casting out devils, through thy name, whom Jesus teacheth that he was not to be forbidden; and again warns them of not offending little ones, and to take heed again, that neither hand, foot, or eye, cause thee to offend.

At Rome it was propounded in the Senate by Quintilian, Tribune of the people, concerning the Sybels book, which C. Cinnus Gallus, one of the fifteen requested, might be received among other books of the same propheticke, and pressed for a Decree of the Senate, to raise it. Which being done by joynt vote, Tiberius sent letters, wherein he somewhat sparingly checked the Tribune, as not being well versed in the old customs, by reason of his youth, but took up Gallus very smartly, who being a man of years, and well experienced in the ceremonies, had notwithstanding moved the business at such time when the house was but thin, many of the Senators being absent: the author of the Poem uncertain, before the Colledge had delivered their opinions, or the Poem had been revised and adjudged by the masters of the Priests according to the usual custom. Whereupon the book was referred to the cognizance of the Fifteen. [ Tacit. Annal. lib. 6. cap. 3. ]

After these things Jesus walked in Galilee, for he would not walk in Jewry, because the Jews sought to kill him. Now the Feast of Tabernacles was at hand. Jesus goeth not up to the Feast, as his brethren would have him, who as yet believed not on him, but goeth up after them, not openly, but as it were in secret.

And it came to passe, when the time was come, that he should be received up, he set his face to go to Jerusalem; and he sent messengers before his face, and they went into a Village of the Samaritans, to make ready for him, but they would not receive him, wherefore they went into another City, having rebuked his Disciples that would have commanded fire to come down from Heaven upon them.

And it came to passe as they went in the way, Jesus gave an answer particularly to some that would follow him.

After these things Jesus sent LXX Disciples by two and two into every City and place, where he himself would come, giving them instructions, and arming them with power.

The multitude enquiring after him, and murmuring concerning him, Jesus in the middle of the feast teacheth in the Temple; and they wondering at his doctrine, he answereth, that his doctrine is not his own, but his that sent him. He answereth many things to them, reproaching and objecting against him, and Officers are sent to apprehend him. In the last and great day of the Feast, Jesus crying out concerning faith in him, there is a division concerning him among the people: but the Officers that were sent, and Nicodemus, defend both his person and cause before the Pharisees that spake against him.

Jesus went into the Mount of Olives, and early in the morning he sat and taught in the Temple, where not willing to condemn (as a Judge) the woman taken in adultery, warnes her to sin no more. Teaching in the Treasury of the Temple, He affirmes that he is the Light of the World, and defends his teaching record of himself, teacheth many things concerning the Father himself: whither he goes, who he is; of their father Abraham: of the levitude of sin and the Devil: of himself that he had not a Devil, as they supposed: that whosoever kept his laying, should not taste of death; concluding with these words, Before Abraham was I am: whereupon they take up stones to throw at him; but Jesus hid himself, and went out of the Temple, going thorough the midst of them, and so passed by.

And as Jesus passed by, he saw one begging that was blind from his youth, who being made to see, after many examinations, both of himself and parents, being cast out of the Synagogue, worships Jesus.

He preacheth moreover that he is the door of the sheep; and that good shepherds, and of thieves and hirelings: and there was a division again among the Jews for these sayings.

The LXX return with joy, whom he farther warns and instructs: and rejoicing in spirit, he tells them privately, that their eyes are happy.

Then behold a certain Lawyer asks him, what he must do to inherit eternal life. Jesus lends him to the Law, and he is taught by the Parable of the man that fell among thieves, who is his neighbour.

Now it came to passe as he went he came to a certain town, and is received into the house of Martha, the her self ministering unto them, whilst Mary heard the word of Jesus, for which she is preferred before Martha.

And it came to passe as he was praying in a certain place, when he ceased, one of his Disciples said unto him, Lord teach us to pray, as John taught his Disciples. Wherefore he the second time prebites unto them the Lords prayer; using arguments also to stir them up to constancy in prayer, and for the confirmation of their faith in obtaining.

And he cast out a devil that was dumb, and the multitude marvelled: and he confirms against some blasphemers, that he casts not out devils through Beelzebub.

And it came to passe as he spake these things, that a certain woman of the company said unto him, Blessed is the womb that bare thee: to whom he replies.

And when the multitude were gathered thick together, he began to say; This generation seeketh a sign, but there shall none be given but that of Jonas: adding, that the Queen of the South, and the Ninivites, shall condemn this generation, and that heed must be taken that the light that is in thee be not darkness.

When he had spoken these things, a certain Pharisee besought him that he would dine with him. Wondering that Jesus had not first washed, he is severely reprehended with the rest of the Pharisees by Jesus for their outward holiness, or simulation, inward wickedness, covetousness, and pride: and a woe pronounced likewise to the Lawyers.

In the mean time, when there were gathered together an innumerable company, Jesus saith to his Disciples, Take heed of the Leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy: And not to tear them which kill the body.

And one of the company said unto him, Speak to my brother that he divide the inheritance with me. To whom he saith, Who made me a Judge? and upon this occasion, preached against covetousness, in the Parable of the rich man that would build greater barns: and against an anxious distrustful and unprofitable carking about the necessities of this life, bidding, that they rather seek the Kingdom of God, and to be like them that wait for the coming of their Lord, as it becometh a faithful and wise Steward: and saith, that he will send the fire of division on the earth; and upbraides them, that they cannot find out that this is the appointed time.

And there were present at that season, some that sold him of the Gentiles, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices: from whence, he preacheth repentance, and propounds the Parable of the fig-tree, not having fruit.

And he taught in one of the Synagogues on the Sabbath day, and behold there was a woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together; whom he heals on the Sabbath, and defends the deed against the Ruler of the Synagogues indignation. Then he likens the Kingdom of Heaven to a grain of mustard-seed, and to leaven.

And he went through all the Cities and Villages teaching and journeying towards Jerusalem: viz. to the Feast of Dedication.

Then said one unto him, Are there few that shall be saved? to whom he answereth, That they must strive to enter in at the strait gate.

On the same day, some of the Pharisees came to him, saying, Get thee out, and depart hence, for Herod will kill thee: to whom he gives a resolute answer.

And it came to pass as he went into the house of one of the chief Pharisees to eat bread, there was present one who had the Dropsie, whom he heals, and defends the deed, though done on the Sabbath; and speaks a Parable to them that were bidden, and instructeth him that had invited him.

And when one of them that sat at meat with him, heard these things, he saith unto him, Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the Kingdom of God: to whom he answereth, and propounds the Parable of the great Supper, and of each excuse that those that were invited made.

And there was a great multitude that went with him, and he turned, and preacheth unto them, that life itself is to be laid down for Christ: propounding unto them the Parables of the man that was about to build a Tower, and of the King going to war.

And there came to him all the Publicans and sinners for to hear him, and the Scribes and Pharisees murmured. He speaks unto them the Parables of the lost sheep, of the goat, and of the prodigal son.

He tells his Disciples the Parable of the unjust Steward accused unto his Lord: together with the application of the same: and the Pharisees heard all these things, and they were covetous, and derided him. He then preacheth against them, and teacheth many other things, and declares the Parable of the rich man farcing deliciously, and of Lazarus the beggar.

He saith to his Disciples: woe to them by whom offences come, and teacheth that thy brother sinning against thee is to be forgiven.

Then said the Apostles, Lord increase our faith, to whom he answers concerning the power of faith, and by the Parable of the servant coming from plough, and straightway ministering, sheweth that they are unprofitable servants, when they have done all, for they have done no more, than what was their duty.

And it came to pass as he went to Jerusalem, that he passed thorough the midst of Samaria and Galilee, and as he entered into a certain village, there met him ten Lepers, who as they were going (by the command of Jesus) to the Priests, were made clean: of whom one of them comes back to Jesus to give him thanks, and he was a Samaritan.

And being asked of the Pharisees, when the Kingdom of God will come? he answered, That the Kingdom of God will not come with observation: but that it is within; and saith to his Disciples, That according to the days of Noe and Lot: So shall be the day in which the Son of Man shall be revealed: but he must first suffer many things.

And he spake unto them a Parable that they should always pray, by the example of a widow interceding towards the unjust Judge: whereas God is a just Revenger.

He spake also some that persuaded themselves that they were just, and despised others, the Parable of the Pharisee and Publican praying in the Temple.

And it was at Jerusalem the Feast of the Dedication, and it was winter, and Jesus walked in the Temple in Solomon's Porch: then came the Jews round about him, and said unto him, How long dost thou make us to doubt, if thou be the Christ, tell us plainly? which he avoucheth by his works, and saying, I and my Father are one, they again took up stones to stone him: and defending himself to be God, by the Scriptures, and his works, they sought again to take him, but he escaped out of their hands.

And he went again beyond Jordan, into the place where John first baptized, and there he abode, and many resorted unto him; and as he was wont, he taught them and healed them, and many believed on him there.

There came to him the Pharisees, tempting him, and saying, It is lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? Jesus denies it, and gives an answer, both to the Pharisees, objecting the bill of divorce which Moses commanded, and also to his Disciples saying, That then it is better for a man not to marry.

They bring unto him little children that he should lay his hands upon them, and pray, and his Disciples forbade them (for which being rebuked) after he had laid his hands upon them and blessed them, he departed thence.

Jesus going out from thence, as he was in the way, there meets him, a young man, one of the Rulers, very rich, saying unto him, Good Master, what must I do to inherit eternal life? Jesus having spoken concerning the title he gave him, lends him to the Commandments, who replying that he had observed them, Jesus loves him; but bidding him sell all that he had,

He inveighes bitterly against covetous rich men: And upon Peters saying, Behold we have left all and follow'd thee; he makes notable promises to all that follow him, some whereof were peculiar to the twelve Apostles: Adding withall, that many which were first should be last, and those which were last should be first, which he declares by a parable of labourers into a vineyard: for many were called, but few chosen.

Lazarus of Bethanie was sick; his sisters therefore sent to Jesus to tell him of his sickness, as soon as he heard that he was sick, he carries two daies in the place where he was, but afterwards he saith to his disciples, let us go again into Judea, who say to him, the Jews of late sought to stone thee, and goest thou thither again. Jesus answering saith unto them, Lazarus sleepeth (speaking of his death, not of his sleep) Let us go to him, saith Thomas, that we may die with him.

Jesus comes nigh unto Bethanie, and finds that Lazarus had been buried four daies in the grave: Martha comes to meet him, they discourse concerning the resurrection. Mary hearing of it comes quickly to him, without the town, where Martha met him, who seeing her weep, Jesus wept, and comes to the grave, bidding them remove the stone, and giving thanks to his father, calls Lazarus out of his grave, wherupon many beleeve on him, and some going to the Pharisees, telling what things Jesus had done.

They called therefore a councill, where Caiaphas prophesied concerning Jesus, and from that day consulted together that they might put him to death, commanding that if any one knew where he was they should give notice that they might take him. Jesus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews but went unto a City called Ephraim, and there continued with his disciples.

As they were in the way going up to Hierusalem, and Jesus went before them, and they were afraid, and he taketh again the twelve, and began to tell them what thing should happen unto him, but they understood none of these things.

Then came to him James and John the sons of Zebedee and their mother, desiring that they might sit one on the right hand the other on the left of Jesus who being repulled with his answer, and the rest being displeased, all are admonished that he that will be great, and first among them, must be the minister and servant of all.

And it came to passe when he came nigh Jericho, a certain blind man sat begging, by the way side, asking who it was that passed by, and knowing that it was Jesus of Nazareth, he though rebuked, earnestly implored his mercy, and being called unto him he receives his sight, and followes him glorifying God.

And Jesus entered and passed through Jericho, and seeing Zachæus in a sycamore tree, he saith unto him, I must abide at thy house to day.

And as they went out from the city Jericho, a great company following him, he restores sight to two blind men (whereof one was Bartimeus,) and they followed him.

When

When they heard these things, because they were nigh to Hierusalem, and because they thought that the Kingdom of God should immediately appear, going on, he spake the parable of the noble man that went into a far Country, who gave his ten servants ten pounds to occupy till he returned, and when he returned, knowing which had gained most by trading, he rewards each of them according to the proportion of their gain.

And the Passover was at hand, and many went out of the Country up to Hierusalem before the Passover, that they might purifie themselves.

Jesus therefore six daies before the Passover comes to Bethanie, and they made him a supper, and Lazarus sat with him, where Mary anoints his feet, and wipes them with the haire of her head, whom Jesus defends against Judas: and much people came thither, not only for Jesus sake, but that they might see Lazarus: but the chief Priests consulted how they might put Lazarus to death, because many of the Jews beleeved by reason of him.

And when he had thus spoken, he went before, ascending up to Jerusalem: and it came to passe when he was nigh Bethphage and Bethany, at the Mount called the Mount of Olives (the 29 day of March) he sent two of his Disciples for an Asse Colt that was tied, (Matthew makes mention of the three Asse colts.)

They brought therefore the Colts unto Jesus, and cast their garments upon the Colt, and set Jesus thereon, & much people that came to the feast met him, many casting their garments in the way, others cut down branches of trees, & strowed them in the way. And when he was come to the descent of the Mount of Olives, the company that went before, & that followed cried Hosanna to the son of David: And some of the Pharisees saying unto him, Rebuke thy Disciples, he answereth them, The Pharisees thy Disciples said among themselves, Perceive ye not that we prevail nothing, behold the World is gone after him.

And when he came nigh, seeing the City, he wept over it, foretelling the utter destruction thereof.

And when he was entered into Jerusalem, all the City was moved, saying, Who is this?

And Jesus went into the Temple of God, and cast out those that bought and sold in it, and heals both blind & lame in it, and justifies the children crying Hosanna in the Temple, against the Priests and Scribes that were displeased at it, he teacheth daily in the Temple, them that heard him being very attentive, but the chief Priests and Elders of the people seeking to destroy him.

Some Greeks of those that came to worship at the Feast desire to see him, he answereth them that tell him, by preaching of his person, and calling upon his Father, receives an answer from Heaven, which some think to be Thunder, others an Angel: and speaking again of the lifting up of the Son of Man from the earth: he answereth them that ask him, who is this Son of Man? And going from thence he hid himself from them: and when it was evening, he went with the twelve unto Bethany; and when he had done so many miracles among them, they did not beleeve in him, that the word of Elias might be fulfilled. Yet nevertheless many of the Rulers believed.

believed

believed on him, but did not confesse for fear of the Pharisees; he crying out therefore, preacheth concerning faith in him.

And on the morrow, when he came from Bethany, he was hungry, and seeing a fig-tree, that had only leaves on it, he curseth it, and it straightway withered. They come to Jerusalem, and entering into the Temple, he again cast out those that bought and sold, and would not that any should carry a vessel through the Temple, and crying out, he teacheth concerning faith in himself, but the chief Priests fought how they might destroy him, for they feared him, because all the people were astonished at his doctrine, and when evening was come, Jesus went out of the City.

And in the morning, as they passed by the fig-tree, they saw that it was dried up from the roots, which Peter shewing, he preacheth unto them of the power and virtue of faith, but especially in prayers. And they come again to Jerusalem, and as he was walking in the Temple and teaching the chief Priests, Elders and Scribes come unto him, saying, by what authority dost thou do these things? Jesus answereth them, by asking them concerning Johns Baptism. And he spake unto them the parable of the two sons, asking them, which of the two did the will of the father, and applies it unto them: as also the parable of the Vineyard let out to Husband-men, and their killing of the Heir of the Vineyard, together with the application thereof, from that hour therefore they sought to take him, but they feared the people, for they took him for a Prophet. Again he propounds to them the parable, of the marriage of the Kings son, and the refusal and excuses of some that were bidden, and the wickedness and punishments of others, especially of him that had not on the wedding garment, then went the Pharisees and took counsel how they might intangle him in his talk; wherefore they sent out unto him their Disciples with the Herodians, saying, Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar or not? who being astonished at his answer, left him, and went their way.

The same day come to him the Sadducees, asking him of the woman, that had the seven brethren for her husbands, which of them should be her husband in the resurrection; and when the multitude heard his answer to prove the resurrection, they were astonished at his doctrine. Then a Pharisee, a Lawyer, tempteth him, asking him which is the great commandment in the law? to whom he answers, and asks the Pharisee, whose Son Christ is? and no man was able to answer him a word, neither durst any man from that day forth, ask him any more question.

Then Jesus speaks to the multitude, and to his Disciples; concerning the Scribes and Pharisees, denouncing a woe eight times against them, and speaking to the City Jerusalem, accuteth her of cruelty and obstinacy, and foretells her desolation.

And as Jesus sat over against the Treasury, he prefers a widow casting in two mites, before them that cast in more.

When he went out of the Temple, his Disciples shewing him the buildings and stones, he foretells the ruine thereof.

And as he sat on the Mount of Olives, over against the Temple, his Disciples asked him, when these things shall be, and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and the end of the World? to whom he at large answers concerning the signs: of them both: and warns them to watch and to be ready for they know not the hour when the Lord will come. And teacheth the same thing by the Parable of the ten Virgins, as also by the Parable of the talents delivered to the servants to trade withal, and delivereth the judgement of this World (perhaps as a type of that) by setting the sheep on the right hand, and the goats on the left, and giving sentence upon each of them. By day he taught in the Temple, but by night he went into the Mount of Olives, and all the people coming unto him early in the morning, he taught them in the Temple.

And it came to passe when Jesus had finished these sayings, he saith to his Disciples, Ye know that after two dayes is the Passover, and the son of man shall be betrayed to be crucified. Then they consulted together in the Palace of the High Priests, that they might kill Jesus; but they said, not in the Feast day, lest there be an uprore among the people.

And as he was in the house of Simon the Leper, he defends a woman that poured an alabastrer box of ointment on his head, as he sat at meat, against his Disciples that murmured, foretelling his burial.

Then entred Satan into Judas, who offers himself, and covenants to betray him.

IN the first day of unleavened bread, when the Passeeover was slain (April 2.) his Disciples asking him, where they should prepare it; He sends Peter and John into the City, telling them that, there should meet them a man carrying a pitcher of water, by following of whom, they should find a guest-chamber ready furnished by the good man of the house.

And in the evening he cometh with the twelve, and when they had sat down, and eaten, Jesus said, I have greatly desired to eat this Passeeover with you, before I suffer; and he commanded them to divide the Cup among themselves, saying, I will not any more eat of the Passeeover, or drink of the fruit of the Vine, until the kingdom of God shall come. And he saith, one of you shall betray me; and they began to be sorrowful, and to say unto him, one by one, one, Is it I? He answered, It is he that dipped his hand with me in the dish, and to Judas asking, is it I? he saith, thou hast said.

When they were eating, he institutes the sacrament of his body in bread; and in wine, after he had supped that of his blood, adding, I will not henceforth drink of the fruit of the Vine, till I shall drinke it n. w. with you in the Kingdome of my father. But behold saith he the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table, then they began to enquire among themselves, if any among them should do this.

And there was also a strife among them, which of them should be accounted the greatest; and supper being ended, he riseth, and laith aside his garments, and took a towell, and girded himself, and began to wash and to wipe his disciples feet, and also Peter, who at first denied, but afterwards desired it, which being done, he sits down again, saying, I have shewed you an example, that as I have done, you might likewise wash one anothers feet, he that is the greatest among you let him be the least; adding moreover, I do not speak of you all; I know whom I have chosen, when he had said these things, he is troubled in spirit, and testified, saying one of you shall betray me; his disciples therefore looking one on another uncertain of whom he spake, Peter beckoned to the beloved disciple, that he should aske who it was, Jesus answered, he it is to whom I shall give a sop after I have dipped it, and he gave it to Judas and said unto him, what thou doest, do quickly, he, having received the sop, went out immediately: and it was night.

When he was gone out, Jesus saith, Now is the son of man glorified, and God is glorified in him, and he admonisheth them of his sudden departure, and of their mutual love one of another; he said also Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired ye that he might winnow you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee, and do thou strengthen thy brethren; and to Peter too confidently saying, I will lay down my life for thee, he answers, The Cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice; and he said to them, he that hath a purse let him take it, and he that hath not a sword, let him buy one; they saying, here are two swords, he saith, it is enough.

Against their sorrow conceived by them for his death, he comforts them, as he was wont, to the questions of Thomas, Philip, Judas, (who is also Lebbæus, surnamed Thaddæus, another of the sons of Alphaus, and brother of James) he answers every one particularly, he promisseth to them, that the Holy Ghost shall be their teacher: and leaves his peace unto them, and again admonishing them of his approaching death, and of the joyfull fruit thereof, he saith, As I let us go hence, and when they had sung an hymn they went out towards the mount of Olives.

As they were going, by the Parable of the Vine and the branches, he exhorts them to bring forth fruit, and to remain in the love of God towards them, and mutual love one towards another, and to abide patiently the hatred of the world, which hates hates Christ himself, and that they should not be offended through persecutions. And again comforts them against sorrow for his death, by the promise of lending them the Comforter, the Spirit of truth, whose office against the world, and towards them he describeth. And admonishing them, that yet a little while and they should not see him, they not understanding when that meaneth, he explains it unto them, and saith, that there foretold sorrow of theirs should be turned into joy, by the example of a woman bringing forth a manchild, and also by his return unto them, by the love of the father towards them, and by his ready hearing of their petitions that they shall make in his name. And he saying, I came forth from the father, and am come into the world, again I leave the world, and go to the father, his disciples answered, Lo, now thou speakest plainly, we beieve thou camest from God: to whom Jesus answers, that the time was now come, that they should be scattered every own to his one, and Christ should be left alone. And at last conclude with a most divine prayer to the father, for the mutual illustration of his own, and the fathers glory, for the Apostles, and the whole company of believers.

When Jesus had spoken these things, he went with his disciples (as he was wont) over the brook Cedron to the mount of Olives. Then saith Jesus to them, all ye shall be offended because of me this night, but after I am risen again I will go before ye into Galilee, and to Peter saying, though all should be offended, yet will not I, Jesus saith, to day, even this night before the Cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice, but both he, and all the disciples reply, though we should die with thee, we will not deny thee.

Then they come into a place, called Gethsemane, where was a garden into which Jesus entered, and his disciples, unto whom he said pray ye that ye enter not into temptation, sit here till I goe and pray yonder: and he took Peter and the two sons of Zebedee with him, and began to be very sorrowfull, and said unto them, tarry here and watch, and going a little further about a stones cast, kneeled down and prayed that this cup might passe from him. And there appeared an Angell from heaven strengthening him; then he retuneth, and finding his Disciples sleeping, he reprehendeth, and admonisheth them; he goeth the second time, and prayeth more earnestly, and being in an agony, he sweates as it were drops of blood, and coming again, finds them sleeping for sorrow, for their eyes were heavy, and again being admonished they know not what to answer he then left them, and went away again and prayed the same words, then cometh he to his disciples and saith unto them, sleep on now, and take your rest, behold the houre is come, and the son of man is betrayed into the hand of sinners; rise, let us be going: behold he is at hand that doth betray me.

While he yet spake behold Judas, who knew the place, (because Jesus often resorted thither with his disciples) with the chief Priests, and Pharisees, Captains of the Temple, and elders of the people, and and Officers, and a band sent from them, cometh thither with Lanterns and Torches, and a great multitude with swords and staves. And Julius had given a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, the same is he, and he straightway kissed Jesus: to whom Jesus said, Wherefore art thou come? Berayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss? but Julius knowing all things that should come unto him, went out unto them, and said unto them, Whom seek ye? they say unto him, Jesus of Nazareth, Jesus saith unto them, I am he, and they went backwards and fell to the ground: he asketh them again, and answereth them as at the first, saying, moreover, If ye seek me, let these go their way: and they took him: and when they that were about him saw what would follow, they said unto him, Lord, shall we smite with the sword, and Peter thrust off the right ear of Malchus, a servant of the High Priests, to whom Jesus said, Put up thy sword, cannot I pray, and have more than twelve Legions of Angels? Shall not I drink of the cup that my Father hath given me? Stiff ye thus far, and he touched his ear and healed him. And Jesus said unto them, be ye come over against a Hill I with swords and staves: but this is your hour, and the power of darkness, then all his Disciples left him, and fled: and a certain young man (of their company) being laid hold on, left his linen cloth and fled from them.

And they bound Jesus, and brought him first to Annas, the father in law of Caiphas, who sent him bound to Caiphas the High Priest, who formerly had prophesied, that it was expedient that one man should die for the people, there were all the chief Priests, and Elders, and Scribes of the people gathered together. Then Caiphas asked Jesus concerning his Disciples, and his Doctrine: Jesus answered him, I speak openly to the World, ask thou that I have said: therefore one of the Officers struck him with a staff, to whom he answered, If I have well spoken, why smitest thou me? Then all the Council sought false witness against him, and found none: at last two false witnesses came, but their testimony agreed not. Caiphas then said, Answerest thou not what they witness against thee? but Jesus held his peace: then he accused him that he should tell, whether he were the Christ. And he answered, I am; and ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of the power of God, and coming in the clouds of Heaven, Wherefore they judged him guilty of death for this blasphemy. Then they mocked him, and they spat on him, cruelly beat him with buffets and staves: and covering his face, they said, Prophesie who smote thee: and many other things they reproachfully spake against him.

But Peter followed afar off, that he might see the end, and another Disciple that was known to the High Priest, and went with Jesus into the Palace: but Peter stood without at the door, whom that other Disciple (speaking to her that kept the door) brought in: and as Peter was warming himself at the fire kindled in the midst of the Palace, (for it was cold) the maid that kept the door asked him, and affirmed that he was one of his Disciples; but he

he denied it, or that he knew him, or knew what he said. And a little after, he went out into the Porch, and the cock crew: and as he was going out another maid saw him, and said unto them that were there, This also was with Jesus of Nazareth: also another said unto him, Thou art one of them; then he again denies it with an oath, and about an hour after, they which stood by came and said unto him, Thy speech bewrayeth thee, and the cousin of Malchus among the rest said, Did not I see thee in the Garden with him? and while he yet spake, the cock crew the second time, then the Lord turned about and looked upon Peter, and he remembering the words of Jesus, went out, and wept bitterly.

And as soon as it was day, the Elders of the people, and chief Priest, and the Scribes, came together, and led him in to their Council, saying, Art thou the Christ? to whom he answered, Ye will not believe, or answer, or let me go; that he was the Son of God: they said, What need we any further witness?

Then straightway in the morning the whole multitude of them arose, and led him bound unto Pontius Pilate the Governor, from Caiphas to the Hall of judgement, (April 3.) and they went not into the Judgement Hall, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover. And Jesus stood before the Governor: Pilate therefore came forth unto them, and said, What accusation bring you against this man? they answered him, If he had not been a malefactor, we would not have delivered him unto thee: and they began to accuse him, saying, we found this man perverting the Nation, and forbidding to pay tribute to Caesar, saying, That he himself is Christ a King: and when he was accused of the chief Priests and Elders, he answered nothing. Then said Pilate unto him, Hearkest thou not how many things they witness against thee? but he answered him not a word, so that Pilate marvelled. Then said Pilate unto them, Take ye him, and judge him according to your law: but they urged, it is not lawful for us to put any man to death. Pilate then entered into the judgement Hall again, and called Jesus, and said unto him; Art thou the King of the Jews? Jesus answered, Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee of me? Pilate answered, Am I a Jew? thine own Nation, and the chief Priests have delivered thee unto me, What hast thou done? Jesus answered, My Kingdom is not of this world, Pilate therefore said unto him, Art thou a King then? Jesus answered, For this cause came I into the world, that I might bear witness unto the truth: Pilate said unto him, What is truth? And when he had said this, he went out again unto the Jews, and said unto them, I find in him no fault at all: and they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching thorough all Jewry, beginning at Galilee to this place. Pilate therefore hearing of Galilee, asked him if he were a Galilean, and when he knew that he belonged to Herods jurisdiction, he sent him to Herod who was at Jerusalem in those days. And when he saw Jesus he was exceeding glad: but being deceived in his hopes of seeing seeing a miracle, and not vouchsafed any answer, either to him, or the chief Priests and Scribes, vehemently accusing him: after Herod had set Jesus at naught, and mocked him, sends him back to Pilate arrayed in a gorgeous robe: and both the Governours were made friends that same day. And Pilate when he had called the chief Priests and the Rulers and the people, said unto them, Neither I, nor Herod, find any fault in him, nor any thing worthy of death: I will therefore chastise him, and release him: for the Governour was of necessity every Feast (as the custom was) to deliver to the people one prisoner whom they would: and the multitude crying out aloud began to desire, that he would do unto them as he had ever done. Pilate therefore calling them, said unto them, Ye have a custom that I should release one unto you at the Pascheover, Will ye therefore that I release unto you the King of the Jews, which will ye, either this man or Barabbas? for he knew that the chief Priests had delivered him for envy: but they stirred up the people, that he should rather deliver Barabbas unto them: now he was a notable thief, who lay bound with them that made insurrection, and for insurrection and murder in the City, was cast into prison. And when he was set down in the judgement-seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have nothing to do with that just man, for I have suffered many things in my dream by reason of him this day. Pilate therefore spake unto them again, being willing to release Jesus, which of the twain will you that I release unto you? but they all cried out, saying, not him, but Barabbas. Pilate therefore answered, and said unto them again, What will you, that I shall do unto him that ye call King of the Jews, and they all cried out again, crucifie him. Pilate said unto them the third time, But what evil hath he done? I find no cause of death in him, I will therefore chastise him and let him go, but they cried more earnestly, crucifie him, and were very insistent with loud voices, desiring the same. Then Pilate took Jesus, and scourged him, and the Soldiers platted a Crown of Thorns, and put it on his head, and clothed him with purple, laying, Hail King of the Jews, and beat him with staves. Pilate therefore went forth again unto them, and said unto them, Behold I bring him forth unto you, that you may know I find no fault in him, then Jesus came forth, wearing the Crown of thorns, and the robe, and Pilate said unto them, Behold the man. When the chief Priests and Officers saw him, they cried out, saying, Crucifie him, crucifie him. Pilate said unto them, take ye him and crucifie him, for I find no fault in him. The Jews said, He ought to dye, because he made himself the Son of God. When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he was the more afraid, and went again into the judgement-hall, and said to Jesus, Whence art thou? but Jesus gave him no answer; then said Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? Knowest thou not, that I have power to crucifie thee? Jesus answered, Thou couldest have no power, unless it were given thee from above: and from thenceforth Pilate sought to release him, but the Jews cried out, Then thou art not Cæsar said.

friend. When Pilate heard this, he brought forth Jesus, and set in the judgement-seat, in the place called the Pavement, and it was the preparation of the Pascheover, and about the sixth hour, then said he unto the Jews, Behold your King, but they cried out, Away with him, Away with him, crucifie him: Pilate said unto them, Shall I crucifie your King, then answered the chief Priests, we have no King but Cæsar. When Pilate therefore saw that he prevailed nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person, see you to it: and all the people answered and said, His blood be on us, and our children: then willing to content the multitude, he released unto them Barabbas, And when he had scourged Jesus, he delivered him over to their will, that he might be crucified.

And the Soldiers of the Governour, when they had led Jesus into the hall called Prætorium, they called together the whole band; and when they had stripped him, they put upon him a scarlet robe, and platted a Crown of Thorns, and put it on his head, and a reed in his right hand, and bowing the knee, mocked him, saying, Hail King of the Jews: and when they had spat on him, they took that reed and smote him on the head: and when they had mocked him, they took off the purple from him, and put his own cloaths on him, and led him out to crucifie him.

Then Judas which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought the thirty pieces of silver to the chief Priests, confessing his sin unto them; and casting the silver pieces into the Temple, went and hanged himself: and they bought with them the Potters field, that the prophetic might be fulfilled.

And Jesus came forth carrying his Crosse, but as they were leading him, they found one Symon of Cyrenes, who came out of the Country, whom they took, and compelled to carry the Crosse after Jesus, and there were two Thieves that were led with him, that they might be crucified: and there followed a great multitude of people, and of women that lamented him, to whom he turned and foretold the lamentable destruction of Jerusalem. And when they were come into the place called Calvary, but in the Hebrew Golgotha, they gave unto him to drink wine mingled with myrrhe, and vinegar mingled with gall, and when he had tasted it, he would not drink it; and they crucified him there, (and it was the third hour) and the two Thieves with him, one on the right hand, and the other on the left: and Jesus said, Father forgive them, for they know not what they do. And Pilate wrote a superscription in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, and put it on the Crosse: which at the request of the chief Priests Pilate would not alter: and after they had crucified him, they parted his garments into four parts, to every Souldier that was employed in the execution, a part, casting lots, and likewise upon his seamless coat, whole it should be, that the Scripture might be fulfilled: and they sitting down, watched him there, and the people stood beholding him, but they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads, heads, and saying, O thou that destroyest the Temple, and buildest it in three days, save thy self, it thou be the Son of God, come down from the Crosse likewise also the chief Priest and Rulers, with the People, mocking and scoffing, with the Scribes and Elders, said among themselves, He saved others, himself he cannot save: If he be the King of Israel, if that Christ, the chosen of God, let him come down from the Crosse, and we will believe him, He trusted in God, let him deliver him, if he will have him, for he said, I am the Son of God: the Souldiers also mocked him, and coming unto him, offered him vinegar, saying, If thou be the King of the Jews, save thy self. The Thieves also which were crucified with him, cast the same in his teeth: But one of them continuing in his railing against him, the other being converted, rebuked him, and said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy Kingdom; to whom Jesus answered, To day shalt thou be with me in Paradise: and there stood by his Crosse, the Mother of Jesus, and his Mothers Sister, Mary, the Wife of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene: when Jesus therefore saw his Mother, and the Disciple whom he loved, standing, he said unto his Mother, Behold thy Son, and to the Disciple, Behold thy Mother. And when the sixth hour was come, there was darkness over all the Land, Country, until the ninth hour: And about the ninth hour, Jesus cried out with a loud voice, Eli Eli, Eloi Eloi Lamma sabachthi? And some that stood by said, he calleth Elias. After this, when Jesus knew that all things were accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, said, I thirst. Now there was set there a vessel full of vinegar, and they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, or a reed, and put it to his mouth, saying also with the rest, let be, let us see if Elias will come to save him, and take him down. But Jesus when he had received the vinegar, said, It is finished: And when again he cried with a loud voice, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit, and bowing his head, he gave up the Ghost. And when the Centurion saw that he had cried out, and gave up the ghost, he glorified God, saying, Truly this is a just man, Truly this is the Son of God.

And behold the vail of the Temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent, and the graves were opened, and many bodies of the Saints, which slept, arose, and came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the Holy City, and appeared unto many: and the Centurion, and they that stood over against, and those that watched Jesus, when they saw the Earthquake, and the things that were done, feared greatly, saying, Truly this was the Son of God, and all the people that came together to that sight, beholding the things that were done, smote their breasts and returned; and his acquaintance, and the women which followed him from Galilee, stood a far off, beholding these things, among whom were Mary Magdalene, and Mary the Mother of James the Little, and Mother of Joses and Salome; who also, when he was in Galilee, followed him, and and ministered unto him, and many other women that came up to Jerusalem with him.

The Jew: therefore, that the bodies should not remain on the Crosse on the Sabbath, because it was the preparation, (for that Sabbath was an high day) brought Pilate, that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away. The Souldiers therefore came, and brake the legs of the two Thieves, but not of Jesus, because he was already dead; but one of the Souldiers with a Spear, pierced his side, and there came out straightway blood and water: and these things were done, that the Scripture might be fulfilled. And when even was now come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath, cometh Joseph of Arimathea, a rich man, and an honourable Counsellour, who also looked for the Kingdom of God, a good man and a just, and had not consented to the counsel and deed of them, being a Disciple, but secretly, for fear of the Jews, came boldly unto Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus. Pilate marvelled if he were already dead, and calling a Centurion asked him, and when he knew it, he gave the body to Joseph. There cometh also Nicodemus (which at the first came to Jesus by night) and brought a mixture of Myrrhe and aloes, about an hundred pound weight: they took therefore the body of Jesus, and wound it in a linnen cloth, with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury. And Joseph, when he had wrapped it in a clean linnen cloth, laid it in his own new Sepulchre, which he had hewn out of a Rock, wherein never man was laid, and which was in a garden, in the place where Jesus was crucified; and Joseph rolled a great stone to the door of the Sepulchre: and Mary Magdalene, and Mary the Mother of Joses, which came with him from Galilee, beheld where they had laid him, and sat over against the Sepulchre; and they returned and prepared spices and ointments, and rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment.

The next day (the fourth of April) the Pharisees brought Pilate that he would command the Sepulchre to be made sure until the third day, shewing him a reason: which when he had yielded unto, they went, and made the Sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch.

In the end of the Sabbath, or when the Sabbath was now past, (April the fifth) when it dawned towards the first day of the week, in the morning very early, whilst it was yet dark, came Mary Magdalene, and Mary the Mother of James, and Salome, bringing Spices which they had bought, that they might see the Sepulchre, and anoint Jesus; and they laid among themselves, who shall roll away the stone from the door for us? and when the Sun was risen, coming to the Sepulchre, they saw the stone was rolled away; for behold there was a great Earthquake, for the Angel of the Lord came down from Heaven, and rolled away the stone, and sat upon it: and they went in and found not the body of the Lord Jesus. And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereat, that behold two men came to them, in shining raiment, their countenances were as lightnings, and their garments white as snow. Mathew and Mark speak but of one Angel, and the keepers for fear did shake, and became as dead men. And when the women were afraid, and bowed their faces to the Earth, the Angels said unto them, Fear not ye, I know ye seek Jesus which was crucified. Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, he is risen, as he said, come and see the place where the Lord was laid, and remember what he said, when he was yet in Galilee with you; saying, The Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again: but go ye quickly, and tell his Disciples, and Peter that he is risen again from the dead; and behold he goeth before you into Galilee, there shall ye see him; Behold I have told ye. Then the women remembered the words of Jesus: and they departed quickly out of the Sepulchre, with fear, and wonder, and great joy, and ran that they might tell his Disciples; but they said nothing to any man (as they went) for they were afraid. And when the woman told these things to the eleven, and to all the rest: their words seemed unto them as idle tales. But Mary Magdalene telling Peter and the other Disciple whom Jesus loved, They have taken away the Lord, and we know not where they have laid him. Peter therefore and that other Disciple went out and came to the Sepulchre, but that other Disciple outran Peter, and came first to the Sepulchre; and when he stooped down, he saw the linen cloaths lying, but went not in: then came Peter following him, and went into the Sepulchre, and seeing the linen cloaths lie, and the napkin that was about his head, not lying with the linen cloaths, but wrapped together in a place by it self. Then went in that other Disciple, and saw and believed, and Peter went unto his own home, wondering at what was done; for as yet they knew not the Scriptures, that he must rise again from the dead. And the Disciples went to their own home. But Mary Magdalene stood without at the Sepulchre weeping, and whilst she yet wept, she stooped down into the Sepulchre, and seeing two Angels in white sitting, the one at the head, and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had laid, which said unto her, Woman, why weepest thou? She said unto them, They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid him: and when she had said thus, she turned her self back, and saw Jesus standing, but knew not that it was Jesus. And Jesus said unto her, Why weepest thou, whom seekest thou? She supposing him to be the Gardener, answered and said, If thou hast born him hence, tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away. Jesus saith unto her, Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father, but go and tell my brethren, and say unto them; I go, &c. And he came and told his Disciples, and those that had been with him, as they were weeping and mourning, that he had seen the Lord, and that he had said these things unto her. But they when they heard that he was alive, and had been seen of her, believed not: and as the women went from the Sepulchre (perhaps Mary Magdalene was absent) absent) that they might tell his Disciples, Behold Jesus meets them, and saith unto them; All hail, and they came and held him by the feet, and worshipped him. Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid; Go ye, and tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, there shall they see me.

Now when they were going, behold some of the watch came into the City, and shewed unto the chief Priests all things that were done; and when they were assembled with the Elders, they took counsel, that they would give large money to the soldiers, that they should say, that his Disciples came by night, and stole him away whilst they slept: and if this come to the Governours ears, we (say they) will persuade him, and secure you. So they took their money, and did as they were taught. And this saying is commonly reported among the Jews to this day.

And behold two of them went into the Country that same day to a village sixty furlongs from Jerusalem, called Emmaus: and as they journeyed, Jesus went along with them, and they telling him what things were done in those dayes concerning Jesus of Nazareth, how he was crucified, and that he rose again: Jesus shews them out of the Scriptures that it behooved Christ to suffer, and to enter into his glory. And in the village, when he had taken bread and given thanks and brake it, and given it unto them, he was known unto them, their eyes being opened, although he appeared in another form; but he vanished out of their sight. And they rose up that same hour, and returned to Jerusalem to the eleven, and those that were with them, who said unto these two, The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared unto Simon. Then they told them what things were done in the way, and how he was known of them in the breaking of bread: but neither believed they them. But whilst they yet spoke, whilst it was evening, in the first day of the week, the doors being shut, where the Disciples were gathered together for fear of the Jews, cometh Jesus himself, and stood in the midst of them, and saith unto them; Peace be unto you, but they were terrified and affrighted, supposing they had seen a spirit; but he shewed them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them that had seen him since he was risen. And he said unto them, Why are ye troubled? See my hands and my feet, a spirit hath not flesh and bones; and he shewed them his hands, and his feet, and his side: and when they believed not for joy and wondered, he said unto them, Have ye here a y meat? and he eat a piece of broiled fish, and an honey comb; and the Disciples rejoiced that they had seen the Lord. And he said unto them, These are the words that I spake unto you, while I was yet with you: That all things must be fulfilled that were written in the Law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes of me. Then opened he their understandings, that they might understand the Scriptures, and said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behooveth Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day, and that repentance, and remission of sins should be preached in his name among by two Angels appearing on the sudden in white raiment, that he should come again (to judgement) in the very same manner as they now beheld him going up into Heaven. [Acts 1. 6, 11.]

And they, when they had worshipped him, returned to Jerusalem with great joy, [Luc. XXIV. 52.] from the Mount of Olives, which is from thence, a Sabbath dayes journey, [Acts 1. 12.] for which the Syrian Paraphrast puts seven furlongs; as also Theophrast reckons out of Josephus: in whom nevertheless we read in our books, that the Mount of Olives was distant, either five furlongs, [as in lib. 20. Antiquit. cap. 6.] or six [as in the 5 book Belli Judaeor. cap. 8.] as the Greek, or [lib. 6. cap. 3.] as the Latines distinguish the books.

The eleven Apostles abode in an upper room in Jerusalem, and continued with one accord in prayer with the women, and Mary his mothers and his brethren, [Acts 1. 13, 14.]

In those daies Peter stood up in the midst of the Disciples (the number of the names together, were about 120) and spake to them concerning one to be chosen into the room of the traitor Judas, who in desperation threw himself down headlong, and burst in the midst: and when they had prayed, they call lots upon Joseph, called Barsabas, and Matthias, and when the lot fell upon Matthias, he is chosen into the number of Apostles. [Acts 1. 15, 26.]

On the day of Pentecost (which fell on the 24 of May) when all (120) were with one accord in the same place, suddenly there came a sound from Heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they sat; and there appeared unto them cloven tongues as of fire, and it sat upon each of them, and they were all filled with the holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the spirit gave them utterance: and there were dwelling at Jerusalem, Jews, devout men, out of every nation under Heaven: who hearing them speaking in their own tongues, the wonderful things of God, were all amazed: but others profanely deriding the miracle, Peter, in a most grave Sermon refutes the calumny of drunkenness, seeing it was but the third hour of the day; and then discoursing of Christ, out of the Law and the Prophets, proves that he is risen, and converts by the power of the spirit he had received to the knowledge of the truth 3000 of his hearers, and commands them to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for remission of sins. [Acts II. 1, 14.]

And they continued steadfastly in the Apostles doctrine, and fellowship, and breaking of bread, and prayer, and fear came upon every soul, and many signs and wonders were done by the Apostles, and all that believed were together, and had all things common, and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every one had need, and they continuing daily with one accord in the Temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness, and singleness of heart, praising God, and having favour with all the people, and the Lord added daily to the Church, such as should be saved. [Ibid. 42, 47.]

Peter and John going up together into the Temple about the hour of prayer, being the ninth hour, at a gate of the Temple, called beautiful, they heal in the Name of Christ, a man that had been lame from his birth, about 40 years old; by reason of which, the people came running unto Solomons Porch, to whom Peter expounds the mystery of salvation through Christ, and upbraiding their ingratitude, exhorts them to repentance; and many that heard him believed, and the number of men were about 5000. But the Priests and Rulers of the Temple, and Sadduces, came upon them, and took Peter and John, and put them in prison until the next day, because it was then evening. The next day the Council being gathered together (in which were Annas the High Priest, the President of the Council, and Caiaphas and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the High Priests kindred) the Apostles are called in question about the miracles they had done, who boldly defended the cause of Christ, and being forbidden to speak hereafter in the name of Christ, they answer, That it is more right to obey God than men; and being threatened and let go, they returned to their own home, where, together with the whole Church they poured out fervent prayer to God, for the propagation of the Gospel, which he shews, he grants by causing an Earthquake, and sending his holy spirit into their hearts. [Acts III. 6-IV.]

And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart, and one soul, and they had all things common: neither was any among them that lacked, for as many as had possessions of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices, and laid them down at the Apostles feet, to be distributed for the use of the poor: in which business Josephus Test. a Levite, by nation a Cypriot furnished by the Apostles Barnabas, that is the son of consolation, shewed the first example. [Acts IV. 32, 37.]

Ananias and Sapphira his wife, fraudulently keeping by joyned consent, part of the price, for which they had sold the land, are struck dead, by the word and rebuke only of Peter, who discoursed the cheat, and avenged by the power of the holy Ghost, to whom whom they had lyed; and great fear fell on all the Church, and on as many as heard of these things. [Acts V. 1, 11.]

By the hands of the Apostles were many miracles done among the people, and they were all together with one accord in Solomons Porch, and of the rest durst no man joyn themselves unto them: but the people magnified them, and the believers were more added to the Lord: and they brought the sick into the streets, that at the least the shadow of Peter passing by, might overshadow them. There came also a multitude out of the Cities about Jerusalem, bringing the sick, and such as were vexed with unclean spirits, and they were all healed. [Ibid.]

The High Priest and the Sadduces that were with him moved with envy, cast the Apostles into prison: from whence the night following being fired by an Angel, are commanded to teach the people boldly and without fear, from whence being brought to the Council, by the advice of Gamaliel a Pharisee, a Doctor of the Law in much esteem among the people, being delivered from death, after they had been scourged, are let go; and they went from the Council rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for the name of Jesus. And they taught daily in the Temple. [Ibid. 17-42.]

The number of Believers increasing at Jerusalem, and wealth also flowing in apace, and consequently employments of the Church, there arose (as it commonly happens amongst a multitude) a murmuring of the Grecians against the Hebrews, because their widows were neglected in the daily distribution of the Church monies: and whereas the Apostles could not be at leisure to distribute the almes of the richer sort unto the poor, or to govern that bulk of money which role out of the sale of the rich mens possessions; by the Apostles advice, and by the common suffrages of the Church, there were seven chosen to be Stewards of the Churches goods, and should intend that service: Stephen, Philip, Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicholas, a Proselyte of Antioch, (it is evident because they have all Greek names, that in this election, there was chiefest account had of the Grecians) and the word of the Lord increased, and the number of the Disciples was multiplied at Jerusalem, and many of the Priests were obedient to the Faith, [Acts VI. 1, 7.]

Stephen did many wonders and miracles among the people, and stoutly defended the Cause of Christ against the Jews of the Synagogue of the Libertines (made free by their Masters) and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia, and of Asia, disputing with him: who when in disputation they could not resist the wisdom and spirit by which he spake, they turn to false accusing him, and caught him and brought him before the Council, and set up false witnesses, who should avow that they heard him speak blasphemous words against the Temple and the Law, [Ibid. 8, 15.]

Stephen in a long Oration before the high Priest (Annas) and Council, shews, That the true worship of God was observed by Abraham and his posterity, before the Temple was built by Solomon, yea before Moses was born, and that Moses gives testimony of Christ, and that the outward ceremonies that were given to their fathers were to endure but for a time. Then he sharply reprehends the Jews, because they always resisted the Holy Ghost, and had wickedly put Christ to death, whom the Prophets had foretold should come into the World. Whereupon being mad with fury, they call that holy man out of the City, and stone him, he in the mean time praying for them, [Acts VII.]

The witnesses (according to the Law, Deut. XVII. 7.) about to throw the first stones, laid their garments at a young man's feet called Saul, who kept them, and was consenting to the death of the Martyr [Acts VII. 58. Acts, VIII. 1, XXI. 20.] This man an Hebrew of the Hebrews, of the Tribe of Benjamin, born at Tarsus in Cilicia, (which City Strabo affirms was then famous for the study of Philosophy, and the liberal Sciences, lib. 14. pag. 673.) by Sect a Pharisee, and the son of a Pharisee, and studied Divinity at that time in Jerusalem, in the Synagogue of the Cilicians, and did frequent the School of Gamaliel, the famous Doctor among the Pharisees, a most strict observer of the Law of Moses, and of the traditions delivered to the Fathers, [Acts XXI. 39. XXII. 3. XXIII. 6, 34. XXVI. 4, 5. 2 Cor. XI. 22. Gal. I. 14. Phil. III. 5, 6.]

Devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him, [Acts VIII. 2.]

Ælius Lamia died at Rome, sometimes titular governour of Syria, for he never came thither. As for Flaccus Pomponius the true Governour of Syria, he died in the Provinces, [Tacit. Annal. 6. cap. 27. with Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 42.]

Herod Agrippa had his daughter Mariamne by Cyprus, ten years before his death, [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 7. and lib. 19. cap. ult.]

There arose a great persecution after the death of Stephen against the whole Church which was at Jerusalem, [Acts VIII. 1, XI. 19.] in which Saul exceedingly raging, raging, made havock of the Church; for having received authority from the chief Priests, he not only when the Saints were put to death, gave his voice against them, but also he himself, entering into every house, and taking from thence both men and women, bound them, and put them in prison, and often beat them in every Synagogue: and so compelled some by denying Christ to blaspheme, others that were constant in the Faith, he persecuted to death. [Acts VIII. 1. IX. 21. XXII. 4, 5, 19. XXVI. 9, 10, 11. Gal. I. 13, 23. Phil. III. 6. 1 Tim. I. 13.]

This persecution dispersed the Church into divers Countries, but with great advantage to the Church: for the Apostles being left alone at Jerusalem, of the rest of which there were some thousands, [Acts II. 41. & IV. 4.] some that were dispersed into the Regions of Judea and Samaria, who preached the Gospel wheresoever they came, [Acts VIII. 1, 4.] Others went to Damascus, [Acts IX. 29, 35.] amongst whom was Ananias a devout man according to the Law, and one who had a good report among all the Jews that dwelt there, [Acts XXII. 12.] Others, it is very likely, went even to Rome it self, and amongst them Junias and Andronicus, who were of note among the Apostles, the kinsmen of this persecutor Paul, and had embraced the faith before him, [Rom. XVI. 7.] Others travelled as far as Phenice, and Cyprus, and Antioch, preaching the word of God to the Jews only, [Acts XI. 19.] viz. to those that were dispersed among the Gentiles. [James. I. 1. 1 Pet. I. 1.]

Amongst them that went to Samaria was Philip, the second in order after Stephen the Protomartyr among the seven that were chosen, [Acts VIII. 5, with XXI. 8.] He coming into the City of Samaria did preach Christ there: the people with their accord giving heed to those things that he spake, seeing the miracles that he did; for unclean spirits crying with a loud voice, came out of many: and many that were taken with Palsies, and that were lame, were healed: and there was great joy in that City, and many believing were baptized both men and women. Simon also who a long time had bewitched the people of Samaria with his sorceries, that giving heed to him, from the least to the greatest, they said he was the great power of God, doing the great signs and wonders that were done by Philip, believed and was baptized. [Acts VIII. 5, 13.]

When the Apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of the Lord, they sent unto them Peter and John, upon whose praying for them, and laying their hands on them, they received the Holy Ghost: which Simon Magus seeing, offered them money, that he also might receive the gift of conferring the Holy Ghost: whole mad impiety Peter sharply rebuking, warns him to repent of this his wickedness, and to ask pardon of God: who desireth the Apostles that they would pray for him to the Lord. Having compleated their ministry in those parts, they returned to Jerusalem, preaching the Gospel in the villages of Samaria, as they went, [Acts VIII. 14, 25.]

After many Ages were past, a Bird called Phoenix came into Egypt, and ministered matter to the most learned of the Country, and also Greek of discoursing many things concerning that miracle. [Tact. Annal. 6, cap. 28.] But Dion reports that this Bird appeared in Egypt two years after. [lib. 54, pag. 638.]

Philip the Tetrarch always reputed a modest man, and a lover of ease and quietness, died in the twentieth year of Tiberius, when he had governed Trachonitis, Gaulanitis, and Batanea, thirty seven years; died at Julia's, he was brought to a Monument that he before had built for himself, wherein he was magnificently and sumptuously interred: and because he died without children, Tiberius annexed that Principality to the Province of Syria: Yet so, that the tributes which were collected in this Tetrarchy, should be kept within the limits of that Country. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 6.]

At Rome in this twentieth year of Tiberius his reign, the Consuls, Lucius Vitellius, and Fabius Pricus for tenth ten years Games, that they might as it were flatter the government to him, as it was used to be done to Augustus. [Dion lib. 58. pag. 636.]

In this year, (as Dion will have) or three years before, (as Tacitus hints about the end of the fifth book of his Annals, relating this Story) a certain young fellow gave out, that he was Drusus Germanicus his son. He was seen first in the Islands Cyclades, and soon after in the Continent of Grecia and Ionia. He was attended by some of Cæsars free-men: the ignorant were allured by the fame of his name, and by the minds of the Grecians ready to new and wonderful things; for they feigned and also believed that if he could get from them that kept him, he would go to his father's armies, and would invade Egypt or Syria. Poppæus Sabinus when he heard these things, who being incentive upon Macedonia, took care also for Achaia, entered Nicopolis, a Roman Colony: there he knew that the young man, being more cunningly examined, had said, that he was Marcus Silanus his son, and that many of his followers being being ship away, he took shipping, as though he would go to Italy, neither, saith Tacitus, have been found any more concerning the end of this business: but Dion adds, that this impostor being willingly received of the Cities, and strengthened with aids, had without doubt come into Syria, and possessed himself of the armies, unless some that knew him had stayed him, and sent him to Tiberius. [Tact. Annal. 5, cap. 10. D. lib. 58, pag. 637.]

Philip the Evangelist, being warned of an Angel, goes to Gaza, which is desert, of which are to be seen those things that are spoken, at the end of the year of the World, 3672, and meets an Eunuch, who had the charge of the treasure of Candace, Queen of the Ethiopians, (in Meroc) and returning in his Chariot from Jerusalem, (where he had been to worship) read the Prophet Elisha, to whom Philip, by the command of the Spirit, came; and having instructed him in the faith of Christ, baptized him, and straightway being caught away out of his sight by the Spirit of the Lord, was found at Azous, and passing through the Country, he preached the Gospel in all the Cities, until he came to Caesarea. [Acts VIII. 26, 40.]

Saul yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the Disciples of the Lord, obtains of the High Priest (Anas, as it is Acts IV. 6.) and the Council of which he was then President) letters to the Synagogues of Damascus, that if he found any that were Christians, he should bring them bound to Jerusalem, that they might be punished. And as he came nigh to Damascus at midday, a light from Heaven, above the brigandage of the Sun, shined round about him, and them that journeyed with him: and when they were all fallen to the earth, he heard a voice speaking to him in the Hebrew tongue, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks: and when he had said, Who art thou Lord? it was answered him, I am Jesus of Nazareth whom thou persecutest, but rise and stand upon thy feet, I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a Minister, and a witness, both of those things that thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee, delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee, that thou mayest open their eyes, and turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive remission of sins, and inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith that is in me. And when as Saul trembling and full of fear, asked further, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? the Lord said unto him, Arise, go to Damascus, and there it shall be told thee of all things that thou must do: but the men that journeyed with Saul, were to amazed, that they were speechless, seeing indeed a light, and hearing a loud voice, but neither seeing Christ which spake, nor understanding any thing that he spake. [Acts IX. 1, 7. XXII. 5, 14. XXVI. 12, 18.]

Saul arose from the earth, and being blinded with the glory of the light, being led by the hand, he comes to Damascus [Acts IX. 8, XXII. 11.] and he was three days without sight, and neither did eat or drink. Now there was a certain Disciple named Ananias, to whom the Lord spake by a vision, Arise, and go into the street that is called straight, and inquire in the house of Judas, for Saul of Tarsus, for behold he prayeth: (and Saul men saw in a vision, Ananias entering, and laying his hand on him, that he might receive his sight) but Ananias answered, Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done unto thy Saints at Jerusalem, yet, in this place he hath authority from the chief Priests, to bind all that call on thy name: and the Lord said unto him, Go thy way, for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to carry my Name before the Gentiles, and Kings, and the children of Israel, for I will show unto him, how great things he must suffer for my Name. And Ananias went and entered into the house, and laying his hands on him, said, Brother Saul, the Lord Jesus, which appeared unto thee, in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mayest receive thy sight, and be filled with the holy Ghost, and straightway there fell from his eyes as it were scales, and he received his sight forthwith. [Acts IX. 9, 18.]

And Ananias said, The God of our Fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know his will, and see that just ones, and shouldest bear the voice from his mouth, for thou shalt be a witness before all men, of those things that thou hast heard and seen: and now why tarriest thou? arise and be baptized, and washed from thy sins, calling on the Name of the Lord. [Acts XXII. 14, 15, 16.] And Saul arose, and was baptized, and when he had received meat, he was strengthened. [Acts IX. 18, 19.]

But what was revealed from the Lord to Saul at Damascus that he should do, Luke shews not in the Acts, but out of those things, which in the Epistle to the Galatians he saith happened unto him immediately after his conversion, it appears, that amongst other things it was commanded him, that he should not confer with flesh and blood, nor return to Jerusalem, so then that were Apostles before him, but that he should go for sometime into Arabia, or places near Damascus, where he should receive the knowledge of the Gospel, Not being taught of men, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ, [Gal. I. 12, 16, 17.]

Saul then returns to Damascus, [Gal. 1. 17.] and carries with the Disciples there a few daies, and straightway in the Synagogues he preacheth, that Christ is the son of God. And they were all amazed who heard these things, and said, Is not this he that destroyed at Jerusalem, those that called on his name, and came hither for that intent that he might bring them bound to the chief Priests? And Saul increased the more in strength, and confounded the Jews that dwell at Damascus, teaching that Jesus is the Christ, [Act. IX. 19. 22.] for to the Jews that dwell at Damascus, was the Gospel first preached by him. [Act. XXVI. 20.]

Tiberius being certified by Pilate out of Palestine, concerning the affaires of Christ, he propoeth to the Senate, that he might be reckoned among the gods, which the Senate opposing, he remaining in his opinion threatens that it should be dangerous for any to accuse a Christian, as Tertullian relates in Apologetic. [cap. 5. & 21.] and others that follow him; as Eusebius in Chronie. & Histo. Eccles. lib. 2. cap. 2. and our Gildas in an epistle of the destruction of Britain; which he granted, we may lawfully say, that the first persecution after the murder of Stephen that arose in Judea, ceased partly by the conversion of Saul who greatly promoted it, and partly through fear of Tiberius.

L. Vitellius who the year before was Consul at Rome, was sent by Tiberius Proconsul into Syria, and comes to Jerusalem, in the very feast of the Passover: where he was honourably entertained by them of Jerusalem, and for a requital remits to the Citizens the whole tribute of the trustees for sale, and allowed that the High-Priests garment with all that belonged to it should be kept in the temple by the Priests, which was formerly kept by the Roman Governour of the Castle Antonia; and thus gratifying the nation, and having substituted Jonathan the son of Ananus (or Annas) the High-Priest in the place of Joseph Caiaphas the High-Priest, he takes his journey to Antioch. [Joseph. lib. 15. cap. ult. & lib. 18. cap. 6.]

Artabanus King of Parthia, Artaxias King of Armenia being dead, let Artaces the eldest of his children over the Armenians; and because he came off from Tiberius free for that he attempts Cappadocia, and sent to demand the treasure left by Vocones in Syria and Cilicia, and also the ancient bounds of the Persians and Macedonians, and also vaingloriously bragged and threatened that he would invade all that was possibled by Cyrus or Alexander, but Sinnaeus, a man both nobly born and rich, and next unto him Abdus an Eunuch, drawing the principal of the Parthians to them, because they could make none of the blood of the Artacides King (most of them being killed by Artabanus, or under years) send private messengers to Tiberius to demand Phraates the son of Phraates the third who was kept hostage at Rome for their King. [Tacit. Annal. 6. cap. 31. Dion. lib. 58. pag. 37.]

Tiberius sends Phraates sufficiently furnished into his fathers Kingdoms, keeping his old drift, by sleights and policies to raise wars abroad, to keep himself quiet at home: in the mean while these conspiracies being known, Artabanus invites Abdus under colour of amity to a banquet, and gives him a lingering poison, and Sinnaeus by feigned friendship and gifts he entertains in other employments, and Phraates being come into Syria, leaving off the Roman manner of living, to which he had been accustomed, and refusing the Parthian wages, being unable to brook his Country manners, falls sick and dies. [Tacit. ibid. cap. 31.]

Phraates being dead, Tiberius sends Tiridates of the same stock, and an enemy to Artabanus; and that he might the sooner get the Kingdoms, writes to Mithridates Iberus that he should invade Armenia: that by this means Artabanus might go out of his own Kingdom, whilst he helped his son, and to this end reconciled Mithridates to his brother Phraaramenes, who succeeded his father Mithridates in the Kingdom of Iberia, and egg'd on Phraaramenes himself, and the King of the Alanes by great gifts, to make war suddenly on Artabanus, but he made L. Vitellius general over all these preparations in the East. [Tacit. ibid. with Josephus lib. 18. cap. 6. with Dion. lib. 58. pag. 637. 638.]

Mithridates induces his brother Phraaramenes to set toward his endeavours by policy and force, Artaces the son of Artabanus is killed by his servants, hired to this villany by great sums of gold: also the Iberians breaking into Armenia, ruine the City Artaxata. When Artabanus knew these things, he furnisheth his son Orodes to revenge it, giving him the strength of the Parthians, and dispatcheth others to levy hired soldiers for his aid; on the other side, Phraaramenes joyne to himself the Albanians, and call the Sarmatians to his help, whole Princes, called Sceptruchi, having received gifts on both sides, as the manner of that Nation is, gave aid to both sides: but the Iberians being masters of the places, thrust in the Sarmatians into Armenia by the Caspian passages, and those that came from the Parthians are easily driven back, there being but one way left for them, between the farthest Albanian mountains, and the shore of the Caspian sea, and that too the Summer then hindered, the Eastern wind filling up the

the Fords, [Tacit. Annal. 6. cap. 32. Joseph. in supra.]

Phraaramenes having re-enforced his strength, forceth Orodes to fight being destitute of his Allies: in which meeting with Orodes, he wounded him through his Helmet, but could not double his blow, being carried away with his horse, and the stoutest of his Guard defending him being wounded. Nevertheless a rumour falsely believed that he was slain, appalled the Parthians, and caused them to yield the Victory, [Tacit. ibid. cap. 34. & 35.] and so the Parthians having lost Armenia again, [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 6.] it is given to Mithridates Iberus. [Dion. lib. 58. pag. 638.]

Yet immediately after Artabanus goes with the whole strength of his kingdom to revenge this: But the Iberians had the better of it, through their skillfulness of the places; neither would he have desisted, had not Vitellius gathering together his Legions, and calling out a rumour, as if he would invade Melopotamia, strook him into a fear of the Roman forces. Then did Artabanus's fortune decline, having lost Armenia, and Vitellius enticing his subjects that they should forsake him, as one that was a Tyrant in peace, and unfortunate in war. Hereupon Sinnaeus hath secret conference with Abdages and others, and drew them to revolt, being prepared by their continual overthrow; those also coming in to him, that were subject rather through fear, than good will, took courage when they had Captains to follow. Vitellius having with money corrupted some both friends and kindred of Artabanus, endeavoured to kill him: he having understood the conspiracy, and not finding a remedy, because the danger was like to come to him from his Nobility, and having suspected even those that remained under his protection, he hasteneth his flight into the higher Provinces and places near to Scythia, expecting aid from the Carmanians and Hyrcanians, with whom he was joyned in affinity. [Tacit. lib. 6. cap. 36. Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 6.]

Agrippa the son of Aristobolus, when he was in great want at Ptolemais, took money up at interest of Protus a freed man in former time of his dead mother Berenice, using therein the help of Marius his own freed-man. He extorted from Marius a bill of his hand for 20000 Attick Drachmes, deducting out of that sum 500 for Marius himself, which he might the easier do, because Agrippa could not otherwise chuse. Having gotten this money, he goes to Antioch, and getting shipping, prepares himself for his journey into Italy. When Herennius Capito the Treasurer of Jamnia heard that he was there, he sent soldiers thither to exact of him 500 thousand drachmes of silver, which Agrippa owed Cæsar's treasury, when he lived at Rome: by which means he was enforced to stay. Whereupon he made a shew to obey their commands; but as soon as it was night, he cut his cables, and sailed to Alexandria, and there offers to borrow of Alexander Alabarcha 200 thousand drachmes of silver. He professes that he will lend him nothing, but to his wife Cyprus, admiring in her, her love to her husband, and her other virtues. When the therefore had become his security, Alexander Alabarcha pays him down five talents presently at Alexandria, but promised to deliver him the rest at Puteoli; because he feared Agrippa's prodigality. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 7. & 8.]

Philo the Jew makes mention of the coming of Agrippa to the City of Alexandria, in his book against Flaccus (at that time Governour of Egypt) which Philo Josephus says was the brother of Alexander Alabarcha. [lib. 18. cap. 10.] And Jerom relates in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers, that he was of the same family of the Priests. Whereupon Baronius (at the year of Christ 34. numb. 265.) thinks him to be no other, than that Alexander, [Act. IV. 6.] who is said to be of the kindred of the Priests; but this was that Alexander Lyfimachus, who bore the office of Alabarcha at Alexandria, (of whom Juvenal in his first Satyre) in former time the Steward of Antonia, the mother of the Emperor Claudius, and father of Tiberius Alexander, Governour of Judea, and the richest of all the Jews of Alexandria. [Joseph. lib. 19. cap. 4. & lib. 20. cap. 3.] He melted gold and silver for the gates of the Temple at Jerusalem, (and not his father, as Baronius writes in the forecited place.) [Joseph. lib. 6. Bell. Judæe. cap. 6.]

Cyprus having furnished her husband for his journey into Italy, returns with her children into Judea by land: and Agrippa when he was come to Puteoli, writ to Tiberius Cæsar then living at Capree, signifying unto him, that he came to do his duty unto him, and begging leave of him to come into the Island. Tiberius without delay writes back again, a kind answer, that he should be glad to see him safe returned to Capree; and also received him with great cheerfulness when he was come; for he both embraced him and lodged him. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 8.]

The next day, Cæsar having received letters from Herennius concerning the 300 thousand drachmes of silver, commanded them of his chamber, that Agrippa should not be admitted till he had paid the debt. He nothing dismayed at Cæsar's displeasure, displeasure; begs of Antonia, the mother of Germanicus and Claudius, (afterwards Emperor) that he would lend him 300 thousand Drachmes, for fear he should loose the friendship of Cæsar: who remembering the familiarity that had been between her and Bernice, Agrippa's Mother, and that he had been brought up with her son Claudius, lends him the money; wherewith having paid the debt, none gain-saying it, he rejoynes the Prince's favour, and is so thoroughly reconciled to Cæsar, that he commended to Agrippa's charge his Nephew (Tiberius the Twin) the son of Drusus, and commanded him that he should dutifully attend him whithersoever he went: and being bound and tied to Antonia for this benefit, he began to reverence Caius (Caligula) her Nephew, who was gracious in all men's eyes, and honoured for the memory of his father. There was there by chance at the same time, one Allus, a Samaritan, of whom he borrows 100000 Drachmes, and paces Antonia her debt, and keeps the rest, the more honourably to attend on Caius. [Joseph. lib. 18, cap. 7.]

Tigranes, the son of Alexander (that was put to death by his father Herod) and of Glaphyra, (the daughter of Archelaus, King of the Cappadocians) who had turned from the Jews to the Gentiles religion, and had been sometimes King of Armenia, being accented at Rome, and there punished, died without children. [Tacit. Annal. 6, cap. 40. Joseph. lib. 18, cap. 7.]

The Cities a Nation (in Cilicia Thracia) subject to Archelaus the Cappadocian, because they were compelled after the Roman fashion, to bring in the value of their yearly revenues, and to pay tribute, fled to the Hill Taurus, and there by the strong site of the place, defended themselves against the weak forces of their King, until M. Trebellius was sent from Vitellius, president of Syria, with 4000 Legionary Soldiers, and some choice Auxiliaries, compelled about with works, two hills, which the Barbarians had possessed, the name of the lesser was Cadra, the greater Tavata, and slew those that desert come out of their holds, and compelled the rest to yield for want of water. [Tacit. Annal. 6, cap. 41.]

Artabanus being fled, and the minds of the people inclining to a new King, Vitellius persuades Tiridates to lay hold on what was offered him, and leads his Legions and Auxiliaries to the bank of Euphrates. As they were sacrificing, and some were preparing Suovetaurilia, (a Boar, a Ram, and a Bull) after the manner of the Romans; others making ready an Horse, for the pacifying the river, the inhabitants about Euphrates bring word that the river was exceedingly risen of its own accord, without any great showers; and that the white froth made circles in form of a Diadem, which was an omen of a prosperous passage: but others did interpret it more foolishly; that the beginnings of their endeavour should be prosperous, but not lasting, because there was more credit to be given to those things that were portended by the earth, and Heaven, than the nature of Rivers were inconsistent, and that if they did shew any good presages, they would as soon take them away. But Vitellius having made a bridge of boats, and passed over his army, Orospades comes to his Camp with many thousands of Horse, he once a banished man, brought no small aid to Tiberius, when he made war in Dalmatia, and for that made Citizen of Rome. After this, entering anew into the Kings favour, he made him Governour of Mesopotamia, and not long after Sinnaeus increaseth his forces, and Abdages, the stay of that party, joyneth both his treasure and loyal preparations. Vitellius thinking it enough to have shewn the Roman forces, admonisheth Tiridates, that he should remember his God and Father Phraates, Cæsar's bringer up, the nobles, that they would be obedient to their King, and reverence the Romans; and that every one should keep his credit and fidelity; and then with his Legions goes back into Syria. [Tacit. Annal. cap. 37.]

Tiridates receives from the Parthians, willingly yielding them Nicophorium, and Anticemulias, and other Cities of Macedonia, using the Grecian languages as also Halus and Artemita, Cities of Parthia, greatly rejoicing, as who hated the cruelty of Artabanus, brought up among the Scythians, and hoped that Tiridates would be gentle, as he had among the Roman. The Seleucians use much flattery, their City is strong and walled about, not corrupted with barbarity, but keeping the laws of their founder Seleucus. When Tiridates was come among them, they highly honour him, and reproach Artabanus, as one indeed that was of the race of the Arsacids, by the mothers side, but in all other things he had degenerated. Tiridates commits the government of the Common-wealth to the people, whereas Artabanus had delivered it to the rule of 300 of the nobility. [Tacit. Annal. lib. 6, cap. 41, 42.]

Tiridates, then consulting what day he should be crowned, receives letters from Phraates, and Hieron, who held the strongest governments, desiring him that he would a little time deter in, which to satisfy those great men, he yielded unto: and in the mean while goes to Ctesiphon, the seat of the Kingdom: but when they delayed from day to day, Surenas, with the approbation of many there present, crowns Tiridates, after the custom of the Country; and if he had entered farther into the Country, and other Nations, those loyterers had been put out of all doubt, and all yielded obedience to one; but staying too long in besieging a Castle where Artabanus had conveyed his Treasure and Concubines, he gives them leave to break the agreement: for Phraates and Hieron, and some others that did not celebrate the day appointed for his Coronation, some for fear, and some for envy to Abdages, who then possessed the new King and was the only favourite at Court, turned to Artabanus. [Ibid. cap. 42, 43.]

Artabanus is found in Hyrcania very meanly attired, and getting his living with his bow. At first he was afraid, as if there had been some treachery; but when they had given their faith that they came to restore him to his kingdom again, he stayed no longer, than to assemble the Scythian forces, (Josephus relates that he got together a great army of the Dahæ and Sacæ) and goes with them presently: neither did he put off his mean attire, the more to move the common people to pity him. There was neither subtilty, nor prayers, nor any thing omitted, whereby he might either draw the doubtful to him, or confirm the willing. [Ibid. cap. 43, 44.]

He came then with a strong power near Seleucia: whenas Tiridates (struck into a fear with the fame and person of Artabanus, began to be distracted in his counsels, whether he should presently encounter him, or delay the war: but Abdages his opinion was, that he should retire into Mesopotamia; that having the River between them, and raising in the mean time the Armenians and Elymeans and the rest behind them, and increasing their forces with Allies and such as the Roman Captain would send, he should then try his fortune. That advice prevailed, because of Abdages authority, and Tiridates his cowardliness in dangers. This retreat differed little from a flight, and the Arabians first led the way, the rest went either home or to Artabanus's Camp: until Tiridates returning back into Syria with a small company, acquitted them all of the infamy of treason. [Ibid. cap. 44.]

Artabanus, having easily overcome his enemies, is restored to his kingdom. [Joseph. lib. 18, cap. 6. Dion. lib. 58, pag. 537.] who writing letters to Tiberius, upbraids him with parricides, murders, floods, and luxury, and advieth him, that he would quickly satisfy the most just hatred of the Citizens, by a voluntary death, [Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 66.] and having without danger set upon Armenia, he purposed also to invade Syria. [Dion. lib. 59, pag. 661.]

Agrippa being entertained with intimate familiarity by Caius Caligula, on a certain day as he rode in the same Coach with him, he prayed that Tiberius might shortly render the Empire to him, as to a worthier person. These words Eutichus overheard that was one of Agrippa's Freed-men, and his Coach-man, but then held his peace; he being afterwards accused, as though he had stolen a garment from his Patron, as indeed he did steal it, and being brought back again after he had fled, and led to Pilo the Prefect of the City, and asked the cause of his flight; he answers, That he had some certain secrets which he desired to reveal to Cæsar, belonging to his taciturnity. Whereupon he was sent in bonds to Caprea, and there long kept prisoner, before it pleased Cæsar to give him any hearing. [Joseph. lib. 18, cap. 8.]

A certain impostor persuades the Samaritans, that they should meet at the mount Garizim, which that nation thinks to be the most holy, affirming that he would then shew them the holy vessels buried, where Moses had laid them, they believing him, and taking arms encamp about a village called Tyrabath, expecting there till the rest came, that they might ascend the mountain with the greater company. But Pilate prepossessing himself with his horse and foot of the top of the hill, and fighting with those that were encamped at the village, some he overthrew, and some he put to flight, and took many captives alive, of whom he beheaded the ringleaders and those of most power among them. [Id. ibid. cap. 5.]

The chief men of Samaria address themselves to Vitellius Governour of Syria, and accuse Pilate of this murder, denying that this assembly at Tyrabath, was any revolt from the Romans, but a refuge from the tyranny of Pilate; whereupon Vitellius sending his friend Marcellus to take charge of Judea, commands Pilate to go to Rome, to answer before Cæsar to such crimes as the Jews objected against him. After he had lived ten years in that Province, [Id. ibid.] to which should be added a little appendix of 4 or 5 months, unless he deferred his voyage either through fear of storms, (the fast of the seventh month being past, as Matt. XXVII. 9.) or detained with contrary winds, or by some intercurrent delay, made him prolong his journey; for before Pilate came to Rome, Tiberius was dead, as Josephus shews.

When Tiberius came from Caprea to Tulucaum, which was distant from the City almost an hundred furlongs: he was perwaded, though much against his will, that he would hear Eutichus, that it might be known, of what crime he accused his Patron: who examining the matter, found that he had neglected his commands of honouring his Nephew Tiberius Drusus's son, and had wholly addicted himself to Caius.

Caius. Whereupon he commands Macro (who succeeded Sejanus in the command of the Pretorian soldiers) that he should bind Agrippa. Then Agrippa hath recourse to prayer, and begs pardon, for the memory of his son, with whom he was brought up, in great familiarity, and by those services that he had done young Tiberius. But all in vain, the Pretorian soldiers carrying him to prison, even in his Purple robes; and at that time it was very hot weather, and he very thirsty for want of wine, seeing a servant of Caius carrying a pitcher of water, he desired to drink, which when he had willingly bestowed on him, he drank, and said unto him, Truly, Lord, thou hast done me this service for thine own good, for as soon as I shall be free from this necessity, I will beg thy liberty of Caius, which also afterward he performed. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 8.]

Agrippa being a prisoner, stood bound among other prisoners before the Pallace, leaning in a melancholly posture against a tree, on which sat an owl: one of the prisoners, by Nation a German, seeing the bird, asks of a soldier, who he that was in purple was; and when he knew that he was one of the chief nobility of the Jews, being led to him, and using an interpreter, he told him, that this bird did signify that there should be a sudden change of his present fortune, and that he should be advanced to great dignity and power, and that he should have an happy death, (in which the most unhappy death of this man, shewed that he was a false Prophet) but when he should see this bird again, he should dye within five days. [Id. ibid.]

Antonia grieved at the calamity of the young man, thought it would be unprofitable to speak to Tiberius in his behalf; yet she obtained this much of Macro, that he might be committed to the custody of soldiers of a gentle behaviour, and that he should have a Centurion that should provide him his diet, and that he might use his daily things, and that his friends and freed men might come to him, by whose services he might be relieved, then were admitted to him his friend Silus, and his freed-men Marfyras and Sycchus, who brought him such meats as he was delighted with, they brought also covelets as it they would tell them, on which he lay a night, the souldier, a suffering this, having before directed on from Macro: and in this manner he spent six months in prison, even until the death of Tiberius. [Id. ibid.]

Concerning the confines of the Countrey Gamalie, there arose a great contention between Herod the Tetrarch and Aretas King of Arabia Petrea, not forgetfull of the injury done to his daughter, whom Herod had married, but condemned, and married in her room Herodias his brothers wife, they manage the war on both sides by their Lieutenants, and when the battles joined Herod's army was clean overthrow, being betrayed by some banished men, who being driven from the Tetrarchy of Philip, served under Herod, these things Herod signifies to Tiberius by letters, who being angry with Aretas for his bold attempt, writ to Vitellius that he should make war upon him, willing him that he should either bring him alive to him, or it dead to send him his head: it was the opinion among the Jews, that Herod's army was overthrow by the just judgment of God, for the murder of John the Baptist. [Josephus. lib. 18. cap. 7.]

Cn. Accerionius and C. Pontius Nigrinus being Consuls, Tiberius dies XVII. Kalends of April: as it is in Suetonius in Tiberio, cap. 13, and Lactantius, Annal. 6, cap. 50, or rather the VII. or XXVI. day of March, whereas after the decease of Augustus, he had reigned 22. years 7. months 7. daies, as Dion relates at the end of his fifty eighth booke, not 5. months 3. daies, as Josephus numbers in [lib. 18. Antiquit. cap. 8.] nor fix months 3. daies, as in the wars of the Jews, [lib. 2. cap. 8.]

Marfyras, the death of Tiberius being known, runs to his Patron Agrippa, whom he found bathing himself, nodding his head, told him in Hebrew. The lion is dead. Which when the Centurion who kept him knew from them, he taking off Agrippa's bonds made them good cheer, as they were merrily eating and drinking, there comes in one that said Tiberius was alive, and that he would shortly return to the City, with which word the Centurion being terrified, he commands Agrippa to be thrust from the rabble and bound, and to be more carefully looked to hereafter, but the next day there came two letters from Caius, one in which he wrote to the Senate that he had succeeded in the Empire in the room of dead Tiberius, the other in which he wrote to Pilo the Prefect of the City declaring the same thing, and commanding him that he should set Agrippa free, and restore him that house in which he had formerly lived in, in which although he was a prisoner yet lived he at his own discretion. [Josephus. lib. 18. cap. 8.]

Caius returning to Rome, bringing also the body of Tiberius celebrated a most sumptuous funeral, with great solemnity, and whereas he would the same day have released Agrippa, by the advice of Antonia he forbore, not that she did not wish well to the man, but denied that this halt was handsome, least he should seem to do this in hatred to Tiberius; if he should so suddenly deliver him, whom Tiberius had

imprisoned, but not many daies after he sent for him to his house, and commanded his hair to be cut, and changed his garments, and then putting a Crown on his head, he made him King of Philips Tetrarchy, giving him also the Tetrarchy of Lytania; and changed his chain of Iron into a chain of gold of the same weight, and sent Marullus governour into Judea. [Josephus. lib. 18. cap. 8.]

Dion relates that C. Caligula freed Agrippa the Grandchild of Herod from those bonds, which Tiberius had put on him, and that he gave him his Grandfather's principality, [lib. 59. pag. 645.] Philo in his book against Flaccus saies that he was honoured with the ornaments of a Prætor by the Roman Senate, and that Caius gave him the Kingdome, and the third part of the ancient dominion that his uncle Paul possessed, but Agrippa having gotten the Kingdom, begs Trajanus of Caius, and gives him his liberty, and makes him steward of his goods. And when Agrippa died he left him in the same office to his son Agrippa, and Berenice his daughter with whom he was in great account as long as he lived. [Josephus. lib. 18. cap. 8.]

Caligula gives to Antiochus, the son of Antiochus Commagene, his father's kingdom, giving him also the maxime places of Cilicia. [lib. 59. pag. 645.]

Aretas, governour of Syria, took with him two Legions, and the aids of Foot and Horse that were sent from the King that were allies, halting towards Petra, came to Ptolemais: and as he thought to lead his army through Judea, the principal men of that Country came to him, desiring that he would not pass that way, for the customs of their Country would not suffer, that any images should be carried there, such as the King of their Country would not suffer, that any images should be carried there, such as the Roman banners had many, with whole prayers he being moved, changed his opinion, and sent his army through the great plains and came with Herod the Tetrarch and his friends to Jerusalem, to offer sacrifice to God, at the next feast, which was night at hand: whether when he was come, he was magnificently entertained by the people, and staying three daies there, in the mean time he transferred the High Priesthood from Jonathan upon Theophilus his brother. [Josephus. lib. 18. cap. 7.]

Four daies after Vitellius having received letters of Tiberius his death, made the people take the oath of fidelity in his letters to Caius, (as it is in Pilo in Legatione.) Whereupon Agrippa saith in his letters to Caius, (as it is in Pilo in Legatione.) They greatly desired succession, (O Emperor) was first heard of at Jerusalem, and the fame of it was diffused to the neighbour Provinces from the Holy City: and because this City, of all the east, first saluted thee Emperor, it is meet that it should be treated more graciously by thee. And the Senate of the Jews in their oration to Petronius, (in the same manner) Caius having obtained the Empire, we first of all Syria congratulated with Vitellius, (whose success for thou art) then being in our City, and had received letters concerning this business, and from us, have carried the joyful news to other Cities, our Temple first of all sacrificed for the Empire of Caius.

Vitellius recalls his forces, leaving off his intended war, because the Empire was devolved to another, and truly some report, that Aretas, when he heard the news of Vitellius's Expedition, gathered from all quarters, that it was impossible for his army to come to Petra, for one of the Generals should die, either he that commanded the Expedition, or he that obeyed it, or he against whom the Expedition was. [Josephus. lib. 18. cap. 7.]

Josephus writes that Vitellius went to Antioch, having sent his army into their Winter Quarters, which it is not likely he would do in the beginning of Summer, whereas he should have rather said that he went with his forces to Euphrates, to make a league with the King of the Parthians: for it appears out of Suetonius and Dion, that this was done, not in Tiberius reign, (as Josephus thinks) but under Caius, for Artabanus always hated and contemned Tiberius, but willingly sought the alliance of Caius: and Vitellius by all his policies inticed him not only to a conference, but also to worship the Roman Standard; for he going over Euphrates, adored the Roman Eagle, and sacrificed to Augustus and Caius's images, and yielded to conditions of peace, which were for the Roman profit, and gave his children as hostages. [Suet. in C. Caligula, cap. 14. & A. Tiberio, cap. 2. Dion. lib. 59. pag. 661.]

The King and Vitellius meet in the middle of a bridge, with each their guard, and after they had agreed upon a league, Herod invited them both to a banquet in a pavilion erected with great cost, in the middle of the River. Vitellius then returns to Antioch, and Aretas goes to Babylon; but Herod being willing to give the first notion to Caius, of the receipt of the hostages, he sent express messengers with letters, leaving nothing for the Caius's Embassadors to certify: wherefore Cæsar writes back to Vitellius upon the receipt of his letters, that he knew all these things before by Herod's messengers, with which he was much troubled. [Josephus. lib. 18. cap. 6.]

Not long after, Artabanus sends his son Darius as hostage, with many gifts, among which there was a Jew, by name Eleazar, five cubits high, who for his greatness was called the Gyanar. [Id. ibid.]

The Jews of Alexandria, after they had appointed for Caius all the honours, that were lawful for them to decree, came and offered the decree to Flaccus Abilius, desiring him, that since it was not permitted to them, to send an Embassy, he would be pleased to send it by his messengers, he reads the decree, and allowing many of the heads thereof, familiarly said, Your prayer highly pleaseth me, I will send as you desire, I will be your Ambassador, that Caius may perceive your gratitude, and I will be a witness of the people's modesty, and obedience well known to me, nevertheless he kept back this decree, that they might seem to be the only contempters of Caius. [Philo, in Flaccum.]

The first year of the reign of C. Caligula, J. Joseph, the writer of the History of the Jews, was born, who was the son of Mattathias, a Priest, as J. Joseph shows in his Life.

When Saul had preached the Gospel a long time at Damascus, the Jews took counsel to kill him, and they being helped by the Governour under Aretas, (who had lately overthrown the army of Herod the Tetrarch) who kept the City of the Damascenes with a Garrison, watched the gates day and night, that they might take him and kill him, but he being let down by a rope by night in a basket, escaped from their laying in wait. [Acts IX. 23, 24, 25. II Cor. XI. 32, 33.]

The first three years of his Apostolic being finished, Saul returned to Jerusalem, to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days. [Gal. I. 18.] And he then assaying to join himself to the Disciples, they all were afraid of him, not believing him to be a Disciple: but Barnabas took him, and brought him to the Apostles, (viz. Peter and James, the brother of the Lord, for he law none other of the Apostles, [Gal. I. 19.]) and declared unto them, how he had seen the Lord in the way, and that he had spoken to him, and how he had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus. [Acts IX. 26, 27.]

Saul speaks boldly in the name of Jesus at Jerusalem, and disputed with the Greeks, or Jews that used the Greek tongue, as Syrus rightly interprets this piece, but they went about to kill him. [Acts IX. 29.]

Saul being in the Temple praying, was in a trance, and saw the Lord speaking unto him, Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem, for they will not receive thy testimony of me: to whom he answered, Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every Synagogue those that believed on thee: and when the blood of thy Martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by, and kept the garments of them that killed him: and the Lord said unto him, Get up, and I will send thee to the Gentiles. [Acts XXII. 17, 21.]

The brethren at Jerusalem brought him to Cesarea, and sent him into his own Country of Tarsus. [Acts IX. 30.] and he came into the Countries of Syria, and Cilicia: hitherto he was unknown by face to the Churches of Judea, but they heard only, that he preacheth the faith which once he destroyed, and they glorified God in him. [Gal. I. 21, 22, 23.]

And the Churches had rest through all Judea, and Galilee, and Samaria, and were edified, and walking in the fear of the Lord, and comfort of the holy Ghost were multiplied. [Acts IX. 31.]

Herod Agrippa had a daughter by Cyprus, named Drusilla, (married afterwards to Felix) [Acts XXIV. 24.] who was six years old when her father died. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 7. & lib. 19. cap. ult.]

Caligula forces Macro, to whom Egypt was committed, (the six years that were appointed by Tiberius, for the government of Flaccus Abilius being ended) and his wife Ennia, by whole help he had got the Empire, to a voluntary death. [Philo, de Legat. ad Caium, & lib. in Flaccum, Sueton in Caligula, cap. 26. Dion. lib. 59. pag. 647.]

Flaccus, who was Governour of Egypt, Macro being killed, on whom he most relied, was dreadfully afraid of C. Caligula, taking this occasion, Dionysius Lampo, and Isidore persuade him, that he should by some great benefit make the people of Alexandria his friends, and that nothing would be more grateful to them, than that he would suffer them to plunder the Jews, and he follows their counsel. [Philo, in Flaccum.]

Caligula, by a decree of the Senate, gives the Kingdom of the Arabians of Ituraea to Symus, to Corys Armenia the Lesser, and also some parts of Arabia, to Rhymatalea, the Kingdom of Corys to the son of Polemon, his fathers Kingdom. (viz. of Bonarus). [Dion. lib. 59. pag. 649.]

In the second year of C. Caligula's reign, Herod Agrippa begs leave of him, to return home, for the ordering of his Kingdom, promising, when he had done that, he would return, [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 8.] The Emperour perswaded him, that taking the readiest way by sea, the East winds being every day expected, he should go directly to Alexandria, and that then he might go with less difficulty into his own Country by lands: who following his advice, went to Puteoli, and there he finds a ship ready to set sail for Alexandria, and in few days after, he arrives at Alexandria. [Philo, in Flaccum.]

The Alexandrians by reason of their inveterate hatred against the Jews, taking it impatiently that they should have a King, in the place of exercise did disgrace Agrippa with curtilous speeches, and mocking words of jesters. They also hurried to the sporting-place, a certain mad man named Carabas, who went naked night and day in the streets, and there let him on a high place that all might see him. Then they let a paper crown on his head, and put on his body a mat instead of his robe, and one gave him a piece of a reed taken off the ground, for his scepter. Being thus adorned with culgins of a King, and thus changed into a King after the manner of Stage players, the young men carrying poles on their shoulders invited him for his guard. Others came to salute him, some desired justice, others asked counsel of him concerning the Common-wealth. Then there was a general acclamation of them that were about him, calling him Marim, which name in the Syrian tongue signifies Lord. [Philo, ibid.] And thus the King of the Jews was derided after the same manner by others, as the Jews themselves five years before had mocked the true Majesty of their own King Jesus Christ.

The Jews of Alexandria acquainted Agrippa with the treachery that Flaccus the Governour had prepared for their destruction; and also delivered to him that writing that they had given to Flaccus to be sent to Caius in the beginning of his Empire. Agrippa promises that he will send this writing to Caius, and that he will signify, that the Jew had intended to send it at the beginning, but being hindered by the malice of the Governour, they could do it no sooner. [Philo, ibid. & in Legat. ad Caium.]

Peter the Apostle visiting the Churches of Judea, Galilee, and Samaria, cometh to the Saints that dwell at Lydda, and there heals Aeneas that lay sick of the Palsie, and had kept his bed eight years: and all that dwell at Lydda and Sharon (of which place Chronicles. V. 16. XXVII. 29.) when they saw this miracle, turned to the Lord. [Acts IX. 31, 35.]

A certain Disciple called in Syriack Tabitha, in Greek Doreas, that is, a she Goat, full of good works and almes deeds, died at Joppa: and whereas Lydda was near Joppa, the Disciples hearing that Peter was there, sent two men unto him, that he would not delay to come unto them; who when he came, fell on his knees and prayed, and restored her to life. And this was known through all Joppa, and many believed in the Lord; and Peter tarried there many days in the house of one Simon a Tanner. [Acts IX. 36, 41.]

The common people of Alexandria, early in the morning (having regained the favour of Flaccus the Governour) with one consent proclaimed that the Statues of Cæsar are to be set up in the Synagogues of the Jews: which the Governour suffered to be done without any respect of the publick security, although he knew that there were not less than ten hundred thousand Jews that inhabited Alexandria, and all that large Country from the desert of Libya, even to the bounds of Ethiopia. [Philo, in Flaccum.] Then they gathering together in great companies, either laid waste their Oratories, by cutting down their Groves, or raled them to the ground; and in all the Oratories which they could not either overthrow or burn, because of the great number of Jews that dwell by them, they set up the Images of Caius, and in the greatest and most frequented, they set up a Statue on high, on Chariots with four horses in Brass, and that with such over-hasty earnestness, that whereas they wanted new Chariots, they took out of the rusty old ones, whose horses wanted their ears, tails, and feet, and such as were dedicated (as was reported) to Cleopatra, which was the great Grandmother of the last Queen of that name. And Caius thought that all these things proceeded out of the love that the Alexandrians bore him: which partly he knew out of the Registers sent to him from Alexandria (for he read them more willingly than any either Poeme or History) and partly from some domestick servants (of whom many were Egyptians) who were wont to praise and laugh at these things with him. [Id. in Legat. ad Caium.]

Caius Caligula, commands a vacation, for his sister Drusilla that was dead, in which it was death for any to laugh, or bathe, or make a feast. [Sueton. in C. Caligula, cap. 24. Dion. lib. 59. pag. 648.]

Flaccus the Governour of Egypt propounded an Edict, in which he calls the Jews, Strangers, and Forrainers, not giving liberty of pleading their cause, but condemned them unjudged. There are five divisions of that City named from the fifth five letters, letters, two of which were called the Jewish quarters, because most of the Jews dwelt in them although many Jews had houses here and there in the other quarters. The common people of Alexandria, having obtained from Flaccus licence of plundering the Jews, having expelled them from four of the letters, thrust them into a narrow compass of one of them; who, because they were more than the place could contain, went out unto the shoars, and monuments, and dunghills, being disposed of all things; their enemies ran violently to their forsaken shops: and there divide the spoils as taken by law of Armes, and breaking open the houses of the Jews, which then were shut because of the mourning for Drullus death, they carry many things from thence, which they sell in the market, and turn to their own use: but the ransacking of four hundred houses did lesse hurt them than their losse of trade, when as the creditors had lost their bonds, neither was Husbandman, Mariner, Merchant, or Handicraftsman, suffered to use their trades. [Philo. in Flaccum.]

Their enemies thought they should shortly see them lie on heapes, for many thousands of men women and children, thrust into a narrow corner of the City like beasts; either killed with famine for want of meat, or stifled in that hot place, even the neighbour aire being corrupted by the multitude of breaths. They took diligence here, lest any should steal privately away, and as many as they intercepted, having first tormented them, they killed them, and abstained from no kind of cruelty. Another band of them lay in wait for the Jews that arrived at the Ports, and all who their merchandise, which when they had taken away in the sight of the owners, they burned the owners themselves in a fire made of the rutenes, oares, and planks, of the ships. Others in the middle of the City were burned by a most miserable kind of death: for, for want of wood, they brought the cuttings of vines, and making a fire of them, they cast into it these miserable men, who were killed, being rather scorched with smoke, than burnt with fire. Others were dragged with cords tied to their ancles through the Market-place, the common people inflicting over them, and not sparing even their dead bodies; for having cut their members into pieces, they trampled upon them with such cruelty, that they suffered not any reliques of them to remain for burial. [Id. in Legat. ad Caium.] and if any did but bemoane the misfortune of his friend or kinsman, he was punished for his compassion presently, and being taken were scourged, and after they had endured all torments that bodies were able to endure, they were crucified. [Id. in Flaccum.]

Flaccus the Governour commanded thirty eight of the Senate, which Augustus had appointed for a publick Council of the Jew, to be taken in their own houses, and forthwith to be bound; and dragging these old men through the Market-place, their hands being tied behind them, some with cords some with chains, brought them into the Theater, and commanded them to be stripe and scourged as they stood before their enemies who sat as Judges. And among these were Erodus Tryphon, and Andron, even in the sight of them who had depolished them of their goods: and although it was a custom that none should be condemned till the solemn celebrations and feast-days of the births of the Augusti were past; yet Flaccus in those very days, (for the Birth-day of Caius fell on the last day of August) did afflict these innocent men, after this manner dividing his plays. From the morning to the third or fourth hour of the day, the Jews were scourged, hanged, tied to wheels, condemned, and led through the middle of the wrestling-place to punishment. Then were brought in Dancers, Jesters, Trumpeters, and other sports of Players: and women were carried away as captives; not only in the Market-place, but in the open Theater also, and for any trifling caviel, were brought upon the stage, not without grievous reproaches; but then knowing that they were not Jews, they were let go, for they apprehended many for Jews before they did gently consider the thing: but after they were found to be Jews, of spectators, they became tyrants, and commanded swines flesh to be given them, and as many of the Jewish women as tasted it for fear of torments, without any more vexation were dismissed; but those that would not eat it, were delivered over to be tormented with most grievous tortures. [Ibid.]

Caius the boldest of the Centurions, is commanded by the Governour to take with him the valiantest of his Band, and to break into the Jews houses, to see if they had any armes hidden, who presently does what he is bidden: the Jews shewed all their private places to the searchers, where women never went to go abroad, and the fearful Virgins, who for modesty avoided the sight of their own kindred, were made a spectacle not only to men unknown, but also to the Military rage; nevertheless after all this scrutiny, the armes they looked for, were not found: for all armes were a little before taken from the Egyptians by Bassus, commanded by Flaccus to oversee that business: but there you might see a great number of ships to arrive at the Ports full of armes, which were fit to be taken from seditious men, who had often before assayed a revolt: but there was a clean other account, to be made of the Jews, who never never were suspected of a revolt, did follow their trades and gains which did make for the concord and peace of the City. [Ibid.]

Whilst the feast of Tabernacles in the Autumnal Equinoctial was intermitted by the Jews so much afflicted; Flaccus the Governour is apprehended by Bassus the Centurion on a sudden as he was at a feast invited by Stephanion the freeman of Tiberius Caesar. Bassus being sent with a Band of footsides out of Italy on purpose to do it; and when he had set sail in the beginning of Winter, being tossed with tempests by sea, after much toil, he scarcely arrives in Italy, where he is presently welcomed by those two malicious accusers, Lampo, and Iodorus, who had incited him against the Jews; who being condemned and dispoiled of all both inheritance and household-stuff, which was very precious; he is banished, and truly he had been banished into the most barren Island of Giarus in the Aegean sea, unless Lepidus had begged that he might be sent to dwell in Andros, which was nigh Giaros: where he died, being killed by the command of Caius, (as did all Noble men that were banished. [Ibid.])

Herodias, the sister of Agrippa, and wife of Herod the Tetrarch, seeing him so glorious in his Kingly Majesty, being maddened with envy, did not cease, till she had perwaded her husband, that they might go to Rome, and beg the same dignity of Caesar. Agrippa knowing both their intention and preparation, as soon as ever he knew they had taken sea, he also sends his freed man Fortunatus to Rome to Caesar with gifts, and letters written against his Uncle, Herod coming to Bial, a most pleasant Town of Campania, where Caesar then was, being admitted, Caesar prevents him, and gives him the letters he had received from Agrippa, which did accuse Herod, that he had formerly conspired with Scianus against Tiberius, and that now he favoured Artabaeus the Parthian, against the new Empire of Caius, and for that purpose had prepared to many arms, as would furnish 70000 men, with which Caius being moved, asked Herod if those things were true that were spoken concerning the number of arms, which he granting, (for he could not deny it) Caius thinking the revolt enough proved, took from him the Tetrarchy of Galilee and Perea, which he afterwards added to Agrippas Kingdom, giving him all his treasure, and sent Herod to Lyons in France, condemning him to perpetual banishment: but after he knew that Herodias was Agrippas sister, he allowed her her own proper stature, and not thinking that she would willingly be her husbands companion in banishment, he promised to spare her in favour to Agrippa. She thanked Caius for this favour, but protested that at this time she could not make use of it, for the thought it a sin, to forsake her husband in his calamity, of whose good fortune, as long as he flourished, she had been partaker: which Caius taking in scorn, commanded her also to be banished with her husband, and gave her goods to Agrippa, [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 9.] and so they were punished for their incestuous marriage. Eight years after John Baptist had been beheaded by this Herod, and fix years after Christ our Saviour had been mocked by the same Herod. [Luke XXIII. 11.]

And also Pontius Pilate was so continually vexed by Caius, that he killed himself with his own hand, as Jerom in Chronicle, out of the Roman Historians, and Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, out of the Greek Writers of the Olympiades. [lib. 2. cap. 7.] and Orosius [lib. 7. cap. 5.] and Cassiodorus in his Chronicle.

Caius joyned all the distance between the Gulf Baiz, and the pyles of Puzoli, with a bridge almost 3600 paces long, in which there followed his Chariot, then did many more things in the nature of spoils came after, as also of the hostages of the Parthians, the late Darius (the son of Artabaeus) Darius and Xerxes being named but in scorn, because he had made a longer bridge upon the sea than he. [Joseph. 19. cap. 1. Sueton. C. Caligula. cap. 19. Dio. lib. 59. pag. 653.]

He also under pretence of the German war, went a little beyond the Rhene, and then presently returned, as though he would go into Britain, [Dion. lib. 59. pag. 616.]

Vitellius was sent for by Caius out of Syria, that he might be put to death, [Id. ibid. pag. 661.] for it was laid to his charge, that he had suffered Tiberides a King that Tiberius had sent to the Parthians, to be thrust out of his Kingdome by them. [Id. in excerptis ab Henrico Valesio. edit. pag. 670.]

Caius sent Petronius succour to Vitellius into Syria, [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 11.] (viz. Publius Petronius) as it is manifest in Philo. in legatione ad Caium) and in [Joseph. lib. 19. cap. 6.] of whom Strabo speaks in the year of the world 3983.) and not that Lucius Petronius (dead long before this time) whom Valerius Maximus mentions, that being born of low parentage, came to the degree of being a Knight. [lib. 4. cap. 7.] as Baronius thinks [anno Christi 41. num. 4.]

Vitellius coming to Caius delivers himself from death, after this manner, he had compelled himself to an habit more humble, than his vain glory would well endure, and and falling at Cæsar's feet, burst out into raptures, and calling him God and adoring him, and then vowing that if he should escape this brute, he would sacrifice to him as he to his molished and appealed Cæsar, that he not only offered him to live, but accounted him among his chiefest friends, [Dion. lib. 59, pag. 661.] and so he was the first that taught Caius to be adored as a God, he being of an admirable wit, in flattering, when he was returned out of Syria, he durst not come into Caius's presence, but with his face covered, turning himself about, and falling prostrate on the ground, [Sueton. in A. Vitell. cap. 2.] and when afterwards Caius affirmed that he had to do with the moon, and altho Vitellius, if he had not seen him when he companied with the goddess, he wald s'cuse cast down as a foolishness, and trembling, answered with a low voice, O my Lord, it is only permitted to you gods to see one the other, [Dion. ut supra.] Vitellius having made this beginning, whereas he had governed the Provincers according to the virtue of his ancestors, he excelled all men in flattery. [Dion. lib. 6. Tacit. Annal. 5, cap. 32.]

Then was Caius Priest to himself, and took his horse as Colleague of his Priesthood, [D. on. ibid. pag. 667.] but at Milcrum in Alia he commanded a temple to be built unto him, choosing this City before others, under colour because he said that Ephelus was taken up by Diana, and Pergamus and Smyrnia, by Augustus and Tiberius, but the true reason was, because he did desire to set to himself that great and fair temple, which the Milcrans had built to Apollo: [id. in excerptis. Valesii. pag. 670. 673.] he purposed also to finish the oracic Didymena at Milcrum. [Sueton. in C. Caligula. cap. 21.]

Strangers out of the neighbouring countries had crept into Jamnia, a City of Judea, that was very populous, who did alwaies endeavour to do something against the Jewish customs: these when they heard by men that came thither, how much Caius desired to be worshipped as a God, and what a heavy friend he was to the nation of the Jews, presently rear an altar of Clay made into bricks, only that they might vex the Jews, this they taking in great scorn took clean away, of which their adversaries accuse them before Capito the Holy Questioner, who had the oversight of the tribunes in Judea, he wrote to Caius, aggravating and amplifying the buffnells, and Caius commanded that for the Altar of brick that was overthrowen in Jamnia, they should place in the temple of Jerusalem a great image in honour of him all guilt, using here in the advices of Helicon an Egyptian, and Apelles of Alcaon a Tragedian, Caius commands Petronius the governor of Syria, by letters most accurately written concerning the dedication of the statue, that he should march with half the army (appointed for defence against the irruptions of the Kings and nations of the East) from Euphrates against the Jews, and that he should accompany the statue, not so much that the dedication might be the more majestic, but that if any one made resistance, he might be presently put to death, but neither was the statue sent from Italy, neither was Petronius commanded to take any choice one out of all Syria, otherwise some sudden tumult would have risen, about the violation of the laws of the Jews, therefore Petronius commanded a statue to be prepared nearer hand, and sending for the best artificer out of Phenicia found the materials, the shop where they should make it he appointed at Sidon. [ Philo, in legatione ad Caesarem. ]

In the mean while he got as great an army as he could, and with two legions wintered at Ptolemais intending to prosecute the war at the beginning of the spring; which he also signified to Caius by letter, who commending his industry, adviceth him to use all expedition therein, and abate the stubbornness of that nation, for Josephus,

In a fiction that arose between the Jews and the Greeks that dwelt at Alexandria, three chosen Embassadors on either side were sent unto Caius the chief of the Embassy of the Jews was Philo a man most famous in all things and of the Greeks Apion [id. ibid. cap. 10.] who being born at Oafinis in Egypt, desired to be called rather of Alexandria, because he was made a Citizen of that place. [id. lib. 2. against Apion.] Philo in his 37. book of his natural history cap. 5. reports that by Iome he was furnished with mesorology as it were after Conquerours, adding also these things of him in his preface to his whole work to Titus Velpasian: Apion the Grammarian, he whom Tiberius Cæsar called the emblem of the world, whereas he might rather be called the dream, wrote that they were immortal seedy him, to whom he compely any thing, who wrote a most lying book against the Jews, to which Jotephus answers in his second book against Apion, for the first book is opposed against other slanderers of the Jewish nation.

The Embassadours of the Jews (whom Philo confirmeth to be five at the end of the Embassy written by himself, (and not three as Josephus would have it) failed to Caius in the midst of winter, to entreat him that he would forbear those injuries which they did daily suffer, and they thought fit to offer to him a register containing the sum of all the calamities, and the petition against them, taken out of that larger petition, which the Jews had sent him by their King Agrippa, their adversaries got the favour of Heliodorus the Egyptian, who was Prefect of the Emperours chamber; nor to match with money, as with the hope of honour, which they promised to confer on him, as soon as ever Caius should come to Alexandria, whom when the Embassadors did desire to pacify and appease, they could find no access to him. [Philos. in legat. ad Caium.]

Caius himself at the first, (dissembling his hatred against the Jews) received their Embassadors in Mars his field, as he came out from his many gardens, falcured them with a cheerful countenance; and with his right hand made a sign, as though he would be kind unto them; and sending Humulus unto them, who was Master of the Ceremonies, promised them that he would take cognizance of their cause when he had leisure, but afterward when he came to visit the gardens of Mœcia and Læmia, both which were close one by the other, and near the City, and the Embassadors being brought in, and done their reverence very humbly, and had saluted him by the name of Augustus Emperor, he grinningly asked them, are ye thibated of the gods, who alone condemn men, being declared a god by the confession of all men, and had rather worship your unmade thing. And then holding up his hands to heaven burst into a speech that was no lawfull to be heard, much more to utter in the same words, the adverse party then greatly rejoiced, calling him by all the names of the gods, which when Il-lorus a bitter Egyptian saw how he was pleased with the terrible, he said: Thou wouldst, O my Lord more desire them, and all their flocks, if thou didst but know their impiety and malice against thee, for all men effecting sacrifices of doves for thy deatly, they only refused to give sacrifice. Then the Embassadors cried out with one consent: O my Lord Caius, we are fairly accused, we have sacrificed Hea-corns, and we have not as the manner of some is, to bring a little blood to the Altar, when carry the flesh home to feast withally, but we have committed what sacrifices to be burned with the holy fire, and that thrice, first, when thou succeedest in the empire, as when thou didst; great flocks, at which flocks all the world was sorrowful, to rally as a vow for the victory of Germany, well, answered Caius, say it were so, ye offered sacrifice, but to another, to me certainly ye did not sacrifice. Then an horrible lezenth on the Embassadors, being as then asked at his last words, he in the mean while goes about the villages, he views the halls and parlours, both below and above stairs, where also he alketh the Embassadors particularly, why they forbore swine flesh, and what right the Cities of Alexandria pretended, at length laying aside his fierceness he said, them men seem to me not to be so wicked, as miserable, that cannot persuade themselves but I am partaker of the divine nature, and immediately departing commanded the Embassadors to be gone.

Caius gave the Tetrarchy of his father-in-law Herod (who was banished to Lugdunum) to Agrippa at his return from his Kingdom: For when he had reigned three years in the Tetrarchy of Philip in the fourth that of Herod fell to him, [Joseph, lib. 29, cap. ult.] which beneficence in his Epitaphus Caius writes after this, he thus acknowledges, Thou hast bestowed the Kingdom on me, than which there could be no happier fortune to a mortal, and which being at first but one region, thou hast enlarged by the addition of Trachonitis & Galilee, Philo, in Legat.

Petronius convoc'd the chief of the Jews both Priests and Magistrates, to the end he might declare unto them the commands of Cæſar, that he ſhould erect the ſtatue of his Idole in their temple, and alſo perſwading them to take patiently the decrees of the ſaid Idole in Matters, and cautioning them of the imminent danger that would enſue upon their diſobedience, for that the whole power of the Syrian army was ready to make havock of them and their Countrey. At the firſt mention of theſe things they were to daſt they had not a word to ſay, but powrd forth whole rivers of teares, rearing their hair and pulling their beards in moſt mournfull wile. But thoſe of Jeruſalem & all the Countrey about, that heard this flocking together with one conſent, giving the ſign of their publick mourning, they went in one company; leaving their Houſes, Towns, and Cattle deſolate, and continued their march till they came unto Phenicia, where Petronius then was. And there at firſt they made ſuch a dolefull ſhout, and to deep a noife that thoſe that wereby could not hear or be heard for it, and then made ſuch compellions and imprecations, as calamitous times are commonly the winckles of. They were diſtributed into fix ranks or orders of old men, young men, and boyes; of old women, wives, and maids. And when they ſaw Petronius upon a high place, all the ranks, as by a general word fell proſtrate upon the ground, ſhowling as it were in a mournfull tone: and being commanded to riſe, could ſcarce be perſwaded to do it, and at laſt when they did, caſting duſt upon themſelves, and waving the hands backward like condemned perſons, they came before him: by a horrible pittifull complaint and ſupplications, Petronius and all that ſaw him being very much much move, when he had consulted the business, took order to send letters to Caius; in which he signified that the dedication of the Statue was deferred, partly for that the workmen were required to the perfecting of the Colosse, which must be finished at an appointed time; partly for the gathering of the corn which was necessary against the expedition. Caius it was reported, had intended for Egypt, and for that the corn was plentiful, and also it was to be feared, that the Jews would take so heavily the loss of their religion, that they would not only not value their own lives, but wait and burn up all the harvest throughout the fields and Mountains in their desperation. [Ibid.]

Caius having received the letters for a time, dissembled his intestine anger to Petronius; for he very much feared the Prefecture, for that it was in their power to make new commotions, especially those of great Provinces, and numerous armies, such as was the tract of Syria to E. pirates. Having thus by his letters appeased him, he seemed to applaud his providence and dexterity in foreseeing future inconveniences; but withal, adding strict command, that when harvest was over, he should for pretence or matter delay the dedication of the Statue. [Ibid.]

The Ambassadors of the Alexandrian Jews received the message, That Caius had commanded his Colosse should be placed at the innermost entrance of the Temple, inscribed with his first name of New Jupiter. With which news being affrighted, they entered into the Concave all together, deploring as well the publick, as their private calamity; yet hoping that God would not be wanting, then who had so often delivered it a nation from ruin. [Ibid.]

When Agrippa came in his wonted manner to salute Caius, looking sternly upon him, he said, Your good and honest Citizens, who alone of all mankind think scorn to have Caius for a god, even take a course in likelihood to bring destruction upon themselves by their contumacy, who when I commanded the Statue of Jupiter to be dedicated in their Temple, renn wholly out of the City not like suppliants indeed, but truly despisers of my commands. By which words he was so struck with horror, and his knees striking together, he had fully fallen to the ground, had not the flanelets by supported him: who were commanded to carry him home in that condition, that by the suddenness of the impression, he had lost his remembrance, and was grown quite stupid and senseless. But Caius was the more exasperated against the Nation of the Jews, saying, If Agrippa, who is my familiar friend, and obliged to me by so many benefits, is so set upon his Country race, that he cannot endure they should be violated so much as by my word only, but is frowarded at it, what is to be expected from them who have no tie to restrain them? [Philo. de Legat.]

When Agrippa was come to himself, he wrote very large Epistles to Caius, in behalf of his Country. (inferred by Philo, in the book of his Embassy) which he closteth with this Epilogue. What will my kinsmen, or any else say of me? For either it will follow, that I am a betrayer of my Country, or I must hereafter be blotted out of the list of thy friends, then either of which, what can be more unhappy? For that hitherto I have been thy favourite, shall be accounted a traitor, if I neither preserve my Country from indomity, nor the Temple inviolate. For you that are in power, are used to consult the relief of those who fly to your imperial power for relief. But if in any thing I am offensive to you, do me the favour not to bind me (as Tiberius) but least I should remain in fear of bonds, let me presently. For what need have I then of life, when all the hope of my welfare, wholly consists in your favour. [Ibid.]

As Caius seeming to be somewhat appeased by these letters, answers more mildly, and grants Agrippa as a great favour, that the Statue should not be dedicated, and upon the same wrote to Petronius, the President of Syria, that he should make no innovation in the Temple of the Jews. But least this favour should seem too intire, he mixt some terror, thus writing: But if any shall place in the outer Provinces, or any where out of the Metropolis, in any outer City, to dedicate any Temple or Altar to me, whosoever shall oppose it, let them either be presently put to death or sent to me. But divine providence so ordered it, that none in any of the outer Provinces did any thing in that business. [Ibid.]

When the Patience grew very hot at Babylon, a great multitude of the Jews went from thence to Seleucia, whither many more of them came five years after from Neerda, (which is a City of Babylonia, encompassed by the flowing of Nilus, and an Academy of the Jews, whence in Syriac it is called בבל as if one should say, The River of Knowledge.) Now at Seleucia, the Grecians and Syrians were always at odds, but the Grecian faction was too hard for the Syrian. Since the coming of the Jews, the Syrians by their friendship became the stronger party, besides that, they had increased in warlike and valour men. Wherefore when the Greeks saw they were beaten in the wind, and knew not how to recover themselves, they made all the friendship they could handily, to have a peace mediated between them and the Syrians,

Syrians, a thing they easily obtained. For the chief men on both sides treating in the business, they concluded and confirmed a peace, on condition they should both prosecute the Jews. And going upon them at unawares, flew to the number of fifty thousand men, so that none escaped, unless saved by the mercy of some friend or kinsman. They go from hence to Ctesiphon, a Grecian City near Seleucia, where the King used to take up his winter quarter, and where was laid up the greatest and best part of his household stuff and there they fixt, establishing themselves on for the reverence of the regal majesty. But the terror of the Babylonians and Seleucians spread it self over all those parts of Judea: wherefore any of the Syrians were in those parts with the Seleucians, they conspired their ruin. Whence it came to pass that many betook themselves to Neerda and Nisibis, reposing the confidence of their security, in their strong fortifications, although otherwise they were possessed by very warlike people. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. ult. fin.]

Caius triumphantly enters Rome on his Birth-day (which was the last of the month August.) [Suetonius in C. Calig. cap. 43.]

When the Alexandrian Legats appeared before Caius: Apion laid many things to the charge of the Jews, and amongst the rest, that they did not yield Cæsar his due respect; for when far and near all Nations build Temples and Altars to Caius, and worshipped him with equal honour with the rest of their deities, the Jews only thought scorn to build Altars to him, or swear by the name of Cæsar. When he had alleged these and what other matters he thought would exasperate Caius, Philo prepared to answer him, but was interrupted by Caius commanding him to be gone, who was so enraged that he very hardly escaped without injury. Philo being thus ejected, bids courage to those that accompany him, for that although Caius was angry in his words, yet they might be assured that God would defend and provide for them, for all that he could do. [Joseph. lib. 18. cap. 10. Joseph. lib. Hist. Eccles. 5.]

Caius repenting of the favour he had granted the Jews, commanded another colosse to be built at Rome brazen and gilt, letting that alone at Sidon lest it should cause any commotions among the people, and that being carried privately by ship, it might be placed in the Temple at Jerusalem before any were aware of it. And this was to be done as they sailed into Egypt, for he had an exceeding great desire of seeing Alexandria, and with great care provided for his journey, intending there to stay long; possist that his deification which he dreamt of, would succeed in this City alone, and from thence the religion would disperse and flow to the other lesser Cities. So Philo who was very well acquainted with these things writes in his Legation to Caius, out of which that of Tacitus is to be corrected. Being commanded by Cæsar to place his Statue in their Temple, they chose rather to take up arms: which commotion the death of Cæsar quashed and appeased. [Hist. lib. 5. cap. 9.]

Appelles the Alcalonic who incited Caius against the Jews, is by him bound and racked in a most tormenting and delayed manner, with some intermissions to make it the more grievous; for some other crimes he had committed. [Philo. de Legat.]

Caius being admonished by the Antiatian lots to take heed of Caius, having Caius Longinus then Procurator of Asia in suspicion for that he was of the family of Caius, one of the murderers of Cæsar; he commanded him to be brought bound to him, and condemned him to death, not remembering that Cnæsus, a little after killed him, was also called Caius. [Sueton. in C. Calig. cap. 57. Dio. lib. 49. cap. 662.]

Apollonius the Egyptian, who at home foretold what should become of Caius, being dragged before him to Rome, the day before his death, (which Suetonius in his 58 chapter denotes to be the IX. Kalends of February) and being brought out a little after to suffer, escaped away late. [Dio. ibid. pag. 663.]

C. Caligula reigned three years ten months and eight days, as Suetonius hath it, [cap. 59.] And Clemens Alexandrian in his first book Stromatum; or rather 9 months and 28 days, as Dio relates in the end of his 59 book: In whole place his Uncle Claudius Cæsar the son of Drusus, is declared Emperor by the Praetorian Bands.

King Agrippa, when he heard that the Empire was forced upon Claudius by the soldiers, with much ado in making way through the multitude, he came to him, and finding him troubled and desirous to resign his place to the Senate, he confirmed him against such fears, and encourages him to go on courageously, and retain the Sovereignty. Now one of Claudius his favourites being called by the Senate, dissembling that he knew any thing of the business, and coming all anonised as if from drinking, asks them what was done concerning Claudius, and they telling him the truth, and asking his advice; he says he would for sake no danger that might be for the dignity of the Senate, and that he thought the best way was to send some to Claudius who might persuade him to lay down his authority, and to that Embassy offered himself for one,

S I C C

When

When he was sent with others to Claudius, he told him plainly the fearful condition the State was in, and advised him to answer like a Prince, and himself; as also he was the cause that afterwards the same Claudius was more mild to the Senate than he would have been. [Joseph, lib. 19, cap. 3.]

Claudius being confirmed in the Empire, sent Mithridates Iberus (whom Caius had kept in bondage) home to receive his kingdom, and to another Mithridates who was descended from that great Mithridates he gave the kingdom of Bosphorus, except a part of Cilicia which he gave to Polemon. [Id. lib. 60, pag. 670.]

As for Agrippa of Palatine who helped him to the enjoyment of the Sovereignty, who was then at Rome, he enlarged his kingdom, and bestowed consular honours upon him. To his brother Herod also he gave Ptolemaic dignity, and a certain Principality (to wit that of Chalcis) and permitted them to go into the Senate and give thanks to the fathers there. [Id. ibid.]

Alto Claudius proposed an Edict whereby he confirmed Agrippa in the kingdom formerly granted him by Caius, praising both his endeavour and his industry adding likewise Judea and Samaria, for that they did formerly belong to the kingdom of his Grandfather Herod. These therefore he restored as due to the Family: But Abila and the utmost of his command in Libanus, which was Lysanias's, he added of his own. Therefore was there a League betwixt the King and the people of Rome cut in brass in the midst of the Forum of the City. [Joseph, lib. 19, cap. 4.]

Claudius dismissed Alexander Lyfimachus of Alabarcha his old friend, and formerly Procurator to his mother Antonia, whom Caius in his anger had committed to bonds, to wit his son Marcus, Barenice the daughter of Agrippa was betrothed, (of which see Acts X. 13, 23.) who dying before marriage, the King places the Virgin with his brother Herod, having begged the kingdom of Chalcis of Claudius for him. [Id. ibid.]

He bestowed Comagena and a great part of Cilicia upon Antiochus whom Caius had deprived of his kingdom. [Id. ibid. Dio, lib. 60, pag. 670.]

Hedion the Egyptian who was master of the Bed-chamber, to Caius, and the man that most incited him against the Jews, was by Claudius for other crimes put to death, as Philo notes in the book of his Legation to Caius; which book ironically intitled De virtutibus (for that therein the wickedness of Caius was set out in Colours) he is said at the command of Claudius before the whole Senate, to have recited: and that afterwards the Romans were to take not only with that, but many other works made by him; that they thought them worthy as precious Monuments to be laid up in their public Library. [Euseb. lib. 2. Hystor. Ecclesiast. cap. 17, 18, 19.] among which were five books of the miseries the Jews endured under the Empire of Caius, written by him; of which three were lost, [Id. ibid. cap. 5.] one to Placcus, and the other of his Embassie are still remaining.

Caius being slain, the Jews who under him were much oppressed by the Alexandrians, began to cheer up, and presently returned their arms. Then Claudius commanded the President of Egypt that he should appease that tumult, and at the entreaty of Agrippa the King of Judaea, and Herod the King of Chalcis, he sent an Edict to Alexandria, written in these words. I will that their rites be nothing infringed by the mad rage of Caius, and that they shall have full power and liberty to persevere in their fathers religion and worship. And I command both parties, as much as in them lies, to study peaceableness one towards the other, and to endeavour to prevent all distractions or commotions of State between them. [Joseph, lib. 19, cap. 4.]

Claudius at the entreaty of the said Kings, the second time he was designed Consul (the first year of his reign) permitted the Jews not only of Alexandria, but where-soever dispersed in his whole Empire, to live according to their own laws, and the rites of their Ancestors; withal advising them that under this grace they should live the more modestly and warily, and that they should not abate the religions of the outer Nations; but that they should be content quietly to enjoy their own customs and traditions. [Ibid.] But when they grew too numerous at Rome that the city could scarce bear them without tumults. He did not eject them but forbade those that lived after their own laws to convent themselves: also the colleges reduced by Caius, and the taverns in which they met and drunk, he clearly abolished. [Id. lib. 60, pag. 669.]

Claudius by his letters commanding him to all Presidents and Governours of Provinces, sends King Agrippa into his own kingdom to look to the charge of it, who with very great expedition came to Jerusalem, and there paid his vows, omitting nothing prescribed by the Law. He commanded many Nazarites to be shaven, and hung up a gold chain which he had received from Caius as a monument of his many miseries and happy deliverances by God, in the holy Temple over the Treasury. Having duly performed his vows to God, he deposed Theophilus the son of Annianus from the High Priesthood, and constituted Simon surnamed Cantharus in his room, which Simon was

was the son of Boethus, Herod the Great his father in law. In fine, he gained the good will, and engaged the thankfulness of the Hierodolymites to him by remitting a tribute to them, which they constantly every year paid out of every house. He made Silas master of all the Militia wholly, who was his constant companion in all his difficulties and deluges. [Joseph, lib. 19, cap. 5.]

A little after this, the Dorians, certain rash young men, under pretence of religion, erected a statue in the Temple at Jerusalem to Cæsar; at which Agrippa, King of the Jews, being much moved, went immediately to Petronius into Syria, and complained of the impudent boldness of them: who himself being no little offended at it, as an impious thing, and against the positive decree of the Empire. He wrote very sharply to the Magistrates of the Dorians, that they should send those bound to him, who-soever they were, that durst make such attempts, and to contrary to the Emperours commands, and commanding for the future, that none should dare to do any such thing. [Id. ib. cap. 5, 8, 6.]

At Cæsarea, Cornelius, a Roman Centurion of a Company belonging to the Italian band, one very well inclined to, and studious of the Jewish Religion, but uncircumcised, (such as the Hebrews were wont to call Proselytes of the Gate, and the Godly of the Nations) about the ninth hour of the day is commanded by an Angel appearing to him, to send for Simon Peter, who was now to stay a great while at the house of Simon a Tanner: who obeying the command, sent two of his household servants, and a Gaily Soldier, one of those that were constantly with him. [Acts X. 1, 8. compared with IX. 43.]

The day after, as they journeyed, and drew near to the City, Peter ascends unto the housetop to pray about the sixth hour: where whilst dinner was providing for him, and he hungry, behold a great linen sheet let down from Heaven, full of all kind of living creatures: of which being commanded to eat promiscuously, he is thereby taught, that the Gentiles are not to be accounted for unclean. The next day, when with those that were sent by Cornelius and six brethren of his, he accompanied them, he came unto Cæsarea, where he finds at Cornelius his house, his whole family, and many more gathered together, he preaches a Sermon to them all, whereby they were converted to the faith of Christ, and the spirit of God descending upon them all, of his own accord, without any laying on of hands of Peter, he baptized them into Christ. [Acts X. 8, 48, & XI. 5, 17.]

And the Apostles and brethren that were at Judea, heard that the Gentiles also had received the Word of God. When therefore Peter came to Jerusalem, there arose a contention betwixt those that had been converted out of Judaism to Christ, and Peter for that he did converse with uncircumcised persons, and eat with them. But when he had declared unto them the full and whole matter, and proved it by the testimony of the six that were with him, they were pacified, and glorified God, who also had given repentance unto him, unto the Gentiles. [Acts XI. 1, 18.]

King Agrippa deprived Simon Cantharus of his High Priesthood: and when he would have conferred it on Jonathan, the son of Ananias, he refusing it out of modesty, and because he had been once degraded, he bestowed it upon Matthias his brother, whom Jonathan commended to it, as far more worthy than himself. [Joseph, lib. 19, cap. 6.]

Vitus Marfus succeeded Petronius in the administration of the affairs of the Province of Syria. [Id. ibid.]

Silas, master of the Militia to King Agrippa, because all along he had been faithful to him, and never refused to partake with him in any danger, having gained his intimate friendship, began now to require equal honour with the King, and grew troublesome in his familiar conference, sometimes extolling himself beyond modesty, sometimes calling to remembrance the adversity of his former fortune, which he would repeat to often, that he very highly exasperated the King against him, inasmuch, that he did not only deprive him of his command, but sent him bound into his own Country, there to be kept. A little after the King being to celebrate his birth-day, he sent for Silas, that he might be at the Kingly feast: but when he sent him back a churchward answer, the King did left him to his keepers. [Id. lib. 19, cap. 7.]

King Agrippa, having turned his care chiefly upon Jerusalem, fortified the walls of that which was called the new City, and made the gates wider and higher than before they had been, all at the public charge, and had so ordered the business, that they had been in expugnable by humane force, had not Marfus, the President of Syria, certified the same by letters to Claudius: who suspecting that the Jews were about to attempt some innovation, writ earnestly to Agrippa, that he should desist from the work, and he immediately obeyed. [Id. ibid.]

A door of Faith being now opened to the Gentiles, the Cyprians and Cyrenians, who after the martyrdom of Stephen, were dispersed at Antioch in Syria, preached

Christ to the Greeks, <sup>(Eusebius)</sup> here the most ancient book of Alexandria hath it, not as the Vulgar <sup>(Eusebius)</sup> and there was a great number that believed and turned unto the Lord. When this came to the ears of the Church at Jerusalem, the sent thither Barnabas, who admonished them all faithfully to adhere unto the Lord. And a great company were joynted unto the Lord. [Acts XI. 20, 24.]

A great famine now raging at Rome, Claudius did not only take care for the present to provide plenty of provision, but took a course for the future: for since the most part of their corn, and other provision, came from foreign Lands, and the mouth of Tiber had no convenient ports, he built the Portum Officæ. [D. lib. 60. page, 671, 672.]

At eleven years end it was scarce finished, although he kept at it constantly thirty thousand men working. [Sueton. in Claud. cap. 20.]

This famine which happened in the second year of Claudius, was particular, as also was that other in his eleventh year, of which Tacitus, [lib. 12. cap. 43.] Suetonius [in Claudius. cap. 18.] and Orosius [lib. 7. cap. 6.] make mention; not that universal one foretold by Agabus. That which began in the fourth year of the same Claudius, is manifest, not only by Eusebius his Chronicle & Orosius, [lib. 7. cap. 6.] but also by the time of Herod Agrippa's death, which was at the very same time. [Acts XII. 23, 25.]

Barnabas goes to Tarsus to seek Saul, and having found him brings him to Antioch. And it came to pass that for a whole year they met together in the Church, and taught a great multitude, and the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch. Which name being derived in a Latine form and not a Greek one, from Christ, it seems to have been imposed by some Romans that were then at Antioch.

About this time the Prophets went down from Jerusalem to Antioch, one of whom (Agabus) made known by the Spirit that there would come a great famine upon the whole world generally. [Acts XI. 27, 28.]

Claudius brought the Lycians again to his servitude, who had tumulted even to the slaughter of many Romans, and laid their Country to the Predestination of Pamphilia, whilst he was examining which of them in Court; there was a certain Embassador a Lycian indeed by his parents, but born at Rome. He asked him some questions in Latine which language, when he found he did not understand, he deprived him of his priviledge saying, it is not meet he should be a Roman, who hath not the Roman language. [D. lib. 60. page, 675.]

King Agrippa having at the immense charge of Berytus built a Theatre, Amphitheatre, baths, & porches, celebrated the dedication of them most sumptuously; exhibiting shows in the theatre, all kinds of musical ostentations or stunts, and other variety of pleasures: and in the Amphitheatre many pairs of fencers. And further more being desirous to gratify and please the spectators, he caused two troops of Malefactors to be drawn out, and to fight promiscuously to the number of about 700 persons, that so this plantation of war might concur at well to the punishment of the malefactors as the delight of those that were in place, and so they were all destroyed by one another martial wounds. [Joseph. lib. 19. cap. ult.]

At last these Kings came to the very Tiber, Antiochus of Commagena, Samphilgeraus of the Emelens, Corys of the lesser Armenia, Ptolemon of Pontus, and besides that: his brother Herod King of Calcis; to whom whilst they there delayed came also Marfus president of Syria. Agrippa therefore observing his due respects to the Romans went to meet him, even to the seventh mile. But when he rode in the same chariot with his guests, Marfus distrustful the friendship of so many Kings, and therefore sent his messengers to every one in particular to depart without delay. At which Agrippa was most grievously offended so that he hated Marfus. [Id. ibid.] and very often told Claud us by his letters, to depose Marfus from his presidency of Syria. [Id. lib. 20. c. 1.]

Agrippa having taken the High-Priesthood, from Matthias the son of Ananias, bestowed it upon Eliouas the son of Cithaus. [Id. lib. 19. cap. ult.]

The famine foretold by Agabus encreasing, the Christians of Antiochia, gathering a subsidy for their friends that lived in Judea, sent it by the hands of Barnabas and Saul, after they had together now for a whole year preached the word of the Lord to the people of Antioch. [Acts XI. 26, 29, 30.]

About this time King Herod Agrippa (as the Syrian paraphrast doth rightly name him here) laying hands upon them insisted some of the Church, [Acts XII. 1.] as contradicting the institutions and rites of their Country, of which he was a most religious observer as Joseph testifies. [lib. 19. cap. ult.]

He slew James (the son of Zebedee) the brother of John with a sword. [Acts XII. 2.] Clemens Alexandrinus adds moreover out of the Tradition our Ancestours in his seventh book book Hypotyposicon, [apud Euseb. lib. 2. Hystor. Eccles. cap. 8. vers. 9.] that this is the very same man that brought James into Judgement, and when he saw how freely he gave testimony of Jesus notwithstanding his most severe forbidding of him, ingeniously confessed, he was a Christian. When they were therefore brought both together to punishment, that he desired leave of James that he might suffer with him, and James considering a little of it, said, Peace be unto thee, and killed him, and afterwards they were both beheaded.

The King seeing that the death of James pleased the people, cast Peter into prison, in the days of Azimus, delivering him to 4 Quaternions, that is 16 soldiers to guard him, intending after the Passover to bring him out to the people. But there were prayers made daily in the Church for him, and an Angel of the Lord delivered him miraculously in the night; and he went to the house of Mary the mother of John Marcus, where many were congregated and at prayer, and telling them that they might certify James the son of Alphaeus and brother of our Lord, and the rest of the manner of his deliverance, he went into another place. [Acts XII. 3, 17.]

Herod being frustrate of his hope, in a rage commands the innocent keepers to be dragged to execution, and he going down to Caesarea stayed there. He was prejudiced in his mind against the Tyrians and Sidonians: whose land being not sufficient to maintain them (especially in that year of scarcity) they were forced to seek for themselves sustenance from Galilee and other places under Herods jurisdiction. They came therefore unanimously to him by the mediation of Blastus the Kings Chamberlain, whom they had made their friend, desiring peace of him. A day being appointed, Herod in his Royal Attire, and sitting before the Tribunal, made a speech to them: the people with acclamations shouting out. This is the voice of a God, and not man. But presently an Angel of the Lord smote him, because he did not give the glory to God; and being eaten up of worms he gave up the ghost. [Acts XII. 3, 17.]

The very fame History Joseph exemplifies: adding also the appearing of the owl, left the divination of his German Prophet should seem void. He had now finished the third year of his reign (the fourth now beginning) when he came to Caesarea, which was formerly called Straton's tower, where he solemnized some yearly plays for Cæsars health: to which festivity a great multitude of Noble men and youngsters came together out of all the Province. On the second day of this celebrity, he goes all attired with his Princely Robes richly and curiously wrought with silver, which by the reflection of the rising Sun yielding an angelical or extraordinary lustre, struck reverence into the spectators. And presently some wicked parasites with acclamations from a far off, saluted him God, desiring him to be propitious to them, for that hitherto they had only honoured him as a man, but now they saw there was something more in him than humane. This impious adulation he neither refused nor repelled: and a little after looking up, he saw over his head an owl sitting upon a rope extended upon some occasion, and presently perceiving that as this was an indicium of his good fortune, so now of his ruin, he was struck to the very heart. Afterwards he boldly began to torment him more, and more grievously, wherefore turning to his friends, he said, Beshold I who by your appellation am a God, am commanded out of this life, my certain fate giving the lie to your flattery, and I whom you valued immortal, am forced to death. But I must endure the piteous of the Heavens, for I have not lived ill, yea so happily that all men may call me blessed. Having spoken these things his pain grew worse and worse: and presently these things being divulged about the Country, the rumour went that he was dying; wherefore immediately all the people with their wives and children were in sackcloth after their country manner, praying to God for the health of their King, making all places ring with their lamentations and howling. And the King lying on a high bed and looking down and seeing the people prostrate on their faces, he could not forbear weeping. In fine his pain lasted in great extremity, and without intermission for five days space, and he then ended his life. [Joseph. lib. 19. cap. ult.]

Joseph attributes to him seven years reign, four under Cæsar (deducting three or four months; for Caius himself did not rule four whole years) and three under Claud us; (adding in like manner three or four months) and adds further of him, that his yearly revenue came to one thousand two hundred myriads, which, he was so noble and liberal, did not suffice his expences, but that he was fain to borrow money. [Ibid.]

Before the Kings death was divulged, Herod the Dynast of Chalcis, and Chelcias the Master of the Militia conferred together, and sent Ariston to kill Silas their common enemy, as if by the Kings command. [Ibid.]

Agrippa left of his posterity one son only named Agrippa, at that time in the 17 year of his age, who was educated at Rome with Claudius, and three daughters, of whom Berenice was married to Herod her Uncle at the age of sixteen, and the other two he left Virgins: Mariammett ten years old betrothed by her father to Julius Archelaus the son of Chelcias, and Drusilla six years of age by him likewise betrothed to Epiphanes the son of Antiochus, King of the Comagenians. [Ibid.]

When

When it was certainly known that Agrippa was dead, the Cæsareans and Sebasteians (two Cities built by his father) cast out most unworthy reproaches against the dead Prince: and the common Soldiers, with one consent, dragging his and his daughters Statues out of the Palace, brought them into the brothels, and abused them in such calumnious wife, that it is a shame to tell: and making feasts and banquets in all public places, they fall to jollity, adorning themselves with garlands and anointing their bodies, sacrificing, or making offerings to Charon, and even whipping one another, for the joy they conceived by the death of the King. [Id. ibid.]

The Word of God being lowered, increased and multiplied. But Barnabas and Saul returned to Jerusalem, when they had finished their ministry there, and took along with them John Mark. [Acts XII. 24, 25.]

Claudius deprived the Rhodians of their liberty, because they had crucified certain Romans. [Dio. lib. 60, pag. 681.]

When Claudius would have sent young Agrippa into his Kingdom, to succeed his father, his freed men and friends, who could do much with him, dissuaded him, saying it was dangerous to commit to great a Kingdom to so young a youth, who had scarce passed child-hood; and so very unfit to rule there, since it was a great burthen for the ill-fated mansouldiers. In which he could not deny, but they spoke rationally and truly. [Joseph. lib. 19, cap. ult.] Although indeed their aim was at the prefecture of that Kingdom, thereby to make themselves rich. Whether is to be related that of Tacitus. [lib. 9, hist. cap. 9.] Claudius the King being dead, brought low, granted the prefecture of Judea to Roman Knights, or freed men.

Claudius therefore made Culpus Fadus, President of Judea, and all the Kingdom of Agrippa, (which was much greater than the first Herod his grandfathers) honouring the dead King in this, that he would not bring Marfus his enemy into his Kingdom: and chiefly gave Fadus in charge, severely to chastise the Cæsareans and Sebasteians for their injury to their dead King, and the contumely against his daughters yet living; and drew out the Cæsarean band, and the Sebasteians, with the fifth Cohort, to make war in Pontus: and substituted in their room Souldiers chosen out of the Romans, that were appointed to defend Syria. But afterwards the Souldiers sending an Embassy-dour to Claudius, obtained of him that they might stay in Judea, who inactiveness were the beginning of most-grievous calamity to the Jews, and the very seed of that war which grew up in the Presidentship of Florus. [Joseph. lib. 19, fin.]

Josephus writes in the beginning of his twentieth book, that having mov'd Marfus in favour of his dead friend Agrippa, Claudius made Culpus Longinus Prefect of Syria in his stead, although for three years after this, Tacitus will have him to be President there.

The Jews that dwell beyond the river Jordan, had a contest with the Philadelphians, about the limits of the Town Nana, a place full of most warlike people. The Transjordanians, or the Jews beyond the River, without the knowledge or consent of their rulers, took arms, and slew many of the Philadelphians. Which when Culpus knew, he was very much offended, for that if the Philadelphians had done them any wrong, they would not make him acquainted, when as to they might have been righted, but did so rashly run to arms on their own heads. Therefore having laid hold of three of the ringleaders, he commanded they should be bound, one of these, by name Anibas, he executed; the other two, to wit Amaramus and Elcazer he banished. And not long after, he took and condemned Tholomæus to death, who was chief of the robbers, and had in many things very much injured the Pameans and the Arabians, and did his endeavour to scour the whole Country of Judea of all robberies. [Joseph. lib. 10, cap. 1.]

Culpus Longinus (or as Tacitus thinks, Vibius Marfus) being President of Syria, and coming to Jerusalem with his army, together with Culpus Fadus, Procurator of the Jews, called together the Priests and chief of the Jews, and plainly shewed unto them the full purport of the Emperours commands; That the stole and other ornaments of the High Priest, in the Tower called Antonia, should be laid up and kept by the Romans, as it was wont to be before Vitellius his time. They durst not contradict them in any thing, but desired leave to send an Embassy-dour to Cæsar, to endeavour to gain that favour of him, that they might not be deprived of the privilege of keeping the holy stole, and that they would have so much patience as to remain Cæsars answer in it. They answered, That they might, if they would first give hostages for the performance of Cæsars will, and their security. They readily delivered up their children, and dispatch away Embassy-dours. [Joseph. lib. 15, cap. ult. & lib. 20, cap. 1.]

In the Church at Antioch there were Prophets, and Doctors, Barnabas and Simeon, Nigera and Lucius, Cyrenæus (and Manahem, who was educated together with Herod the Tetrarch) and Saul, All which serving God and fastings the Holy Ghost commanded ded Barnabas and Saul to separate themselves from the rest, and let themselves to preaching the gospell. These being commended to God by the Church, with fasting and praying and imposition of hands, taking with them John Marc, a fervent, they came to Seleucia, and from thence sailed into Cyprus (Barnabas his Country) where amongst the Salaminians they first began to preach the word of God in the Synagogues of the Jews. [Acts XIII. 1, 4.]

Travailing over that Island as far as Paphos, they there found a false prophet a Jew, Barjesus, first named Elymas or Miguus, who endeavoured to divert Sergius Paulus the ruler of that Countrey having a desire to hear Paul and Barnabas, Saul having sharply reproved this man he was presently struck with blindness, and the Proconsul being moved by this miracle and the Doctrine of the Gospell was converted to the faith. And from this time Saul is always found named by his new name Paul. Thence and thence that came with him to Paphos went to Perga of Pamphilia, where John Marcus leaving them returns to Jerusalem. [ibid.]

The Hierosolymitan Embassadors by the intercession of Arrippa, who was then with Claudius obtained the confirmation of that privilege of keeping the stole first granted them by Vitellius. And also prevailed for a rescript in this behalf from Claudius in the V. year of his Tribunal power to the Magistrates at Jerusalem, Dated the IV. Kalends of July by Rufus, and Pompeius Sulpicius Consuls, writing to Herod King, Chalcis, and Aristobolus the younger his most endeared friends, that herein he would gratify them. [Joseph. lib. 15, cap. ult. & lib. 20, cap. 1.]

About the same time Herod the King of Chalcis petitions Claudius with success for the command of the temple and holy treasury, and the right of choosing the High-Priests. [Id. lib. 20, cap. 1.]

Claudius because that upon his birth day there would be eclipse of the Sun, and in regard there had some prodigies appeared, fearing least it might occasion some ill and tumult, before the time, he, in writing published not only that there would be an eclipse, but the very time, place, and all the natural causes of it, and demonstrated that it could be no otherwises. [Dio. lib. 60, pag. 682.] Now the birth-day of Claudius fell upon the Kalends of August, [Id. ibid. pag. 667.] on which day the Sun almost two hours before noon was in eclipse to a fourth part of the Diameter.

Herod, King of Chalcis, moving Simon Cantharus placed his son Josephus Cananis (or Cananyes) in the High-Priests stool. [Joseph. lib. 20, cap. 1.]

Theudas, a meet impostor, pretending himself to be a prophet, persuaded a great multitude of the Jews to take their riches with them, and follow him to Jordan; promising them that he would divide the river and make them an easie way through; against these Fabius Culpus the Procurator of the Jews, sent out some troops of horse, who entering in upon the body of them at unawares, slew a great number of them, &c took many alive, amongst the rest Theudas himself whose head they took off and brought it to Jerusalem. [Joseph. lib. 20, cap. 2, fin.]

Paul and Barnabas leaving Perga came to Antioch in Pisidia, and entering into their Synagogues on the sabbath day after the reading of the Law and the Prophets, are invited by the rulers of the Synagogue to teach, where Paul having made an excellent sermon, and being gone out of the Jews Synagogue, the Gentiles entreated that they would expound the same things to them the next sabbath day, and the company being dissolved many devout Jews and religious Preselytes follow Paul and Barnabas who speaking to them admonished them to continue in the grace and favour of God. [Acts XIII. 14, 43.]

The next Sabbath almost all the whole City came flocking to hear the word of God, but the Jews seeing the multitude were filled with envy and contradicted what Paul spoke with whole blasphemies Paul and Barnabas being grievously offended they left the Jews, and preach only to the Gentiles: who with joy embracing the Gospell, all, as many as were ordained to eternal lifes, believed: and the word of God was divulged over that whole Nation: where the Jews being frustrated in their malicious design by the means of many religious women, (called by the Hebrews Phylisettes of the gate) both honourable and the chief in the City, they raised a commotion, and drove Paul and Barnabas out of their coats, who shaking the dust of their feet against them, they came to Iconium and the Disciples were filled with joy, and the Holy Ghost. [ib. 44, 52.]

At Iconium Paul and Barnabas entering the Synagogue of the Jews (spoke so, that both Jews and Greeks might believe. But the Jews, who were incredulous, exasperated and prejudiced the minds of the Græcians against the brethren. Yet they staid there a great while and spoke freely aspired by the Lord who gave testimony to the word of his grace, and did many miracles by their hands. [Acts XIV. 1, 2, 3.] At which time Thecla a noble maid of Iconium is thought to be converted to the faith of Christ: whole acts are notwithstanding most deservedly let down amongst the

the Apocrypha by the LXX. a Synod of Bishops had under Gelafius.

The multitude of Iconium being divided, some were for the Jews some for the Apostles: But when it came to passe that a strength both of Jews and Gentiles together with their chief Rulers came flocking to inquire and stone them, they fled away into the cities of Lyconia, Lystra, and Derbe, and the Region thereabouts, and there preached the Gospel. [ Acts XIV. 4, 7. ]

At Lystra a man lame from his mothers womb is cured by Paul in the Senate. Whereas the Lystrians would have sacrificed to Paul as Mercury, and Barnabas as Jupiter, They tearing their cloaths denied that honour, and had much ado to restrain the multitude from sacrificing to them. Soon after the incredulous Jews coming thither from Iconium and Antioch, and having raised a tumult, and excited the people against them, the furious multitude drew Paul being stoned, as dead out of the city. But when his Disciples came about him, he rose and entered the city. [ Ibid. 8, 20. ]

In this year, and it may be at this very time, Paul was wrapt into the third heavens, and heard unpleasable words: fourteen years before the later Epistle to the Corinthians was written. [ II Corinth. XII. 2, 3, 4. ] Whether is thought to refer that of Triphon in Lucian, or the ancienter author of that Dialogue inscribed Philopatris, when it met that Jewish bald pate, justly laugh at, who being rapt up into the very third heavens through the air, learnt there those things that were most excellent and glorious, he renewed us by water, made us walk in the steps of the blessed, and redeemed us from the dominion of the wicked. So Triphon. God raising on high, great, heavenly, and eternal, the Son of the Father, the Spirit proceeding from the Father, one of three, and three of one, and in like manner thus preaching as the Christians used.

Paulus with Barnabas going from Lystra, came to Derbe, where having preached the Gospel, they gained many to Christ. [ Acts XIV. 20, 21. ]

Amongst many others that gave their names to Christ at this time, was Timotheus with his holy mother Eunice, and his grandmother Lois, who took care to teach him the Scriptures from his very infancy. He being in these parts, although as yet a very child, was an eye-witness of the sufferings of his spiritual father Paul at Antioch (in Pisidia) Iconium, and Lystra, (in Lycania) [ Acts XVI. 1, 2. II Tim. I. 2, 5, & III. 11, 15. ]

Paul and Barnabas going no further than Derbe, returned to Lystra, and Iconium, and Antiochia, confirming the minds of the Disciples, and exhorting them to endure affliction for their faiths sake without wavering: and having constituted Bishops over them in every of their Churches, and praying for them with fasting, they commended them to God in whom they believed. Afterwards travelling over Pindia, they came into Pamphylia, and having declared and published the word of the Lord at Perga, passed into Italy, and thence sailed to Antioch, whence they first went about the work; they afterwards performed; where to the congregated Churches declared what God had done by them, and how he had opened the door of Faith to the Gentiles. [ Acts XIV. 21, 27. ]

Tiberius Alexander is made Successor to Caius Fidus, in the administration of the Jewish affairs, being the son of Alexander Anabarch of Alexandria (an old friend of Claudius's) who had forsaken the Jewish, his country religion. [ Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 3. ]

A little after this, the fame of it passing thorough all Judea, Helena the Queen of the Adebans (on the confines of Assyria and Mesopotamia) is converted by a certain Jew to the worship of the True God, and cometh to visit the Temple at Jerusalem, that she might worship there the True God, and pay her vows, provided plentifully for her journey; being diverted for a few days by her Ion Izates, who was then King, and afterwards converted to the same Religion by Ananias the Jewish Merchant. Where when the saw many of the Jews even starving with famine, out of her own purse she sent some to Alexandria for a great quantity of wheat, others to Cyprus to fetch thence a great deal of figs to their relief, who made a speedy return; and she divided all the store to those that wanted it. Her son also Izates, hearing what a distress they were in by famine, sent money to the chief Magistrates at Jerusalem. [ Id. ibid. cap. 2, & 3. ]

Izates the King sent his five sons to Jerusalem to learn their language and customs exactly. His mother Helena also erected three Pyramids three stadias distant from Jerusalem. In which afterwards the bones of her son Izates were interred. [ Id. cap. 2. ] Which Monuments of Helena were extant, not only in the time of Josephus, but Eusebius also. [ Joseph. lib. 5. bell. xiv. 7, & 15. in Greek, or lib. 6. cap. 6, & 7. in Latin. Ensch. lib. 2. Histor. Ecclesiast. cap. 11. xiv. 18. & Hier. Epist. 27. ]

Paul and Barnabas stayed at Antioch with the Disciples a great while, [ Acts XIV. 28. ] after which Paul, as it appears, propagated the Gospel even to Illyrium; preaching such things to them concerning Christ, as they never heard before. [ Rom.

[ Rom. XV. 19, 20. ] and suffered those things which in his later Epistle to the Corinthians [ cap. XI. 24. ] he commemorates: to wit, that as at Philippi afterwards, so twice elsewhere by the Gentiles he had been whipt with rods, and received 5 times 4 hundred stripes from the Jews; that he had thrice made shipwreck, and was all night in the deep. For since we find, that between the return of Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, and their going to the Council at Jerusalem, was 5 years, we cannot place these things better any where, than in so large a vacuum and silence in the History of the Church.

Valerius Asiaticus being again Consul, the Island Thersia rose out of the Ægean [ ea. ] Seneca. Natural. quæst. lib. 2. cap. 26. & lib. 6. cap. 21. ] in a night wherein the Moon was eclipsed. [ Aurel. Vitor. in Claudius. ] This eclipse was seen the very night between the last day of December, (which terminated that year in which Valerius Asiaticus was the second time Consul) and the Kalends of January, which begins the Consulship of Claudius Aug. IV. & L. Vitellius III. in whole time a little Island, before never seen, appeared near Thera, as Dio relates. [ lib. 60. pag. 685. ]

James and Simon the sons of Judas of Galilee (who, in Quirinus his time solicited the Jews to a revolt) were crucified for it. [ Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 3. ]

Herod the King of Chalcis, among Josephus the son of Camylas, constituted Ananias the son of Nchedeus High-Priest in his room. [ Id. ibid. ]

Gotarzes prepares to destroy Artabanus King of the Parthians, with his wife and son, [ Tacit. lib. 11. cap. 8. ] But Artabanus dying, left his kingdom to Bardanes his son, [ Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 2. ] For these two brothers Gotarzes and Bardanes, are rather to be thought Artabanus his sons with Josephus, than his brothers with Tacitus.

Bardanes being invited by the Parthians (who feared the cruelty of Gotarzes) to be their King; being a man prompt enough to all high and desperate designs, in two days space he invaded, three thousand fadia's off, and assaulted Gotarzes (who was all in a fright at his coming, so altogether unexpectedly,) and without delay seized upon the next Provinces also; the Seleucians only denying him subjection. Against whom, as being also such as revolted from his father, he being more incensed than the present opportunity could well bear, is puzzled with the siege of that strong City, fortified on the one side by a river, and on the other with a very strong guard. In the interim Gotarzes by the aid of the Dahæ and Hyrcanians, recruits his forces, and renews the war, and thereupon Bardanes is forced to leave the siege of Seleucia, and pitch his tents in the Bactrian fields. [ Tacit. lib. 11. cap. 8. ]

Hearing the news of the Parthians discord, and that they were various in the election of their King, Mithridates King of Armenia the Greater, by the advice of Claudius Cæsar, re-marches into that kingdom, confiding in the power and wealth of his brother Pharasmanes, King of the Iberians; and indeed, the affairs of the East being so distracted and the people unreluctant who to incline unto, he posset himself of Armenia: the Roman soldiers subduing the castles and strong forts whilst the Iberian army kept the field: nor did the Armenians resist. Demetrius their General who only durst design a battle being slain. Presently hereupon Corys, King of Armenia the Lesser, made thitherward: but Cæsar having taken him off the design by letters, all the countries came flocking in to Mithridates, who was something more fierce than was convenient in his new kingdom. [ Ibid. cap. 8, & 9. ]

Gotarzes and Bardanes being about to joine battle; Gotarzes discovering the treachery of the people to his brother, they shook hands and swore at an altar to reveng themselves upon one the others enemies, and to agree betwixt themselves. And Bardanes appearing furer to hold the kingdom, Gotarzes to avoid all emulation, went quite away into Hyrcania. [ Ibid. cap. 9. ]

At Bardanes his return thither Seleucia is delivered up unto him the seventh year after the defection. After this he invades the most strong Provinces, and had in his mind to recover Armenia; but was prevented by Vibius Marcius (or, according to Josephus Cassius Longinus rather) threatening war to the Embassadour of Syria. [ Ibid. ]

Ventidius Cumanus succeeded Tiberius Alexander in the government of the Jews, and Herod King of Chalcis brother of that great Agrippa died in the eighth year of Claudius his reign; leaving three sons behind him: of whom Aristobolus was by his former wife Mariamme, and of Berenice his brothers daughter, Bernicianus, and Hyrcanus. [ Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 3. ]

The Feast of the Passover drawing near, and much people flocking from all parts to the solemnity, Cumanus (after the example of the preceding Prefidents) sets one Cohort for a guard upon the Porch of the Temple to restrain tumults if there should happen any. On the fourth day of the Feast, one of the soldiers throwing his obscene parts to the multitude, they cried out (being enraged by that contumely) That not only they, but he who they honoured in that feast, was affronted by it, and some of the boldest of them rallied against Cumanus saying this impudent souldier was sent by him. When Cumanus heard this he was not a little troubled: but yet desired the people to raise no commotions in the time of the feast; and when they still rallied at him, he commanded the whole army to Antonia, a Castle close adjoining to the temple. The common people, seeing the souldiers coming were afraid, and began to flee with such violence that being straitened with the narrowness of the passage, and thinking the souldiers had pursued them, they oppressed and trod one another, so that 20000 of them were found dead, as Josephus hath it in the 4 chapter of the 20 book of his antiquities. But in his book of the Jewish wars we read that [cap. 11. § 10. x.] ἡ μὲν τῶν ῥωμαίων ἀβροῦς ἑκατὼν περὶ τὸν ποταμὸν ἔκειτο where Rufinus reads about thirty thousand: Eusebius as well in his Chronicle as his ecclesiastical History the second book, [cap. 18. 19. & Orosius lib. 7. cap. 6.] retaining the very same number.

Some who by flight escaped this tumult, in the High-way, about Bethoron, 100. stadia's from the City robbed Stephen the servant of Caesar, as he was travelling, and took all his packs of treasure. When Cumanus heard this he sent souldiers thither, with command to destroy the villages next adjoining to that place. In this havoc one of the souldiers brought out the books of the Mosaicall Law which he found in one of those villages, and tore them in the sight of them all, railing exceedingly both against the Law and the Nation. When this news came to the Jews, gathering a great company they made for Caesarea, where Cumanus then resided, entreating him that he would revenge not their own, but the contempt and injury of their God. Then the President, being afraid of the defection of the people, by the advice of his friends, put the souldier to death that had done the fact, and to appeased the tumult. [Joseph. ant. supra.]

Apollonius the Tyanean, upon his journey to the Indians, entered the City Babylon, the second month of the third year of Bardanes, and there conferred with the King. [Philoftrate, in vita Apollon. lib. 1. cap. 19. & 20. compared with Euseb. in Hierocl.]

Gotarzes, repenting that he had yielded up his Kingdome, and recalling his nobility who were the more enslaved by the peace, he gathered a great force, and is met at the river Erindes in the passage whereof there was a great conflict, and Bardanes had the better of it, and with good success proceeded and subdued the mid Countries to the river Gindes, which divides between the Dahæ and the Arians, &c. there his success terminated: for the Parthians although Conquerors depiled the enemy afar off, and therefore erecting monuments there, by which their riches were sufficiently manifest, (no tribute but that of the Artaxidæ ever coming to any of that Nation:) Bardanes returned with great glory, and so much the sterner and more intolerable to his subjects. [Tacit. lib. 11. cap. 10.]

Bardanes, going to Izates King of the Adialeni, persuaded him that he would joyn with him in war against the Romans; whom Izates endeavoured to divert from his purpose, moderately recounting unto him the Roman acts and their power. Bardanes offended at this presently denounces war against Izates, but was prevented of prosecuting the same by death, [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 2.] for the Parthians, when they knew his mind, that he was resolved to wage war with the Romans at unawares, whilst he was intent at hunting slew him in his prime, the chief of all young Kings, and if he had as well obtained the love of his subjects as the fear of his enemies, he might have been numbered amongst the old ones. [Id. ibid. Tacit. lib. 11. cap. 10.]

The Parthian affairs being disjoynted by the death of Bardanes, they were again doubtful who should be King. Many inclined to Gotarzes, some to Maherdates (the son of Phraates the third, the son of Zenones the first) who was then plegd with the Romans. At last Gotarzes prevailed, and being possessed of the Palace, tormented the Parthians by his luxury and cruelty to send privately to Claudius, to send them Maherdates to be their King, [Tacit. ibid.] complaining of Gotarzes his cruelty, both to the nobility and commonalty; For first he exhausted his brothers, then his neighbours, then those farther off with slaughters, adding their wives big with child, their children small, so that being sluggish and licentious at home, and unfortunate in war, he covered his sloth by his cruelty. [Id. ibid. Tacit. lib. 12. cap. 10.]

When Didius, the Roman General had deposed Mithridates from the Kingdom of Bosphorus, and had constituted his son Cotys, a mad young blade, there, he led away thence the power of the army, leaving only some few Cohorts, under the command of Julius Aquila, a Roman Knight: with the new King. Mithridates having lost all, and wandering about, cited together the Nations, and gathered out of them all the runnagadoes; and in fine got together an army, wherewith he deprived the King of the Daridæol, and enjoyed, his Kingdom. [Tacit. lib. 12. cap. 15.]

The Parthian Embassadors being heard, Claudius sends Mithridates to be their King, advising him that he should not think of rule and servants, but of government and fellow Citizens, and that he should expresse mercy and Justice: and gave command to C. Cassius, who was Prefident of Syria, that he should see the young man safe upon the bank of Euphrates. [Id. ibid. cap. 11.]

At this time Cassius excelled all others in his skill in the laws; but was very ignorant in martial affairs: but in that he came to it peaceably, he renewed the ancient custom, exercising the Legions with the lame care, as if an enemy had been invading, esteemed therefore worthy, the family of the Cassians and his ancestors, in those very Nations in high esteem. Now calling together those by whose vote Mahardates was chosen King, when he had pitched his Tents at Zeugma, where the river is very fordable; (When the Noble Parthians, and the King of the Arabians, Acbarus (or Abgarus) were come, he, before them, admonished the young man Mahardates, that the edge of the Parthians would abate in this business by delay, and would turn to treachery, and therefore advised him to press on his design speedily: whose counsel deep slyng by the fraud of Acbarus, thinking, like a young man as he was, that all fortune consisted in luxury, he stayed at the Town Amida many daies. [Id. cap. 12.]

When Mithridates was posselt of the Kingdom of the Daridæ, and was thought now to be about to invade Bosphorus; Aquila and Cotys, despoiling their own power, because Zorines, King of the Siracans (to Caucasus) had joyned with Mithridates, they also seek foreign assistance, sending Embassadors to Eunones, who ruled over the Nation of the Aorlori, (amongst the Scythians) whose society they easily obtained, shewing how Mithridates rebelled against the Romans. Therefore they covenanted that Eunones should fight the horse-battles, and the Romans should look to the besieging of their Cities. [Id. cap. 15.]

Then, having marshalled their body, they go on, the Romans and Bosphorans detaching each wing of Aorlor before and behind; and thus having repulled the enemy, they come to Soza, a Town of Dandara, which was left by Mithridates, because the minds of the people were somewhat wavering towards him: they thought good to take it, and leave there a Garrison, and to pass on to the Country of the Siracians; and having passed the river Panda, besieged Ulpes, seated in a place fenced both with walls and ditches, only the walls being not made of stone, but piles composed together, and earth, were something infirm, and the Towers being raised on high, the besieged were the more distressed with the picks and fier-works. So that it might had not put an end to the conflict, they had besieged and taken it all in a day. [Id. cap. 16.]

The next day Embassadors, miserably entreating that they might go free, who were free born, offered ten thousand slaves; which the Conquerors despising, because it would be cruelty to slay them, when delivered up, and dangerous to keep such a company of prisoners, rather put it to the fortune and law of arms. And having given the souldiers, who scaled the walls, a sign to destroy: The rest being terrified by the destruction of the Ulpesines, since eminent and fenced places could do no good, but they broke through rivers and all: Zorines long considering whether it were better go on with Mithridates, or console the affairs of his own distressed Country: at last his own affairs prevailed, and giving pledges, he fell down at the image of Caesar, in respect to the great glory of the Roman army, who were victorious, and yet not bloody, and then three dayes journey from the river Tanais. But in their returne their fortune was far otherwise: for some of their ships in their returne, touching upon the coast of the Taurians, the Barbarians flocke together about them, and slew the Captain of their Cohort and many more. [Id. cap. 17.]

In the interim Mithridates, having no relief, consults whose mercy he had best implore. His brother Cotys, who was formerly his traitor, he feared would be his enemy. There was none of the Romans now of that authority, as that his promises could be much regarded, flying therefore to Eunones, and entering his Palace, casting himself upon his knees, saies, Mithridates fought by sea and land so many years, behold, in my presents of his own accord. Use as you please the son of great Achamenes, for my enemies have taken all help else from me. Eunones being moved with the honour of the person, the change of fortune, and the generous petition, writes to Caesar, and sends Embassadors to entreat him not to restore Mithridates his Kingdom, but that he would not triumph over him, nor put him to death. But Claudius being in doubt whether to punish or pardon him, at last was conquered, with the more merciful sentence. [Id. cap. 18. 29. 30.]

When Carthens sent for Mahardates to act the business, telling him it would be very easy, if he came without delay; he, being led away with civil counsel, came not strait to Mesopotamia, but fetch a compass through Armenia, a place unreasonable at at that time, for that it was the beginning of winter. At last tired out with the sea and Mithridates, when they drew near to the Champaign Country, they joined forces with Carthages, and passing the river Tigris, they marched over Adiabana, where King Izates openly courted friendship with Mahardates, but privately and more faithfully was a friend to Gotarzes. Notwithstanding in their journey they took the City Ninus, the most ancient seat of Assyria. [Ibid. cap. 12. & 13.]

Mithridates of Baphrobus being brought to Rome by Cilones Procurator of Pontus, is said to have disputed with Caesar somewhat more highly than his condition required, and that he elevated his voice in these words, I am not sent back to thee, but returned: which if thou believest not, let me go again and see. His fortitude also continued undaunted, when at the rostrum being held on all sides with keepers, he was exposed to public view. Consular Edicts are decreed to Cilones and to Aquila Pretorian. [Ibid. cap. 21.]

When the Byzitians accused this Julius Cilones their Prefect for many and great bribes which he had taken, before Claudius, with very great clamours, and Claudius by reason of the multitude not understanding what they meant, asking those that stood by what they said, a voice being answered that they gave thanks to Julius; he believing it said, Let him therefore be their President two years more. [Ido. lib. 60. pag. 687.] At this time Cadius Rulus at the accusation of the same Byzitians, is condemned of bribery by law. [Tacit. Annal. 12. cap. 22. & Histor. lib. 1. cap. 77.]

The Lucians and Judeans, their Kings Sohemus and Agrippa being dead, are added to the Province of Syria. [Tacit. lib. 12. cap. 23.] Indeed the years of Agrippa the younger are hence to be deduced, and it appears out of Josephus, telling us that the beginning of the Jewish war (which fell upon the month May, according to our common account, the LXVI. year of Christ) was in the XVII. of King Agrippa, [lib. 2. bell. cap. 13. sup. xiv. p. 1017.] and out of the Grecian money to be taken notice of in the place, in which Judea was taken (about the month September, in the year of the same account LXX.) to be in the XXI. year of Agrippa. And indeed Claudius did not bestow his father's kingdom Judea upon Agrippa the younger, but his uncle Herodotus of Chalcis; together with the power of the Temple and holy Treasury, and to chiefe High Priests, which was granted before to his uncle Herod. And his father's kingdom was also added to Syria, that it should have Procurators notwithstanding there, by Cæsar's election: Ventidius Cumanus (as formerly) retaining still at this time the administration of Judea and Galilee, and Felix being sent Procurator of Samaria, which was between them; which Felix was freed-man of Claudius and his mother Antonia, who from her had the surname Antonius, and from him, Claudius. He was the brother of another freed-man, Pallantes, whom Tacitus notes to have been most affectionately beloved by his Patron Claudius. [lib. 11. cap. 29.]

Gotarzes at the mountain Sambulon made vows to the god of the place with the especial religion of Hercules. But his army being not yet sufficiently stored, and increased, he made use of the River Corma for his defence. And although he was invited to battle by pursuants and messengers, with challenges, he delayed, and changed his station, and sending bribes to corrupt the faith and loyalty of his enemies. Of whom Ahabenus, and King Acbarus of the Arabians (of the Edessians) with their army revolted, with a civil-like levity, and because by experience it is known that the Barbarians would rather seek a King at Rome than find him. But Mahardates being strip of his forces thus, and mistrusting those that remained, resolved to put it to the hazard of a battle. Nor did Gotarzes deny him battle, being grown high by the diminishing of his forces: and they fought with great slaughter and dubious event, until Carthanes having overcome his overbearing, wheeled about with a circumference and came upon the back of his enemies. Then Mahardates, past all hope, and trusting to the promises of Parthaces his father's client, is overcome by his deceit, and delivered up to the Conqueror. And he, blaming him not as a neighbour, or of the stock of Araces, but as a Roman and foreigner, cut off his ears in contempt of the Romans, and gave him his life to shew his mercy. [Tacit. lib. 12. cap. 14.]

Joseph the son of Matthias at the age of fourteen, had attained to that praise in learning, that he was consulted about the more full sense and meaning of the Law, even by the High-priests and Primates of the City of Jerusalem: as he himself relates in the book of his Life.

Gotarzes being dead of a disease, Venones then President of the Medes being called to the rulership, had a short and most inglorious reign amongst them: and the Parthian kingdom was translated upon Volgoles his son; who, being of his mothers side the son only of a harlot, by the disagreement of his brothers attained the reign. So Tacitus [lib. 12. cap. 14. & 44.] Joseph, also writes, that Gotarzes being killed by treachery, his son Volgoles succeeded him, [lib. 20. cap. 2.] adding further, that he distributed the kingdom to two brothers by the same father: viz. to one of them, Pacorus 4763. 50.

Pacorus being the elder Media, and to the other and younger Tiridates Armenia.

A war arose betwixt the Armenians and Iberians, which was the cause of very great commotions betwixt the Romans and Parthians. Pharasmanes obtained the Iberians by ancient possession, and his brother Mithridates the Armenians, by the help of the Romans. Pharasmanes had a son called Rhadamistus, of a most haughty, proper complexion, of a very strong body, and much admired by the whole Country. When he began to affix his fathers Kingdom, and Pharasmanes fearing now, being in his decaying years, seeks to give him, by putting another Phancy in his head, shewing him Armenia, and telling him that he beat away the Parthians, and bestowed it upon Mithridates: but adding, That it was better to wave force and cunning, and to taking him at unawares, they might easily catch him, and do what they pleased. So Rhadamistus dissembles his discord to his father, which was not like that of a step-dame, goes to his Uncle, and by the sweetness of his behaviour, inticed many things of himself, and many of his Nobles, and the chief of Armenia to commotions. [Tacit. lib. 12. cap. 44.]

Rhadamistus, taking upon him the shew of reconciliation, returned to his father, and told him how far he had gone by fraud, and that the rest was to be performed by arms. In the interim Pharasmanes seizes causes of war, That he must war against the King of the Albanians, and that whilst he called the Romans to his aide, he should go and by his death revenge that injury of his brother. Also he delivered a great army to his son. He with a sudden eruption compelled Mithridates into the Castle Gornaces, much terrified, and deprived of the Country: the place was very fair, both by reason of the situation and the strong guard over whom Cælius Pollio was President, and Calperius was his Centurion. Rhadamistus in vain, and with great loss having attempted the fort, began to try if he could corrupt the President with money, Calperius opposing it, left the King and Aides; and left Armenia, the gift of the Romans, should be sold with money. At last, when Pollio urged the number of the enemy, and Rhadamistus his fathers commands, having made a truce, he departs: saying, although he had affrighted Pharasmanes by wars, he should make T. Numidius Quadratus, President of Syria, acquainted in what state the affairs of Armenia stood. [Ibid. cap. 45.]

The Sixt Clippcock Period begins.

After the departure of Calperius the Centurion, Pollio the Prefect, being as it were, rid of his keeper, exhorts Mithridates to a league, with his elder brother Pharasmanes, relating to him also all other respects he was engaged in: as that he had his daughter in marriage, that he was Uncle to Rhadamistus, &c. Mithridates delaying the business, and suspecting the counsel of Pollio, for that he kept a hoar, and was given up to all manner of lust and luxury, and accounted Venial, or mercenary. Caparius in the interim requires of Pharasmanes, that the Iberians might be withdrawn from the siege. He incertainly and often gently answers him: but in the mean while sends privately to Rhadamistus, to hasten the gaining of the Castle by any means. He augments the promise of reward for their treachery, and Pollio privately persuades the Souldiers by delivering it up to consult their own safety, and the Countries peace. In which necessity Mithridates appoints the day and place of the conference, and goes out of the Castle. When first Rhadamistus, countering obedience, falls to embrace him, calling him father in law, and father: adding by an oath that he would injure him neither by sword nor poison, and presently leading him into a grove hard by, told him he had provided to sacrifice there, that by the witness of the gods, their peace might be confirmed. But there was Mithridates cast down and bound with chains, and at length the commands of Pharasmanes being received, Rhadamistus, as if mindful of his oath, cast down his father in law and Uncle, together with his own wife, and heaping many and heavy packs upon them, they to perished. His sons all, because they cried at their fathers death, he killed. [Tacit. lib. 12. cap. 46. & 47.]

Quadratus, when he heard Mithridates was betrayed and slain, and Armenia possessed by his murderers, calls a council, propounds the business, and whether it were to be revenged. Having a while debated in the business, many were of opinion to desist in it. But least they should seem to assent to such a wickedness, and Cæsar should command them otherwise: messengers are sent to Pharasmanes, to require him to depart from the coasts of Armenia, and recall his son. [Ido. cap. 48.]

Julius Pelignus was Procurator of Cappadocia, equally contemptible for his ridiculous person, as the sluggishness of his disposition: but very familiar formerly with Claudius, when he was a private man, and most affected with ease and sloth. This Pelignus, gathering together the Auxiliaries of the Provinces, as if he would recover Armenia, and preying rather upon his friends than his enemies, by the defection of his forces, and the incursions of the Barbarians, being left destitute, comes to Rhadamistus

Rhadamistus, and being overcome by his bribes, exhorts him again to take up the King's Ensignes, and was the very author and abettor to him in it. Which being divulged in dishonourable terms, least the rest should be branded with Peligious fault, Helvidius Priscus is sent Embassador with a Legion for a time, to take care of those disturbed affairs. He therefore passing the Mountain Taurus with all speed, composed more things by moderation than force. When he is commanded to return into Syria, left the beginning of a war against the Parthians should arise: for Vologeses was supposed to have consulted the invading of Armenia; which having been enjoyed by his ancestors was wickedly compassed by a foreign King; he gathered an army, and prepared to bring his brother Tiridates into the Kingdom, that none of the family might be without a Kingdom. At the cutting of the Parthians, the Iberians were overcome without a fight, and the Cities of Armenia, Artaxata and Tigranocerta came under their yoke. Upon this a grievous sharp winter, and want of Provision ensue betwixt which there grew a languishing sickness amongst them, which compelled Vologeses to desist proceeding further in the business at present. [Id. cap. 49. & 50.]

Rhadamistus again invades Armenia, (it being void of a ruler) more cruelly than before, as if he came against revolters, and who in time would rebel. But they all, though accustomed to servitude, abandoned all patience, and ran to arms, inclosing the Palace, which put Rhadamistus to that that he had no other way to save himself, but by the swiftness of his horses, by which he conveyed away both himself and his wife Zenobia. And his wife being great with child, would notwithstanding (for that it was the first night, and for fear of the enemy together with her love to her husband) endure it. Afterwards with continued haste, her belly began to be over much jogged, and her bowels to torment her with gripings and pangs: the prayers that the might rather dye honourable, than live with the disgrace of captivity. He, at first, embraces her, cherishes, and helps her, sometimes wondering at her courage, sometimes even sick with fear, if he should leave her, some body might light of her and wrong her. At last for the violence of his love, and being no baby in wicked exploits, he drew his sword, and having wounded her sufficiently, he drags her to the bank of the river Araxis, and flings her into it, least even her body should come into the enemies possession. He presently went through Iberia to his fathers' Throne. In the mean time some shepherds found Zenobia, manifestly breathing and alive, and supposing that she was nobly born, by the comeliness of her person, they bind up her wounds, and apply their Country Medicines: and when they knew her name and chance, they carried her to Artaxata; from whence being brought to Tiridates by the public charge, he receives her courteously, and useth her as a Queen. [Ibid. cap. 50, 51.]

Certain professors of the Name of Christ, of the sect of the Pharisees, came down from Judea to Antioch, and said that the Christians of the Gentiles ought to be circumcised, and keep the Law of Moses, if they would be saved; disturbing the souls of many of the brethren in Syria and Cilicia, with their perverse doctrine, against who Paul and Barnabas stoutly oppose themselves. [Acts XV. 1, 2, 5, 23, 24.] Paul calls them circumcisers of the ears, brethren brought in unawares. [Gal. II. 4.] Philastrius de Hæresi, cap. 87. & Epiphanius. Hæresi. 28. say, That Cerinthus, that arch Heretic, was the first broker of this opinion.

Paul, fourteen years after his going to Jerusalem, undertaken three years after his conversion, goes to Jerusalem with Barnabas, [Gal. II. 1.] both of them being sent from the Church at Antioch with some others, that they might ask the judgement of the Apostles and Elders at Jerusalem, (whose names those disturbers had abused, to baffle out their opinion) concerning the controversy newly risen. [Acts XV. 2, 3, 24.]

Paul goes up by Revelation, Titus a Grecian going up with him, whom he would not compel to be circumcised, least that he should seem to give place to the false brethren for a moment. [Gal. II. 1, 5.]

Paul and Barnabas in their journey through Phenicia and Samaria, declare the conversion of the Gentiles to the great joy of all the brethren, and when they came to Jerusalem, were received by the Church, and of the Apostles and Presbyters, telling what things God had done by them. [Acts XV. 3, 4.]

Paul communicated the Gospel that he had preached among the Gentiles, privately to the chief among the Apostles, James, Peter, and John, (who were thought to be Pillars) who when they saw that the Gospel among the Gentiles was committed unto him, as to Peter among the Jews, and perceived the grace that was given unto him, they gave the right hands of fellowship to him and Barnabas, that these should do the office of the Apostleship among the Gentiles, and they among the Jews, advising them only, that they should take care of relieving the poor at Jerusalem. [Gal. II. 2, 7, 9, 10.]

In a council of the Apostles and Elders, held at Jerusalem, when after much disputing, Peter had spoken his opinion, Barnabas and Paul declared what great miracles God had done by them among the Gentiles: then James concluding, that it seemed good by the common decree of the Apostles, Elders, and of the whole Church, that no other thing should be laid upon the believing Gentiles, but that they should abstain from things sacrificed to idols, fornication, things strangled, and blood, to which purpose the Synod's letters were written to them of Antioch, and to the rest of the brethren in Syria and Cilicia: which they delivered to be carried to Antioch, to Judas, surnamed Barsabas, and Silas, chief men in the Church, with Barnabas and Paul: who when they came to Antioch, and had delivered and read the letters, the brethren greatly rejoiced. Judas and also Silas, being Prophets also themselves, confirming them with many words. [Acts XV. 6, 31.]

Some what after, Judas being returned to the Apostles, it seemed good to Silas to stay at Antioch, where Paul and Barnabas, with many others, preached the Gospel. [Ibid. 33, 34, 35.]

Josephus, the son of Matthias, in the sixteenth year of his age, began with great and heard labour, to make trial of all three, viz. of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. [Joseph. in his Life.]

To Pallas, the freed man of Claudius, were decreed the Pretorian ornament, and 15,000 Sesterces. [Tacit. lib. 12. cap. 53.]

When the Galileans go to the feast at Jerusalem, they must needs go through Samaria. [John IV. 3, 4.] It happened that there was a Galilean killed, at a Village of the Samaritans, called Nais, otherwise Geman, whereupon there arose a fight between the Pastors and Villagers, in which many of the Galileans were lost: the Rulers taking this very hainously, stirred up the Jews to arms, exhorting them to defend their liberty: that servitude was troublesome of it self, but then it was intolerable, when it was joined with the injuries of their Subjects. Wherefore at Jerusalem, they leaving the feast, the common people being armed, invade Samaria: neither would they surcease, do what the Magistrates could. There were also called into their aide Eleazar, the son of Dincus, and Alexander, the Captains of the Thieves, who making an incroade upon the Samaritans, that bordered on the Country of Acrabatena, made a confused slaughter, sparing no age nor sex, and burnt also the Towns: but Cumanus knowing what was done, took with him one Troop of the Sebastian Horse, and four Cohorts of Foot, arming also the Samaritans, goes against the Jews; and when he had overtaken them, he slew many of them that followed Eleazar, but took more prisoners. Then the Rulers of Jerusalem, when they saw to what calamity they were brought, put on sack-cloth and ashes on their heads, beseeching the rest of the multitude that went to destroy the territories of Samaria, that they would leave off their design: setting before their eyes, how their Country would be destroyed, the Temple burnt, and their wives and children taken Captives. Wherefore they prayed them that laying aside their arms, every man would betake himself to his own arms: to which the Jews yielded, and went home, but the thieves retired again to their strong holds, and from that time Judea was full of thieves. [Joseph. lib. belli Judæic. 2. cap. 11. Antiquit. lib. 20. cap. 5.]

The Governours of Samaria resorted to Numidius Quadratus, the President of Syria, who then dwelt at Tyrus, beseeching him that he would take vengeance of the Jews, who had plundered and fired their Towns. There were present at the same time some of the Jewish Nobility, as also Jonathan, the son of Ananus the High Priest; who answering what was objected against them, said, That the beginning of the tumult arose from the Samaritans themselves, who first committed a murder, but that Cumanus was the cause of all the calamities that followed; because being corrupted with money, he would not revenge that murder. Quadratus having heard them, deferred his sentence, saying, That then he would give his judgement, when he should come into Judea, and there more exactly know the truth of the matter; and so they departed and nothing was done. [Id. Ibid.]

In the mean time Felix, by his unseasonable remedies, provokes the Jews to offend the more. Ventidius Cumanus, who had part of the province, being his rival in all wickedness; which provinces they thus divided, that Cumanus should command the Galileans, and Felix the Samaritans, which Nations were always at odds, but then much more, through the contempt of their Governours. They therefore made incroades one on another, sent thieves and robbers to plunder, laid ambushes, and sometimes fought battles, and brought the spoils and preys to the Governours; who were glad of it at the first: but when the mischief grew to an height, they sent Soldiers to quell it, who were all slain, and the province had been all of a flame, had not Quadratus redressed it in time. [Tacit. lib. 12. cap. 54.]

Neither did he long defer to put those Jews to death, that had killed the Roman Souldiers. Cumanus and Felix drew the matter at length, because Claudius; when he had heard the causes of the rebellion, gave authority to him of determining even of the Governours themselves. But Quadratus let Felix among the Judges, (because he was the brother of Pallas, the great Favourite at Rome) and received him into the Tribunal to him, that he might daunt his accusers, and to Cumanus is alone condemned for the faults that both had committed, and by that means he let the Province in peace. [Id. ibid.]

The Nations of the Country, Cilicians, called Clites, having Trofoboros (or Aroforas) for their Captain, encamped upon rough Mountains, and from thence running down to the shores and Cities, plundered the husbandmen and Citizens, but most commonly the Merchants and Seamen. They besieged also the Cities of the Armenians, and also put to flight the horsemen sent from Syria, that were sent to their aid with their Captain Curtius Severus, because the places thereabouts were good to fight afoot, but nought for horsemen. Then Antiochus the King of that country, divided fair words towards the common people, and policy towards their Captain, utilizing their forces: put to death Trofoboros, and some of the ring-leaders, and appealed the rest through his clemency. [Id. ibid. cap. 55.]

Peter the Apostle coming to Antioch, did eat and familiarly converse with the believing Gentiles: but when certain brethren of the Jews came thither from James, he withdrew himself from the Gentiles: whose example also some Jews of the Church of Antioch followed; inasmuch that Barnabas was carried away with their dissembling. This preposterous dissembling as being contrary to the Gospel, Paul not brooking, withstood him to the face; and sharply reproved his feartulness before them all [Gal. II. 11, 14.]

Quadratus coming to Samaria, commanded those that were accused to defend their cause, and found that the tumult began through the Samaritans fault. But going to Cefarea he knew that some Jews endeavoured an innovation, wherefore he changed those that Cumanus had taken alive and kept prisoners: then going to Lydda a Town as big as a City, sitting in the Tribunal hearing again the cause of the Samaritans, he learned from a certain Samaritan, that Dorus a Ruler of the Jews had persuaded the Jews to a revolt; whom he put to death: and strook off the head of eighteen Jews, who had been in the fight. [Jos. lib. 2. bell. cap. 11. & lib. Antiqu. 20. cap. 5.]

4766.

Quadratus sent to Cefar two of the chief Priests, Jonathan and Annanias, and his son Ananus, and some of the Nobility of the Jews, and likewise also some of the Nobility of the Samaritans; he commanded also Cumanus the Governour, and Celer the Tribune to go to Rome, to give an account to Cefar of that they had done in the country. [Id. ibid.]

This being done, Quadratus fearing the Jews might make some innovation, went from Lydda to Jerusalem; where he finds all things quiet, and the people busied about their Feast of unleavened bread, and offering sacrifice: thinking therefore that they would be quiet, he left them busied at their Feast, and returned to Antioch. [Id. ibid.]

Cumanus and the Samaritans being sent to Rome, at an appointed day, are commanded to defend their cause; but they had got the favour of Cefars freed-men and friends, and had gotten the day by their means, if King Agrippa the younger then living at Rome, and seeing the Rulers of the Jews over-powered by the favour of the great ones, had not by much intreaty obtained of Agrippina the wife of Claudius, to persuade her husband that he would fully hear the matter, and execute justice on those he found the authors of the sedition. Claudius yielded to their requests, and having heard the parties, and finding the Samaritans the beginners of the tumult, he put to death those that came before him to plead their cause. He punished Cumanus with banishment: and sending Celer the Tribune prisoner to Jerusalem, delivered him to the Jews to be punished, that he should be dragged through the City, and then have his head cut off. [Id. ibid.]

He then sent Claudius Felix the brother of Paulus, Governour into Judea, and that he should also command that Province, together with Samaria, and Galilee, [Id. ibid.] which Jonathan the High Priest had begged of Cefar for him. [Id. ibid. cap. 6.] Suetonius writes, That Claudius preferred Felix, one of his freed-men, to the command both of horse and foot, and to the government of Judea, and that he was the husband of three Queens. [Id. ibid. cap. 28.] Tacitus writes, that being Governour of Judea, he thought he might do any wickedness securely, bearing himself upon his authority. [Annal. lib. 12. cap. 54.] and in the fifth book of his Histories, he further adds concerning his tyrannical government in Judea. Antonius Felix exercised regal power with a cruel disposition by all cruelty and lust, having married Drusilla the niece of Cleopatra and Antonius: in that Claudius was the grandchild of the same Antonius and son of Felix.

When

When King Agrippa the younger had commanded Chalcis four years, Claud us after the 12 year of his Empire, took that from him, and gave him a greater: viz., the Tetrarchy of Philippi, to wit, Batanea, and Gaulanitis, together with Trachonitis, and also added Abila the Tetrarchy of Lysanias, which Varus had governed. [Josephus lib. Antiquit. 20. cap. 5. Belli. Judaic. lib. 2. cap. 11.]

The young man being thus advanced by Cæsars gifts, gave Drusilla his sister in marriage to Azazius the King of the Emisitanians, that was circumcised: for Epiphanes the son of Antiochus the King of the Commagenians had refused her, because changing his minde, he would not embrace the Jewish Religion, as he had promised her father. He married also Mariamne to Julius Archelaus the son of Clelia, to whom he was betrothed by her father Agrippa. [Id. lib. 2. cap. 5.]

Josephus the son of Matthias began to imitate the manner of living of one Banus, who living in the Wilderness, clad himself with what the trees brought forth, and used for his food those things that grew of themselves: and to keep himself chaste did often walk himself in cold water; and thus he lived three years. [Joseph. in his Life.]

Nero undertaking the cause of the Illynes, in his speech rehearsed how the Romans were defended from Troy, and that Æneas was the author of the Julian Family, and many other old things not unlike to fables, and to got that the Illynes were freed from all public duties. [Tacit. Annal. 12. cap. 58.] Claudius also remitted to them all tribute for ever, as being the Founders of the Roman Nation, reading openly the Greek Epistle of the Senate and people of Rome, to King Seleucus, promising him friendship and alliance; but yet so, that he should acquit their kinsmen the Illynes from all charges. [Sueton. in Claud. cap. 25.]

To the Rhodians also repaying of their old demerits, Claudius restored their liberty, which was both often taken away, or confirmed either as they had delivered in forraign wars, or offended by sedition at home. [Sueton. & Tacit. ut supra.] Suetonius writes that he pleaded for the Rhodians and Illynes in Greek before his father being Consul, viz., Claudius in his last Consulship, two years before [in Nero cap. 7.] Claudius remits all tribute to the Apameans for five years, because they were ruined by an Earthquake. [Tacit. lib. 12. cap. 58.]

After that Claudius propounded concerning the freeing the Coans from tribute. He alleged many things concerning their antiquity, as that the Argives even with Ceus the father of Latona (of whom the Island was named) were the ancient Inhabitants: then by the coming of Æsculapius the art of Physick was brought thither, and that he was famous to all posterity: naming them by their names, and in what ages they lived. Then saying that Zenophon his own Physitian was a Coan, and descended from that Family: and that he had yielded to his intreaty, that they might hereafter be free from tribute, and be devoted to the service of that god. [Id. ibid. cap. 64.]

Paul asketh Barnabas to go again and visit the Churches where they had preached the Gospel: Barnabas determined to take John Mark with him, Paul thought it not good to take him, who had departed from them from Pamphylia, [Acts XIII. 13.] and went not with them to the work: which Barnabas took ill, that (such an injury should lie upon his sisters son, [Colos. IV. 10.] that the contention was so sharp, that they departed one from the other, and Barnabas took Mark and sailed into his own Country of Cyprus, but Paul being commended to the grace of God, having chosen Syllas went into Syria and Cilicia confirming the brethren. [Acts XV. 36, 41.]

Paul coming to Debe and Lystra found there among the Disciples, Timotheus born of a Greek or Gentle father, but his mother was a believing Jew (Eunice) to whom all the brethren at Iconium and Lystra gave good testimony, him would Paul take with him, but that he might the sooner gain the Jews he caused to be circumcised. [Acts XVI. 1, 3.]

Paul and Silas as they passed through the Cities, delivered them the decrees for to keep that were ordained by the Apostles and elders that were at Jerusalem, and the Churches were established in the faith, and entreated in number daily. [ibid. 45.]

Now when they had gone through Phrygia, and the region of Galatia, they were forbid by the Spirit to preach the word of God in Asia, and when they had come to Mysia they assayed to go into Bithynia, but the Spirit not suffering them from Mysia they came down to Troas, then to his ship there seems to stand a man of Macedonia before Paul, saying: come into Macedonia and help us. [Acts XVI. 6, 9.]

When he had seen this vision, we endeavouring to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us to preach the Gospel to them, saith Luke, [Acts XVI. 10.] who speaking from henceforward of Paul and his companions in the first person whereas always before he had spoken in the third person, he doth sufficiently shew that from that time he was a companion of Pauls in the preaching of the Gospel.

Paul and Silas with Luke and Timothy, loosing from Troas, came with a straight course to Samothracia, and the next day to Neapolis, and from thence to Philippi, the chief City of that part of Macedonia, and a Colony belonging to Italy; and they abode there certain days. [Acts XVI. 11, 12.]

On the Sabbath day they went out of the City to the Riverside, where was an house of prayer, and there spake unto the women that resorted thither; among which was Lydia, one that worshipped God, a seller of Purple in the City of Thyatira, attending unto the things that were spoken by Paul, the Lord opening her heart, believed in Christ: who when she was baptized and her household, entertained Paul and his companions. [Ibid. 13, 14, 15.]

As they went afterwards to the place of prayer, an unclean spirit out of a servant that had the spirit of divination, cried after them many days; These men are the servants of the most High God, which shew unto us the way of salvation: at which Paul being grieved, commanded the spirit in the name of Jesus to come out of her. And when the Masters of the maid saw that the hope of their gain was gone, they drew Paul and Silas into the Market-place, and did so much with the Rulers by their clamours, that both of them were publicly scourged, and cast into prison: where in the mid-night as they were praying and singing Psalmes, there was a great Earthquake, and all the doors of the prison were opened, and all the prisoners bands were loosed: when therefore the Jaylor being in desperation, would with his naked sword have killed himself, he is converted to the Faith by Paul and Silas, and baptized the same night with all his family. When it was day, the Magistrates sent them word that they might go out free, they expostulated the matter with them, concerning the shame and injury done them, because they had publicly scourged them and cast them into prison condemned. Whereupon the Magistrates came themselves and let them at liberty with honour, and brought them to depart the City: who entering into Lydias house, comforted the brethren that came unto them, and so went out of the City. [Ibid. 16, 40.]

As they journeyed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, the chief City of Macedonia, where was a Synagogue of the Jews. [Acts XVII. 1, 2, 3.] There Paul writes, [1 Thess. 1. 1.] after he was shamefully entreated at Philippi, he preached the Gospel with much contention: for as his custom was he went into the Synagogue of the Jews three Sabbaths together, and reasoned with them concerning Christ out of the Scripture. Of whom some believing, there were joyed to Paul and Silas of religious Greeks, a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few. [Acts XVII. 2, 3, 4.]

Paul taught the Thessalonians not only concerning Faith in Christ, but also concerning the future Apostolic of Antichrist, and his revelation. [II Thess. II. 5.]

When Paul stayed long at Thessalonica, he received once and again relief from the Philipians for his necessities. [Phil. IV. 16.] But the Jews which believed not, took unto them certain lewd fellows of the bolder sort raised an uproar in the City, they drew Jason (with whom Paul and his companion lodged) and certain brethren to the Magistrates, and accused them with great clamours. And when they had taken security from them, the brethren sent away Paul and Silas by night to Berea. [Acts XVII. 5, 10.]

Here also when they had entered into the Synagogue of the Jews, they diligently preached Christ out of the Scriptures, and the auditors comparing the things preached with the Scriptures, which when they found altogether to agree, many of them believed; both honourable women that were Greeks, and men not few. And when the Jews of Thessalonica came thither, they stirred up the multitude against Paul; but then immediately the brethren sent them away, to go as it were to the Sea; but they brought him to Athens: receiving a commendment to Silas and Timothy lest at Berea that they should come unto him with all speed. [Ibid. 10, 15.]

The Jews by the intigation of Chrestus continually tumulting, Claudius expells them to Rome. [Sueton. in Claud. cap. 25.] Suetonius, if I mistake not, mentions only Chrestus for that Christ our Lord (for whom the Christians in another place by the same are denominated) is here meant I cannot yet persuade my self.

Paul whilst he waits for Silas and Timothy at Athens, did dispute in the Synagogue, with the Jews and devout men, and daily in the market-place with such as met with him, disputing also with the Philosopher of the Epicurean and Stoick sect concerning Christ and the resurrection, then being brought into Marcellus as a fester forth of strange gods, he to defend his cause in a most learned oration flows, both from the Altar dedicated to the unknown God, as also from the testimony of Aratus the Poet, confirming that we are the offspring of God, that that God whom they ignorantly worship was he that was declared declared by him. [Acts XVII. 16, 31.] for the God of the Jews among the Gentiles was called the unknown God, in the same sense, the uncertain God by Lucan in his second book of Pharsalia, the uncertain power by Trebellius Pollio, in the life of Claudius, and unnamed God, by Caius Caligula, in Philo. in his legatio, to the same Caius, to whom the inhabitants of mount Carmel, [in Tacitus in the 2 book of his histories cap. 78.] did attribute neither image nor temple, but only an Altar and reverence, to the Athenians made an Altar to Mercy in the middle of their City without any image, Statius in his twelfth book of Thebais thus relates it.

*Nulla autem effigies, nulli commissa metallo.
Forma Deæ, mentes habuit & pectora gaudet.*

Gods form by pictures cannot be express'd,
He loves to dwell within the heart and breast.

Among those that were converted at this time by Paul, was Dionysius the Areopagite, and a woman, (or his wife as it seems to Ambrose, Chrysostom and Augustine) called Damaris, and some others with them. [Acts XVII. 34.]

Felix the Governour of Judea, when he saw Drusilla the sister of King Agrippa, fell in love with her, and sent his friend Simon, a Jew by nation a Cyriot, that was a foothlayer, to persuade the woman to leave her husband, and marry him, promising that she should be happy if she did not refuse him, the unadvisedly, and willing to escape the troubles of her sister Berenice, who envied her for her beauty, consented to forsake the Jews religion and to marry Felix. But Berenice the widow of her Uncle Herod, when there was a report that she had lien with her brother King Agrippa, persuades Polemon that being circumcised he might marry her, thinking hereby that she might prove it to be a lie, neither did Polemon refuse the match, being induced rather because the was rich, but this marriage lasted not long. Berenice (as it was reported) through her intemperance departing from him, who was forlorn by his wife he immediately left the Jews religion. [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 5.]

At the same time also Mariamne the third sister of King Agrippa, (sister Julius Archelaus the son of Chelcias, went and married Demetrius a chief man among the Jews of Alexandria both for birth and riches, and was at that time the Alabarcha. [Id. ibid.]

Paul sending back Silas and Timothy who had come to him from Berea, again into Macedonia, stays alone at Athens, and he had a great mind once and again to go to Thessalonica, but could not compile it, being hindered of Satan. Wherefore he sent Timothy thither, that he might confirm in the faith, and comfort the Thessalonians. [Acts XVIII. 5. 1 Thess. 1. 17, 18. III. 1, 2.]

In the mean time he left Athens and went to Corinth, where he found Aquila a Jew, and his wife Priscilla, who came lately from Italy, because Claudius had made a decree that all Jews should depart from Rome: and because he was of the same craft of making tents with them, Paul abode with them and laboured, and he reasoned in the Synagogue every Sabbath, and persuaded both Jews and Greeks. [Acts XVIII. 1, 5.]

Here Paul with his own hand baptized the family of Stephanus, [I Cor. 1. 16.] who were the first fruits of Achaia, and addicted themselves to the ministry of the Saints. [Ibid. XVI. 15.]

As Silas and Timothy came out of Macedonia, when the Jews withstood Paul preaching Christ with great zeal, and blasphemed: taking his garments against them he turns aside unto the Gentiles, going into the house of one who was fir-named Just, one that worshipped God and lived near unto the Synagogue. [Acts XVIII. 6, 7.]

Christus the ruler of the Synagogue believed in the Lord with all his family, and many of the Corinthians hearing believed and were baptized, [Ibid. 8.] of whom Paul baptized Crispus a villan to Paul by night, he not afraid but speak, and hold not thy peace, for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee, for I have much people in this City, and he staid there a year and six months, teaching the word of the Lord among them, [Acts XVIII. 9, 10, 11.] together with Sylvanus (or Silas) and Timothy. [II Cor. 1. 19.]

After the return of Timothy from Macedonia, Paul with the same Timothy and Sylvanus (or Silas) wrote the first epistle to the Thessalonians, [I Thess. III. 6.] in which when he had spoken something obscurely concerning the day of judgment, as it were now at hand, [cap. I. 1, 5.] he wrote a little after another epistle unto them, wherein he more clearly expounds that business. [I Thess. II. 2, 3.] written verily when he had Sylvanus and Timothy for his companions in the ministry of the the Gospels, [cap. I, x.] and after he had been to the Thessalonians, and they had embraced the faith of Christ, [cap. II, 5.] so that Grotius was extremely mistaken, in thinking that it was written under Caius Caligula.

The Parthians broke in and wasted Armenia, having driven out Rhadamistus, who had often enjoyed the Kingdom; and been often a fugitive, had now all forsaken that war, [Tacit. Annal. lib. 13. cap. 6.] But when Bardanes began to contend with Vologesus the King of the Parthians, the Parthians forsook Armenia, as if they deferred the war. [Id. ibid. cap. 7.]

Claudius died the III Ides of October, Afrius Marcellus, and Afrius Aviola being Consuls. [Seneca, in Lud. de Mort. Claudii, Sueton. in Claud. cap. 45. Dion. lib. 60. pag. 688.] When he had reigned thirteen years, eight month, and twenty dayes. [Dion. ibid. enm Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 5.] And in the middle of the same day, the gates of the Palace being suddenly thrown open, Nero, both the son in law and adopted son is declared Emperor. [Tacit. lib. 12. cap. ult.]

In the beginning of his new principality, Junius Silanus, Proconsul of Asia, a Noble man, and defended of the Cæsars, unknown to Nero, being scarce out of his childhood, and innocent: was taken away by the treachery of his mother Agrippina. The Ministers were P. Celer, a Knight of Rome, and Ælius, a freed man, they both had the charge of the Princes revenues in Asia: by these the Proconsul was poisoned at a feast. [Tacit. lib. 13. cap. 1.]

The Embassadors of Armenia pleading the cause of their Nation before Nero, his mother would needs come up into the seat of Audience, and sit with him: but that (the rest surprized with fear) Seneca advised him, to meet his mother, and so under colour of doing his duty, prevented the discredit. [Tacit. lib. 13. cap. 5.]

The report being brought to Rome, that the Parthians had possessed themselves of Armenia, Nero commanded the youth of the neighbour Provinces to be mustered, to supply the Legions of the East, and the Legions themselves to be planted neerer Armenia, and also the two old Kings, Agrippa (of Judea) and Jocchus (or Antiochus, rather Commagenus) that they should prepare their forces, to enter the bounds of the Parthians, and that bridges should be made over Euphrates; and he committed to Aristobolus the charge of Armenia the Less, and of the Country of Sophene to Sohemus, with the ornaments of a King. He set Domitius Corbulo to keep Armenia, and so divided, the forces of the East should remain in the Province of Syria, with Quadratus the Lieutenant thereof: and the like number of Citizens and Allies with Corbulo, with other Cohorts and Troops of Horse that wintered in Cappadocia, and gave command to the confederate Kings to be ready, as occasion of war should require. [Id. ibid. cap. 5, 7, 8.]

In the fifth year of Nero's Empire, Azizus, King of the Emeseniens, being dead, his brother succeeded him in the Principality. But Aristobolus, the son of Herod, King of Chalcis received of Nero the Principality of Armenia the Less, (as it is already said out of Tacitus) and to the Kingdom of Agrippa he added four Cities, with all the land belonging to them: in Galilee, Tiberias, and Tarichea: in Iturea beyond Jordan, Abila and Julias, with the land that was inhabited with fourteen Villages. [Joseph. Antiquit. 20. cap. 6. Bell. 2. cap. 12.]

Domitius Corbulo, making all speed, at Egge, a City of Cilicia, met Quadratus, who went thither on purpose, lest if Corbulo had entered Syria, to receive the forces, all mens eyes had been cast upon him. Both of them sent messengers to Vologeses the King of the Parthians, That they desired peace rather than war, and therefore he should give hostages, and continue the like reverence to the people of Rome, as his Ancestors had done: and Vologeses, either that he might the better prepare for war, or that he might remove all competitors by the name of hostages, delivered the most noble of the family of the Arsacide: and the Centurion Hostorius (or Histius) sent from Quadratus for the same purpose receives them. Which being known unto Corbulo, he commanded Arrius Varus, the Captain of a foot company, to go and receive the hostages. Hereupon grew a quarrel between the Captain and the Centurion: and because they would not be a scorn to the strangers, the business is put to the Arbitrament of hostages, and the Lieutenants that conducted them: and they both for his new honours, and by a certain inclination of the enemies themselves, preferred Corbulo. Hereupon grew a jarr between the Commanders, Quadratus complaining that that was taken from him that was compassed by his advice, Corbulo on the other side protesting, that the King was never drawn to offer hostages, until that he being chosen General, the Kings hopes were turned into fear. Nero, that he might compose the differences, published this order, That Quadratus and Corbulo, for their prosperous successes should have bayes added to their bundle of rods. [Tacit. 13. cap. 8. & 9.]

In the beginning of Neros reign, all Judea is filled with thieves and enchanters, and seducers of the unskillful multitude, whom Felix every day put to death as many as he took: but Eleazar, the son of Dinars, who had a great band of thieves about him, he persuaded him to come unto him, giving him his word, that he should suffer no hurt from him, and when he came, he bound him and sent him to Rome. [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 6.]

When Felix could no longer endure Jonathan the High Priest, to often and so freely admonishing him concerning his better government of the Common-wealth of the Jews: He persuaded Dora, a great friend of Jonathan's, by promising him a great sum of money, to kill Jonathan by some assassins. Certain therefore of them came into the City, under colour of religion, with short swords hid privately under their garments, and mingling among his family, killed Jonathan: and because that murder was unpunished, invited by this licentiousness, came at every feast, hiding their swords after the same manner, being in the crowds, they freely killed some for private enemies, some being hired thereunto for money, not only in other parts of the City, but also in the Temple it self. [Id. ibid.]

And thus was the City infested with thieves: and as touching deceivers and Magicians, they enticed and drew multitudes into the delarts, promising them that they would show them signs and wonders done by the power of God: but the multitude being thus persuaded, suffered the penalty of their folly, being recalled back by Felix, and put to death. [Id. ibid.]

At that time there was a certain Egyptian came into the Province, who termed himself a Prophet, who gathered together almost thirty (or rather four [Acts XXI. 38.] thousand men, and brought them from the wilderness, unto the Mount of Olives, there he told them, That by his command they should see the walls of Jerusalem fall down, by which way they might enter into the City: which being reported to Felix, he brake in, and invaded this seduced multitude, with his Roman Horse and Foot: a great multitude also of the Jews helping him: he killed 400, and took 200, prisoners alive. The rest of the multitude being dispersed into their own Countries: but the Egyptian, with a few that escaped from the fight, was not known what became of him. [Id. ibid. & lib. 2. Bell. cap. 12.] Of whom Lyfias the Captain speaks to St. Paul, [Acts XXI. 38.] Art not thou that Egyptian which before these dayes madest an apparition, and leddest out into the desert 4000 men that were murderers?

When Gallio was Proconsul of Achaia, the Jews of Corinth brought Paul before his judgement-seat: but he refusing to be Judge in these matters, and driving them from the judgement-seat, the Greeks took Sothenes, the Ruler of the Synagogue, and beat him: but Gallio cared for none of these things. [Acts XVIII. 12, 17.]

This Gallio was the brother of L. Anneus Seneca, (who together with Burrhus, commanded all things at Rome, under his young Scholar Nero) who declining the deifying of Claudius, that was taken away by poyson, said, That he was taken up to Heaven by a hook, as Dion laith in the end of his 60 book, there is extant the book of Controversies, of Marcus Anneus Seneca, the Father to the three Sons, Novatus, Seneca, and Melat. The second of these L. Seneca in his consolation to his Mother Helvia teacheth, that one of his brothers by his industry got honours, the other condemned them. By the first understanding Novatus, who being adopted by Junius Gallio (who was banished by Tiberius, as we have declared at the end of the year of the World, 405, out of Tacitus) was also called Gallio, and was by the same Seneca called Lord, as being his elder brother, as Lipsius notes up in the place of the Epistle 104. This was wont to be the speech of my Lord Gallio, who began to have a fever, being in Achaia, and presently took shipping, crying, That it was not the disease of the body but of the place.

When Paul had stayed many dayes at Corinth, after the tumult that was made before Gallio's Tribunal, after he had taken his leave of the brethren, he sets saile from the port of Cenchrea; and sailing into Syria, he came first to Ephesus, where entering into a Synagogue, he reasoned with the Jews: and when they desired him to tarry longer with them, he consented not, saying, That he must by all means keep the feast that cometh at Jerusalem: but promising that he would returne to them again, if God will: and bidding them farewell, leaving Aquila and Priscilla there, he sailed from thence to Ephesus, with the rest of his companions. [Acts XVIII. 18, 22.]

Paul going from Cæsarea (Stratons) to salute the Church of Jerusalem, went down to Antioch, (of Syria) and when he had stayed there some time, he departed, and went over in order all the regions of Galatia and Phrygia, confirming all the Disciples. [Id. 22, 23.] where he is received by the Galatians, as an Angel of God, or Jesus Christ himself. [Galat. IV. 14.] Among other things he appointed that the collections collections for the poor should be set apart every Lords day. [I. Corinths. XVI. 1, 2.]

Josephus, the son of Matthias, after the three years that he had lived with Banus in the wilderness, returns to Jerusalem, being now fourteen years old, he began to meddle with publick affairs, following the Sect of the Pharisees, which comes nearest to the Sect of the Stoicks among the Grecians. [Joseph. in his Life.]

A certain Jew named Apollos, born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, and powerful in the Scriptures, came to Ephesus, and being instructed in the way of the Lord, and fervent in the spirit, he spake and taught diligently the things of the Lords knowing only the baptism of John: and he began to speak freely in the Synagogue; whom when Aquilla and Priscilla had heard, they took him unto them, and expounded unto him the way of the Lord more fully. And when he was disposed to passe into Achaia, the brethren exhorted him, and wrote to the Disciples to receive him: who when he was come helped them who had believed for with great contention he convinced the Jews publicly, shewing by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ. [Acts XVIII. 24, 28.]

When Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coasts, (viz. Galatia and Phrygia) came to Ephesus, where he found twelve Disciples, which knew only the baptism of John, but had not yet received the Holy Ghost, by the imposition of hands: who being farther instructed by him in the doctrine of Christ. When he had laid his hands on them, the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied. Then he went into the Synagogue, and spake freely, disputing and persuading the things concerning the Kingdom of God. [Acts XIX. 1, 8.]

When some Jews were hardened and belived nor, but spake evil of the way of the Lord, Paul in the view of the multitude, departing from them, separated the Disciples, daily disputing in the School of one Tyrannus: and this he did by the space of two whole years; so that all that dwelt in Asia, both Jews and Greeks heard the word of the Lord Jesus: and many miracles were done by the hand of Paul: so that handkerchieves and aprons were brought from his body to the sick, and the diseases departed from them, and evil spirits went out of them. [Ibid. 9, 12.]

Asia accusing P. Celes, because Caesar could not absolve him, he delayed his trial, till he should dye by old age; for Celes having killed Syllanus the Proconsul, cloaked all his other wickedness, by the greatness of that villany. [Tacit. lib. 13. cap. 33.]

The Cilicians accused Cossutianus Capito, as one bespotted and defiled with all vices, and thought that he had the same authority, to do wickedly in the Province, as he had exercised in the City: but he being turmoiled with this overhwart accusation, let fall his defence, and was condemned of extortion. [Id. Ibid.] to whom (according to Lipsius) is to be referred that of Juvenal in the eighth Satyre.

—quam fulmine iusto
Et Capito & Tutor vnerint damante Senatu, Pirata Cilicium.

—How th' Senates just thunder strook
Tutor and Capito for making prize,
As Pirates, of th' Cilician Merchandize.

And that of Quintilian, [lib. 6. cap. 1.] The accuser of Cossutianus seemed to us young men to speak bravely, it was in Greek, but to this sense, He was ashamed to be afraid of Caesar.

Great suits prevailed so much for Epirus Marcellus, of whom the Lycians demanded restitution, that some of the accusers were banished, as though they had endangered an innocent man. [Tacit. lib. 13. 33.]

The war about the getting of Armenia, that was drawn at length between the Romans and Parthians, by mild beginnings, was now hotly pursued, because neither would Vologes suffer his brother Tiridates to be deposed of that Kingdom, that he had invested him with, or let him accept it as the gift of another: and Corbulo thought it worthy the greatness of the people of Rome, to recover what was in former time gotten by Lucullus and Pompey. Corbulo, to prepare his army to this war, fashioned it after the old severity and discipline; and entering Armenia, dismantled some Castles, and burnt Artaxata, Tiridates not daring to give him battle. [Tacit. lib. 13. from cap. 34. to 41.]

Seven exorcists of the Jews, the sons of Scava a chief Priest calling over them that had unclean spirits, the name of the Lord Jesus, did adjure them by Jesus whom Paul preached, on whom he that had the unclean spirit leaped, and compelled them to fly out of the house wounded and naked, which when it was known both to the Jews and Greeks which dwelt at Ephesus, fear fell on them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified, and many that believed came and confessed and shewed their deeds, many also of them that used curious arts, brought their books together and burned them before all men, and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver, so mightily grew the word and prevailed. [Acts XIX. 13, 20.]

The Galatians, immediately after the departure of Paul from them [Acts XVIII. 23.] being seduced by false brethren, thought that they were to be justified by the works of the Law, whom he calls from their error by a vehement Epistle written unto them concerning that matter. [Gal. 1. 6, 7.]

Paul thought in his mind, when he had passed thorough Macedonia and Achaia, to go to Jerusalem, saying, after I have been there, I must see Rome also. [Acts XIX. 21.] And first he purposed to come to Corinth, and from thence to go into Macedonia, and again from Macedonia to Corinth, and to go to Judea, [I Cor. I. 15, 16.] whether he had assigned the collections for the poor Saints at Jerusalem to be sent: from thence he appointed to go to Rome, and so to take a journey into Spain. [Rom. XV. 24, 28.]

Paul agitating these things in his mind, sent Timotheus and Erastus into Macedonia, but he himself staid in Asia for a season. [Acts XIX. 22.] viz. of Lydia, in which he seems to have preached the Gospel, to the Cities that were near to Ephesus, by the space of nine months, which with the two years that he taught in the School of Tyrannus, and the three months being added that he taught in the Synagogue of Ephesus, will make up the three years that he saith he laboured in Asia, [Acts XX. 15, 31.] a great door being opened unto him although there were many adversaries. [I Cor. XVI. 9.]

Campania perceived the eclipse that happened the last of April, Vipsianus and Fonteius being Consuls between seven and eight of the clock in the morning, Corbulo the general in Armenia wrote that it was seen between ten and eleven, [Pliny. lib. 2. cap. 70.] at Rome the eclipse was seen in the middle of their sacrificings, that were made by the decree of the Senate, for the cause of Agrippina that was killed by her son, so that the stars were seen, [Xiphilin. out of Dion, with Tacitus. lib. 14. cap. 12.]

Then arose a Schism in the Church of Corinth, which was shewed unto him by those that were of the house of Chloce, some saying that they were of Paul, some of Apollos, some of Cephas, and some of Christ. [I Cor. I. 11, 12, & III. 3, 4.] Apollos with some other brethren went from Corinth to Paul into Asia, [Ibid. XVI. 12.] by whom the Corinthians write to Paul and ask his advice, about the matter of Marriage and Single life. [Ibid. VII. 1.]

Paul together with Sothenes the Ruler of the Synagogue at Corinth, being converted to the Faith of Christ, (Timothy being then absent) [I Cor. XVI. 10, with Acts XIX. 22.] from Asia, (of Lydia, where he then was) wrote the first Epistle to the Corinthians by Stephanus, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, that were sent from them to visit the Apostle. Apollos refusing to return so suddenly back with them. [I Cor. I. 1. & XVI. 13, 17, 19.]

In that Epistle he commanded the incestuous Corinthian that had married his fathers wife, to be delivered to Satan, [Chap. V.] and corrects the error that had crept into the Church; as well the errors of practice, as that chief error of opinion, (taken out of the sink of the Sadduces) denying the Resurrection to come, [cap. XV.] signifying unto them, that he will come unto them, and set in order the things that remain, [cap. IV. 18, 19, & XI. 34.] as he passed by into Macedonia; but first he will tarry at Ephesus until Pentecost: [XVI. 5, 6, 7. cap. XVI. 5, 8.] which his purpose, some unlooked for occasion suddenly hindered.

For Demetrius a Silver-smith, who made silver Shrines for Diana, fearing that he should lose his profit, calling together the workmen of the same craft, raised a tumult against Paul, as he that would persuade not only the Ephesians, but almost all the whole multitude of Asia, that they were not gods that were made with hands. Who having caught Gaius and Aristarchus Macedonians, Pauls companions in travel, they rushed into the Theatre: and when Paul would have gone in thither, the disciples and some of the chief men of Asia (that provided for the Plays to be seen in the Theatre) his friends would not suffer him to go out unto the people; and when Alexander the Jew would have made his defence to the people, there was a great cry among the people almost for two hours: Great is Diana of the Ephesians. At length the tumult being appeased by the wisdom of the Town-clerk, Paul calling the brethren together took his leave, and departed for to go into Macedonia. [Acts XIX. 24, 41, and XX. 1.]

Aquila and Priscilla going from Ephesus returned to Rome, after they had laid down their own necks for to save Paul: [Rom. XVI. 3, 4.] with [1 Cor. XVI. 19.] the Jews every where returning to Rome, the Edict of Claudius for their expulsion after his death wearing out of date. [Acts XXVIII. 17, 21.]

Paul coming from Ephesus to Troas, although there was a door open unto him of the Lord to preach the Gospel, yet being troubled because he found not Titus there (whom he had sent to the Corinthians with another brother,) he failed from thence into Macedonia, [II. Cor. II. 12, 13, with XII. 18.] which after he had gone over, he exhorted the brethren with much exhortation. [Acts XX. 2.]

And when his affliction there did not remit, but without were fightings, within were fears, the coming of Titus brought comfort unto him, and the joyful message that he brought concerning the state of the Corinthians, [II. Cor. II. 5, 16,] by whose example he provoked the Macedonians to provide collections for to be sent to Jerusalem, [saying that Achaia was ready a year ago,] [ibid. IX. 2.] by whose example they being moved, in much trial of affliction, yea, and beyond their power, they threw themselves liberall. [ibid. VIII. 4, 5.]

The Apostle having learned from Titus the success of his first epistle, wrote together with Timothy the second epistle to the Corinthians, in which after he had reckoned up the great affliction that he had suffered in Asia, by the procurement of Demetrius, he protests that he came not unto them as he had intended, only that he might spare them, [cap. I. 8, 9, 17, 23.] and desires them that they would pardon the inconsiderate Corinthian upon his repentance, [cap. VI. 3, 11.] he sent Titus unto them again, with another brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the Churches, (who is thought to be Luke) that their collections to be sent to Jerusalem, might be in readiness when he came thither himself, [cap. VIII. 16, 19, & IX. 3, 4, 5.]

Paul went from Macedonia into Greece, where he staid three months; [Acts XX. 3, 3.] within which time coming to Corinth, he received the collections in Achaia for the relief of the believers at Jerusalem, [I. Cor. XVI. 3, 4, 5, with II. Cor. IX. 4.]

That that famous epistle to the Romans was written from Corinth, Origen confirms by many reasons in his preface to the exposition of that epistle, it was indited by Paul, written by the hand of Tertius, and sent by Phoebe a servant of the Church of Cenchrea near Corinth, [Rom. XVI. 1.] at what time the Apostle was about to take his journey to Jerusalem with the collections of Macedonia and Achaia, [Rom. XV. 25, 26.]

When the Apostle thought to go directly from thence into Syria, that he might carry the collections to Jerusalem, he was laid wait for by the Jews, whereupon he thought it best to return into Macedonia, from whence he came, and from thence to pass into Asia properly to called. [Acts XX. 3, 4.]

Paul sent away before him from Philippi in Macedonia into Asia, the companions of his journey, Sopater or Sopater, [Rom. XVI. 11.] of Berea, Aristarchus and Secundus of Thessalonica, Gaius of Derbe, and Timotheus, with Tychicus and Trophimus of Asia: who expected him at Troas, but he himself with Luke and the rest, saying away from Philippi, after the daies of unleavened bread, came unto them within five daies to Troas, and tarried there seven daies, [ibid. 4, 5, 6.]

On the eighth day which was the first of the week, the Disciples being gathered together to break bread. Paul preached unto them, he being to go away the next day, and continued his discourse unto midnight, where he resorted to like Eutychus a young man that fell down from the third lofe in the room where they were gathered together. [ibid. 7, 12.]

From hence Paul went a foot unto Assos, where Luke and his other companions going by ship, took him in and came to Mytelene; and when they had layed from thence, the day following they came over against Chios, and the next day arrived at Samos, and when they had tarried at Trogyllium, the day following they came to Miletus. [ibid. 13, 14, 15.]

And Paul made haste that he might possibly be at Jerusalem at the feast of Pentecost willing therefore to pass by Ephesus, he sent messengers from Miletus to Ephesus, and called the Elders of the Church, whom he in a most grave speech warns of their duty, and seriously exhorts them to the performance of the same, then kneeling down he prayed with them, and they all wept, but forsooking most of all because he had laid (as he then thought it would come to pass) that they should see his face no more. [ibid. 16, 38.]

After

After they had lunched from Troas, they came with straight course to Coos; and the day following to Rhodes, and from thence to Patara: then going into a ship that sailed to Phenicia, they discovered Cyprus, and leaving it on the left hand, they came to Tyus. [Acts XXI. 1, 2, 3.]

There having found Disciples they tarried seven days, who laid unto Paul by the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem; but he kneeling down on the shore, prayed with them: then taking ship, he came from Tyus to Ptolemais; and there having saluted the brethren, the next day he came to Cæsarea, (Stratobis) Where he staid many daies with Philip the Evangelist, who was one of the Seven, [Acts VI. 5.] and had four daughters, Virgins, that did prophesie; and there came a Prophet from Judea called Agabus, who binding his own hands and feet, foretold the bonds that waited for him; who when he could not be persuaded by the brethren, that he should not cast himself into such imminent danger, he came to Jerusalem: the Disciples accompanying him from Cæsarea, and bringing with them one Mnaso of Cyprus, an old Disciple, with whom he should lodge. [ibid. 4, 16.]

Here being most gladly received of the Church, by the advice of James and all the Elders of Jerusalem, to wash off the calumny that was spread of him, (to wit, that he taught and exhorted the Jews that believed in Christ, of whom there were then many thousands) to forsake the observation of the Law of Moses) he joynted himself to four men that were believing Jews that had made the vow of the Nazarite: and purifying himself with them according to the command of the law. But all this did no good: for when some of the unbelieving and rebellious Jews of Asia, (which came to Jerusalem to the feast) saw him in the Temple, with great clamour and noise they stirred up the people, leigned this crime, that he had brought Trophimus, a Gentile of Ephesus, into the Temple, and had prophaned the Temple. And as they were about to kill him, there came the chief Captain (Claudius Lysias) with a band of men, and took Paul out of their hands, and led him into the Castle: where, by the permission of the chief Captain, he spake unto the people as they were in the tumult, a speech in the Hebrew tongue. [Acts ibid. 17, 40.]

The Jews being enraged, and more vehemently crying out against him, by reason of his speech, the chief Captain commands him to be examined by scourging: from which punishment he is freed, by his declaring that he was a Roman; and when the chief Captain desired to know of what crime he was accused by the Jews; the next day he commanded the chief Priests and all their Council to come together, and set Paul before them, having looked him from his bands. [Acts XXII.]

As Paul was beginning to plead his cause before the Council, Ananias the High Priest (the son of Nebideus, who, although he was deprived of the High Priesthood, yet seems to be President of the Council) as before him Annas, or Ananus was, that was the father in law of Caiphas) commanded him to be smitten on the mouth; wherefore he is severely rebuked of Paul, by the name of whited wall. Then Paul proclaiming openly that he was a Pharisee, and that he was called into judgement for the hope of the resurrection. Then arose a disension between the Sadducees that accused him, and the Pharisees that excused him: but the chief Captain fearing lest he should be torn in pieces by them, as they were contending, took Paul from among them with his soldiers, and brought him into the Castle to whom the Lord appearing the next night, comforted him as he was sad, and animates him to greater things, foretelling him that he must bear witness of him at Rome also. [Acts XXIII. 1, 11.]

And when it was day, more than fourty of the zealous Jews bound themselves under a curse, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul: which they laying in wait, the chief Captain knowing from Pauls sisters son, in the third hour of the night, he sent Paul with a guard of Soldiers to Felix, the Governour of the Province; by whom he is brought in the night to Aniparris, and the next day to Cæsarea: where he is commanded by Felix to be kept in Herods judgement-hall. [ibid. 12, 35.] All which things are to be acted within the space of one week; as may be understood, from Acts XXIV. verses 1, and 11, compared together.

Five daies after Paul being accused by Ananias and the Elders, by the mouth of Tertullus an Orator, before the Governour at Cæsarea, clears himself from their false accusations; twelve daies after the violence that was offered him in the Temple, when as now Felix had governed the Jews many years, for this was now the tenth year of his government, he having heard them, defers his sentence to another time, commanding a Centurion that Paul should be kept, and to let him have liberty, and that none of his acquaintance should be forbidden to minister or come unto him. [Acts XXIV. 1, 23.]

After

After some dayes, when Felix came with his wife Drusilla which was a Jew, (the sister of King Agrippa,) another Drusilla besides that was the wife of Felix, that was the daughter of Juba, the King of Mauritania, the Neice of Antony and Cleopatra, he called for Paul: and heard him trembling, reasoning of faith in Christ, righteousness, and temperance, and judgement to come; and he spake with Paul the officer, hoping that he would redeem himself with money, having him in bonds two whole years. [ Ibid. 24, 27. ]

Corbulo had Tigranocerta yielded unto him, who also subdued all Armenia. [ Tacit. lib. 14, from the 13 chap. to the 26. ]

Tigranes the son of Alexander (the son of that Alexander that was put to death by his father Herod the Great) and of Glaphira (the daughter of Archelaus the King of Cappadocia) who was kept Hostage at Rome a long time, even unto servile Patience was sent by Nero to take that Kingdom, he was not received there by a general consent, the ancient love they bare the Artaxiads remaining still amongst some of them; but the most hating the pride of the Parthians, desired a King to be given them rather from Rome. He had also a guard given him, a thousand Legionary soldiers, three Bands of allies, and two wings of Horse: to the end he might more easily defend his new Kingdom. Part of Armenia as it lay nearest to every one, was commanded to obey, part Nipolis (Thraipolis) part Aristobulus and Antiochus. [ Id. ibid. cap. 26, with Joseph. lib. 18, cap. 7, fin. ]

Corbulo went into Syria, that wanted a Governour by reason of the death of Ventidius (Numidius) Quadratus the Lieutenant there, and it was committed to his charge. [ Tacit. lib. 14, cap. 26. ]

In the same year Laodice one of the most famous Cities of Asia, destroyed by an Earthquake, recovered again by her own wealth. [ Id. ibid. cap. 27. ]

4774. 61. Terquinius Priscus was condemned for extortion, at the suite of the Bythinians, at which the Senator greatly rejoiced, remembering that his Proconul Statilius Taurus, was condemned by him. [ Id. ibid. cap. 46, with lib. 12, cap. 59. ]

There arose a contention at Cæsarea Stratonis, between the Jews and the Syrians about the equality of power in the City. The Jews being rich, reproached the Syrians, who though they were poorer in respect of wealth, yet they bore themselves high, by reason that many that served the Romans in their wars about those places, were country-men of Cæsarea and Sebaste; and so gave the Jews as good as they brought. Afterwards they began to throw stones one at another, so that many were slain and hurt on both sides; but yet the Jews had the Victory: whom when Felix required to leave off their debate, and they obeyed not, he sent soldiers amongst them who killed many, and took many prisoners; and granted also to his soldiers the plunder of many rich houses: but the more honourable and fuller of modesty of the Jews fearing the like misery might befall themselves, besought Felix that he would send a reitrate, and to spare that which yet remained, and that he would pardon them upon their repentance: to which the Governour yielded at their intreaty. [ Joseph. lib. 20, cap. 6. ]

At the same time King Agrippa conferred the High Priesthood on Israel the son of Phabius. There arose also a dissention between the chief Priests and the rest of the Priests and Rulers of Jerusalem, and they each went guarded with a company of most bold and seditious men, who decided their debates with reproaches and throwing stones. Neither was there any to restrain them, as though the City wanted Magistrates: and the impudency of the High Priest grew to such an height, that they durst send their servants to the very corn-floors to take away the Tithes that were due to the Priests: so that many poor Priests died for want of food. So much did the violence of the seditious prevail above justice. [ Id. ibid. ]

Marke the Evangelist who first preached Christ at Alexandria, died in the 8 year of Nero, and was buried at Alexandria; [ Jerome. Scriptor. Eccles. Catalog. ] after whom the Elders of Alexandria chose one from among themselves, whom they placed in a higher degree, and called him a Bishop: after the manner, as if an army should chuse a General, or the Deacons chuse one from among themselves whom they know to be industrious, and should call him Arch-Deacon. [ Id. in Epist. 85, ad Euagrium. ] And they chose Anianus a man both dear unto God for his piety, and also admirable in all things: who was the first bishop of the Church of Alexandria after Marke, and was there twelve years. From the eighth year of Nero, to the fourth of Domitian, [ Id. in Catalog. with Enseph. in Chronic. & Eccles. Histor. lib. 2, cap. 23, & lib. 3, cap. 12. ]

4775. 62. Volageses the King of the Parthians, endeavours to restore his brother Tiridates that was thrust out of Armenia, to which end he sent one army into Armenia, and another into Syria. Corbulo sends part of his army to Tigranes King of Armenia, and he himself drives the Parthians out of Syria, and so threatens the Parthians, that they

they leave off the war, and send Embassadors to sue for peace; who are dismissed by Nero, without their suit being granted: and Cæcunius Pæus is preferred to be General for the defence of Armenia. [ Tacit. lib. 15, cap. from 1, to the 7. ]

Felix seeing this sedition between the Jews and Syrians of Cæsarea still to continue, sent one of the Nobility of both sides as Embassadors to Nero, to argue their cause before him. [ Joseph. lib. 2, bell. cap. 12. ] He also sent prisoners to Rome for a very final fault, (some Priests, good and honest men, to plead their own cause before Nero, [ Id. in his own Life. ] He also sent Paul the Apostle, whom he had kept prisoner two whole years at Cæsarea, to shew the Jews a pleasure, still a prisoner there, when he had received Portius Festus from Nero his succellour, in the Province. [ Acts XXIV. 27. ]

Festus when he was come into the Province, after three dayes he ascended from Cæsarea to Jerusalem: before whom when the High Priest, and the Rulers of the Jews accused Paul, desiring that he might be brought from Cæsarea to Jerusalem, with an intent to lay wait and kill him in the journey. Which Festus refusing, commanded Pauls accusers to come to Cæsarea: and having tarried there not above ten dayes, he goes down to Cæsarea; and the next day sitting in his Tribunal, he heard the Jews accusing Paul, and Paul clearing himself from their accusations: and Festus being willing to please the Jews, asked Paul if he would be judged at Jerusalem before him, of that matter that he was accused of: Paul, who knew with what intent, and by whose advice he asked that question, and fearing some treachery from the Jews, denied to go thither, and appealed to Cæsar: whose appeal, Festus, after he had conferred with the Council, admitted. [ Acts XXV. 1, 12. ]

After certain dayes, Agrippa the King, and Berenice his sister, came to Cæsarea, to salute the new Governour: and when they had tarried there many dayes, Festus, not knowing what to write to Cæsar concerning Paul, consulted with Agrippa about that business: who when he had said that he would willingly hear him himself. The next day Agrippa and Berenice with much pomp came into the place of hearing, together with the Captains, and the principal men of the City, and Paul, at Festus command, is brought out before them, being bound with a chain. [ Ibid. 13, 27. ] Who in an eloquent oration, so clears his innocency, that although to the Governour, who was ignorant of these things, he seemed to be mad; yet the King, who was exercised in the Scriptures, he had almost persuaded to be a Christian: and by the judgement of the whole Council, he was thought to have done nothing worthy of death or bonds, and that moreover he might have been let at liberty, if he had not appealed unto Cæsar. [ Acts XXVI. ]

The Rulers of the Jews that dwelt at Cæsarea, went to Rome to accuse Felix, and he had suffered punishment for the injuries he had done the Jews, unless Nero had pardoned him at the intreaties of his brother Pallas, who was in great favour at that time with his Prince. [ Joseph. lib. 20, cap. 7. ] Although afterward the same Pallas, because he kept from Nero an huge deal of money by his living so long, may be thought to be poisoned by him this same year, [ Tacit. lib. 14, cap. 16. ]

Two principal men of the Syrians of Cæsarea, with a great sum of money, bribed Beryllus, who had been Nero's School-master, but was then his secretary for the Greek tongue, that he would get the Emperours letters patents, by which the Jews might be deprived of all authority in the City, which they had in common with Syrian inhabitants; which thing he easily obtained. Which when the Jew of Cæsarea understood, they continued in their seditions, even unto the beginning of the wars of the Jews, which took their beginning especially from hence. [ Joseph. lib. 20, cap. 7. ]

Festus coming into Judea, found it grievously afflicted with thieves, every where spoiling the Villages, of whom the most cruel were called cut-throats, of which there were a great number, from their short crooked Swords, like the Persian Cymetres, with which thrusting themselves into the precise of people (as it is said) that came to Jerusalem to celebrate, as God commanded, their festival daies, they might easily kill as many as they would; who also being armed, went to the Villages of their enemies, and having plundered them, burnt them. [ Ibid. ] These Festus carefully pursued, and took great store of the thieves, and put not a few of them to death. [ Id. lib. 2, bell. cap. 12, and beginning of 13. ]

When it was decreed that Paul should be sent to Cæsar, he was delivered to Julius, a Centurion of Augustus band, with some other prisoners: who put him into a ship of Adramyttium, that was to go to Asia, Aristarchus of Macedonia, besides Timothy and Luke accompanying him; the next day they touched at Sidon, where Julius courteously entreating Paul, permitted him to go visit his friends, and to refresh himself: going from thence they sailed by Cyprus, because the winds were contrary. And when they had sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia, they came to Myra, a City

City of Lycia : where when the Centurion had found a ship, whose signe was Castor and Pollux, going into Italy, he put the Captives in her : and when they had sailed slowly many days, were scarce come over against Cnidus, they failed under Crete, over against Salmone, and hardly passing by it, they came to the fair Havens in the life of Crete. [Acts XXVII. 1, 6.]

When the fall (that solemn fall of the expiation, used to be kept every year by the Jews on the seventh month, and tenth day) was past, and that laying began to be dangerous, Paul foreseeing the damage to come, advised them to winter there ; but when that port seemed inconvenient to winter there, they determined to winter in another port of Crete called Phenice, and as they were saying thither the fourthwind at the first favouring them, but a little after there arose a tempestuous wind called Euroclydon, by which they were carried to a little island called Claudia; then being caught and tossed by the great tempest, they lightened the ship, and the third day with their own hands they cast out the tackling of the ship, neither sun nor stars appearing for many daies, but when all hope of safety was taken away, it was revealed to Paul by an Angell in the night, that he must be brought before Caesar, and that God had given him all that layed with him in the ship in the fourth watch of the night, as they were driven up and down in Adria, the shipmen deemed that they were nigh some countrey, which they found afterwards to be the island Melia, and as they strove to make in thither, the ship was broken by the violence of the tempest, but the men some swimming, and some on the planks and broken pieces of the ship were all saved and came safe to land. [ibid. 9. 44.]

After they had escaped they were curiously received by the inhabitants of Melitus, who making a fire to dry their cloathes, and Paul standing in the chimney, shook off a viper from his hand and had no hurt, they were wrapt into admiration of him, and said he was a god, here they lodged three daies with Publius a chief man of the island, whose father lying sick of a leaver and the bloody flux was healed by Paul, others also which had discales in the island were healed. [XXVIII. 1, 9.]

Cecilius Pæus, not having sufficiently fortified his wintering camps, nor provision of corn made, marcheth with all hast out the mount Taurus, and took a few Castles and some prey, and by long journeys having overrun the places he could not hold, and the provisions which he had taken, being corrupted, he came back again, and wrote letters to Cæsar in high words, as though the war had been finished, but void of matter. [Tacit. lib. 15. cap. 8.]

In the mean time Corbulo had a special care to furnish the bank of Euphrates with more Garisons, and frighted Vologeles from entering Syria. Whereupon Vologeles turned against Pæus, and pressed him to fight, that he forced him to a dishonourable peace, of which Monobazus, King of Adiabena, is called to be a witness. The Fortresses that Corbulo had built on the other side of Euphrates were demolished, and the Armenians left to their own wills. But at Rome there were Trophies and Tryumphal Arches set up in the middle of the Capitoline Mount, for honour of the victory over the Parthians, which were done by the decree of the Senate, the war being yet fresh, neither were they taken down, only for a fair shew, not regarding the truth. [Id. ibid. from cap. 9. to 18.]

Paul and his companions being highly honoured by them of Melitus, and furnished with all things necessary, after three month that they had been there, they went in a ship of Alexandria, that had wintered in the Island, and came to Syracuse: where they tarried three dayes ; from whence fetching a compass, they came to Rhegium, and within one day the South wind blew, and the next day they came to Pu coli, where they found brechren, who desired them that they would stay with them seven dayes, and so they went toward Rome. [Acts XXVIII. 10, 14.] in the ninth year of Nero's reign.

The brethren went from Romero to meet Paul as far as Appii Forum, and the three Taverners: and when they came to Rome, the Centurion delivered the prisoners to the Captain of the guard: but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a Souldier that kept him. After three dayes, calling together the chief of the Jews that were at Rome, he declared unto them the cause, why he was sent prisoner to Rome, and that he was compelled to appeal unto Cæsar. And when they denied that they had received any letter from Judea concerning him, but said, That this heretic was every where spoken against: and when they had appointed him a day, there came unto him to his lodging, to whom he expounded Christ out of the Law and the Prophets, from morning unto evening: and some assented unto the things that were spoken, and believed not: to whom after he pronounced their judgement out of Elaias: leaving them, he turned to the Gentiles, and he remained in his own hired house two whole years, and received all that came to him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things that concerne the Lord Jesus Christ, no man forbidding him. [Acts XXVIII. 14, 31.]

Onesiphorus

Onesiphorus very diligently sought out Paul at Rome, and found him, and refreshed him. [II Tim. 1. 16, 17.]

In the beginning of the Spring, the Embassadors of the Parthians brought to Rome the messages and letters of King Vologeles, desiring that Armenia (which they had already taken) might be given unto them, and that a peace might be confirmed. But both these things being denied, the government of Syria is committed to Cincius (as Governour) the management of the war to Corbulo: and the sixteenth Legion is brought out of Pannonia under the conduct of Marius Cælius. Allo the Tetrarchs and Kings: and Prefects and Governours, and those that ruled the neighbour Provinces, are commanded to obey Corbulo, in as high a manner, having his power enlarged, as Pompey had given him by the people of Rome, when he undertook the war against the Pirates. Pæus being commanded home; Nero thought it enough (when Pæus feared greater matters) to scoffe at him, saying, That he would presently pardon him, lest he that was so ready to be afraid, should fall sick with too much penitence. [Tacit. lib. 15. cap. 24, & 25.]

Corbulo, after he had mustered his army, went into Armenia, where the Embassadors of Vologeles met him, and desire peace: but Tiridates being compelled to come into the Roman Camp; took off his Crown, and laid it at Cæsar's Image, and agreed to go to Rome to him to take it of him again: but with this condition, that he might first go visit his family and friends: in the mean time he leaves his daughter an Hostage, and delivered supplicatory letters to Nero. As he went away, he found Patrons with the Medes, and Vologeles at Ecbatana. [Tacit. lib. 15. cap. from 26. to 31.]

In Judea Festus sent forces both of Horse and Foot against a certain impostor a Magician, who drew men after him into the Wilderness, being deceived by his promises, that they should be freed from all their misfortunes; but those that went, and the seducer himself are killed by the soldiers that were sent. [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 7.]

At the same time King Agrippa built a stately house near the porch in the Palace of Jerusalem, which in time past belonged to the Hasmoneans; and was situate in an high place, from whence a fair prospect lay open to all Jerusalem: which the chief men of Jerusalem taking ill, that for a private house the sacrifices and all things that were done in the Temple might easily be seen, built an high wall, which not only hindered the prospect of the Kings house, but of the west porch also without the Temple, in which the Roman souldiers kept guard on the Feast dayes, for the keeping of the Temple. At which act not only the king, but also Festus the Governour of the province was offended: and commanded to pull it down: But ten chief men (by his permission) were sent Embassadors to Nero about this business, together with Imael the High Priest, and Chelcias the keeper of the holy Treasure. Nero having heard their Embassie, not only forgave the Jews, but suffered the way to stand as it did, gratifying herein his wife Poppea, who favouring the Jews Religion, became their intercessor, who also suffered the ten men to return, but kept Imael and Chelcias as Hostages with her; which when Agrippa knew, he took away the High Priesthood from Imael, and gave it to Joseph surnamed Cabis, the son of Simon, sometime High Priest. [Id. ibid.]

Josephus the son of Matthias, hearing that some Priests his familiar friends that were sent prisoners to Rome by Felix, had not in their calamity cast off the care of their Religion, but that they lived on Nuts and Figs; that he might find some way to deliver them, in the 26 years of his age went to Rome, having passed many dangers in his journey by sea: for their ship being sunk in the middle of the Adriatic sea, for 600 that had swam all night, about 80 that swam more so, were taken into a ship of Cyrene and so saved. Among whom was Josephus, who being set ashore came to Dicarcha, (or Parcoli, as the Italians call it) where he falls into the acquaintance of one Aliturus a Player, who was a Jew, and in reputation with Nero: by him he was made known to Poppea the Emperrix, and by her means presently got the Priests free. [Id. in his Life.]

Festus dying in the Province, Nero sent Albinus his successeur into Judea. But King Agrippa took away the High Priesthood from Joseph; and gave it to Ananus, the son of Annas, or that Ananus who had enjoyed formerly the High Priesthood even to satiety, he had five sons that enjoyed that dignity, which had never happened to any of the High Priests before. [Id. lib. 20. cap. 8.]

Ananus the new High Priest of the sect of the Sadducees, a bold and heady man, thinking it a fit time seeing Festus was dead, and Albinus on his way, called a Council of the Judges, and brought James the brother of Jesus before them, who with some other accused of transgressing the Law, he delivers to be stoned. [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 8.]

This James the brother of the Lord, in the time of the Paschever was thrown down from from a pinnacle of the Temple and stoned, and one of them was a Fuller, with a bar with which he was wont to press his cloaths, strook him on the head with it and killed him. This Eusebius relates in the fifth book of the History of Hegeffippus, [lib. 2. Histor. Ecclesiast. cap. 22.]

This murder of James much displeased all the good men, and observers of the Law. Whereupon they sent a messenger privately to King Agrippa, desiring him that he would command Ananus that no such thing should be done any more. Some also met Aninus as he came from the City of Alexandria, and informed him that Ananus had no power to call a Council without his leave. He being persuaded by their words, wrote a sharp letter to Ananus, wherein he threatened to punish him: and Agrippa also for the same cause within three months took the High Priesthood from him, and gave it to Jesus the son of Damaceus. [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 8.] But among the Christians, after the death of James, Simon (the son of Cleophas) is constituted Bishop of the Church of Jerusalem. [Euseb. lib. Histor. Ecclesiast. cap. 26.]

Albinus as soon as he came to Jerusalem, he employed all his care and study, that he might keep the Country in quiet, by putting to death many thieves: and Ananus the High Priest (the son of Nebedeus) increased every day more and more in the love and esteem of the people, and he was honoured of all men for his liberality; and Albinus also daily honoured the High Priest for his gifts. But Ananias had very bad servants, who getting a company of headstrong men, went from farme to farme, and took away the Tithes of the Priests, and beat those that refused to render them. Some of the Priests also did the same, no body being able to restrain them: and many of the Priests that were maintained by the Tithes, were even starved for hunger. [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 8.]

The thieves at the Feast that then was (of Pentecost) entered Jerusalem by night and took alive the Secretary of Captain Eleazar the son of Ananias the High Priest. Him they carried away, and then lent to Ananias, one that should promise in their name, that if he would persuade Albinus to free ten of theirs that he had taken captive, they would deliver the Secretary: which thing Ananias obtained of Albinus, meer necessity compelling it. This was the beginning of greater calamities; for the thieves always found some trick to intercept some of Ananias his kindred, whom they would never deliver, until they had freed some of their own: wherefore being increased both in boldness and number, they spoiled the whole Country. [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 8.]

At this time King Agrippa enlarged the walls of Cæsarea Philippi, and changing the name, called it Neronias: at Berytus also he built a Theatre at huge charges, and set forth every year sports, for which he assigned a great sum of money. He also gave to the people of Berytus corn, and oil to each man: and he adorned that City with Statues, set up in divers places, and with Images of antick work, and transferred almost all the Ornaments of his kingdom into that City: for which cause his subjects began to hate him, because he dissembled them their Ornaments, to adorn a strange City. [Id. ibid.]

Four years before the Jewish war, (that was managed by Vespasian) when the City of Jerusalem enjoyed both peace and plenty, one Jesus the son of Ananus, a country man, and one of the common people, coming to the Feast of Tabernacles, began suddenly to cry out; A voice from the East, a voice from the West, a voice from the four Winds; a voice against Jerusalem and the Temple, a voice against new married men and women, a voice against all this people: and crying thus night and day, he went thorough all the streets of the City. Some of the Nobility disdaining any token of adverting, took the fellow and scourged him with many stripes: but he spake nothing secretly for himself, nor unto them that scourged him, but continued still in the same cry. But the Magistrates thinking it rather to be some motion in him from God, brought him to the Roman Captain, where being beaten till his bones appeared, he neither made intreaty, nor shed a tear: but as well as he could framing a weeping voice, at every stroke, he answered, Wo, Wo, to Jerusalem. Albinus then asked them, who he was, and where he was born, and why he still cried after this manner: but he answered nothing; yet he ceased not to bewail the City, till Albinus thinking he was mad, suffered him to depart. He cried thus most on the Feast days, and that for 7 years (space or rather 6, as it is in Phot. Biblioth. cod. 47.) and five months, and yet was neither hoarse nor weary; at last he was killed by a stone shot out of an Engine, in the time of the siege. [Id. lib. 7. bell. cap. 12.]

At the command of King Agrippa, Jesus the son of Gamaliel succeeded in the High Priesthood, Jesus the son of Damneus very unwillingly yielding it up. Whereupon there arose a discord between them; for having gotten to them companies of refulgent young fellows, they came from words, to throwing of stones; but amongst the rest Ananias was richest, and by his bounty got most of his side. Costabarus also and Saul got each of them a band of rascally people, these were of the Blood-Royal, and beloved for their nearness of blood to Agrippa, yet were violent, and as ready as any too in spoiling the weaker sort. [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 8.]

From this time especially began the Common-wealth of the Jews every day to grow worse and worse, [Id. ibid.] and the seeds of the future destruction were then sown, through multitudes of Commanders that then governed. [Id. lib. 2. bell. cap. 13.]

But Albinus the Governour did not only take away from private men their goods, under colour of justice, but burdened the Nation in general by exaction of greater tribute; but even those thieves that the soldiers of the City had taken, and those whom the former governours had left in prison, he set free; if their kindred would give him money; and he that did not give him money was kept in prison as a most heinous offender. [Id. ibid.]

At the same time also, the insolence of them that desired innovation in the City of Jerusalem increased; of whom those that were rich, befired Albinus to wink at their moving sedition, and the common people that could not be in quiet, joyined themselves with Albinus his party. Each of them had a troop of rascally people about him; and Albinus himself was over them all as a Tyrant and a Prince of the Thieves, and used the help of his guards to rob the meaner sort: and so it was, that those whose houses were ransacked, held their peace, and those that escaped were glad to be officious to them, that they knew deserved death, for fear they should suffer the same things. [Id.]

Nero, Rome being on a fire, beheld the burning of it from Mecenas tower, and being much delighted with the beauty of the flames, sang the destruction of Troy in his players habit, likening the present evil to the old ruins; [Tacit. lib. 15. cap. 38, 39, 40. Sueton. in Nerone, cap. 38. Xiphilin in Dion.] Some there were that noted, that this fire began on the XIV. Kalends of July, on which the Senates after they had taken the City set it on fire, others went so far in their curiosity, that they reckoned the very daies and months that were between the two burnings, [Tacit. ibid. cap. 41.] as if they had said there were just between them 448. yeares, 537. months, and 167632. daies.

For to extinguish the rumour, Nero falsely accused, and punished most grievously with exquisite torment, those whom the vulgar called Christians, first therefore they were apprehended, who confessed them selves Christians, then an huge multitude are convicted by their detraction, not so much for leaving the City on fire, as for the hatred of all men against them, (comes also were added to their sufferings, some were covered with beasts skins to be torn with dogs, some were crucified, and some burnt, and when the day failed, they were burnt to give light by night. Nero made his garden fit for that spectacle, and set forth shews in the Circuses when he himself was among the common people in the habit of a waggoner, or standing in airing whereupon pity was taken on them, seeing they suffered not for any common good, but to satiate one mans cruelty, [Tacit. lib. 15. cap. 44.] for the illustrating of which the words of an old Scholiast are brought, upon that of Juvenal in his first Satyre.

Pone Tigellinum: cada laceris in illa,
Qua flantes ardent qui suo gutture flammam.

Thou shalt be made a torch by night to shine
And burn impal'd: name thou but Tigilline.

If thou some Tigellinus, thou shalt be burnt alive, as it was in the shew of Nero, of whom he commanded torches to be made, that they might give light to the spectators; and they were fastned through their throat that they might not bow themselves. Nero clothed Malescitors with pitch paper and wax, and so set them to the fire.

This was the first persecution that was raised against the Christians by the Roman Emperours, of which Suetonius as an heathen man speaks in Nerone, cap. 16. The Christians are punished a kind of men of a new and pernicious superstition, but Tertullian as a Christian in his Apologetic cap. 5. Search your records, then you shall find, that Nero was the first that used Cæsars sword against this sect at that time much increasing at Rome: but we glory in such a dedication of our condemnation, for he thus understands himself, cannot but understand that nothing can be condemned by Nero but some great good.

Cestius Gallus is by Nero sent Governour into Syria and Gessius Florus into Judea, this Florus was a Clazomenian by birth, he married Cleopatra a wicked woman: by whose means, as being a friend of the Empreſſe Poppæ, ſhe got this government for him. [Joſeph. lib. 20. cap. 9.]

Alonius hearing that Florus was come to succed him, and willing to gratifie the Citizens of Ierusalem, he called before him all the pilopers, and those that were notoriously guilty of any capital crime he put to death, the rest, who for smaller offences were cast in prison, he remanded them to prison again, and delivered them upon their fines, and after this manner the prisons were emptied, but Judea was filled with thieves. [Jo<sup>seph</sup>, lib. 20, cap. 8.]

In the mean time, the Levites whose office was to sing hymns in the Temple, went to King Agrippa, and by their entreaty perswaded him, that he would call a council, and permit unto them the use of the linnen robe, which was then only granted, to the Priests, for said they, this new custome would conduce much for the perpetual memory of his reign. Wherefore the King by the advice of his council, permitted to those that sang the hymnes, that laying aside their former habit, they should wear a linnen garment as they desired, at their entreaty also he allowed another part of the same tribe, that was added to the services of the temple to learn to sing the sacred hymnes, [ibid.]

The Philippians sent Epaphroditus with money to Rome, to visit Paul in prison, and to minister to him in his necessities; who joining himself to Paul, as both an helper and fellow soldier for the work of Christ, making no account of his life, put himself in danger of death, for he fell into a grievous disease. [Philip. II. 25, 30, with IV. 10, 14, 18.]

Paul being aged and in prison gained to Christ, Onesimus a servant that fled from Colosse from his Master Philemon. [Philem. 9, 10, 15, with Coloss. IV.]

Timotheus, that was kept prisoner with Paul, is set at liberty. [Hebrews
XIII. 23.]

XIII. 25. ] Paul wrote the Epistle to the Philippians by Epaphroditus, after he had recovered his health, hoping also that in a short time he should send 1 Timothy unto them, as soon as he should call to his service, trusting also that he himself shall come shortly unto them, as he saith, Phil. II. 25, 29. ] at which time Pauls bonds for Christ were famous in many parts, Phil. II. 25, 29. ] at which time Pauls bonds for Christ were famous in many parts of the Court, some even of Cæsar's Palace being converted to the faith, [Cap. I. 12. and II. 25. ] For being sent into prison by Cæsar, he was more known in his family, and to made the house of persecution the Church of Christ. [Ierem. in Comment. to Philomen.]

Paul writes an Epistle to Colosse to Philemon, by his servant Onesimus, in which he reconciles and commends him to his Master, signifying that he hopes he shall be freed from prison, and desiring him to prepare him a lodging; and by the same Onesimus and Tychicus; Paul wrote an Epistle out of Priso, to the Colossians, whom he had never seen, but were instructed in the doctrine of Christ by Epaphras. [Coloss. i. 7, 8. & ii. i. iv. 7, 9. & 18.] At that time besides Timothy (whose name is prefix to both the Epistles) there were with Paul at Rome, of the circumcision, his companion in bonds, Aristarchus of Thessalonica, [4th XX. 4.] Mark, Barnabas his sisters son, concerning whom he gives the Colossians command to receive him, if he come unto them, and Jesus which is called Justus; of the others, Luke the beloved Philitian, Demas and Epaphras, whose great affection, the Apostle commends not to the Colossians onely, (with whom Archippus supplid his ministry, now he was absent) but also towards them that are of Laodicea and Hierapolis. [Col. iv. 10, 14. 17. Philem. 23, 24.]

33 24.] The lame Tychicus, the companion of his travel from Asia. [Acts XX. 4.] Paul sent them also into Asia, that from him the brethren might know his affairs, with an Epistle wrote by him to the Ephesians. [Ephes. VI. 21, 22.] Which Tertullian [lib. 5. against Marcion. cap. 110. & 17. and Epiphanius in Heref. 42.] shews was said by Marcion the Heretic; to be that that underwent the name of the Epistle to the Laodiceans: which Grotius thinks to be credible enough to be done by him out of the credit of the Church of Laodicea, affirming that there was no cause why he should tell a lie in this bulineſſe: and gathers from thence that the Epistle to the Ephesians, and also to the Laodiceans, was written in the ſame words: where it is to be noted in ſome old books (as it appears out of the ſecond lib. of Baſil, againſt Eunomius, and of Jerom's Commentary upon this place of the Apoltle) it was generally intitled mis aſia, mis eu- rope to xristu lord, or (as it was wont to be done in the copies of letters that were to be ſent to divers places, To the Saints which are at 0000000, and to the faithful in Chriſt Jeſus, as if it had been ſent firſt to Ephesus, as the M. tropolis of Asia: and thence to be ſent to the reſt of the Churches of that Province, (the name of each Church being inter-ferred) to ſome of which, whom Paul never ſaw, thoſe words of his ſeem eſpecially to look. After I heard of your faith in Chriſt Jeſus, and love unto all the Saints, [cap. i. 15.] ward, &c. [cap. III. 24.] which perhaps Marcian thought might rather agree to the Laodiceans, who had not seen the Apostle present in body, [Colos. II. 1.] than to the Ephesians, with whom he conversed so long together. [Acts XIX. 8, 10. XX. 31.]

About the same time Paul wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews, Timothy being set at liberty, but gone from him some whither for a time, with whom if he come shortly, he promiseth to see them; in the mean time he sent them salutations from the brethren from Italy. [Heb. XXIII., 23, 24.]

The building of the Temple being now finished, and the people seeing that about 180000 workmen lived idly, that were heretofore wont to get their living by working in the Temple; and being loath that the Holy Treasure should be reserved for a prey to the Romans, and desiring also to provide for the workmen, so that if they wrought but one hour they were presently paid: they perswaded King Agrippa, to repair the Eastern Porch; this Porch hung over a deep and narrow valley, and was upheld by a wall of 400 cubits high, the length of every stone being 20 cubits, and the thickness six. This was the work of King Solomon, who first built the Temple. But the Kings to whose care claudius Cæsar had committed the charge of the Temple, thinking with himself that any great building might easily be pulled down, but hardly for up, especially this Porch, that would cost much time and much money, denied their request; but yet forbade them not to pave their City with white stone, if they would. [Joseph. lib. 20. cap. 8.]

Paul, the two years in which being detained in free custody, he taught the Gospel at Rome, being ended, [A<sup>cts</sup> XXII, 30.] he seems to have gone from thence into Asia, and at Colosse to have lodged with Philemon. [Philem. 22.]

and at Colosse to have lodged with Pnemonon. [Pnemonon, 21.]
In the feast day of unleavened bread, which fell this year on the eighth day of Xanthicus, or April, about nine of the clock at night, a vision was thought to be midday.
Temple, there shined such a light, that it might have been thought to be midday, which continued half an hour. In the same feast day also, a Cow that was led to facrifice, brought forth a Lamb in the middle of the Temple. The East Gate also of the Temple, being traffic and mighty heavy, and at evening could scarce be shut by twenty men, and was locked with bars of Iron, and had bolts that were let down deep into a threshold, made all of one stone, was seen, about fix of the clock in the night, to open of its own accord. These things being told the Magistrate by the keepers of the Temple, as they went their round, he came up himself, and could scarce shut it. [Joseph, lib.
2, bell. 12.]

On the 28 day of Artemisius or May, before Sun set, there were seen in the air Iron Chariots all over the Country, and armies in battle array, passing along the clouds, and begirring the City : and in the Façt of Pentecost, the Priests going into the inner Temple by night, according to their custom, to celebrate divine service, at first they found the place to move and make a noise, and afterwards they heard a sudden voice, which said, Let us depart hence. [Joseph, ibid.]

Paul preacheth the Gospel in the Isle of Crete, where he left Titus, that he might set in order the things that were wanting, and ordain Elders in every City there.

King Agrippa having taken the Priesthood from Jesus, the son of Gamaliel, gave it to Matthias, the son of Theophilus, the beginning of the Jewish war was when he was High Priest. (Joseph, lib. 20, cap. 8.)

Josephus having received many gifts from the Emperesse Poppea, and returning into his own Country, found among them perfect signes of innovations, and rebellions whom he in vain endeavours to disuade from their unhappy undertakings. [Id. ubi his Lib.]

For Gæffus Florus to outrageously abase his authority, that the Jews defired Albinus again, as one that was their benefaكتور; for he was wicked and injurious as privately as he could possibly. But contrarywise Florus, as if he had been fent to make open choice of his villanies, bragged publicly of the injuries he did the Nation, leaving nothing to be done to the height of iniquity in rapines and punishments: he was inflexible to mercy, unfatiable in his gainings, equally snatching at small and great things, so much that he went thurs with the thieves, for many used that trade, and paid part of the booty to him; there being no means or end of their injuries, to that the milarable Jews not able to endure the ravening insolencies of the thieves, were constrained to abandon both their houſes and religion, and to fly to ſtrange Countries judging that they might more commodiously live any where, even among Barbarians. (Id. lib. 2.

Poppea, Nero's wife, being great with child and sick, upbraided Nero, as he returned late from driving his Chariot, whom in his anger he killed, with a kick of his foot: this was after the end of his quinquennial pa'stime celebrated the second time, for Nero his first prize was instituted in the LX. year of Christ. [Sueton. in Nero, cap. 35. Tacit. lib. 16, cap. 2. 6.]

Paul having staid sometime at Ephesus, left Timothy there, whilst he went thence into Macedonia, that Timothy might govern that Church in his absence, [1 Tim. 1. 3. III. 14. 15.] being in Macedonia he carried with the Philippians, as he had formerly promised them. [Phil. 1. 25, 26. & II. 24.]

Paul wrote his former Epistle to Timothy, in which he declares that he had delivered Hymeneus and Alexander, making shipwreck of the Faith, over to Satan, that being chastised they might learn not to blaspheme, [1 Tim. 1. 20.] for Hymeneus did deny the Resurrection to come, as did Philenus, saying, that it is past already, [1 Tim. II. 17, 18.] and Alexander was that Coppermith, that did Paul so much evil, and so greatly withstood his preaching. [1 Tim. IV. 14, 15.]

Paul also wrote another Epistle to Titus into Crete, desiring that when he shall send Artemus or Tychicus unto him, he would come to him to Nicopolis, (famous for the Victory at Actium) where he appointed to winter, and also that he should bring diligently Zenas the Lawyer, and Apollo on their journey, that they should want nothing. [Tit. III. 12, 13.]

Winter being past, Paul returned to Ephesus to Timothy: and went to Troas and there left his cloak. Erastus abode at Corinth, of which he was Chamberlain, [Rom. XVI. 23.] Paul left Trophimus at Miletum sick. [1 Tim. III. 14. II Tim. IV. 13, 20.]

Cestius Gallus coming from Antioch to Jerusalem, desiring to signify to Nero the strength and flourishing estate of the City, who contemned the Nation, desired of the High Priests, if it were possible, that they would number the multitude: and they (for it was the day of the Passover) killed sacrifices from the ninth hour to the eleventh, and there were 25600 sacrifices, to the eating of which, ten, and sometime twenty, met to each sacrifice. [Joseph. lib. 7. belli, cap. 17. Latin. Edit. in lib. 6, cap. 45. Edit. Græc.]

There came about Gallus a multitude, not less than 300000 Jews and besought him, that he would take pity on the calamities of their Nation, calling upon him that he would remove Florus that plagues of their Common-wealth. Who although he was in the sight of the people, and in Gallus his presence, was not only not moved, but laughed at their cries against him. Cestius at that time appeasing the rage of the people, promising that he would make Florus more gentle unto them, went back again unto Antiochia. Florus brought him as far as Cæsarea, deceiving him with lyes, devising with himself to make a war upon the Nation of the Jews, by which way only he thought he could best hide his own villanies; for as long as the peace continued, he should always have the Jews his accusers to Cæsar: but if he could make them revolt, that then the envy of his lesser impieties would be taken from him by their greater offence: and to the end that the Nation might revolt from the Roman Empire, he more earnestly every day increased their calamities. [Idem. lib. 3. belli, cap. 12.] Paul coming to Rome the second time, is heard and quitted by Nero: of which thus himself in [II Tim. IV. 16, 17.] In my first answer, no man stood with me, but all forsook me: I pray God it be not laid to their charge. Now hath standing the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me; that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear: and I was delivered out of the mouth of the Lion. So that as before for two years, to now again for an whole year, he preached the Gospel to all Nations that came from every place flocking to Rome, as their common Country.

Demas left Paul, embracing the present world, and went to Thessalonica: Crescens into Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia, only Luke remained with Paul at Rome. [II Tim. IV. 10, 11.]

There was an old and constant opinion that was commonly talked of over all the East: that there was a Prophecy, that there should come from Judea those that should be masters of all. It was afterwards manifest by the event that this was foretold of the Roman Emperour. The Jews applying this Prophecy to themselves rebelled, Saith Suetonius [in Vespasiano, cap. 4.] The Jews patience endured [Saith Tacitus lib. Hist. 5, cap. 10.] until Cestius Florus was Governour; under him the war began, to wit, in the Artemisian month, or our May; in the twelfth year of Nero's Empire, the 17 of the reign of Agrippa, the second of the government of Cestius Florus. [Joseph. lib. 1. belli, cap. 13. & lib. 20. Antiquit. cap. ub. 7.] We have fully described by Josephus in the later part of the second book, and the five following books, the History of that war: a breviary of which we have hither transferred, taken out of the abridgement of the Jewish History of that most eminent man Ludovius Capellus.

Nero passing into Græcia, carried there till winter. [Xiphilin. ex Dion.]

King Agrippa in a long Oration exhorts the Jews from war, but in vain; for a little while after he was gone from Jerusalem, some of the seditious possessed themselves of the strong Castle Maslada unawares, and put to the sword all the Romans they found there. At Jerusalem also Eleazar the son of Ananias the High Priest, and Commander of the souldiers of the Temple, a bold and factious young man, persuaded the Priests that they should not offer any sacrifices, but only of the Jews, nay not those that were to be offered for Cæsar or the Romans. Which rash act when the Governours of the City, being peaceable men, judged to be intolerable, and saw that it was an argument of open rebellion, yet could they not disuade the seditious from this opinion, whereupon they sent messengers to Cæsarea to Florus, and to King Agrippa, desiring them that they would presently send forces, and repress the rebellion in the beginning. Florus, who did desire there should be a revolt, neglected it: but Agrippa sent a thousand horsemen, who together with the rulers and Priests, and the rest of the multitude that loved peace, seized upon and held the upper City against the seditious who kept the temple and the lower City, there were continual skirmishes between them for seven daies together, but upon the feast day of their carrying wood into the temple, many murderers were received into the temple, who with the rest, set upon the Kings souldiers, and forcing them from the upper part of the City, drove them into Herod's palace, and burnt the place where the records were kept, and the palace of the Hasmoneans (which was then Agrippa's court) and Ananias the High-Priests house, the next day which was the 15. of August, they take the Castle of Antonia after two daies siege, kill all the Roman souldiers there, and set the Castle on fire. A little after they set upon the Kings palace, (Manahemus the son of Judas Galileus being then Captain, who after he had taken the Castle of Maslada, and plundered Herod's armory, brought his murderers armed into Jerusalem,) which having taken and burnt, Manahemus seized upon the tyranny, but immediately after he is killed in the Temple as he was at his prayers, by Eleazar the Captain of the Temple, his guard also are thrust out, vvhio return to Maslada, Eleazar the son of Jairus being their Captain, vvhio was a kin to Manahemus, the seditious also of Jerusalem upon the very Sabbath day put to death the Romans, who after the palace was won by assault, had retired into the Castles of Hippico, Phasaelus, and Mariamme, where being besieged, and yielding upon compulsion, and delivering their arms, yet against their oath, were put to death.

The same day at Cæsarea, all the Jews that dwell there; at the instigation of Florus are massacred by the heathens of Cæsarea to the number of 40000, by which the Jews through the whole Countrey are so vexed, that they waist all the villages of the Syrians and the neighbour Cities as Philadelphia, Gerasa, Ptolemais, Pella, Scythopolis, Gadara, Hippo, Gaulanitis, Scabale, Alcalon, Anthedon, and Gaza. Then there was a generall slaughter by the Syrians, of the Jews that went through all Syria, partly out of the old hatred against the Jews, and their religion, and partly for the love of plunder, and desire of revenge, onely they of Antiochia, Apamea, and Sidonia spared the Jews that dwell amongst them, but at Alexandria the Metropolis of Egypt, upon a sedition that was raised there were in one day 50000. Jews killed, by two Roman legions that were let in upon them.

Cestius Gallus, the Governours of Syria being vexed with the commotions, comes from Antioch into Judea with the 12 Legion and the King Agrippa's souldiers, and other forces, and from Ptolemais invades Joppe and burnes it, he sends Cefennius Gallus into Galilea, which he pacifies being entertained at Sephoris, and comes to Cæsarea.

Peter and Paul are warned by revelation from the Lord, of their approaching departure out of this life. [II. Pet. 1. 14. II. Tim. IV. 6, 7.]

Peter wrote his second epistle to the Hebrews dispersed through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bythinia. [II. Pet. III. 1. with I. Pet. 1. 1.]

Paul sent his second epistle to Timothy to Ephesus, by Tychicus, where the family of Onesiphorus was: after Aquila and Priscilla having left Rome, were returned thither again, [II. Tim. IV. 12, 19.] in which he desires Timothy that he would come to him before winter, and bring with him Mark, as very profitable for him to the ministry, [ibid. 9. 21, 21.] and sends him salutations from Eubulus Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia. [ibid. 21.]

Cestius Gallus in the feast of Tabernacles, after he had burnt Lydda, marcheth towards Jerusalem, whom the men of Jerusalem meet about sixty furlongs from thence, and there fight a perillous battle near Bethoron, but fresh forces coming to Cestius, he forceth them into the City, into which he also brake, the fourth of October, and held the lower part of the City, (as also Bezetha, and Cernopolis) then he assaults the Temple and the upper City, and had easily taken it, if he had more valiantly continued the assault, the people favouring the Romans, and the seditious only withstanding them.

But Cestius when he was near taking the Temple, without any good reason why, raised the siege, and retreats to Antipatris, having lost in his march many both Romans and auxiliaries, and many also killed by the Jews who pursued them with a great part of their baggage and ammunition, and engines and slings, and other armes that the Romans threw away in their flight, which afterward the Jews made use of for their own defence against the siege of Titus. And this was done on the eighth of November in the twelfth year of Nero: (to wit, being ended) for the thirteenth year of Nero had begun on the thirteenth of the precedent October.

The Jews pulled up with this Victory being returned to Jerusalem, create Joseph the son of Gorion, and the High Priest Governors of the City, and lend many Commanders into each Province, and Governments of places; and among the rest they send Joseph, (the writer of this war of the Jews) into Galilee: in which after he had fortified many Towns, and walled them, and ordered all things for to endure a war, he expected the invasion of the Romans.

In the mean while there are many commotions, and many and frequent rebellions of the Cities against him, by the subtilty and fraud of John the son of a certain Levite, and by the envy of some of the Governors of Jerusalem, who desired to have the government of Galilee taken from him; but Joseph brake the neck of all their endeavours, arts, and councils, and avoided them by his prudence and patience; who also forced that John to flee to Jerusalem with his forces out of Gilecala a Town of Galilee which he had fortified. But at Jerusalem Ananias the Governour of the City, prepares all things necessary for the sustaining of the war, repairs the walls, and provides that warlike instruments, and darts, and armes, be made thorough the whole City. He endeavours to reconcile those that they called the Zelots, but in vain. He endeavours also to apprehend Simon the son of Giora, who exercised thevery, and affected the Tyranny, by sending soldiers against him; but he with his party fled to the thieves that kept Masluda, from whence they with their robberies infested all the Country of Judea and Idumea.

Moreover Cestius having sent messengers to Nero (who was then in Achaia) declares unto him the troubled state of Judea. Nero being much moved with this news, commands Vespasian thither, and Vespasian having received this command, sent his son Titus to Alexandria, to bring from thence the fifth and tenth Legion into Judea, and he himself goes by land from Achaia into Asia, and from thence comes into Syria and Antiochia.

Peter and Paul had foretold at Rome, that it should come to passe that after a little time, God would send a King that should overcome the Jews, and that should lay their City equal with the ground, and should besiege them being pined with hunger and thirst: and then it should come to passe that they should eat one the other, and consume one the other; and at last, that they should come into their enemies hands, and should see their wives most grievously tormented in their sight, and their virgins to be violated and prostituted; their sons to be torne asunder, and their little ones to be dashed a pieces: and to be short, all things to be waisted by fire and sword, and themselves ever banished out of their own lands, and all this because they exalted themselves above the most loving and approved son of God. [Lactantius, lib. 4. cap. 21.]

Vespasian at Antioch gathers together the Roman forces and the aides from the Kings, from whence he comes to Ptolemais, and recovers Sepphoris that favoured the Romans.

Titus came to his father to Ptolemais sooner then could have been hoped for, by reason of winter; their own forces and the auxiliaries being come together, are in number three score thousand of Horse and Foot, besides their servants and the baggage.

Vespasian intruding Galilee, burnt and waisted the City of the Gadarens, which he took at the first assault; thence coming to Jotapata on the 21 day of May, he fights against it.

On the 29 of June (which last day of that month falls to be within the reign of Nero) Paul was beheaded at Rome: as the Records both of the Eastern and Western Church confirm: whereupon Chrysostom undoubtedly affirms, that the day of his death was more certainly known, then that of Alexander himself, [in II Cor. Homil. 26.] Dionysius the Bishop of the Corinthians affirms in an Epistle to the Romans, that Peter also suffered Martyrdom at the same time with him, [in Epistola, lib. 2. Hist. Ecclesiastica, cap. 24.] whom also Origin relates in the third Tome of his Commentaries upon Genesis, that at Rome he was crucified with his head downwards (as he had desired) [Ibid. lib. 2. Hist. cap. 1.] the prediction of Christ being then fulfilled which he made upon him, [John XXI. 18, 19.] When thou art old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldest not.

Vespasian after fourty dayes siege takes Jotapata by force, and overthrowes it, and burns it, after it was valiantly defended by Joseph, who was Governour then, on the Kalends of June, in the 13 year of Nero, he takes Joseph as helay hid in a Cave, gives him his life, but keeps him prisoner.

Jotapata being destroyed, Vespasian retires with his army to Cesarea, and there places two Legions, to refresh themselves after the siege, a third to the same end, and purpose he sends to Scythopolis; he himself goes to Cesarea Philippi, where he with his army is scalded by King Agrippa for twenty daies: there he prepares for the sieges of Tiberias and Tarichea, they of Tiberias immediately yield, and at the intreaty of King Agrippa it is granted that the City shall not be rated, but Tarichea, after it had suffered a siege, is taken by storm.

These Cities being recovered or overthrown, almost all Galilee inclined to the Romans, except Gamala in Gaulanitis, and Gilecala, and the Mountain Itaburium.

4071 Gamala, after an whole months siege was taken the 23 of October, and overthrown: and a little after also the Mountain Itaburium was taken by the Romans. Titus sets upon Gilecala, which was kept by John, with his party of the seditious. John seems to like of the conditions of peace that were offered by Titus, but in the night he with his party fled out of the City, and betakes himself to Jerusalem. Titus spares the City, but puts a Garison there, and comes to Cesarea, but Vespasian going from Cesarea to Iamnia and Azotus, conquers them both, and returns again to Cesarea.

In the mean while there was a great dissention thorough all Judea, some desiring war, others being willing to remain under the protection of the Romans. Whereupon there were whole troops of thieves gathered together, all over Judea, who plundered them, that were desirous of peace; and being loaded with their plunder, were received into Jerusalem, and there fill all things with murders, dissensions, discords, and rapines, and first they cast Antipas, and a great many Noble men, and the chief of the City into prison, and shortly after put them to death, without any trial, falsely accusing them, that they would have delivered the City to the Romans: and when the people would have risen up against them, they seize upon the Temple, and use it as a Bull-work against the people, and there create an High Priest by lots, one Phannius, (or Phannas) a rude and unskilful man, and one that was not of the order of the Priest-hood.

Against these Zelots, (for so they called themselves) Ananus, and the Nobler Priest, stir up and arme the people, and set upon them in the very Temple, and force them into the inner Temple. The Zelots sent letters privately to the Captains of the Idumeans, wherein they accuse Ananus of treachery; and complain, that whilst they are fighting for liberty, they are besieged in the Temple, and call the Idumeans to their assistance. They presently fly thither with 20000 men, and being privately let into the City and Temple by night by the Zelots, there is great slaughter, and burnings, and rapines made by both sides upon them of Jerusalem. For there were 80000 killed that night, and in the following dayes they killed Ananus, and others of the nobility, to the number of 12000, besides an infinite number of the common people. But a little after the Idumeans began to repent themselves, when they saw the wickedness of the Zelots, and could perceive no signe of treachery in the Nobility, (of which they were accused) and so setting at liberty 2000 which they held in prison, the Idumeans left Jerusalem, and returned home: they being gone, the Zelots began to use more cruelty against the Nobility than formerly, for they would not suffer the Noble men, after they had slain them, to be buried, but those especially, who they suspected, that they would fly to the Romans: for they kept all the passages, and diligently observed them that would fly, whom they killed, and let them lie unburied.

In the mean time there arose a dissention amongst the Zelots, that John who fled from Gilecala to Jerusalem, affecting their Tyranny, and others not induring him to be their superiour, who they before had accounted their equal; but they thus disagreeing among themselves, were very unanimous, in the robbing of the common people, nay all Judea, as it followed the example of the Metropolis, to wit, Jerusalem, was very full of thieves, and most miserably vexed.

With these discords, by which the Jews destroyed each other, and by the cries of those that fled to him, intreating to preserve and free their Country from this sedition, Vespasian was incited, and prepares for the siege of Jerusalem, and that he might leave nothing behind him, to trouble him, whilst he was at the siege at Jerusalem; he comes with his army to Gadara, to quench those relics of war and tumult, in the Country beyond the River, he being called thither by the moderate men of the City, who had rather have peace than war; and presently takes the City, the seditious being fled: and sending Placidus with his horse to pursue them, and put them all to the sword, and to possess himself of all the Country beyond the river, even to the lake lake Asphaltis, except the Castle of Macheron, and to having appointed Garrisons through the Towns and winter quarters for his soldiers, he comes to Cefarea and there winters.

Vespasian having received news of the stirrs that were raised in Gallia by Vindex, who had armed the Gauls against the Romans, made him more earnest to finish the war against the Jews, wherefore in the beginning of the Spring, he leads his army out of Cefarea, and runs through all Judea, and Idumea, and waisting it, brings back his army, and leads them through Samaria to Jericho, from whence the inhabitants fly into the mountain Country opposite to Jerusalem, but he pursues them, and bearing them from the hills, by setting citadels at Jericho and other places, begins the Jews on every side.

Some promised to themselves (Nero being forsaken) the government of the East, from the Kingdom of Jerusalem, but most the recovery of their ancient fortune. [Sueton. in Nero. cap. 40.]

Nero pronounced of himself that he was undone, when he heard that Galba and Spain had revolted from him, [id. ibid. cap. 42.] and at length he flew himself on the ninth day of June, when he had reigned thirteen yeares and eight moneths.

On the Kalends of January in Germany, the images of Galba are thrown down, and on the third day Vitellius is saluted Emperour by the army, and on the 15. day of the same moneth Galba is killed, seven moneths after the death of Nero. [Tacit. Histor. lib. 1.]

Galba being taken out of the way, Otho is created Emperour by the soldiers, not knowing that Vitellius had taken upon him the Empire. Dio writes that he was killed the 90. day of his reign, and Suetonius that he was buried the 95.

Tiberius Alexander the Governour of Egypt was the first that swore the Legions to Vespasian on the Kalends of July, which day of his entrance into the empire was afterwards kept a festival, then the Jewish army on the V. Ides of July swore to him, [Suet. in Vespasian. cap. 6. with Tacit. lib. 2. hislor. cap. 79.] Dio notes that there was but one year and 22. daies between the death of Nero and the beginning of the reign of Vespasian.

When Vespasian, being returned to Cefarea, prepared to goe with his whole army to besiege Jerusalem, news was brought him of Nero's death, which news having received, he deterrs the war against the Jews, and sends his son Titus to Galba, who had succeeded to Nero, to know his pleasure concerning the Jewish war. Titus going by ship to Achaia, heard there that Galba was killed, whereupon he presently returns to his father to Cefarea, they being in suspense, (and the Empire as it were tottering) deferred the wars of Judea, and being afraid least some hurt should come unto their own Country, they thought it not a convenient time to invade a strange Country.

In the mean time Simon the son of Giora, (concerning whom something is spoken formerly) a bold and valiant young man went from Massada, whither he had fled to the murderers into the mountain Country of Judea, and by promises of liberty to servants, and rewards to the freemen, in short time got a band of thieves, and by little and little increasing his forces, he waisted not onely villages, but invades Cities, he came also in short time to that power, that he conquered all Idumea, and waisted Judea, and at last came before Jerusalem, where pitching his tents, he became a terror both to them of Jerusalem, and to the Zelots also, and thus were the Citizens of Jerusalem grievously oppressed on both sides, within by the Zelots whom John commanded, and without by Simon a most cruell man, in the mean time the Idumeans who were of Iohans party, and were among his forces, falling at variance with him and fighting with him killed many of the Zelots, and then, taking Iohans palace and burning it, forced him with his party to fly into the temple, but then they fearing, as also did the Citizens, lest that by night he should make an excursion into the City, and burn it, they took counsell, and send for Simon, and admit him into the City, that they might defend themselves against him, whom having received they assault the temple, but the Zelots fighting valiantly, they seek to win it by assault.

Vespasian having left Cefarea, comes to Berytus and Antioch, from whence he sends Mutianus with forces into Italy; but he himself goes to Alexandria.

In Mesia Antonius Primus that followed Vespasians party, leads the third Legion into Italy against the party of Vitellius, and in a fight at Cremona against the Vitellians, he puts them to flight, and beates them, then coming to Rome and being joyned with Mutianus in the middest of the City, he overthrowes Vitellus's army, and dragging dragging Vitellius himself through the Market-place, there cuts his throat. Mutianus makes Domitian the son of Vespasian Prince of the Empire, in the mean time that his father came out of Syria.

Vespasian hearing these things at Alexandria, sends his son Titus with forces into Judea, for to finish the rest of the war of Judea; but he himself saileth into Italy.

Moreover whilst Titus stayed at Alexandria, the City of Jerusalem was divided into a threefold faction. For Simon whom the Citizens of Jerusalem had sent against John, and admitted into the City, kept the higher City, and some part of the Tower: and John with his Zelots had possessed the Temple and the other part of the lower City: and the last faction is divided again into two; For Eleazar who was the first Commander and Captain of the Zelots, taking it in dudgeon that John by his boldness and subtilty got the government to himself, and to do all things at his own pleasure, departs from him, and taking some followers with him, possessed himself by them, of the inner part of the Temple, and from thence fights against John. Eleazar was inferior to John in number of men, but his superiority in the fire and quality of the place: and so upon John who held the outward circuit of the Temple and the Porches there lay a double war, one against Eleazar, and the other against Simon: and so some fighting against others, they burnt many things about the Temple, and spoiled the corn, and many necessaries for victual, which might have sufficed them a long time; which things being spoiled and consumed, they were oppressed with famine afterwards, when they were besieged by the Romans.

Titus coming from Alexandria to Cefarea, and there gathering his forces together, to wit, four Legions, and the auxiliaries of the neighbour Kings, marcheth towards Jerusalem, and pitcheth his Camp some six or seven furlongs off the City, a little before the Feast of unleavened bread, and by that means shut up within the City an infinite multitude of men, that had after the custom gone up to the Feast, by which in a short time a most cruel famine oppressed the City; where all food and nourishment is in short time consumed, a most horrid and memorable example whereof happened at that time there, of a mother that devoured her own child: and in the Feast day of unleavened bread, being the 14. of April, whenas Eleazar, who had seized upon the inner Temple, had opened the gate of the Temple that the people might sacrifice, John taking hold of this opportunity, sends privately many of his party armed privately with swords under their garments, who being admitted into the Temple with the rest of the multitude, let upon Eleazar, and seize upon the inner Temple, together with the slaughter of many of the Zelots; and so the faction that was threefold, is now made twofold; to wit, one of Johns who were in number 8400. and the other of Simons, with whom were 10000 men, besides 5000. Idumeans.

Titus coming near the walls, pitched his Camp near the Tower Psephina, and presently raising a mound, shakes the wall with a Ram, and beates it down by force: and on the seventh of May breaks into the City, the first wall being beaten down, and the Jews retiring inwards, he possessed himself of the North quarter of the City, even to the Castle of Antonia, and the valley of Cedron. On the fifth day, after a certain Tower of the second wall being shaken and beaten down with the Ram from the North quarter, he gets the new lower City; from which he is repulsed again by the Jews: but on the fourth day after he repossesseth it, and addresseth himself for the assault of the third wall. And on the 13. of May, commands four mounds to be raised, two at the Castle of Antonia, by which he hoped to gain the Temple, and two at John the High Priests Tomb, by which he hoped to gain the upper City; but John resisted the Romans at Antonia, and Simon at Johns Tomb. Those mounds being perfected on the 29. of May which were making 17. daies, and the Romans beginning to shake the walls John by a mine from Antonia calls down one mound, and burns it, and Simon the second day after in a folly that he made, sets on fire two mounds opposite to him, together with the Rams and other Engines, and the Jews set upon the Romans in their Camp; but by Titus his coming from Antonia, they are again forced into the City.

The former mounds being spoiled and burnt, Titus thought fit to raise new ones, from which he might assault the City, and also to compass the City with a wall that none might flee out of it, nor any thing be brought into it. Whereupon in three daies space he built a wall about the City, of the circuit of 39 furlongs, and about the wall he built 23 Castles, each Castle containing ten furlongs: whereupon famine prevailed in the City, and so cruelly raged, that not only the common people died of it, but the seditious also were mightily oppressed by it: and so great was the number of them that perished by famine and pestilence, that from the 14. of April, (on which day the siege began) to the Kalends of July, that thorough one gate (as Mannas one that fled, and was to take the account reported ) there were carried out 115 800 carcases of poor people that were buried at the common charge, besides those that were buried by their kinsmen and friends : a little after it was known from them that fled, that there were 60000 that were carried out of the gates to burial : and whereas afterwards there were not enow to bury the poor, they cast them in great heaps together in empty houses, and shut the doors upon them : and the manner of burial of them was no other, then throwing them over the walls and filling up the ditches with them.

In the mean time Simon within the City refrained not from murders and rapines ; for he put to death Matthias the High Priest, being accused of treachery, as though he would have fled to the Romans, (and by whose means he was let into the City) with three of his sons, and fifteen of the nobles of the people, all of them uncon- demned : and moreover he raged with such cruelty, that Judas, one of his Captains, hating his cruelty, had a consultation of delivering a Town to the Romans, of which he had the charge : but being prevented by Simon, he with ten that were of counsel with him, were put to death : and John being compelled by necessity, converts to his own and to prophane uses the holy things of the Temple, as Vessels of Gold and Silver, and the money of the Temple : nay, he was compelled to distribute to his Souldiers the very Oyl and Wine which was dedicated for divine service.

Titus also fetching materials from every place, and cutting down woods, and all trees, even to 90 furlongs off, with great labour within 21 dayes, caused new Mounts to be raised, and he made four about Antonia, one upon every side of the Castle. Which when John had cowardly and in vain attempted, they were repulsed by the Romans : and the Romans, on the Kalends of July, began to bring the Ram to the wall of Antonia, by which a breach being made on the fifth of July, they brake into Antonia, and pursue the flying Jews, even into the Temple. But after a long skirmish the Romans being for some time repulsed ; on the 17 of July (on which day the continual sacrifice termed by the Greeks ἱεράματα, was not solemnised for very want of men.) Josephus (by Titus his command) in vain exhorts the seditious to a yielding : and on the seventh day after, he brings his Mounts nearer, the materials of which were brought an hundred furlongs off, and overturning the foundations of Antonia, made an easie ascent unto the Temple, and breaking in by Antonia, seizeth upon the North and West Porches of the outward range of the Temple : part of which Porches, especially that that was joynted to Antonia, was burnt and overthrowen by the Jews, and two dayes after, the other part was burnt by the Romans, Sc. 24. of July, the Jews not quenching the fire, but letting it run on, that for the porch might be clearly separated from Antonia.

On the 27 day the Jews again burn the West Porch to the bridge that leadeth to the Gallery, whither many Romans getting up were burnt, (the Jews flying for the nonce) But on the day after, the Romans burnt all the North Porch, even to the Eastern Porch.

And on the eighth of August, when as Titus prevailed nothing by battering with the Ram the wall of the inner Temple, neither by undermining the foundations of the gates, by reason of the great noise and strong clement of the stones ; neither could the Romans by their ladders get up into the Porches, the Jews still beating them back from above : at last, that that he had deferred to do for the reverence of the place being compelled by necessity he did ; Sc. He commanded the gates of the inner Temple to be set on fire : which being on fire, the Porches which were joynted to them were all on a flame also : The Jews beholding and wondering at it, but not endeavouring to stop and quench the fire for very amazement, and so the Porches burnt all that day, and the following night. And whereas Titus and his Captains had determined to keep the Temple from firing, he could by no means bring it to pass. For on the tenth of August, when as the Romans which kept Corps due guard in the outward range of the Temple, being provoked by the Jews, had made a charge upon them who quenched the fire of the inner range, and had driven them into the very Temple, a Roman Souldier took a flaming fire brand, and getting upon his fellows shoulders, casts the fire through the golden window into the houles and chambers that were built on the North side of the Temple, which immediately taking fire, burnt the Temple also which joynted unto them, Titus in vain commanding his his Souldiers to quench the fire. And this was done in the second year of Vespasian, in the same month, and the same day of the month that it was formerly burnt by Nebuchadnezar.

After the Temple was pillaged and burnt, and the Ensigns set on the East gate of the Temple ; and having done sacrifice, Titus is proclaimed Emperour by the army ; and then he from the bridge, by which the Temple is joynted to the City upon a Gal- lery lery, exhorts by an interpreter, the seditious to yield, who had fled into the upper City who when they refused, although he offered them their lives, to commit themselves to his arbitrament, and asked that they might have leave to depart the City with their wives and children, and to go into the wilderness : at which Titus taking scorn, threatens them with utter destruction, commanding all the lower City to be set on fire, and the Palace Acra which he had seized on : but the higher City which was seated on a steep Rock, he began to assault, and beginning to arile his mounts on the 20 of August, and portecting them on the seventh of September, he brings his Engines to the walls, wherein having made a breach, the Tyrants flee with their guards for fear and amazement, and on the eighth of September, the Romans brake in and deftroyed all with fire and sword.

Dio notes that Jerusalem was destroyed on a Saturday, which day the Jews most religiously observe ; whether having respect to the day of the Cities being taken, (for the eighth of September fell this year on a Sabbath-day) or of the Cities being destroyed : for Titus commanded all the Citie and Temple to be raled to the foundation, and to be laid plain, (and also to be ploughed according to the customs) except the West part of the wall onely, and three Towers, Hippicon, Phaelus, and Mariamne, which for their great beauty and strength, he had a mind to leave for a monument to posterity, of the magnificence of that City.

When as Titus had thus taken the City, and had filled all places with dead bodies, the neighbour Nations would needs have him crowned, but he answered them, that he was unworthy of that honour : for it was not he that was the author of the work, but that he had given his hands to God, that had shed his anger against the Jews. [Philistratus in vita Apollonii, l. 6. c. 14.] Yet there are coins of Titus, marked with a Trophy, and a Tryumphal Chariot : as also of Vespasian, with the image of a woman sitting sorrowfull under a Palm Tree, and with the inscription, (I)UDEA CAPTA S. C. as also money was coined about the end of the 21 year of King Agrippa, with an inscription in Greek, ΑΥΤΟΚΡΑΤΩΡ ΟΥΡΩΝ ΚΑΙ ΑΝΩΝ ΚΑΙ ΑΓΡΑΠΙΟΥ ΔΑΔΙΑΣ ΕΛΛΕΡΚΥΙΑΣ ΕΤΕΙ ΚΑ ΑΡΙΠΗ Π. (i. e.) Vespasian Emperour and Cæsar, Judea was taken in the year 21 of Agrippa.

Titus having finished the war, rewarded the Souldiers, and commits the custody of Jerusalem to the tenth Legion, but the twelfth Legion which had fought unfortunately under Cestius he banished out of Syria, and sent them to Euphrates, into the confines of Armenia and Cappadocia, he himself with the fifth and sixteenth Legion, came to Cesarea on the sea coast, whither he gathered together all the prey and spoiles and the Captives, because the winter season toroad him to faile into Italy.

The two Tyrants, John and Simon, were taken as they lay hid in the vaults of Jerusalem ; of whom John was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and Simon was reserved for the Triumph. In the same vaults were found 2000 men, who either perished for hunger, or each killed the other, rather than they would yield themselves to the Romans.

Titus tarried at Cesarea, where he celebrated the birth-day of his brother Domitian, (which fell on the 30 of December, where the number of the Jews that perished with fighting with wild beasts, and that burned with fire, and that fell by fighting one against the other, exceeded the number of 2500.

Afterwards Titus came to Berytus in Pœnicia, where he tarried longer, and solemnized the birth-day of his father, (Sc. of his Empire) which as we have taught out of Suetonius and Tacitus was wont to be observed on the Kalends of July) with great magnificence, there a multitude of Captives also perished in the like manner as before.

Titus going to see Antiochia and other Cities of Syria, and then by Judea and Jerusalem, being accompanied with the fifth and sixteenth Legion, goes into Egypte to Alexandria, and from thence failes to Rome, where he was welcomed home by all men, and, together with his father, Tryumphed for the conquest of Judea.

The two Captains of the seditious, John and Simon, were led in that Triumph, and 700 other Jews that excelled in strength and beauty, of whom Simon onely suffered death, (called by Dio Barporos) The law also of the Jews was carried in this Tryumph, as the last of the spoils, which, together with the purple vails of the Sanctuary were laid up in the Palace.

From this victory both father and son got the name of Emperours, yet neither of them was called Judaicus, although many other things, and especially Tryumphal Arches were decreed for them, [Xiphilin. ex Dion.] and there remains yet at the foot of the hill Palatine, a Marble Tryumphal Arch, erected to the honour of Titus, out of which there is a copy expressed by Villalpandus of the instruments of the Temple that were carried in Triumph. [Tom. 2. explanat. on Ezechiel, lib. 5. cap. 7. pag. 587.]

Lucilius Bassus was sent Lieutenant into Judea, who receiving the army from Censil Vitellianus, had the Castle Herodian with the Garrison yielded unto him: and shortly after, he took the strong Castle Macheron beyond Jordan by assault.

It happened even in our time, that neither Sun nor Moon were seen, for 12. (others say 15. dayes) the Vespasian being Emperours, the Father the third time (perhaps the fourth) and the son the second time being Consuls: saith Pliny, [lib. 2. cap. 13.] which some think were foretold by our Saviour. [Mathew, XXIV. 29.]

Cæsar wrote to Tiberius Maximus the Governour of Judea, that he should tell all the land of the Jews. He imposed also a tribute upon all the Jews wheresoever they lived; and commanded them to bring in every year into the Capitol two drachmes as they were wont to pay in former time to the Temple of Jerusalem.

In the fourth year of Vespasian, Cæcennius Petrus, Governour of Syria, drove Antiochus the King of Commagene out of his kingdom, who himself fled into Cilicia, and his son unto the Parthians: but both of them being afterwards reconciled to Vespasian, he is restored to his kingdom. [Joseph.]

The Abani brake into Media, and waste it all over, the King Pacorus fleeing before them; they afterwards passe into Armenia, to whom Tiridates the King opposing himself, he is almost taken in the very battle. [Id.]

Amongst the Jews, Bassus being dead, Publius Silva succeeds in the government of Judea. He on the 15 day of April wins by force that impregnable Castle of Masfada, that was seized upon by Eleazar, the Nephew of Judas Galilæus, the Captain of the thieves: all the thieves that were in the Castle to the number of 900, with their wives and children, at the persuasion of Eleazar putting each other to death, having first burnt the Castle with all the household stuff, lest they should come into the power of the Romans: and so all the reliques of the Jewish wars are taken away, and all Judea is quieted.

Many of the thieves that escaped from Judea, fled & came into Egypt to Alexandria, where they solicit the Jews to revolt: but the common people being persuaded by their Rulers fell upon those thieves, and took 600 hundred of them, whom they deliver to the Romans to be punished: the rest that escaped into Egypt and Thebes were also taken. Concerning which business, Cæsar having advice, he commandeth Lupus, then Governour of Alexandria, that he should pull down the Temple of the Jews (that was built a long while ago in Egypt, by Onias the brother of the High Priest). But Lupus did no more than take away some gifts out of the Temple, and so shut it up: but Paulinus his successor in the government, having taken away all the gifts, and shutting up the doors, made an order that none should come thither; so that there was not so much as any foot-step of Religion left there.

A certain Jew, a weaver, Jonathan by name, attached to Cyrene, where raising a tumult, he drew 2000 Jews into the Wilderness: when Catullus (or Catulus) the Governour of Libia Pentapolis, sending Horic and Foot, easily overthrew them. Jonathan being brought before him, he falsely accused the most wealthy of the Jews to be the chief authors of this project: so whose accusations Catullus willingly giving ear, he put 3000 of them to death at once. And this he did the more securely, because he confiscated their estates to Cæsar's revenues. Jonathan also is sent prisoner by him with others that were taken to Rome to Vespasian, that he might accuse the most honest of them that lived at Rome and Alexandria of innovation. Who affirmed also amongst others, that Josephus the Writer of the Jewish History, lent to him both arms, and money. But Vespasian, knowing that this accusation was not lawfully brought against these men, he at Titus his intreaty acquitted them: but deservedly punisheth Jonathan; for having first scourged him, he was burnt alive. Catullus also through the mercy of the Princes [suffered then no chastisement, but not long after he was taken with a complicated and incurable disease, and he was tortured and tormented in his mind (for he thought he saw the ghosts of them that he had killed always before him) at last his guts and bowels rotting and issuing out of him, he died. [Joseph, lib. 7. bell. cap. ult. and in his Life.]

Here Joseph endeth the History of the destruction of Judea: who being taken in this war, and made a freeman by Flavius Vespasian the Emperour, took the name of Flavianus from his Patron.

Cornelius and Suetonius relate that there were 600000. Jews killed in this war, but Josephus a Jew, and a commander in that war, and who deserved thanks and pardon from Vespasian for foretelling him he should be Emperour, writes that 1000000. perished by sword and famine, and of the rest of the Jews that were dispersed all the world over, and put to death divers waies, the number is said to be 900000. So Orofius [lib. 7. cap. 9.] but I find not the number of 600000, of them that were killed in Suetonius, in Josephus [lib. 6. bell. cap. 17.] the number of captives is 97000, but other other number of 1100000 is only of them that perished in the six months siege of Jerusalem, but of those that perished out of Jerusalem, through the whole seven years, Iustus Liplus made this catalogue out of Josephus. [in lib. 2. de Constantia. cap. 21.]

Which number of the dead, being added to the 1100000. that perished at the siege of Jerusalem, makes up the number of 1337490. an innumerable company being omitted that perished through famine, banishment, and other miseries. Iustus Tiberienus in his Chronicle of the Kings of the Jews, shews that Agrippa the last King of the race of Herod, had his Kingdom augmented by Vespasian, [apud Photi. in Bibliotheca. cod. 33.] Dio relates that he had Prætorian honours given him, his sister Berenice that came to Rome with him dwelt in the Pallace: for Titus was so in love with her that he made her believe he would marry her, and the carried all things as if she had been his wife, but Titus when he knew that the people of Rome did not take it well, he put her away, [Sueton. in Tit. cap. 7. & Xiphilin. ex Dion.] Of the rest of Herods progeny, the observation of Josephus is very memorable, [lib. 18. Antiquit. cap. 7.] That they all failed, although it was very numerous, within an hundred years. And this was the Period of the Jewish affairs.
